Ver. 39. And they came, &c.] To the priſon in perſon, as Paul had inſiſted on they ſhould: and beſought them; that they would put up the injury that had been done them, and quietly depart out of priſon: and brought them out; that is, out of priſon; took them by the arms, and led them out, as they had put them in, which was what the apoſtle required: and deſired them to depart out of the city; leſt there ſhould be any further diſturbance about them: in Beza's moſt ancient copy, and in another manuſcript copy, this verſe is read thus, and which more clearly explains the paſſage; "and they came "with many friends unto the priſon, and deſired "them to go out, ſaying, we are not ignorant of "your caſe, that you are righteous men; and bringing them out they beſought them, ſaying, go "out of this city, leſt they (the people) ſhould turn "again upon you, crying againſt you;" which looks as if they took along with them ſome perſons, who were friends to the Apoſtles as well as to them, to prevail upon them to depart quietly; and they excuſe themſelves by attributing what had paſt to popular rage and fury, and pretend they conſulted the ſafety of the apoſtles, by deſiring them to go out of the city.

Ver. 40. And they went out of the priſon, &c.] In a public manner, with great honour and reputation, at the requeſt of the magiſtrates that put them there: and entered into the houſe of Lydia; whom Paul had baptized, ver. 14, 15. The word houſe is rightly ſupplied, for the ſenſe is not, that they went into the country of Lydia, as ſome have been tempted to think; but they went to the woman Lydia, whoſe heart the Lord had opened, and was become a diſciple and follower of Chriſt; they went to her houſe, it being in the city of Philippi, where ſhe now abode: and when they had ſeen the brethren; the men of Lydia's houſe, her ſervants, who were converted, and had been baptized with her, and are therefore called brethren; and whomſoever elſe they might have been inſtrumental in the converſion of, who might meet them in Lydia's houſe: in Beza's above mentioned copy, tis here added, they declared what the Lord had done for them; they related the earthquake, and the effects of it, and how they had been uſeful for the converſion of the goaler and his family, who had been baptized by them, and by what means they were releaſed from priſon; all which they aſcribe to the Lord, who has all power, and the hearts of all in his hands: and thus, they comforted them; with what God had done for them, or exhorted them; to cleave to the Lord, to continue in the faith, and abide by the truths and ordinances of the Goſpel: and departed; that is, out of the city of Philippi; this is wanting in the Syriac and Arabic verſions here, but is placed in the beginning of the next chapter: and now theſe two families, Lydia's and the goaler's, laid the foundation of a Goſpel-church in this city of Philippi, and which continued for ages after; Eraſtus, of whom mention is made in chap. xix. 22. is ſaid to be biſhop of this church, and it may be alſo Epaphroditus, for there were more biſhops than one in this church in the Apoſtle's time, Phil. i. 1. and ii. 25. and iv. 18. in the ſecond century there was a church, to which Ignatius and Polycarp are ſaid to ſend epiſtles; and there are epiſtles to the Philippians which go under their names, that are ſtill extant: in the third century, Tertullian[o] among other churches, makes mention of the church at Philippi, as ſound in the faith; and in the fourth and fifth centuries we read of a church in this place; in the ſeventh century, when it went by the name of Chryſopolis, there was a church in it, and a biſhop of it, who was preſent at the ſixth council in Conſtantinople; there were chriſtians dwelling here in the ninth century[p].

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. NOW when they had paſſed thro' Amphipolis, &c.] A city of Macedonia, where it is placed by Pliny[q]; according to Ptolomy[r], it was in that part of Macedonia, which is called Edonis, and was near Philippi, and lay in the way from thence to Theſſalonica; Harpocratian[s] ſays, it was a city of Thrace, formerly called the nine ways; it was upon the borders of Thrace, and had its name Amphipolis from the river Strymon running on both ſides of it, making it a peninſula; it was alſo called Crademna, and Anadræmum; it is now in the hands of the Turks, and by them called Empoli; this city was originally built by Cimon the Athenian, into which he ſent ten thouſand Athenians for a colony, as the writer of his life reports[t]. The Apoſtle only paſſed thro' this place; it does not appear that he at all preached in it, or at any other time, nor do we read of it in Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, nor of the following place: and Apollonia; this is alſo placed by Pliny[u] in Macedonia, and ſaid by him to have been formerly a colony of the Corinthians, and about ſeven miles from the ſea; and by Ptolomy[w], in that part of Macedonia called Mygdonia, and with him its name is Apollonia of Mygdonia; it was ſituated by the river Echedorus, and was famous for Auguſtus Cæſar's learning Greek here, and is now called Ceres: there was another of this name in the region of Pentapolis, and was one of the five[x] cities in it; and another in Paleſtine mentioned by Pliny[y], along with Ceſarea; and by Joſephus[z], with Joppa, Jamnia, Azotus, &c. but this was near Theſſalonica; it is ſaid to be about twenty miles from it: here alſo the Apoſtle did not ſtay to preach the Goſpel, nor is there any mention made of it elſewhere in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and yet Marcus ſiſter's ſon to Barnabas, is ſaid to be biſhop of Apollonia; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. but whether the ſame place with this, or whether fact is not certain: they came to Theſſalonica; a free city of Macedonia[a]; it was formerly called Halis[b], and ſometimes Therme; it had its name of Theſſalonica from the victory which Philip king of Macedon, obtained over the Theſſalians; and not from his daughter Theſſalonica, the wife of Caſſander, who alſo had her name from the ſame victory: in this place a ſedition being raiſed, and ſome magiſtrates killed, Theodoſius the Roman emperor ſuffered ſeven thouſand men to be ſlain; and when he came to Milain, Ambroſe biſhop of that place having heard of it, would not ſuffer him to enter into the church and receive the Lord's ſupper, until he repented of his ſin, and made public confeſſion of it[c]. Theſſalonica has been ſince, the head of a new kingdom erected by Boniface marquiſs of Montferrat; it was for ſome time in the hands of the Venetians, but was taken from them by Amurath emperor of the Turks[d]. The Italians call it now Saloniki; it has been ſince inhabited by Chriſtians, Turks, and Jews, and chiefly by the latter; their number, according to their own account, is fourteen thouſand, and their ſynagogues fourſcore. There always were many Jews in this place, and ſo there were when the Apoſtle was here, for it follows; where was a ſynagogue of the Jews; it ſeems as if there was none, neither in Philippi, nor in Amphipolis, nor in Apollonia: why theſe two laſt places ſhould be paſſed thro' by the Apoſtle, without making any ſtay at them, cannot be ſaid; it is very likely he had, as in ſome other inſtances before, ſome particular directions from the Spirit of God, there being none of the choſen veſſels of ſalvation to be called there, at leaſt, at this time, when there were many at Theſſalonica.

Ver. 2. And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, &c.] To the Jews in their ſynagogue; for tho' the Jews had put away the Goſpel from them, and the Apoſtle had turned to the Gentiles; yet he ſtill retained a great affection for his countrymen the Jews, and as often as he had opportunity, attended their ſynagogues, in order to preach the Goſpel to them: and three ſabbath-days reaſoned with them out of the ſcriptures; that is, out of the Old Teſtament, concerning the Meſſiah, the characters of him, the work that he was to do, and how he was to ſuffer and die for the ſins of men; and this he did three weeks running, going to their ſynagogue every ſabbath-day, when and where the Jews met for worſhip; and made uſe of books, which they allowed of, and of arguments they could not diſprove.

Ver. 3. Opening, &c.] That is, the ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament, explaining and expounding them, giving the true ſenſe of them; ſo this word is frequently uſed in Jewiſh writings[e], as that ſuch a Rabbi פתח, opened, ſuch a ſcripture: and alledging, that Chriſt muſt needs have ſuffered, and riſen again from the dead; he ſet this matter in a clear light, and made it plain and manifeſt, from the writings of the Old Teſtament, that there was a neceſſity of the Meſſiah's ſuffering and riſing from the dead; or otherwiſe theſe ſcriptures would not have been fulfilled, which have ſaid that ſo it muſt be; for theſe things were not only neceſſary on account of God's decrees, and the covenant-tranſactions the Son of God entred into, and on the account of the ſalvation of his people; but becauſe of the types, promiſes, and prophecies of the Old Teſtament: the ſcriptures which the Apoſtle opened and ſet before them, and reaſoned upon, ſhewing the neceſſity of theſe things, very likely were ſuch as theſe, Gen. iii. 15. Pſal. xxii. Iſ. liii. Dan. ix. Pſal. xvi. 10. Hoſ. vi. 2. with many others: and that this Jeſus whom I preach unto you is Chriſt; he ſhewed that all the things which were ſpoken of Chriſt, or the Meſſiah, in thoſe ſcriptures, were fulfilled in Jeſus of Nazareth, who was the ſubject matter, the ſum and ſubſtance of his miniſtry; and therefore he muſt be the Meſſiah, and the only Saviour and redeemer of loſt ſinners.

Ver. 4. And ſome of them believed, &c.] That is, ſome of the Jews; power went along with the word, and faith came by it, and they believed that Jeſus of Nazareth was the true Meſſiah, and that what the Apoſtle preached concerning him was the truth; and this they received in the love of it, and cordially embraced it, and made a profeſſion of it: and conſorted with Paul and Silas; aſſociated with them, and privately converſed with them, as well as publickly attended their miniſtry; for when ſouls are converted, they love to be in company with believers, and eſpecially with the miniſters of the Goſpel, to hear their diſcourſes, and learn from them the doctrines of grace: and of the devout Greeks a great multitude; theſe were Gentiles who were proſelytes to the Jewiſh religion; and theſe in greater numbers believed, and joined themſelves to the Apoſtles, and became followers of them, than there were of the Jews, who were the moſt averſe to the Goſpel, and were more hardened, and incredulous: and of the chief women not a few; ſome of the wives of the principal men of the city, were become proſelytes to the Jews, and theſe attending ſynagogue worſhip, and hearing the diſcourſes of Paul from time to time, were convinced and converted, and profeſſed faith in Chriſt Jeſus; and theſe converts laid the foundation of a Goſpel-church in Theſſalonica, of which church Sylvanus is ſaid to be the firſt biſhop; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. In the ſecond century there were martyrs for Chriſt here; and to the inhabitants of this place, Antoninus Pius the emperor wrote in behalf of the chriſtians there, to give them no diſturbance[f]: in the third century there was a church here; Tertullian[g] makes mention of it: in the fourth century [h]Theodoſius the emperor was baptized at Theſſalonica, by Acholius biſhop of that place; who firſt aſked him what faith he profeſſed, to which he replied, that he embraced and profeſſed that faith which the churches in Illyricum, who were not yet infected with the Arian hereſy, namely the ſame which was of old delivered by the Apoſtles, and afterwards confirmed at the ſynod at Nice; in this century Ireminus, Paulinus, and Alexander were biſhops of Theſſalonica: in the fifth century it was a Metropolitan of Macedonia, and Anyſius was biſhop of it, and ſo were Rufus and Anaſtaſius: and that there was a church here in the ſixth century is manifeſt from hence, that their biſhops for fear of the emperor Anaſtaſius, agreed with Timothy biſhop of Conſtantinople, whom the council at Chalcedon had anathematized; and in this age pope Gregory among others, wrote to Euſebius biſhop of Theſſalonica, that he would not receive any of a military habit into monaſteries within three years: in the ſeventh century a biſhop of this place aſſiſted at the ſixth council at Conſtantinople; and in the ſame age it was the ſeat of an archbiſhop: in the eighth century there was one Thomas biſhop of this place, and alſo Theophilus who was preſent at the Nicene ſynod: in the ninth century a biſhop of Theſſalonica was beaten with two hundred ſtripes, for being againſt image-worſhip.

Ver. 5. But the Jews which believed not, &c.] The Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, and Syriac verſions leave out the words, which believed not; but whether this character is expreſſed or not, it is certain that the unbelieving Jews are here intended: moved with envy; at the ſucceſs of the Apoſtles, many of their own people and of their proſelytes, and ſome of the better ſort being converted by them: or with zeal; for what they called the glory of God, but it was not according to knowledge; it was a blind and ignorant zeal, a zeal for the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moſes, and for the traditions of the elders: took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baſer ſort; or of the market folks, who ſat and ſold things in the market, and were generally of the meaner and vulgar ſort, as the word may ſignify; or who ſtood idle in the market-place, ſquandring away their time in an idle manner, not caring to work, and ſo were fit perſons, and who could eaſily be gathered together, for ſuch ſervice as the unbelieving Jews employed them in; or they were a ſort of officers and ſervants, that attended courts of judicature, and cited perſons thither, and aſſiſted in the buſineſs done there, and who were commonly men of profligate and abandoned lives: and gathered a company, and ſet all the city in an uproar; they raiſed a mob, and made a clamour, which brought people out of their houſes to enquire what was the matter, and ſo gave great diſturbance and uneaſineſs to the inhabitants: and aſſaulted the houſe of Jaſon; who by what follows appears to have been a diſciple of Chriſt, a believer in him, and the hoſt of the Apoſtle and his companions, who being an inhabitant of Theſſalonica, at leaſt having a dwelling-houſe there, received them into it. This Jaſon is ſaid to be one of the ſeventy diſciples, and afterwards biſhop of Tarſus, but this is not certain; nor whether he was a Jew or a Greek, very probably the former: we read of Jaſon the brother of Onias the high-prieſt, a Jew, 2 Maccab. iv. 7. whoſe name was Jeſus, the ſame with Joſhuah, but as Joſephus[l] ſays, he called himſelf Jaſon; and ſo this man's Hebrew name might be Jeſus or Joſhua, and his Greek name Jaſon; and very likely he was a believer in Chriſt before the Apoſtle came to Theſſalonica, and it may be is the ſame who is ſpoken of in Rom. xvi. 21. ſee the note there. Some of the ancients[k] make mention of a diſputation between Jaſon a chriſtian Hebrew, and Papiſcus an Alexandrian Jew, but there is no reaſon to believe that he is the Jaſon here ſpoken of: and ſought to bring them out to the people; they expected to have found Paul and Silas in Jaſon's houſe, where they lodged, and their intention was to have dragged them out and expoſed them to popular fury, to be beaten or ſtoned by the people; and ſo the Arabic verſion reads, requiring thoſe two Apoſtles, that they might ſet them before the people; or put them into the hands of the mob, which they had gathered, to do as they would with them.

Ver. 6. And when they found them not, &c.] In Jaſon's houſe, as they expected: they drew Jaſon, and certain brethren; the Syriac verſion adds, who were there; in Jaſon's houſe, who either came along with the Apoſtle, and lodged with him there; or they were ſome of the inhabitants of Theſſalonica, who were lately converted and were come thither in order to have ſome chriſtian converſation; theſe with Jaſon the rabble ſeized on, and in a rude and violent manner dragged them out of the houſe, and had them, unto the rulers of the city; the civil magiſtrates, the judges in courts of judicature, to which ſome of theſe belonged; crying; in a very noiſy and clamorous way; theſe that have turned the world upſide down; the Syriac verſion reads, the whole earth: the Apoſtles, according to the cry of theſe men, had thrown the whole world into diſorder, and had made diſturbances in kingdoms and cities, wherever they came; and had made innovations in religion, and turned men from their old way of worſhip to another; theſe, ſay they, are come hither alſo; to make the like diſorders and diſturbances, as elſewhere.

Ver. 7. Whom Jaſon hath received, &c.] Into his houſe in a private manner, and has entertained, contrary to law, which forbids men to receive and entertain perſons of ſeditious principles, and practices, for this is mentioned as a charge againſt Jaſon: and theſe all do contrary to the decrees of Cæſar; both the Apoſtle and thoſe with him, and Jaſon, and the brethen, whom they now had ſet before the magiſtrates, who were all of the ſame ſentiments and practices; and which were oppoſite to the decrees of the Roman emperor, and the Roman ſenate, who ſuffered none to be called a king but whom they pleaſed; whereas theſe men taught, ſaying, that there is another king, one Jeſus: but then tho' they ſaid he was a king, yet not a temporal one, but one whoſe kingdom was ſpiritual, and not of this world; and therefore aſſerted nothing contrary to the decrees of Cæſar, or what was in the leaſt prejudicial to his worldly intereſt and glory.

Ver. 8. And they troubled the people, and the rulers of the city, &c.] Fearing ſome revolution would be made, and ſome new king, or rather tyrant, would ſtart up, and uſurp a power over them; or that they ſhould come under ſome ſuſpicion or charge with the Roman government, and ſhould be called to an account, for admitting ſuch men and tenets among them; with ſuch fears were they poſſeſſed, when they heard theſe things; alledged againſt the Apoſtle and his company.

Ver. 9. And when they had taken ſecurity of Jaſon, and of the other, &c.] That is, received ſatisfaction from them, by the defence which they made for themſelves, and the Apoſtles, by the account that they gave of them and of their doctrines; whereby it plainly appeared to the full ſatisfaction of the magiſtrates, that their principles had no tendency to move ſedition, or to alter the form of their government, or to do any thing detrimental to Cæſar, as was ſuggeſted: the Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, took ſureties; of them for their good behaviour, and that they would be forth coming, when ever called for: they let them go; about their buſineſs, to their own houſes, and company, and did not inflict any puniſhment upon them, or commit them to priſon.

Ver. 10. And the brethren, &c.] The believers in Theſſalonica, the young converts there, who were full of love and affection to their ſpiritual fathers: immediately ſent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea; another city in Macedonia: and ſo it is placed by Pliny [l], in the north part of it; and, according to Ptolomy [m], it was in that part of Macedonia called Emathia, and was not far from Pella, the native place of Alexander the great. It is now called Veria; ſome ſay it was called Beræa from Beræa, daughter of Beres, ſon of Macedo, by whom it is ſaid to have been built; others from Pheron; and ſome think it has ſome agreement with the Syriac word Barja and Baraitha; ſince what is called Berytus, is Beroe with others: there was beſides this another Beræa, a city of Syria, which Joſephus [n] ſpeaks of, and is mentioned by Pliny [o] along with Hierapolis and Chalcis, and very likely is the ſame that is ſpoken of in 2 Maccab. xiii. 4. Hither the brethren ſent Paul and Silas, when it was night and dark, and they could paſs unobſerved, in order to preſerve them from the fury of the mob. Who coming thither; to Beræa; that is, Paul and Silas: went into the ſynagogue of the Jews; which was in that city; not being at all daunted or diſcourged with what they had met with at Theſſalonica.

Ver. 11. Theſe were more noble than thoſe in Theſſalonica, &c.] That is, the Jews at Beræa were more noble than the Jews in Theſſalonica, as the Syriac verſion expreſſes it; for the compariſon is not between the native inhabitants of Beræa and Theſſalonica, but between the Jews that dwelt in theſe places: and the one being more noble than the other, does not refer to their birth, lineage, and deſcent, as in 1 Cor. i. 26. few ſuch were called; and beſides, both ſorts were Jews, and of the ſame deſcent; and as for the proſelytes in both places, there were ſome of the chief and honourable women converted in each: but to their minds, diſpoſitions, and manners; the one were more candid, and ingenuous, and open to conviction and ſuſceptive of the word, than the other; and uſed the Apoſtle with better manners, with more mildneſs and gentleneſs, willing to hear what they had to ſay, without contradicting and blaſpheming, and to examine with patience and candour what they delivered. Not that there is in any man, nor was there in thoſe men naturally a diſpoſition to attend to, and regard the Goſpel of Chriſt; for there is a natural enmity in the minds of men to it, and with them it is folly and nonſenſe; nor are there any previous diſpoſitions in the minds of men qualifying them for the grace of God; nor is any thing of this kind a reaſon why ſome, and not others, are called by grace, for all are children of wrath, and none better than others; but this more noble diſpoſition of mind and conduct were owing to the grace of God beſtowed upon them; and which ſhewed itſelf in the following inſtance: in that they received the word with all readineſs; or who received, &c. which is a character, not of the Theſſalonian Jews, as ſome think; tho' it is true of them that they received the word with joy of the Holy Ghoſt, and not as the word of man, but as the word of God, it coming to them not in word only, but in power, 1 Theſſ. i. 5, 6. and ii. 13. but of the Beræan Jews, who exceeded them, who ſhewed at once a readineſs and eager deſire to attend the Goſpel, and embrace it. This is to be underſtood not of the eſſential word Chriſt; tho' as it is true of him, that he is the word, and he is ſaid to be received, and that readily and willingly, ſo theſe Beræans did receive him by faith, they believed in him, and made a profeſſion of him; nor of the written word, for that is deſigned by the ſcriptures, which they ſearched daily, and by which they examined, tried, and judged of the word they received; but of the word ſpoken by the Apoſtle, the word of truth, the Goſpel of ſalvation: this they received into their underſtandings, not merely notionally, ſo as to give their aſſent to it; but ſpiritually and experimentally, ſo as to feel the power, and enjoy the comfort of it, their underſtandings being opened by the Spirit of God for this purpoſe; otherwiſe the Goſpel is unknown unto, and rejected by the natural man: they received the love of the truth, or the word of truth into their affections, not with a mere carnal flaſhy affection, ariſing from a principle of ſelf-love; but with a ſpiritual affection of the Holy Ghoſt, with real ſolid gladneſs, it bringing the good news of ſalvation by Chriſt to them who ſaw themſelves miſerable, and undone: they received it into their hearts, ſo that it had a place there, and worked effectually in them: they believed it, not with a mere hiſtorical faith, but from the heart obeyed this form of doctrine delivered to them; and this they did with all readineſs, as an hungry man receives his food, and greedily feeds upon it, or as a man ready to periſh receives and lays hold on any thing that offers for his ſafety. And ſearched the ſcriptures daily whether thoſe things were ſo; they did not diſpute with, and cavil at the Apoſtle, as the Theſſalonian Jews firſt did, ver. 2. nor did they receive the word, right or wrong, or with an implicit faith; but they immediately betook themſelves to reading and ſearching the writings of the Old Teſtament, to ſee whether the things which the Apoſtle preached, concerning the Meſſiah, his incarnation, obedience, ſufferings, death, and reſurrection from the dead, were agreeable to them, or no; determining if they were not, to reject them, but if they were, to embrace them, as they did; ſee John v. 39. and this they did continually day after day. They were neither backward to hear and receive the word, nor ſlothful to examine it.

Ver. 12. Therefore many of them believed, &c.] What the Apoſtle preached, and in Jeſus of Nazareth, as the true Meſſiah, and profeſſed their faith in him, upon finding, thro' reading and ſearching the ſcriptures, that the characters of the Meſſiah agreed in him, and that what the Apoſtle delivered, were entirely conſonant to thoſe writings: alſo of honourable women which were Greeks, and of men not a few; beſides the Jews, there were Gentiles alſo, both men and women, who were proſelytes to the Jewiſh religion, and who were perſons of figure and credit, eſpecially the women, who were alſo converted and believed in Chriſt. Theſe converts were the beginning of a Goſpel churchſtate in this place, which continued many ages after. Timon, one of the firſt ſeven deacons of the church at Jeruſalem, is ſaid to be biſhop of Beræa; though, according to others, Oneſimus, the ſervant of Philemon, was the firſt biſhop of this church: even in the fifth century mention is made of Lucas, biſhop of Beræa, who was preſent in the ſynods of Chalcedon and Epheſus; yea, in the ninth century, there were Chriſtians dwelling in this place [p].

Ver. 13. But when the Jews of Theſſalonica, &c.] The unbelieving Jews there, had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Beræa; which they came at, either by perſons that came from thence to Theſſalonica, or by letters ſent them: they came thither alſo; as the Jews from Antioch and Iconium came to Lyſtra on a like account, ch. xiv. 19. and ſtirred up the people; the common people, the natives of the place againſt the Apoſtles; ſuggeſting that they were wicked men, and enemies to all laws, human or divine, civil or religious.

Ver. 14. And then immediately the brethren, &c.] That were at Beræa, the new converts there: ſent away Paul; whom they knew the Jews moſtly ſought after, and were offended with: to go as it were to the ſea; the Ægean ſea, or Archipelago, near to which Beræa was: this ſeems to have been done, in order to make the people conclude that he intended to take ſhipping, and go into ſome other parts of the world, when the deſign was to go to Athens afoot, and ſo be ſafe from any lying in wait of his perſecutors: the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin and the Oriental verſions read, to go to the ſea; to the ſea-ſide, whither it ſeems he did go; and yet it looks as if he did not go by ſea, but by land to Athens: but Silas and Timotheus abode there ſtill; at Beræa, to confirm and ſtrengthen the young converts there made.

Ver. 15. And they that conducted Paul, &c.] From Beræa to the ſea-ſide: brought him unto Athens; a famous city in Attica, where both [q] Pliny and Ptolomy [r] place it, well known for the learning and wiſdom of the ancient philoſophers, who had their ſchools and univerſities in it; the former of theſe calls it a free city, and ſay, it needed no deſcription nor commendation, its fame was ſo diffuſed every where. The account Jerom [s] gives of it is, "Athens, a city in Achaia, dedicated to the "ſtudies of philoſophy, which though but one "is always uſed to be called in the plural number; its haven, called the Piræum, is deſcribed "as fortified with ſeven walls." The city itſelf ſtood about two miles from the ſea; it had its name either from the Greek word ηϑονον, which ſignifies the mind of God, as boaſting of its divine knowledge; or rather from the word אתין, Athen, which may be interpreted ſtrangers, it being originally inhabited by the Pelaſgi, who were a ſett of people that moved from place to place [t]; or becauſe of the great multitude of ſtrangers which flocked from all parts hither for learning, of whom mention is made in ver. 21. The inhabitants of it have been called by different names; when under the Pelaſgi, as Herodotus [u] obſerves, they were called Cranai; when under king Cecrops, they went by the name of Cecropidæ; when Erechtheus had the government, they changed their name into Athenians; from Ion, the ſon of Xythus, their general, they were called Ionians. This city has gone thro' different fates: it was burnt by Xerxes, about 480 years before Chriſt; ſome years after that it was taken by Lyſander; and after that reſtored to its ancient liberty by Demetrius; after this the Romans were poſſeſſed of it; and now it is in the hands of the Turks, and goes by the name of Setines. In Beza's ancient copy it follows, but he paſſed thro' Theſſalia, for he was forbidden to preach the word to them; for as he came from Beræa to Athens, he muſt come thro' Theſſalia; but he made no ſtay here, but paſſed through, being forbid to preach the Goſpel here, as he had been before to preach it in Aſia and Bithynia, ch. xvi. 6, 7. nor have we any account any where elſe of the Goſpel being preached in Theſſaly; and in the ſecond century, we read of heatheniſm prevailing there, and of many groſs acts of idolatry, particularly at Pella in Theſſaly, a man was ſacrificed to the gods: tho' in the beginning of the fourth century there were biſhops out of Theſſalia at the ſynod of Nice; and ſo there were at the ſynod at Sardica, about the middle of the ſame century: in the ſixth century, Dion, biſhop of Thebes in Theſſalia, was in the firſt ſynod at Epheſus, and Conſtantinus, biſhop of Demetrias, and Vigilantius of Lariſſa, both cities in Theſſalia, were in another at the ſame place [w]. And receiving a commandment; or a letter from him, as one copy, and the Syriac verſion read; that is, the brethren from Paul: unto Silas and Timotheus for to come to him with all ſpeed; to Athens, where he now was: they departed; from Paul at Athens, and came back to Beræa.

Ver. 16. Now while Paul waited for them at Athens, &c.] That is, for Silas and Timotheus: his ſpirit was ſtirred in him; not only his ſoul was troubled, and his heart was grieved, but he was exaſperated and provoked to the laſt degree: he was in a paroxyſm; his heart was hot within him; he had a burning fire in his bones, and was weary with forbearing, and could not ſtay; his zeal wanted vent, and he gave it: when he ſaw the city wholly given to idolatry; or full of idols, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions render it. So Cicero ſays [x], that Athens were full of temples; and Xenophon [y] obſerves, that they had double the feaſts of other people; and Pauſanias [z] affirms, that the Athenians far exceeded others in the worſhip of the gods, and care about religion; and he relates, that they had an altar for mercy, another for ſhame, another for fame, and another for deſire, and expreſſed more religion to the gods than others did: they had an altar dedicated to twelve gods [a]; and becauſe they would be ſure of all, they erected one to an unknown god; in ſhort, they had ſo many of them, that one [b] jeſtingly ſaid to them, our country is ſo full of deities, that one may more eaſily find a god, than a man: ſo that with all their learning and wiſdom they knew not God, 1 Cor. i. 21.

Ver. 17. Therefore diſputed he in the ſynagogue with the Jews, &c.] There being a ſynagogue of the Jews here, and there being many Jews ſettled in this place, hence we read in Jewiſh writings [c] of men going from Jeruſalem to Athens, and from Athens to Jeruſalem; and hence it may be accounted for, how, many of the Athenian philoſophers came to be acquainted with the books and ſentiments of the Jews, from whom they borrowed many things; ſince there were ſo many that dwelt among them, and doubtleſs had for years paſt, as well as by their travels into Egypt: and a Jewiſh ſynagogue being here, the Apoſtle went into it, according to his uſual manner, and began with them, as he was wont to do, preaching the Goſpel to the Jew firſt, and then unto the Gentiles: with them he diſputed, not about idolatry, or the worſhip of many gods, to which they were not addicted; nor about the one, true, and living God, whom they knew and profeſſed; but about the Son of God, about the Meſſiah, contending and proving that Jeſus of Nazareth was he: and with the devout perſons; that is, with the Gentiles, who were proſelytes to the Jewiſh religion, and worſhipped the God of Iſrael with the Jews, in their ſynagogues, but knew nothing of Jeſus Chriſt, and the way of ſalvation by him: and in the market daily with them that met him; where there was a concourſe of people; and where, after the Apoſtle had been once or twice, the people came purpoſely to meet with him, and to hear his diſcourſes, and reaſon with him about points in religion: the Syriac verſion renders it, in the ſtreet; and then the ſenſe ſeems to be, that as he met perſons in the ſtreet, day by day, as he walked along, he would ſtop and talk with them, about religious things, and about their idolatry, vanity, and ſuperſtition.

Ver. 18. Then certain philoſophers of the Epicureans, &c.] Theſe were ſo called from Epicurus, the ſon of Neocles, who was born 342 years before Chriſt, and taught philoſophy at Athens, in his garden; the principal tenets of which were, that the world was not made by any deity, or with any deſign, but came into its being and form, through a fortuitous concourſe of atoms, of various ſizes and magnitude, which met, and jumbled, and cemented together, and ſo formed the world; and that the world is not governed by the providence of God; for tho' he did not deny the being of God, yet he thought it below his notice, and beneath his majeſty to concern himſelf with its affairs; and alſo, that the chief happineſs of men lies in pleaſure. His followers were called Epicureans; of which there have been two ſorts; the one were called the ſtrict or rigid Epicureans, who placed all happineſs in the pleaſure of the mind, ariſing from the practice of moral virtue, and which is thought by ſome to be the true principle of Epicurus; the other were called the looſe, or the remiſs Epicureans, who underſtood their maſter in the groſs ſenſe, and placed all their happineſs in the pleaſure of the body, in brutal and ſenſual pleaſure, in living a voluptuous life, in eating and drinking, &c. and this is the common notion imbibed of an Epicurean. And of the Stoicks; the author of this ſect was Zeno, whoſe followers were ſo called from the Greek word Stoa, which ſignifies a portico, or a piazza, under which Zeno uſed to walk, and teach his philoſophy, and where great numbers of diſciples attended him, who from hence were called Stoicks: their chief tenets were, that there is but one God, and that the world was made by him, and is governed by fate; that happineſs lies in virtue, and virtue has its own reward in itſelf; that all virtues are linked together, and all vices are equal; that a wiſe and good man is deſtitute of all paſſion, and uneaſineſs of mind, is always the ſame, and always joyful, and ever happy in the greateſt torture, pain being no real evil; that the ſoul lives after the body, and that the world will be deſtroyed by fire. Now the philoſophers of theſe two ſects encountred him; the Apoſtle Paul; they attacked him, and diſputed with him upon ſome points, which were contrary to their philoſophy: and ſome ſaid, what will this babler ſay? this talking, prating fellow? tho' the word here uſed does not ſignify, as ſome have thought, a ſower of words; as if they meant, that the Apoſtle was a dealer in many words, a verboſe man, and full of words, but not matter; but it properly ſignifies a gatherer of ſeeds; and the alluſion is either to a ſett of idle people, that uſed to go to markets and fairs, and pick up ſeeds of corn, that were ſhook out of ſacks, upon which they lived; and ſo the word came to be uſed for an idle good-for-nothing fellow, and for one that picked up tales and fables, and carried them about for a livelihood. So Demoſthenes, in a way of reproach, called Æſchines by this name; and ſuch an one was the Apoſtle reckoned: or the metaphor is taken from little birds, as the ſparrow, &c. that pick up ſeeds, and live upon them, and are of no value and uſe. Harpocratian ſays [d], there is a certain little bird of the jay or jack-daw kind, which is called Spermologos, (the word here uſed) from its picking up of ſeeds, of which Ariſtophanes makes mention; and that from this a baſe and contemptible man, and one that lives by others, is called by this name: from whence we may learn in what a contemptuous manner the Apoſtle was uſed in this polite city, by theſe men of learning. Other ſome, he ſeemeth to be a ſetter forth of ſtrange gods; other than thoſe worſhipped in the city of Athens: this was the charge which Melitus brought againſt Socrates; "Socrates, ſays he [e], has acted an unrighteous part, "the gods, whom the city reckons ſuch, he does "not, introducing other and new gods." Ælianus [f] repreſents him as cenſured by Ariſtophanes, as one that introduced ξενας δαιμονας, ſtrange gods, tho' he neither knew them, nor honoured them. The reaſon why they thought the Apoſtle was for bringing in other gods, than which nothing was more foreign from him, was, becauſe he preached unto them Jeſus, and the reſurrection: the Syriac verſion reads, and his reſurrection; that is, the reſurrection of Chriſt; the Arabic verſion renders it, the reſurrection from the dead; the general reſurrection; both doubtleſs were preached by him, ſee ver. 32. Jeſus they took for one ſtrange and new god, they had never heard of before, and Anaſtaſis, or the reſurrection for another; which need not be wondered at, when they had altars erected for mercy, fame, ſhame, and deſire, as obſerved on ver. 16.

Ver. 19. And they took him, &c.] Not that they laid hands on him, and carried him away by violence, as a derider of their gods, and an introducer of new ones, in order to puniſh him; but they invited him to go with them, and they took him along with them in a friendly manner, and had him to a more convenient place for preaching and diſputation, and where were many learned men to hear and judge of his doctrine; and this appears from their deſire to hear what his doctrine was, and from his quiet departure, after he had ended his diſcourſe: and brought him unto Areopagus. The Arabic verſion ſeems to underſtand this of a perſon, rendering it, and brought him to the moſt ſkilful, and the judge of the doctors; to be heard and examined before him, about the doctrine he preached, who was moſt capable of judging concerning it; and this might be Dionyſius, who is called the Areopagite, and was converted by the Apoſtle, ver. 34. The Ethiopic verſion renders it, they brought him to the houſe of their God; to one of their idol's temple, the temple of Mars, which is not much amiſs; for we are told [g], that Areopagus was a ſtreet in Athens, in which was the temple of Mars, from whence it had its name; but the Syriac verſion renders it beſt of all, they brought him to the houſe of judgment, or court of judicature, which is called Areopagus; and ſo it is called Martium judicium, or Mars's court of judicature, by Apuleius [h]; and Martis curia, or the court of Mars, by Juvenal [i]; for it was a court where cauſes were tried, and the moſt ancient one with the Athenians, being inſtituted by Cecrops, their firſt king; and is thought to be near as ancient, if not full as ancient, yea, as more ancient than the Sanhedrim, or the court of ſeventy elders, appointed by Moſes among the Jews. It was called Areopagus, becauſe Ares, or Mars, was the firſt that was judged there [k]. The caſe was this, Alcippe, the daughter of Mars, being raviſhed by Habirrhothius, the ſon of Neptune, and caught by Mars

Mars in the very fact, was killed by him; upon which Neptune arraigned Mars for the murder, and tried him in this place, by a jury of twelve deities, by whom he was acquitted[l]. Hither Paul was brought, not to be tried in a legal manner; for it don't appear, that any charge was exhibited againſt him, or any legal proceſs carried on, only an enquiry was made about his doctrine, and that only to gratify their curioſity: ſaying, may we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou ſpeakeſt, is? for they had never heard of Jeſus, nor of ſalvation by him, nor of the reſurrection of the dead; theſe were all new things to them, and therefore they were the more curious to aſk after them, new things, being what they were fond of: wherefore they call his doctrine new, not ſo much by way of reproach, as ſuggeſting it to be a reaſon why they enquired after it, and why they deſired him to give them ſome account of it; and that it ſhould be a new doctrine with them, or if they reproached it with the charge of novelty, it need not be wondered at in them, when the Jews charged and reproached the doctrine of Chriſt in like manner, Mark i. 27.

Ver. 20. For thou bringeſt certain ſtrange things to our ears, &c.] Strange doctrines and ſtrange deities, ſuch as they had never heard of before: we would know therefore what theſe things mean; they deſire he would explain theſe things to them, and let them know the riſe, and ground, and nature, and end, and deſign of them.

Ver. 21. For all the Athenians, &c.] The natives of Athens, who were born and lived there, and were inhabitants of the city, and free of it: and ſtrangers which were there; who came there from ſeveral parts of the world, to get wiſdom and knowledge, to learn the ſeveral arts and ſciences, and to attend the ſeveral ſects of philoſophers they made choice of: ſpent their time in nothing elſe but either to tell or to hear ſome new thing; that is, they did ſo for the moſt part; and this was the complexion and taſte of the generality of them; and with this agrees what Demoſthenes himſelf ſays of them[m], "we, ſays "he, (for the truth ſhall be ſaid) ſit here, ουδεν ποιουντες, "doing nothing——enquiring in the court, ει τι "λεγεται νεωτερον, whether any new thing is ſaid." The character of ſuch perſons is given, and they are deſcribed in a very lively manner by Theophraſtus[n]. The Jewiſh doctors, at this time, were much of the ſame caſt in their divinity-ſchools; the uſual queſtion aſked, when they met one another, was, מה חדוש, what new thing have you in the divinity-ſchool to-day[o]?

Ver. 22. Then Paul ſtood in the midſt of Mars hill, &c.] Or of Areopagus, as it is better rendered in ver. 19. for it is the ſame place, and it is the ſame word that is here uſed: Paul ſtood in the midſt of that court of judicature, amidſt the Areopagites, the judges of that court, and the wiſe and learned philoſophers of the different ſects that were aſſembled together: and ſaid, ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too ſuperſtitious; or more religious, than any other perſons, in other places, which has been obſerved before on ver. 16. they had more gods, and more altars, and more feſtivals, and were more diligent and ſtudious in the worſhip of the gods, than others. And this manner of addreſſing them, both as citizens of Athens, and as very religious perſons, and who, as ſuch, greatly exceeded all others, muſt greatly tend to engage their attention to him.

Ver. 23. For as I paſſed by, &c.] Or through; that is, through the city of Athens: and beheld your devotions; not ſo much their acts of worſhip and religion, as the gods which they worſhipped; in which ſenſe this word is uſed in 2 Theſſ. ii. 4. and the altars which were erected to them, and the temples in which they were worſhipped; and ſo the Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, the houſes, and places of your worſhip; and the Ethiopic verſion, your images, or deities. I found an altar with this inſcription, to the unknown God. Pauſanias[p] ſpeaks in the plural number of altars of gods, that were named unknown, at Athens; and ſo ſays Apollonius Tyaneus to Timaſion[q], it is wiſeſt to ſpeak well of all the gods, eſpecially at Athens, where there are altars to unknown gods: it may be, there were altars that had the inſcription in the plural number; and there was one which Paul took particular notice of, in the ſingular number; or the above writers may ſpeak of altars to unknown gods, becauſe there might be many altars with this inſcription: the whole of the inſcription, according to Theophylact, was this; "to the gods of Aſia, Europe, and Ly- "bia, (or Africa) to the unknown and ſtrange "god;" tho' Jerom[r] makes this to be in the plural number: certain it is, that Lucian[s] ſwears by the unknown god that was at Athens, and ſays, we finding the unknown god at Athens, and worſhipping with hands ſtretched out towards heaven, gave thanks unto him: the reaſon why they erected an altar, with ſuch an inſcription, might be, for fear when they took in the gods of other nations, there might be ſome one which they knew not; wherefore, to omit none, they erect an altar to him; and which proves what the Apoſtle ſays, that they were more religious and ſuperſtitious than others: or it may be they might have a regard to the God of the Jews, whoſe name Jehovah with them was not to be pronounced, and who, by the Gentiles, was called Deus incertus[t]; and here, in the Syriac verſion, it is rendered, the hidden God, as the God of Iſrael is called, Iſ. xlv. 15. and that he is here deſigned ſeems manifeſt from what follows, whom therefore ye ignorantly worſhip, him declare I unto you; which could not be ſaid by him of any other deity. God is an unknown God to thoſe who have only the light of nature to guide them; for tho' it may be known by it that there is a God, and that there is but one, and ſomewhat of him may be diſcerned thereby; yet the nature of his eſſence, and the perfections of his nature, and the unity of his being are very little, and not truly, and commonly underſtood, and the perſons in the godhead not at all, and ſtill leſs God in Chriſt, whom to know is life eternal: hence the Gentiles are deſcribed as ſuch who know not God; wherefore, if he is worſhipped by them at all, it muſt be ignorantly: and that they are ignorant worſhippers of him, appears by worſhipping others more than him, and beſides him, or him in others, and theſe idols of gold, ſilver, braſs, wood, and ſtone; and by their indecencies and inhumanity uſed in the performance of their worſhip: wherefore a revelation became neceſſary, by which men might be acquainted with the nature of the divine being, and the true manner of worſhipping him; in which a declaration is made of the nature and perfections of God, and of the perſons in the godhead, the object of worſhip; of the counſels, purpoſes, and decrees of God; of his covenant-tranſactions with his ſon reſpecting the ſalvation of his choſen people; of his love, grace, and mercy diſplayed in the miſſion and gift of Chriſt to be the ſaviour and redeemer of them; of the glory of his attributes in their ſalvation; and of his whole mind and will, both with reſpect to doctrine and practice; and which every faithful miniſter of the Goſpel, as the Apoſtle Paul, ſhuns not, according to his ability, truly and fully to declare.

Ver. 24. God that made the world, and all things therein, &c.] In this account of the divine being, as the creator of the world, and all things in it, as the Apoſtle agrees with Moſes, and the reſt of the ſacred ſcriptures; ſo he condemns both the notion of the Epicurean philoſophers, who denied that the world was made by God, but ſaid that it owed its being to a fortuitous concourſe of atoms; and the notion of the Peripateticks, or Ariſtotelians, who aſſerted the eternity of the world; and ſome of both ſects were doubtleſs preſent. Seeing that he is the Lord of heaven and earth; as appears by his being the creator of both; hence he ſupports them in their being, and governs all creatures in them by his providence. Dwelleth not in temples made with hands; ſuch as were the idol-temples at Athens; nor in any other edifices built by man, ſo as to be there fixed and limited; no, not in the temple at Jeruſalem: but he dwells in temples that are not made with hands, as in the temple of Chriſt's human nature, in which the fulneſs of the Godhead dwells bodily, and in the hearts of his people, who are the temples of the Holy Ghoſt. This ſtrikes at a notion of the Athenians, as if God was limited, and circumſcribed, and included within the bounds of a ſhrine, or temple; tho' it is not at all contrary to his promiſes, or the hopes of his own people, of his preſence in places appointed for divine worſhip, but is expreſſive of the infinity and immenſity of God.

Ver. 25. Neither is worſhipped with mens hands, &c.] Or ſerved with them; or miniſtred unto by them, as the Syriac verſion renders it: and the ſenſe is, that men by worſhipping God do not give any thing to him, that can be of any uſe or ſervice to him; he being God all-ſufficient, ſtands in need of nothing; for external worſhip is not here intended by worſhipping with mens hands, in diſtinction from, and oppoſition to internal worſhip, or to the worſhip of God with the heart; but that whether it be with the one or with the other, or both, nothing is given to God, as adding any thing to his eſſential glory and happineſs: as though he needed any thing; for he does not, he is El-Shaddai, God all-ſufficient; nor can any thing be given to him, he has not; or otherwiſe all perfection would not be in him: but that he cannot be indigent of any thing, appears from hence, ſeeing he giveth to all life and breath; or the breath of life, as the Ethiopic verſion renders it; this God breathed into man at firſt, and he became a living ſoul; and every animate creature, every one that has life and breath, have them from God; he gives them to them, and continues them: and all things; that are enjoyed by them, and are neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence, and for the comfort of life, and for both their uſe and profit, and for their delight and pleaſure; wherefore he that gives them all things, cannot want any thing himſelf, nor receive any thing at their hands. This clauſe is left out in the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions.

Ver. 26. And hath made of one blood, &c.] That is, of one man's blood; the Vulgate Latin verſion reads, of one; and the Arabic verſion of De Dieu, reads, of one man; of Adam, the firſt parent of all mankind, and who had the blood of all men in his veins: hence the Jews[v] ſay, "the firſt man was "רמו של עולם, the blood of the world;" and this by propagation has been derived from him, and communicated to all mankind. They alſo ſay[w], that "the reaſon why man was created alone (or "there was but one man created) was, on account "of families, that they might not be ſtirred up "one againſt another;" that is, ſtrive and contend with one another about pre-eminence: and they add, "that the righteous might not ſay we are the ſons "of the righteous, and ye are the ſons of the "wicked." And it is a certain truth that follows upon this, that no man has any reaſon to vaunt over another, and boaſt of his blood and family; and as little reaſon have any to have any dependance upon their being the children of believers, or to diſtinguiſh themſelves from others, and reject them as the children of unbelievers, when all belong to one family, and are of one man's blood, whether Adam or Noah: of whom are all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth; for from Adam ſprung a race of men, which multiplied on the face of the earth, and peopled the world before the flood; theſe being deſtroyed by the flood, and Noah and his family ſaved, his deſcendants were ſcattered all over the earth, and re-peopled it: and this is the original of all the nations of men, and of all the inhabitants of the earth; and ſtands oppoſed to the fabulous accounts of the Heathens, which the Apoſtle might have in his view, that men at firſt grew up out of the earth, or after the flood were formed of ſtones, which Deucalion and Prometheus threw over their heads; and particularly the Athenians boaſted that they ſprung out of the earth, which Diogenes ridiculed as common with mice and worms. But the Apoſtle aſcribes all to one blood: and hath determined the times before appointed; how long the world he has made ſhall continue; and the ſeveral diſtinct periods, ages, and generations, in which ſuch and ſuch men ſhould live; ſuch and ſuch nations ſhould exiſt, and ſuch monarchies ſhould be in being, as the Aſſyrian, Perſian, Grecian, and Roman, and how long they ſhould ſubſiſt; as alſo the ſeveral ſeaſons of the year, as ſeed-time and harveſt, cold and heat, ſummer and winter, and day and night; and which are ſo bounded, and kept ſo diſtinct in their revolutions, as not to interfere with, and encroach upon each other; and likewiſe the ſeveral years, months, and days of every man's life; ſee Job vii. 1. and xiv. 5. to which may be added, the times of the law and Goſpel; the time of Chriſt's birth and death; the time of the converſion of particular perſons; and all their times of deſertion, temptation, affliction, and comfort; the times of the church's ſufferings both under Rome pagan and Rome papal; of the holy city being trodden under foot, of the witneſſes prophecying in ſackcloth, and of their being killed, and their bodies lying unburied, and of their reſurrection and aſcenſion to heaven, Rev. ii. 10. and xii. 6. and xi. 2, 3, 9, 11, 12. the time of Antichriſt's reign and ruin, chap. xiii. 5. and of Chriſt's perſonal coming, and the day of judgment, 1 Tim. vi. 15. Acts xvii. 31. and of his reign on earth for a thouſand years, Rev. xx. 4, 5, 6. All theſe are appointed times, and determined by the creator and governour of the world: and the bounds of their habitation; where men ſhall dwell, and how long they ſhall continue there; the age or diſtinct period of time, in which every man was, or is to come into the world, is fixed and determined by God; nor can, nor does any one come into the world ſooner or later than that time; and alſo the particular country, city, town, and ſpot of ground where he ſhall dwell; and the term of time how long he ſhall dwell there, and then remove to another place, or be removed by death. And to this agrees the Ethiopic verſion, which renders the whole thus, and hath appointed his times, and his years, how long they ſhall dwell; ſee Deut. xxxii. 8. to which the Apoſtle ſeems to refer.

[w] T. Hieroſ. Sanhedrin, fol. 22. 2.

Ver. 27. That they ſhould ſeek the Lord, &c.] Or God, as the Alexandrian copy and others, and the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions read; their creator, and kind benefactor, and who has appointed their time of life, and their habitations for them; and this ſhould engage them to ſeek to know him, who has done all this for them, and to fear and ſerve him, and to glorify his name: if haply they might feel after him, and find him; which ſhows, that tho' it is poſſible for men, by a contemplation of the perfections of God viſible in the works of creation and providence, ſo to find God, as to know that there is one, and that there is but one God, who has made all things; and ſo as to be convinced of the vanity and falſhood of all other gods, and to ſee the folly, wickedneſs, and weakneſs of idolatrous worſhip; yet, at the ſame time, it very ſtrongly intimates, how dim and obſcure the light of nature is; ſince thoſe, who have nothing elſe to direct them, are like perſons in the dark, who feel and grope about after God, whom they cannot ſee; and after all their ſearch and groping, there is only an haply, a peradventure, a maybe, that they find him: though he be not far from every one of us; not only by his omnipreſence, and immenſity, whereby he is every where; but by his power in ſupporting all in their being; and by his goodneſs in continually communicating the bleſſings of providence to them.

Ver. 28. For in him we live, and move, and have our being, &c.] The natural life which men live is from God; and they are ſupported in it by him; and from him they have all the comforts and bleſſings of life; and all motions, whether external or internal, of body or of mind, are of God, and none of them are without the concourſe of his providence, and ſtrength and aſſiſtance from him; tho' the diſorder and irregularity of theſe motions, whereby they become ſinful, are of themſelves, or of the devil; and their being, and the maintenance of it, and continuance in it, are all owing to the power and providence of God. As certain alſo of your own poets have ſaid; the Syriac verſion reads in the ſingular number, as a certain one of your wiſe men has ſaid; but all others read in the plural; and ſome have thought, that the Apoſtle refers to what goes before, that being an Iambic verſe of ſome of the poets, as well as to what follows, which is a citation from Aratus [x]; and whom the Apoſtle might have called his own, as he was his countryman; for Aratus was a native of Solis, a city of Cilicia, not far from Tarſus; yea, ſome ſay [y], he was of Tarſus, where the Apoſtle was born: but Aratus being an Heathen, and the Apoſtle ſpeaking to Heathens, calls him one of them; and the rather, that what is cited, might be the more regarded by them: tho' the expreſſion is alſo [z] ſaid to be in an hymn to Jove, written by Cleanthes, who taught at Athens; and ſo the Apoſtle addreſſing the Athenians, might, with greater propriety, ſay, as certain of your own poets ſay: it is alſo ſaid to be in Aratus the aſtronomer, and in the poet Homer; ſo that the plural number may well be uſed. Which is, for we are alſo his offspring; the offspring of Jove, ſays Aratus; which the Apoſtle applies to the true Jehovah, the creator of all men, by whom, and after whoſe image they are made, and ſo are truly his offspring; upon which the Apoſtle argues, as follows.

Ver. 29. Foraſmuch then as we are the offspring of God, &c.] In the ſenſe before given; for the Apoſtle is not here ſpeaking of himſelf, and other ſaints, as being the children of God, by adoption, and by regenerating grace, and faith in Chriſt Jeſus, but as men in common with others, and with theſe Athenians: we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or ſilver, or ſtone graven by art and man's device; for men themſelves, who are the offspring of God, and made after his image, are not to be compared to graven images of gold, ſilver, and ſtone, but are vaſtly preferable to them, they being formed by their art, and the device of their minds; and much leſs then ſhould God, the creator of men, and from whom they ſpring, be likened to, or repreſented by, any ſuch thing; for ſo to think of God, is to think very unworthily of him; for if to think thus of ourſelves, who are deſcended from him, would be a debaſing of us, then much more to think ſo of God, the Father of Spirits, muſt be a depreciating of him; and which by no means ought to be done, and argues great ſtupidity: if living rational creatures are not to be equalled to, and compared with ſenſeleſs ſtatues, much leſs God, the former of men and angels.

Ver. 30. And the times of this ignorance God winked at, &c.] Not that he approved of, or encouraged ſuch blindneſs and folly, as appeared among the Gentiles, when they worſhipped idols of gold, ſilver, and ſtone, taking them for deities; but rather the ſenſe is, he deſpiſed this, and them for it, and were diſpleaſed and angry with them; and as an evidence of ſuch contempt and indignation, he over-looked them, and took no notice of them, and gave them no revelation to direct them, nor prophets to inſtruct them, and left them to their ſtupidity and ignorance: but now commandeth all men every where to repent; that is, he hath given orders, that the doctrine of repentance, as well as remiſſion of ſins, ſhould be preached to all nations, to Gentiles as well as Jews; and that it becomes them to repent of their idolatries, and turn from their idols, and worſhip the one, only, living, and true God: and tho' for many hundreds of years God had neglected them, and ſent no meſſengers, nor meſſages to them, to acquaint them with his will, and to ſhew them their follies, and miſtakes; yet now he had ſent his Apoſtles unto them, to lay before them their ſins, and call them to repentance; and to ſtir them up to this, the Apoſtle informs them of the future judgment in the following verſe. Repentance being repreſented as a command, does not ſuppoſe it to be in the power of men, or contradict evangelical repentance, being the free-grace gift of God, but only ſhews the need men ſtand in of it, and how neceſſary and requiſite it is; and when it is ſaid to be a command to all, this does not deſtroy its being a ſpecial bleſſing of the covenant of grace to ſome; but points out the ſad condition that all men are in as ſinners, and that without repentance they muſt periſh; and indeed, all men are obliged to natural repentance for ſin, tho' to all men the grace of evangelical repentance is not given: the Jews [a] call repentance, מצות התשובה, the command of repentance, tho' they don't think it obligatory on men, as the other commands of the law. The law gives no encouragement to repentance, and ſhews no mercy on account of it, it is a branch of the Goſpel-miniſtry, and goes along with the doctrine of the remiſſion of ſins; and tho' in the Goſpel, ſtrictly taken, there is no command, yet being largely taken for the whole miniſtry of the word, it includes this, and every thing elſe which Chriſt has commanded, and was taught by him and his Apoſtles; ſee Matt. xxviii. 20.

Ver. 31. Becauſe he hath appointed a day, &c.] The day of judgment is fixed by God in his eternal purpoſes, and is ſure and certain, and will come, tho' it is not known by men or angels; and this is a reaſon why God will have the doctrine of repentance every where publiſhed, both to Jews and Gentiles, ſince all muſt come to judgment: and the day for it is appointed by him, in the which he will judge the world in righteouſneſs; the whole world will be judged, and every individual in it, good and bad, righteous and wicked; and this judgment will be a righteous one; it will proceed according to the ſtrict rules of juſtice and equity, and upon the foot of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, as that has been received or rejected by men, or as men are clothed with, or are without that righteouſneſs: by that man whom he hath ordained; Beza's ancient copy reads, the man Jeſus; not that the Apoſtle means that Chriſt is a mere man; for then he would not be fit to be a judge of quick and dead, and to paſs and execute the definitive ſentence; which requires omniſcience and omnipotence: but preaching to mere Heathens, he choſe not at once to aſſert the deity of Chriſt, tho' he tacitly ſuggeſts it; but intended, by degrees, to open the glories of his nature and office to them, he being the perſon God had from all eternity ordained, and in time had ſignified, ſhould have all judgment committed to him, and by whom the laſt judgment ſhall be managed and tranſacted: whereof he hath given aſſurance to all men; or full proof, both of his being the judge, and of his fitneſs to be one, and alſo of the righteouſneſs, according to which he will judge: in that he hath raiſed him from the dead; whereby he was declared to be the Son of God; and when all power in heaven, and in earth was given to him; and which was done for the juſtification of all thoſe for whoſe offences he was delivered: and this ſeems to be the reaſon why the Apoſtle calls Chriſt the judge a man, that he might have the opportunity of mentioning his reſurrection from the dead.

Ver. 32. When they heard of the reſurrection of the dead, &c.] Of a certain man that the Apoſtle ſaid God had raiſed from the dead, tho' they knew not who he was: ſome mocked; at him, and at the doctrine he preached: theſe very likely were of the Epicurean ſect, who diſbelieved a future ſtate; though, as Tertullian obſerves [b], the doctrine of the reſurrection was denied by every ſect of the philoſophers: it is a doctrine of pure revelation, and what the light of nature never taught men, and by which men being only guided, have declared againſt, and have treated it with the utmoſt ridicule and contempt. Pliny [c] reckons it among childiſh fancies, and calls it vanity, and downright madneſs to believe it; as does alſo Cæcilius in Minutius Felix [d]; and who even calls it a lye, and places it among old wives fables; and Celſus in Origen [e] repreſents it as exceeding deteſtable, abominable, and impoſſible. And others ſaid, we will hear thee again of this matter; ſome think theſe were of the Stoic ſect, who held a future ſtate; and that the ſoul would live after the body, and had ſome notions which looked inclining to this doctrine: however, theſe thought there might be ſomething in what the Apoſtle ſaid; they could not receive it readily, and yet could not deny it; they were willing to take time to conſider of it, and were deſirous of hearing him again upon that ſubject; in which they might be very open and upright; and this might not be a mere excuſe to ſhift off any further hearing at that time, like that of Felix, ch. 24, 25.

Ver. 33. So Paul departed from among them.] As it was high time, when they fell to deriding and ſcoffing at him; for hereby they judged themſelves unworthy of the Goſpel miniſtry: the Ethiopic verſion adds, from Athens; but it does not appear that the Apoſtle went directly out of the city; we read afterwards of his departing from Athens, chap. xviii. 1: but the ſenſe is, that he went out of the Areopagus, from that court of judicature; and from among the judges of it, and the philoſophers of every ſect, that ſtood around him in it; they having no more to ſay to him, nor he to them. And this ſhows, that he was not brought to be tried and judged, in order to be puniſhed, but only to be heard concerning his doctrine; of which, when they had heard enough, he departed quietly, no one moleſting him, unleſs with ſcoffs and jeers.

Ver. 34. Howbeit, certain men clave unto him, and believed, &c.] There were ſome who were ordained to eternal life, to whom the Goſpel came in power, and they received the love of the truth, and their hearts and affections were knit unto the Apoſtle; and they followed him, and kept to him, and privately converſed with him, and believed his doctrine, and in Jeſus Chriſt, whom he preached unto them; to theſe the Goſpel was the ſavour of life unto life, when to the ſcoffers and mockers it was the ſavour of death unto death: and this is the fruit and effect of the Goſpel-miniſtry, where-ever it comes: among the which was Dionyſius the Areopagite; a judge in the court of Areopagus: how many judges that court conſiſted of, is not certain, nor whether there was one who was ſuperior to the reſt; if there was ſuch an one, Dionyſius ſeems to have been he, ſince he is called the Areopagite. The buſineſs of this court was not only to try cauſes of murder, which ſeems to have been the original buſineſs of it; but by theſe judges the rights of the city were preſerved and defended, war was proclaimed, and all law-ſuits adjuſted and decided; and they made it their buſineſs to look after idle and ſlothful perſons, and enquire how they lived [f]: they always heard and judged cauſes in the night, in the dark, becauſe they would only know facts, and not perſons, leſt they ſhould be influenced by their affections, and be led wrong [g]; they were very famous in other nations for their wiſdom and ſkill, and for their gravity and ſtrict juſtice. Dolabella, proconſul of Aſia, having a woman brought before him for poiſoning her huſband and ſon, which ſhe confeſſed, and gave reaſons for doing it, referred the matter to a council, who refuſed to paſs ſentence; upon which he ſent the caſe to Athens, to the Areopagites, as to judges more grave and more experienced [h]: and hence thoſe words of Julian the emperor [i], "let "an Areopagite be judge, and we will not be afraid "of the judgment." This Dionyſius the Areopagite is ſaid, by another Dionyſius, biſhop of the Corinthians, a very ancient writer [k], to be the firſt biſhop of the Athenians, which is more likely than that he ſhould be a biſhop in France. It is reported of him, that being at Heliopolis in Egypt, along with Apollophanes, a philoſopher, at the time of Chriſt's ſufferings, he ſhould ſay concerning the unuſual eclipſe that then was, that a God unknown, and clothed with fleſh, ſuffered, on whoſe account the whole world was darkned; or, as others affirm he ſaid, either the God of nature ſuffers, or the frame of the world will be diſſolved: it is alſo related of him, that when he was converted by the Apoſtle at Athens, he went to Clemens, biſhop of Rome, and was ſent by him with others into the weſt to preach the Goſpel; ſome of which went to Spain, and others to France, and that he ſteered his courſe to Paris, and there, with Ruſticus and Eleutherius his collegues, ſuffered martyrdom [l]. The books aſcribed unto him concerning the divine names, and eccleſiaſtical hierarchy, are ſpurious things, ſtuffed with fooliſh, abſurd, and impious notions, and ſeem to have been written in the fifth century. And a woman named Damaris; ſome of the ancients, and alſo ſome modern writers, take this woman to be the wife of Dionyſius; but had ſhe been his wife, ſhe would have been doubtleſs called ſo; however, by the particular mention of her name, ſhe ſeems to have been a perſon of ſome note and figure: the name is a diminutive from Δαμαρ, Damar, which ſignifies a wife. And others with them; with theſe two, as the Arabic verſion renders it; that is, with Dionyſius and Damaris. Theſe laid the foundation of a Goſpel-church at Athens. Dionyſius, as before obſerved, was the firſt biſhop, or paſtor of it; it is alſo ſaid that Narciſſus, one of the ſeventy diſciples, was biſhop of this place; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. In the ſecond century Publius was biſhop of the church at Athens, who ſuffered martyrdom for Chriſt in the time of Hadrian; and was ſucceeded by Quadratus [m], who was famous for a writing he preſented to the ſaid emperor, in favour of the churches in common, and the ſucceſs of it, about the year 128; at the ſame time, Ariſtides, a famous philoſopher and chriſtian, flouriſhed in the church at Athens, who wrote an apology for the chriſtian religion; and alſo Jovius, a preſbyter and martyr, and a diſciple of Dionyſius; likewiſe Athenagoras, a man of great learning and piety, who wrote alſo an apology for the chriſtians, and a treatiſe concerning the reſurrection of the dead, which are ſtill extant; the former was written to the emperors Antoninus and Commodus: in the third century mention is made of the church at Athens; and Origen [n] ſpeaks very honourably of it, as meek and quiet, and deſirous of approving itſelf to God. In the fourth century it appears, that there were Chriſtians there, ſince Maximinus the emperor ſtirred up wicked men to moleſt and diſtreſs them; and there was a chriſtian ſchool there, in which Baſil and Gregory Nazianzen were brought up. In the fifth century there was a church in this place; and in the ſixth, a chriſtian ſchool, in which Boethius Patricius, learned the liberal arts; and in the ſeventh century mention is made of a biſhop of Athens, who was in the ſixth council at Conſtantinople [o]: thus far this church-ſtate is to be traced.

Ver. 1. AFTER theſe things, &c.] The Arabic verſion renders it, after theſe words, or diſcourſes; after the Apoſtles diſputation with the philoſophers, and his ſermon in the Areopagus, the effects of which are before related: Paul departed from Athens, and came to Corinth; the metropolis of Achaia, or Peloponneſus. This city was formerly called Ephyra from Ephyra [p], the daughter of Oceanus, and had its name of Corinth from Corinthus, the ſon of Maratho, who repaired it when deſtroyed; or, as others ſay, from Corinthus, the ſon of Pelops, others of Oreſtes, and others of Jupiter: tho' more probably it was ſo called from the multitudes of whores in this place, as if it was κοραι ενθα, corai entha, here are girls, or whores; for in the temple of Venus there were no leſs than a thouſand whores provided, to be proſtituted to all comers thither; ſee the note on 2 Cor. xii. 21. It was ſituated between two great ſeas, the Ægean and Ionian; hence [q] Horace calls it Bimaris: it had a very ſtrong tower, built on a high mount, called Acrocorinthus, from whence theſe two ſeas might be ſeen, and where was the fountain Pirene, ſacred to the muſes: the city was about ſixty furlongs, or ſeven miles and a half from the ſhore [r]; it was a city that abounded in riches and luxury. Florus [s] calls it the head of Achaia, and the glory of Greece; and Cicero [t], the light of all Greece: it was in time ſo much enlarged, and became ſo famous, that it was little inferior to Rome itſelf, on which account it grew proud and haughty; and uſing the Roman embaſſadors with ſome degree of inſolence, who were ſent into Greece, on ſome certain occaſion, firſt Metellus, and then Mummius were ſent againſt it, which latter took it, and burnt it; and the city then abounding with images and ſtatues of gold, ſilver, and braſs, were melted down together in the fire, and made what was afterwards called the Corinthian braſs, which became ſo famous, and is often ſpoken of in hiſtory [u]: but Julius Cæſar, moved with the commodious ſituation of the place, rebuilt it [w], and it became a colony of the Romans, as Pliny [x] and Mela [y] both call it; and ſo it was at this time when the Apoſtle was there. After this it came into the hands of the Venetians, from whom it was taken by Mahomet, the ſecond ſon of Amurath, in the year 1458 [z]; but is now again in the hands of the Venetians; and that and the country about it are called the Morea. And as the Goſpel was to be preached to the worſt of ſinners, among whom God's choſen ones lay, the Apoſtle was directed to come hither; and it appears by the ſequel, that God had much people here, even more than at Athens, among the wiſe and learned.

Ver. 2. And found a certain Jew named Aquila, &c.] This ſeems to have been his Roman name which he had took, or was given him, while he was at Rome; very likely his Jewiſh name was נשר, Neſher, which ſignifies an eagle, as Aquila does: unleſs it ſhould rather be thought to be a Greek name; and as Olympas is from Olympios, and Nymphas from Nymphios; ſo Akilas as it is in the Greek text from Akylios, and this from Ακυλος, Akylos, which ſignifies an acorn. There was a Jewiſh proſelyte of this name who tranſlated the Bible into Greek, who is called by the Jewiſh writers עקילס, Akilas[a]; and Euſebius[b] calls him Ακυλας ο Ποντικος, Akylas, or Aquila of Pontus as here, but cannot be the ſame; for one was a Jew, the other a Gentile, then a Chriſtian, and afterwards a Jewiſh proſelyte, and lived after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem many years, even in the times of Adrian: nor is it the ſame name with Onkelos, the famous Chaldee paraphraſt, as ſome have thought, and much leſs the ſame perſon; for tho' their age better agrees, yet neither their name, nor their nation; for Onkelos was only a proſelyte, not a Jew, as this man was; and the agreement the names of theſe proſelytes may be thought to have with this, do but confirm it to be a Roman name; and in a decree of Claudius the Roman emperor, mention is made of Akylas, or Aquila, a Roman governour of Alexandria[c]; and in the reign of Caius Caligula, there was a conſul of Rome whoſe name was M. Aquila Julianus. This is ſaid to be afterwards biſhop of Heraclea; but that is not to be depended upon: born in Pontus; a country in Aſia; ſee the note on chap. ii. 9. where many Jews lived; though he was born in an Heathen country, his parents were Jews: lately come from Italy; a famous and well-known country in Europe; ſee the note on Heb. xiii. 24. with his wife Priſcilla; ſhe and her huſband are both highly ſpoken of in Rom. xvi. 3, 4. ſee the note there: becauſe that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome; of which edict Suetonius[d] makes mention, who ſays, that Claudius "expelled the Jews from "Rome, who were continually making tumults, being "moved thereunto by one Chreſtus," who is generally underſtood to be Chriſt; and it is thought that the reaſon of this edict was, that the Jews in Rome continually oppoſing and diſputing with the Chriſtians, about Jeſus being the Meſſiah, Claudius, who was of a timorous diſpoſition, was afraid of a tumult, and that it might iſſue in his detriment, and therefore baniſhed all the Jews, with whom the Chriſtians were involved; for by the Heathens they were all called Jews, the firſt Chriſtians being Jews; tho' others ſay the reaſon was, that the Jews had contracted an acquaintance with Agrippina, the wife of Claudius, and had drawn her into Judaiſm: but be it as it will, ſuch an edict was made, on account of which Aquila and Priſcilla were obliged to leave Rome, and come to Corinth. It muſt be ſomething that was very provoking to him, otherwiſe before he had ſhewn much favour to the Jews; for he not only granted to the Jews at Alexandria, that they ſhould continue in the obſervance of their laws and cuſtoms, but permitted the ſame to them in all parts of the empire, by a ſpecial decree, which runs thus[e]; "Tiberius Claudius "Cæſar, &c. decrees, ſeeing the kings Agrippa and "Herod my deareſt friends, have intreated me that "I would ſuffer the Jews in every government "under the Romans, to obſerve their laws as in "Alexandria; I moſt willingly grant it, not only "for the ſake of gratifying thoſe who aſk it, but "judging that thoſe are worthy, for whom it is "aſked, becauſe of their faithfulneſs and friendſhip "to the Romans; eſpecially accounting it moſt juſt "that no Grecian city ſhould be deprived of theſe "rights, ſeeing they were kept for them by the "divine Auguſtus; wherefore it is right alſo that "the Jews throughout all our empire, ſhould ob"ſerve the cuſtoms of their country without any "hindrance, whom I now command that in love "to us they would behave more moderately, and "not deſpiſe the religion of other nations, but keep "their own laws; and I will that governours of "cities, and colonies, and freedoms, both in Italy "and without, have this my edict tranſcribed, and "alſo kings and princes by their embaſſadors, and "that it be put in ſuch a place in leſs than thirty "days, from whence it may be plainly read." This Claudius was the fifth emperor of Rome; and this decree paſſed in the ninth, or, as others, in the eleventh year of his reign, and about the year of Chriſt 51. or, as others, 54. And came unto them; that is, the Apoſtle, having found out Aquila and Priſcilla, he came and viſited them, and took up his lodging with them.

Ver. 3. And becauſe he was of the ſame craft, &c.] Art, occupation or trade: he abode with them; in the ſame houſe in which they were: and wrought; with his own hands, to ſupport himſelf, for he was a ſtranger in this place; and as yet here was no church to miniſter to him; and when there was, he would take nothing of them, that the falſe teachers, who roſe up among them, might not make any handle of it againſt him, and to the prejudice of the Goſpel; tho' otherwiſe he thought it his juſt due to receive a maintenance from the churches; and inſiſted upon it as an ordination of Chriſt. He learned a trade whilſt among the Jews, with whom it was common for their greateſt doctors to be brought up to ſome trade or another; ſee the note on Mark vi. 3. for by their occupation they were tent-makers; either for the ſoldiers, and which were made of ſack-cloth of hair, or of leather, and of the ſkins of various animals[f], ſewed together; hence the phraſe, ſub pellibus, under the ſkins, is uſed for to lie in tents[g]: or thoſe tents they made, were canopies made of linnen, and other things, which were erected in the ſummer ſeaſon to ſhade and ſkreen from the heat of the ſun; tho' others take them for a ſort of tapeſtry, or hangings, which they made for theaters, palaces, and ſtately rooms; and, according to the Syriac verſion, they were horſes trappings which they made: perhaps they were of the ſame occupation with Menedemus the philoſopher, who was σκηνορραφος, a ſewer of tents[h].

Ver. 4. And he reaſoned in the ſynagogue every ſabbath, &c.] In Corinth there was a ſynagogue of the Jews, in which they met together for worſhip on the ſeventh day of the week, which was their ſabbath; and hither Paul went, and took the opportunity of reaſoning with them out of the ſcriptures, concerning Chriſt, his perſon, and offices, his incarnation, obedience, ſufferings, and death, and about redemption and ſalvation by him: we may obſerve the diligence, induſtry, and indefatigableneſs of the Apoſtle; on the ſabbath-day he went to the ſynagogue, and preached Chriſt to thoſe who there attended; and on the week-days he laboured with his own hands. Beza's moſt ancient copy, and the Vulgate Latin verſion add here, interpoſing the name of the Lord Jeſus; frequently making mention of his name, or calling upon it, and doing miracles in it. And perſuaded the Jews and the Greeks; this was the effect of his reaſoning, and the ſucceſs that attended it; ſome, both of the Jews, who were ſo by birth, as well as religion, and of the Greeks, or Gentiles, who were Jewiſh proſelytes, and attended ſynagogue-worſhip, were convinced by his arguments, and were induced to believe the truth of his doctrine, and to embrace it; or at leaſt he endeavoured to perſuade them that they were loſt ſinners, and that there was ſalvation for them in Chriſt, and in him only.

Ver. 5. And when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, &c.] Not from Berœa in Macedonia, for from hence they came to the Apoſtle while at Athens, and from whence he ſent them, at leaſt Timothy, to Theſſalonica, to know the ſtate of the ſaints there, as appears from 1 Theſſ. iii. 1, 2. and from hence they now came to the Apoſtle at Corinth: when Paul was preſſed in Spirit; either by the holy Spirit, by which he was moved and ſtirred up to preach the Goſpel more frequently, and more powerfully; for he had not always the ſame meaſure of the Spirit, or was not always under the ſame influence; or elſe in his own Spirit, and ſo the Arabic verſion renders it, grief beſet the ſpirit of Paul; his ſoul was filled with trouble and ſorrow, when he obſerved the impenitence and unbelief, the contradiction and blaſphemy of the greater part of the Jews; and being filled with zeal for their welfare, he continued preaching Chriſt unto them. The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions, inſtead of in ſpirit, read in ſpeech, or in word; and the ſenſe is, not that he was ſtraitened in his ſpeech, and knew not what to ſay to the Jews, or had not freedom of ſpeech with them; but that he was inſtant in preaching to them, and preached the word more frequently and fervently, upon the coming of Silas and Timothy to his aſſiſtance: and teſtified to the Jews that Jeſus was Chriſt; he continued to produce more teſtimonies out of the writings of Moſes, and the prophets, to prove that Jeſus of Nazareth was the Chriſt, or Meſſiah, propheſied of in thoſe writings, and promiſed to the Jews, and whom they expected.

Ver. 6. And when they oppoſed themſelves, &c.] To the truth, and contradicted themſelves in many inſtances, and their own propheſies; or thoſe books which they themſelves allowed to be the oracles of God, and blaſphemed both Chriſt, and the Apoſtle, and the doctrine which he taught; and railed at him, and ſpoke evil of him, and uſed him in a very contumelious and reproachful manner, as they were uſed from contradicting to go to blaſpheming; ſee ch. xiii. 45. he ſhook his raiment; his outer garment, and the duſt off from it, as a teſtimony againſt them; ſee Matt. x. 14. and Acts xiii. 51. and ſaid unto them, your blood be upon your heads; meaning, that they were the authors of their own ruin and deſtruction; that they could not impute it to any other, when it came upon them; and that they were left inexcuſable, and muſt bear their own iniquities, and the puniſhment of them: this clauſe is wanting in the Syriac verſion. I am clean; meaning from their blood; ſee ch. xx. 26. The Apoſtle ſeems to allude to Ezek. xxxiii. 4, 5, 6, 8, 9. ſignifying, that he had diſcharged his duty as a preacher, and ſo had delivered his own ſoul from their blood being required at his hands; and that it reſted entirely on themſelves, and they were anſwerable for all their impenitence, unbelief, and blaſphemy: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles; in that city, and preach the Goſpel to them, and no more enter into their ſynagogue, as it is very likely he afterwards never did; for tho' Criſpus, the chief ruler of the ſynagogue, was afterwards converted, yet his converſion ſeems to have been not in the ſynagogue, but in the houſe of Juſtus, which was hard by it. Compare with this Acts xiii. 46.

Ver. 7. And he departed thence, &c.] Not from Corinth, but from the ſynagogue: and entered into a certain man's houſe named Juſtus; he did not return to Aquila and Priſcilla, becauſe they were Jews, leſt he ſhould be thought not to abide by his words, that he would henceforth go to the Gentiles; wherefore as he came out of the ſynagogue, he turned into a houſe adjoining to it, which belonged to one Juſtus: in one copy of Beza's, and in ſome others, and in the Vulgate Latin verſion, he is called Titus Juſtus; and in the Arabic verſion, Titus the ſon of Juſtus; the Syriac verſion only reads Titus: whether this is not the ſame Titus, who afterwards was a companion of the Apoſtle, and to whom he wrote an epiſtle, may be enquired. One that worſhipped God; a Gentile, but a religious man, ſuch an one as Cornelius: he might be a proſelyte either of the gate, or of righteouſneſs; tho' if he was the ſame with Titus, he could not be the latter, becauſe he was not circumciſed, Gal. ii. 3. whoſe houſe joined hard to the ſynagogue; had this man been a Jew, his houſe might very well have been taken for the houſe which was סמוך לבית הכנסת, near to the ſynagogue, in which travellers were entertained, and eat, and drank, and lodged [i]; and that he was the perſon appointed to take care of them, and ſo a very ſuitable houſe for Paul, a ſtranger, to take up his lodging in. The Ethiopic verſion adds, very wrongly, taking it from the beginning of the next verſe, becauſe he was the ruler of the ſynagogue; as if Juſtus was the ruler of the ſynagogue; and this the reaſon why his houſe was ſo near; whereas not he, but Criſpus, was the ruler, as follows.

Ver. 8. And Criſpus the chief ruler of the ſynagogue, &c.] This was a Jewiſh name; frequent mention is made of R. Criſpa in the Jewiſh writings [k]: this perſon, either thro' hearing Paul before he departed from the ſynagogue, or when in Juſtus's houſe, which was hard by the ſynagogue, believed on the Lord with all his houſe: he believed the doctrine the Apoſtle preached, concerning Jeſus, and that he was the Meſſiah; and he believed in him for life and ſalvation, and made a profeſſion of his faith in him, and ſo did all his family, upon which he was baptized by the Apoſtle; ſee 1 Cor. i. 14. and many of the Corinthians hearing; not his faith, as the Arabic verſion adds; as if hearing of the faith of Criſpus induced them to believe alſo; for the ruler of the Jewiſh ſynagogue had no ſuch influence on the Gentile Corinthians, as theſe were: but theſe hearing the Goſpel, preached by the Apoſtle, very likely in the houſe of Juſtus, to which they came, believed; faith came by hearing; they believed the Goſpel, and they believed in Chriſt, the ſum and ſubſtance of it; and not with a bare hiſtorical faith, but with a ſpiritual and ſaving one, or ſuch as is unto ſalvation, with their heart, and with their mouth made confeſſion of it: and were baptized; not by the Apoſtle, for he baptized at Corinth none but Criſpus and Gaius, and the houſhold of Stephanas, but by ſome of his companions, as Silas, or Timothy, or both: this is a plain inſtance of believers baptiſm; firſt they heard the word of God; then they believed, this word coming with power to them; and upon their believing, they are baptized. Theſe laid the foundation of a famous church in this place, which continued for many ages after; Silas who is reckoned among the ſeventy diſciples, is ſaid to be the firſt biſhop or paſtor of it; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. in the ſecond century Primus was biſhop of this church, with whom Egeſippus as he went to Rome ſtayed ſome days, and was much refreſhed with the orthodox faith of him, and the Corinthians; in the ſame century Dionyſius preſided over this church, who was not only very uſeful to the church under his care, but to many others[l]; in the ſame age, under Severus lived Bacchylus biſhop of Corinth, who wrote a book concerning Eaſter in the name of all the biſhops in Achaia[m]; in the third century Tertullian[n] makes mention of a church at Corinth; in the fourth century Epictetus was biſhop of the ſaid church, and was cotemporary and familiar with Athanaſius, to whom a letter is extant in the works of Athanaſius[o]; in the fifth century there was a church at Corinth, and a biſhop of it was in the ſynod at Chalcedon, and it was then a metropolitan church; in this age Peregrinus biſhop of Corinth, was in the firſt ſynod at Epheſus held againſt Neſtorius, and Eriſiſtratus a biſhop alſo of the ſame church, was in another ſynod at the ſame place, and Peter biſhip of Corinth was in the Chalcedon council; in the ſixth century mention is made of a biſhop of the Corinthians, in the fifth ſynod at Conſtantinople, and in the ſame century Gregory inſtructed John biſhop of the Corinthians rightly to govern the Lord's flock, and exhorted all the Corinthian biſhops to concord. In this age Adrianus alſo was biſhop of Corinth, he flouriſhed under Mauritius the emperor; as likewiſe did Anaſtaſius archbiſhop of the Corinthians; and he being removed from his office, John ſucceeded him in it; in the ſeventh century there was a Corinthian biſhop in the ſixth council at Conſtantinople[p]; thus far this ancient church is to be traced in hiſtory.

Ver. 9. Then ſpake the Lord to Paul in the night by a viſion, &c.] On a certain night as he was aſleep, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt appeared to him in a dream, and ſpake after this manner to him: be not afraid; it is very likely that after the baptiſm of Criſpus and his family, and of many of the Corinthians, that both the Jews and the Gentiles were exaſperated againſt the Apoſtle; and his life might ſeem to be in danger, and he might be thinking of removing from hence for his preſervation and ſafety; and might be adviſed to it by his friends, or at leaſt that he ſhould be incognito, and not be ſeen publickly: wherefore the Lord appears to him, and bids him not indulge any fears, or conceal himſelf and be ſilent, but ſpeak, and hold not thy peace; preach freely and boldly the Goſpel without fear of men; the fear of men ſhould not ſtop the mouths of Chriſt's miniſters.

Ver. 10. For I am with thee, &c.] According to his promiſe, Matt. xxviii. 20. not only to aſſiſt in the miniſtry of the word, to give light into it, and liberty to preach it, and ſucceſs in it, but to keep and preſerve from being hurt by men: and no man ſhall ſet on thee; attack thee, or lay hands on thee: to hurt thee; to do any injury to thy perſon, to thy body, in any part of it: wicked men can't ſtrike a blow, or do the leaſt damage to a ſervant of Chriſt without his permiſſion; he can tie their hands, and reſtrain their rage. For I have much people in this city; this wicked and luxurious city; there were many here who were yet in their ſins, in a ſtate of unregeneracy, whom God had choſen to be his people, and had taken into his covenant as ſuch; and who were given to Chriſt as his peculiar people, and whom he had redeemed with his precious blood: they were his people both by gift and purchaſe, before they were called by grace; and becauſe of this his intereſt in them, he will have his Goſpel continued for the gathering them in to himſelf; for Chriſt will loſe none of his, all ſhall come unto him: from all which it appears, that Chriſt has a people who are related to him, and he has an intereſt in, before they are effectually called by grace; for this refers not to the many Corinthians who had heard and believed, and were baptized, but to ſome that had not, and were yet to be called; not the Jews in this city, Chriſt's own nation, nor all the inhabitants of it who were in ſome ſenſe Chriſt's people, being made and ſupported in their beings by him, are intended; but a ſpecial people among the Gentiles, the ſame with the other ſheep Chriſt ſpeaks of, John x. 16. not yet of his fold; a people beloved of God, choſen in Chriſt, given to him, and with whom a covenant was made in him, for whom Chriſt undertook, in whoſe name he acted, and for whom he received bleſſings and promiſes, as well as took the care and charge of their perſons; for the ſake of theſe he aſſumed human nature, and ſuffered and died; towards theſe his heart always is; his eye is upon them, and he knows them, and where they are; and therefore he will look them up and find them out, and they ſhall be brought to believe in him, and ſhall not periſh, but have everlaſting life: and it may be further obſerved, that Chriſt has many ſuch, tho' they are but comparatively few, yet in themſelves they are a great number; yea, he has ſometimes many of theſe in the worſt of places, and among the vileſt of men; and for the ſake of theſe, in order to ſelect and ſeparate them from the reſt, is the Goſpel preached and continued. The miniſters of it are ſent here and there, where ſuch perſons are, and there they are continued till they are gathered in; yea, on this account both the Goſpel and its preachers, are continued in the world; and even the world itſelf, for the ſake of theſe till they are brought in, and then it will be deſtroyed; and it may be alſo remarked, that for the encouragement of Goſpel miniſters, Chriſt promiſes his preſence and protection, and which was fulfilled in the Apoſtle Paul at Corinth; who tho' he ſtayed there a year and ſix months, none were ſuffered to do him any injury; and when an inſurrection was made within that time, yet the Apoſtle eſcaped and quietly departed elſewhere.

Ver. 11. And he continued there, &c.] At Corinth, as the Syriac verſion, and ſome copies, read; he was obedient to the heavenly viſion: in the Greek text it is, he ſat there, anſwerable to the Hebrew word ישב, which ſignifies to ſit, continue and abide: he ſtaid there in all a year and ſix months; which was a long time for the Apoſtle to ſtay in one place, and longer than he did any where, unleſs at Epheſus, where he continued two years, ch. xix. 10. for as for his ſtay at Rome, that was by confinement: but here were many people to be called, and much work to do, a large church to be raiſed, and put in order; and this required time as well as care and labour: teaching the word of God among them; he did not ſit idle here, but preached the Goſpel, which is the word of God, and not man, openly and publickly, among them all; and that frequently, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, and with great boldneſs and faithfulneſs.

Ver. 12. And when Gallio was the deputy of Achaia, &c.] This province, which was now become a Roman one, Pliny the younger [q] calls true and mere Greece; it went by the name of Ægialus [r], and now it is called Livadia: it has on the north the country of Theſſaly, and on the weſt the river Acheloo, or Aracheo, on the eaſt the Ægean ſea, and on the ſouth Peloponneſus, or the Morea. Gallio, who was now deputy of it, was brother to L. Annæus Seneca, the famous philoſopher, who was preceptor to Nero; his name at firſt was M. Annæus Novatus, but being adopted by L. Junius Gallio, he took the name of the family. According to his brother's account of him [s], he was a very modeſt man, of a ſweet diſpoſition, and greatly beloved; and Statius [t] calls him Dulcem Gallionem, the ſweet Gallio, mild and gentle in his ſpeech, as Quintilian ſays. Seneca [u] makes mention of him as being in Achaia; and whilſt he was deputy there he had a fever, when as ſoon as it took him he went aboard a ſhip, crying, that it was not the diſeaſe of the body, but of the place. The Jews made inſurrection with one accord againſt Paul; being provoked that ſo many of their people, as well as of the Gentiles, were converted by him to the Chriſtian religion, and were baptized: and brought him to the judgment-ſeat; of Gallio, the deputy, to be tried and judged by him.

Ver. 13. Saying, this fellow perſuadeth men to worſhip God contrary to the law.] Meaning either to the law of the Romans, which forbad the bringing in of any new Gods, without the leave of the ſenate; ſee the note on chap. xvi. 21. or rather to the law of Moſes: the Arabic verſion reads, our law; tho' this was falſe, for Moſes in his law wrote of Chriſt, and ordered the children of Iſrael to hearken to him.

Ver. 14. And when Paul was now about to open his mouth, &c.] In his own defence, and plead his own cauſe, and anſwer to the charge exhibited againſt him: Gallio ſaid unto the Jews, if it was matter of wrong; of injury to any man's perſon or property, as murder, theft, &c. or wicked lewdneſs; as fraud, forgery, perjury, treaſon, &c. O ye Jews, reaſon would that I ſhould bear with you: his ſenſe is, that it would be according to right reaſon, and agreeable to his office as a judge, to admit them and their cauſe, and try it, and hear them patiently, and what was to be ſaid on both ſides of the queſtion, what the charges were, and the proof of them, and what the defendant had to ſay for himſelf. The Vulgate Latin verſion reads, O men Jews; and ſo Beza's ancient copy.

Ver. 15. But if it be a queſtion of words, &c.] Or of the word, what the Jews called the word of God, which Gallio did not pretend to underſtand: and names; as the names of God, of Jeſus, and of Chriſt, whether he is God, and the Meſſiah: and of your law; concerning circumciſion, whether theſe chriſtians and the proſelytes they make, are obliged unto it: look ye to it; ſuggeſting that this was a matter that lay before them, and they were the proper judges of, and might determine for themſelves, ſince they had the free exerciſe of their religion, and a right of judging of every thing that reſpected that within themſelves, and for which they were beſt furniſhed, as having a more competent knowledge of them; as the Arabic verſion renders it, and ye are more learned in theſe things; and moſt converſant with them: for I will be no judge of ſuch matters; and it would be well if every civil magiſtrate would act the ſame part, and not meddle with religious affairs, any farther than to preſerve the public peace.

Ver. 16. And he drave them from the judgment-ſeat.] He would not hear, and try the cauſe; but diſmiſſed them with threatning them, if ever they brought an affair of that kind to him any more.

Ver. 17. Then all the Greeks took Soſthenes, &c.] Theſe were not the Greeks or Gentiles that were devout perſons, or converted to Chriſtianity, and were on the ſide of Paul, and fell foul on Soſthenes, as being his chief accuſer; for this is not agreeable to the ſpirit and character of ſuch perſons, but the profane and unconverted Greeks, who obſerving that Gallio ſent the Jews away, with ſome reſentment and contempt, were encouraged to fall upon the principal of them, and uſe him in a very ill manner; it is very likely that this perſon was afterwards converted, and is the ſame that is mentioned in 1 Cor. i. 1. The name is Greek, and there is one of this name mentioned among the executors of Plato's will [w]. This man was now chief ruler of the ſynagogue; choſen in, very likely, upon Criſpus becoming a Chriſtian, and being baptized: and beat him before the judgment-ſeat; of Gallio; before he and his friends could get out of court: and Gallio cared for none of theſe things; which might not be owing to any ſluggiſhneſs in him, but to an ill opinion he had of the Jews, as being a turbulent and uneaſy people, and therefore he connived at ſome of of the inſolencies of the people towards them; tho' it did not become him, as a magiſtrate, to act ſuch a part, whoſe buſineſs it was to keep the publick peace, to quell diſorders, to protect mens perſons, and property, and prevent abuſe and miſchief, and to correct and puniſh for it. The Arabic verſion renders it, and no man made any account of Gallio; they did not fear his reſentment, he having drove the Jews from the judgment-ſeat.

Ver. 18. And Paul after this tarried there yet a good while, &c.] A year and a half, as in ver. 11. for this inſurrection might follow immediately upon the viſion the Apoſtle had; and who by that was encouraged to continue in this city, notwithſtanding the treatment he met with; he not doubting of the promiſe of God, and of his power and faithfulneſs to fulfil it, though this was a trial of his faith and conſtancy: and then took his leave of the brethren; whom he had been inſtrumental in the converſion of, and had eſtabliſhed and confirmed in the faith; and having now done his work in this place, at leaſt for the time preſent, he takes his leave of them and departs: and ſailed thence into Syria; or towards Syria, for he took Epheſus by the way, which was in Aſia, and ſtopped there a little while: and with him Priſcilla and Aquila; whom he had met with at Corinth, and with whom he had lodged and wrought at his trade, ver. 2, 3. Having ſhorn his head in Cenchrea; which ſome underſtand not of Paul, but of Aquila, who is the laſt perſon ſpoken of; and the Ethiopic verſion reads in the plural number, referring this to both Priſcilla and Aquila, and they had ſhaved their heads, for they had a vow; and ſo it was read in a manuſcript of Baronius, and [w] Laert. l. 3. in Vita Platon.

Bede obſerves, that it was read in like manner in ſome copies in his time; but the more authentic reading is in the ſingular number, and is more generally underſtood of the Apoſtle Paul; who being about to go into Judea, to the Jew became a Jew, that he might gain ſome: Cenchrea, where this was done, was a ſea-port belonging to the Corinthians, on the eaſt of the Iſthmus, as Lechea was on the weſt; according to Pliny [x], there were two gulphs, or bays, to the Iſthmus, the one he calls the Corinthian bay, and others the Criſſean and Alcyonian bay, and Golfo de Petras; the other the Saronic bay, now called Golfo de Engia; Lechea was in the Corinthian bay, and Cenchrea in the Saronic bay; and both belonged to Corinth, and were the bounds of the Straights; the ſpace between them was the Iſthmus, which conſiſted of about five miles; and ſo Pauſanias ſays [y], the Iſthmus of the Corinthians, is waſhed on both ſides by the ſea; on one ſide at Cenchrea, and on the other at Lechea, and this makes the iſland a continent; and likewiſe Philo [z] giving an account of a voyage of Flaccus ſays, that paſſing over the Ionian gulph, he came to the ſea (or ſhore) of Corinth——and going over the Iſthmus from Lechea, to the oppoſite ſea, he came down to Cenchrea, a ſea-port of the Corinthians; of which Apuleius [a] gives this account; "this town is a moſt noble colony of the Corinthians, it is waſhed by the Ægean and Saronic ſea, where there is a port, a moſt ſafe receptacle for ſhips, and very populous." Hither the Apoſtle came from Corinth to take ſhipping, and from hence he ſailed to Syria, as before obſerved: it has its name either from millet, for Cenchros ſignifies millet, and Cenchrias is bread made of millet; or from the bird Cenchris, which is a kind of hawk; ſee the note on Rom. xvi. 1. For he had a vow; this ſome think, could not be the vow of the Nazarites, for then he ſhould have ſtaid till he came to Jeruſalem, and have ſhaved his head at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and caſt the hair into the fire, under the pot in which the peace-offerings were boiled [b]; though he that vowed in the country, was not obliged to this: others think it was ſuch an one, as the Jews in travelling uſed, that they would not ſhave till they came to ſuch a place; and ſo the Apoſtle had made a vow, that he would ſhave at Cenchrea, and accordingly did; but this is not likely, that the Apoſtle ſhould make a vow upon ſo light an occaſion: others, that it refers to his going to Jeruſalem, to keep the feaſt there, ver. 21. and ſo theſe think the words are a reaſon, not of his ſhaving of his head, but of his ſailing to Syria; the firſt is moſt probable, that it was a Nazarite's vow; ſee ch. xxi. 24.

Ver. 19. And he came to Epheſus, &c.] The metropolis of Aſia; according to Pliny [c], it had been called by many names; at the time of the Trojan war, Alopes, then Ortygia and Morges, alſo Smyrna Trachea, Samornion and Prelea, and which he calls the work of the Amazons: ſome ſay [d] it was called Epheſus, becauſe Hercules permitted the Amazons to dwell in it, Epheſus in the Greek language ſignifying permiſſion; Pauſanias [e] denies, that the famous temple in it was built by them, but by Epheſus the ſon of Cayſtrus, and ſays that from him the city had its name; though others ſay it was built by Androclus, the ſon of Codrus, king of Athens, in the time of David king of Iſrael, and that having ſuffered by the ſea, it was rebuilt by Lyſimachus king of Thrace, who called it after his wife's name Arſinoe; but he being dead, it was called by its ancient name Epheſus: it is now a poor village in the hands of the Turks, and with them goes by the name of Aiaſalik; though with others it ſtill has the name of Epheſo: the Syriac verſion reads, they came; not only Paul, but Aquila and Priſcilla; and certain it is that they came with him thither, ſince it follows, and left them there; unleſs this is to be underſtood of Cenchrea: this clauſe is not here read in the Syriac verſion, but is placed at the end of ver. 21. where it reads much better; as that he ſhould leave them at Epheſus, when he departed from thence, than when he firſt came thither; unleſs the ſenſe is, that he left them in ſome part of the city, whilſt he went to the Jewiſh ſynagogue; ſince it follows, but he himſelf entered into the ſynagogue and reaſoned with the Jews; concerning Jeſus being the Meſſiah, and the abrogation of the law; and the doctrine of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and not by the deeds of the law; which were the principal things in debate, between him and the Jews: Beza's ancient copy reads, and the ſabbath following he left them there.

Ver. 20. When they deſired him to tarry longer time with them, &c.] Either Aquila and Priſcilla, whom he left here, for here they were, as is certain from ver. 24, 26. or rather the Jews with whom he reaſoned, who might be deſirous of further conference with him, upon the ſubject they had diſputed about; either in order to gain more knowledge, or in hopes of baffling and confounding him: he conſented not; for a reaſon afterwards given.

Ver. 21. But bad them farewel, ſaying, &c.] As follows: I muſt by all means keep this feaſt that cometh in Jeruſalem; which perhaps was the paſſover, ſince that often went by the name of the feaſt: the reaſon why he muſt by all means keep it, was not becauſe it was obligatory upon him; nor did he always obſerve it, as appears from his long ſtay at Corinth, and other places; and beſides, as a chriſtian, he had nothing to do with it; but either becauſe of his vow, ver. 18. or becauſe he knew he ſhould have an opportunity of preaching the Goſpel to great numbers; the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions omit this clauſe: but I will return again unto you, if God will; he promiſes to return to them, but not peremptorily; as knowing that he was altogether ſubject to the will of God, who diſpoſes and orders all things according to his ſovereign pleaſure; ſee James iv. 15. and he ſailed from Epheſus; which was near the Ægean ſea: ſuch was the ſituation of Epheſus, according to Apollonius [f]; who ſays, that it ſtood out to the ſea, which encompaſſed the land on which it was built; ſo Pauſanias [g] relates, that Lyſimachus paſſing into Aſia by ſhipping, took the kingdom of Antigonus from him, and built the city the Epheſians now inhabit near the ſea; ſo Joſephus [h] reports of Herod and Agrippa, that travelling by land to Phrygia Major, they came to Epheſus, and again, διεπλευσαν, they ſailed from Epheſus to Samos.

Ver. 22. And when he had landed at Ceſarea, &c.] This was Ceſarea Stratonis, formerly called Strato's tower; it would have been neareſt for the Apoſtle to have landed at Joppa, in order to go to Jeruſalem, but that haven was a dangerous one; this was the ſafeſt, and which therefore Herod had repaired at a vaſt expence, and in honour of Cæſar had called it by this name: of the port at Ceſarea, and what a convenient and commodious one, as it was made by Herod, Joſephus [i] gives a particular account, and who often calls this place Ceſarea, παραλιος, Ceſarea by the ſea [k]; and in other Jewiſh [l] writings, mention is made of this place as a ſea-port, and of, שונתא דימא דקיסרין the ſhore of the ſea of Ceſarea: Joſephus [m] ſometimes calls it the port Sebaſtus, or Auguſtus, it being as before obſerved made by Herod, and ſo called in honour of Auguſtus Cæſar; and in another place [n], Sebaſtus the port of Ceſarea: according to Jerom [o], or a writer under his name, this was neither Ceſarea Philippi, which indeed it could not be, that being an inland town; nor Ceſarea formerly called Strato's tower, but a third Ceſarea, the metropolis of Cappadocia; in which he muſt be miſtaken, ſeeing that was no ſea-port, and the Apoſtle could not be ſaid to land there; nor did it lie in the way to Jeruſalem from Epheſus; but this city was in Phenice, and lay between Joppa and Dora; which cities were maritime ones, but very diſagreeable havens, becauſe of the vehement ſtrong winds from Africa; which rolling up the ſand out of the ſea upon the ſhore, would not admit of a quiet ſtation [p]; wherefore the Apoſtle choſe to land here, and not at either of the ſaid ports: and gone up; not to Ceſarea, but to Jeruſalem, from thence, which lay higher; and going to and from theſe places, is ſignified by a going up and down, ch. ix. 30. and xxv. 1. Moreover, the Apoſtle had told the Epheſians, that he muſt go and keep the feaſt in Jeruſalem, as he undoubtedly did; and yet if this does not refer to his going up thither, it will not be eaſy to obſerve, that he went thither at all before his return to Epheſus; and beſides, to ſuppoſe him to go from Ceſarea to Antioch, was all one as to go back to Epheſus, and ſo to go, as one obſerves, by the ſame place to Jeruſalem, unto which he promiſed in his return from Jeruſalem, to come again if God would: and ſaluted the church; at Jeruſalem, the mother church: he went down to Antioch; in Syria, from whence he firſt ſet out.

Ver. 23. And after he had ſpent ſome time there, &c.] At Antioch: he departed; from thence: and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, ſtrengthening all the diſciples; that were in thoſe parts, confirming them in the faith of Chriſt, and fortifying their minds againſt the temptations of ſatan, and encouraging them to bear the reproaches and perſecutions of men; which ſhews the affection, diligence, and induſtry of the Apoſtle: it ſeems there were diſciples in theſe countries of Galatia and Phrygia, which very likely were made by the Apoſtle, when he paſſed through thoſe places, ch. xvi. 6. and who were the beginning of Goſpel churches in theſe places, which continued for ages after; certain it is, there were churches in Galatia in the Apoſtle's time, of whom he makes mention, and to whom he wrote, 1 Cor. xvi. 1. Gal. i. 2. According to the apoſtolical conſtitutions, Creſcens mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 10. was appointed by the Apoſtles biſhop of the churches of Galatia; and particularly it is ſaid, that he was biſhop of Chalcedon in Galatia; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. and in the ſecond century, there was a church at Ancyra, which was diſturbed by the hereſy of Montanus, and was eſtabliſhed by Apolinarius, who makes mention of the elders of this church [q]: in the third century there were churches in Galatia, which Stephen biſhop of Rome threatened with excommunication, becauſe they re-baptized hereticks: in the beginning of the fourth century, there were biſhops from hence, which aſſiſted at the council of Nice, againſt Arius, and at the ſynod of Sardica, in the ſame century; and at the beginning of it, Clemens biſhop of Ancyra, after he had taught twenty-nine years, ſuffered much in the perſecution of Diocleſian, firſt at Rome, then at Nicomedia, and at laſt was put to death by the ſword; in this age alſo lived Baſil, biſhop of Ancyra under Conſtantius; he firſt came to the biſhoprick of that place under Conſtantine, but being deprived of it for four years, was reſtored by Conſtantius in the council of Sardica; under the former he diſputed againſt Photinus, as Epiphanius [r] relates; who makes mention of Anyſius his deacon, and Eutyches and Theodulus his notaries; and the ſame writer [s] takes notice of ſeveral elders and officers of the ſame church in that age, as Photinus, Euſtathius, another Photinus, and Sigerius elders, Hyginus deacon, Heracides ſub-deacon, Elpidius reader, and Cyriacus preſident of the church: in the fifth century, there were many churches in Galatia, yea, they are ſaid to be innumerable; Leontius was biſhop of Ancyra in the times of Arcadius and Honorius; and was ſucceeded by Theodotus, who was in the firſt Epheſine ſynod againſt Neſtorius, as was alſo Euſebius biſhop of the ſame church, at another ſynod in the ſame place; Anaſtaſius was biſhop of the ſaid church, lived under the emperor Leo the firſt, and was at the ſynod of Conſtantinople; Meliphthongus biſhop of Juliopolis in the ſame country, aſſiſted at ſeveral ſynods; Euſebius biſhop of Aſpona in Galatia, was preſent in the firſt ſynod at Epheſus againſt Neſtorius; likewiſe Peter biſhop of Gangræ, and Theoctiſtus biſhop of Peſſinus, both lived in the time of the two ſynods, the infamous one at Epheſus, and the other at Chalcedon: in the ſixth century, there were biſhops of Ancyra, Juliopolis, and other cities in Galatia, who were preſent at the Roman and Conſtantipolitan ſynod; in this age under Anaſtaſius the emperor, lived Dorotheus biſhop of Ancyra: in the ſeventh century, were preſent at the ſixth council at Conſtantinople, ſeveral biſhops of the churches of Galatia; as of Sinope, Peſſinus, Aſpona, and others: in the eighth century, mention is made of Baſil, biſhop of the church at Ancyra, Nicodemus biſhop of Didymi, Gregory biſhop of Sinope: and even in the ninth century a garriſon of chriſtians was placed in Ancyra, againſt the incurſions of the Saracens [t]; ſo long the chriſtian name remained in thoſe parts: and that there were alſo churches in Phrygia, is as evident; Ariſtarchus a companion of the Apoſtle Paul, is ſaid to be biſhop of Apamea, which was a city in Phrygia; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. in the ſecond century, Papias a diſciple of the Apoſtle John, was biſhop of Hierapolis in this country [u]; and in the ſame age there was a church at Philomelium in Phrygia, Phrygia, to which the church at Smyrna wrote a letter, ſtill extant in Euſebius [w], which gives an account of the martyrdom of Polycarp; likewiſe the church at Lyons in France, ſent a letter to the churches in Aſia and Phrygia, giving an account of their martyrs, which is to be ſeen in the ſame writer [x]; in this century lived Apolinarius, biſhop of Hierapolis, who oppoſed the Phrygian hereſy of Montanus; and who makes mention of Zoticus, of the village of Comana, and Julianus of Apamea, both in Phrygia, as his fellow elders and biſhops [y]: Dionyſius of Alexandria, ſpeaks of a church, and of the brethren at Synnada, which was in Phrygia, in a letter of his to Philemon, a preſbyter at Rome [z]; at Lampſacus in Phrygia, there were martyrs that ſuffered under Decius: in the third century, there was a church at Hierapolis, famous from the times of the Apoſtles. Tertullian makes mention of the believers in Chriſt in Phrygia, in his time [a]: in the beginning of the fourth century under Diocleſian, a whole city in Phrygia of chriſtians, was ſet on fire and burnt, men, women, and children, calling upon Chriſt the God of all [b]; and at the council of Nice under Conſtantine, were preſent biſhops of many churches in Phrygia; as Ilium, Synnada, Eucarpia, Hierapolis, and others; at Lampſacus in this country, was held a memorable ſynod againſt Eudoxus and Acacius, the chief of the Arian faction: in the fifth century there were churches in Phrygia; Theodoſius and Agapetus were biſhops of Synnada in Phrygia Pacatiana; Marinianus biſhop of the ſame place, was preſent at the ſeveral ſynods in this century; Nunechius of Laodicea, Gennadius of Acmonii, Thomas and Olympius both of Theodoſiopolis, Lucianus of Ipſa, Albertus of Hierapolis, Euſebius of Doryleus, with many others, all in Phrygia, are made mention of in hiſtory: in the ſixth century, ſeveral biſhops of Phrygia, as of Philomelium, &c. were preſent at the ſynod held at Rome and Conſtantinople: in the ſeventh century, biſhops of ſeveral churches in this country, as of Hierapolis, Synnada, &c. aſſiſted at the ſixth ſynod at Conſtantinople: in the eighth century were many churches here, whoſe biſhops were preſent at the Nicene ſynod, as Baſil biſhop of Pergamus, Nicetas of Ilium, John of Synnada, and others [c].

Ver. 24. And a certain Jew named Apollos, &c.] Who by ſome is thought to be the ſame with Apelles, Rom. xvi. 10. his name is Greek, though he was a Jew, not only by religion, but by birth, being of a Jewiſh extract: born at Alexandria; in Egypt, which was built by Alexander the great, from whence it had its name; it was the metropolis of Egypt, and the ſeat of the kings of it; great numbers of Jews were in this place; here lived Philo the famous Jew: an eloquent man; in ſpeech, as well as learned, wiſe and prudent, as the Ethiopic verſion renders it: and mighty in the ſcriptures; of the Old Teſtament, particularly in the prophecies of them concerning the Meſſiah; he had thoroughly read them, and carefully examined them, and could readily cite them; as well as had great knowledge of them, and was capable of explaining them; he was ſkillful in the ſcriptures, as the Syriac verſion renders it; or he knew them, as the Ethiopic; he had large acquaintance with them, and was well verſed in them: it is a Jewiſh way of ſpeaking; ſo Ahitophel is ſaid to be, גבור בתורה:, mighty in the law [d]; the ſame is ſaid of the ſons of Reuben [e]: this man came to Epheſus; after the departure of the Apoſtle Paul; and while Aquila and Priſcilla were there; the reaſon of his coming hither, was to preach the word, as he did.

Ver. 25. This man was inſtructed in the way of the Lord, &c.] Which John, whoſe baptiſm he only knew, came to prepare: the word here uſed, ſignifies catechized; and ſuggeſts, that he was trained up by his parents in this way, who might have been the diſciples of John, though afterwards removed from Judea to Alexandria; and that he only had been taught the rudiments of the chriſtian religion, or doctrine of the Goſpel; here called the way of the Lord, or which directs and leads unto him, as the only Saviour, and is the path of faith and truth; or as ſome copies read, the word of the Lord; and which accounts for what is afterwards ſaid of him: and being fervent in the Spirit; either in or by the Spirit of God, being made ſo by him, who is compared to fire, and who in the form of cloven tongues of fire, ſat upon the diſciples at the day of Pentecoſt, and upon others; among whom this Apollos is by ſome thought to be, though without any reaſon; however, he might be inſpired with zeal by the Spirit of God: or in his own ſpirit, as the Ethiopic verſion renders it; his ſoul was enflamed with zeal for the glory of God, the honour of Chriſt, and the good of ſouls; his miniſtry was very affectionate, warm, and lively; ſee Rom. xii. 11. He ſpake and taught diligently the things of the Lord; or of Jeſus, as read the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions; according to the meaſure of light and grace he had received, he ſpake out freely and fully, and taught the people with great induſtry, and with all the exactneſs he could, the things he knew concerning the perſon, offices, and grace of the Lord Jeſus: knowing only the baptiſm of John; which muſt be underſtood, not of the ordinance of baptiſm ſingly as adminiſtered by John, but of the whole miniſtry of John; as of that ordinance, ſo of his doctrine concerning repentance and remiſſion of ſins; and concerning Chriſt that was to come, and concerning his being come, and who he was, whom John pointed at, and taught the people to believe in: but perhaps he might know very little, if any thing, of the miracles of Chriſt, or of his death and reſurrection from the dead, and the benefits and effects thereof; and of the pouring out of the Holy Ghoſt upon the Apoſtles, and the light and knowledge which were communicated thereby.

Ver. 26. And he began to ſpeak boldly in the ſynagogue, &c.] Of the Jews at Epheſus; uſing great freedom of ſpeech, and ſhewing much intrepidity and greatneſs of ſoul, and preſence of mind; not fearing the faces of men, nor the revilings and contradictions of the Jews: whom when Aquila and Priſcilla had heard; they attending at the ſynagogue, and having obſerved what he delivered, that there was ſome deficiency in it, though they took no notice of it publickly; partly on their own account, it not being proper, eſpecially for Priſcilla, to ſpeak in publick, nor was it allowed in the Jewiſh ſynagogues, for a woman to ſpeak there; and partly on his account, that they might not put him to the bluſh, and diſcourage him; and chiefly on account of the Goſpel, that they might not lay any ſtumbling-blocks in the way of that, and of young converts, and give an occaſion to the adverſary to make advantages: wherefore they took him unto them; they took him aſide when he came out of the ſynagogue, and privately converſed with him; they had him to their own houſe, as the Syriac verſion renders it: and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly; theſe two doubtleſs had received a conſiderable meaſure of evangelical light and knowledge from the Apoſtle Paul, during the time of their converſation with him; and as they freely received from him, they freely impart it to Apollos, with a good deſign to ſpread the truth of the Goſpel, and to promote it and the intereſt of Chriſt in the world: and as on the one hand it was a good office, and a kind part in them, to communicate knowledge to him, ſo it was an inſtance of a good ſpirit, and of condeſcenſion in him, to be taught and inſtructed by them; eſpecially ſince one of them was a woman, and both mechanicks, and made but a mean figure: and from hence it may be obſerved, that women of grace, knowledge, and experience, though they are not allowed to teach in public, yet they may, and ought to communicate in private, what they know of divine things for the uſe of others.

Ver. 27. And when he was diſpoſed to paſs into Achaia, &c.] The chief city of which was Corinth, and whither Apollos went, as appears from ch. xix. 1. What diſpoſed him to go thither, after he had received a greater degree of light and knowledge, was no doubt that he might communicate it to the good of others, to which he was moved by the Holy Ghoſt, who had work for him to do there: according to Beza's moſt ancient copy, there were Corinthians ſojourning in Epheſus, who when they had heard him (Apollos) beſought him that he would go with them into their country; to which he agreeing, the Epheſians wrote to the diſciples at Corinth to receive him, as follows: the brethren wrote, exhorting the diſciples to receive him; that is, the brethren at Epheſus, among whom Aquila was a principal one, wrote letters of recommendation to the brethren of the churches in Achaia, particularly at Corinth, not only that they would receive him into their houſes, and hoſpitably entertain him as a chriſtian man, but admit him, and behave towards him, as a preacher of the Goſpel: who when he was come; into Achaia, and to Corinth: helped them much which had believed through grace; the phraſe through grace, is omitted in the Vulgate Latin verſion, but is in all the Greek copies, and may be connected either with the word helped; as the Syriac verſion, he helped through grace; and then the ſenſe is, that Apollos, through the gifts of grace beſtowed on him, or by the aſſiſtance of the grace of God, or both, greatly helped and contributed much to the advantage of the believers in thoſe parts; as to the incouragement of their faith, and the increaſe of the joy of it; for the quickening, and comforting, and eſtabliſhing them in the truths and doctrines of the Goſpel, by his affectionate, fervent, and nervous way of preaching: or it may be connected with the word believed, as it is in the Arabic verſion and in ours; and the meaning is, that he greatly aſſiſted ſuch who were already believers; and who became ſo, not of themſelves, but through the grace of God; for faith is not of nature, nor the produce of man's freewill, but is the gift of God's grace; it is a fruit of electing grace, an inſtance of diſtinguiſhing grace, it is owing to efficacious grace, and comes along with effectual calling grace, through the word preached, the means of grace; and is ſupported and maintained by the grace of God: the Ethiopic verſion renders it, he preached much to them, who believed in the grace of God; that is, in the Goſpel, the doctrine of the grace of God, which they had received and profeſſed; or in the love and favour of God, they were rooted and grounded in, and perſuaded of.

Ver. 28. For he mightily convinced the Jews, &c.] His reaſoning was ſo ſtrong and nervous, his arguments ſo weighty and powerful, and the paſſages he produced out of the Old Teſtament ſo full and pertinent, that the Jews were not able to ſtand againſt him; they could not object to the texts of ſcripture he urged, nor to the ſenſe he gave of them, nor anſwer the arguments founded upon them; he was an over-match for them; they were refuted by him over and over, and were confounded to the laſt degree: and that publickly, in their ſynagogue, before all the people; which increaſed their ſhame and confuſion; and was the means of ſpreading the Goſpel, of bringing others to the faith of it, and of eſtabliſhing them in it, who had already received it: ſhewing by the ſcriptures; of the Old Teſtament, which the Jews received and acknowledged as the word of God: that Jeſus was Chriſt; or that Chriſt, that Meſſiah, which theſe ſcriptures ſpoke of, whom God had promiſed, and the church of God expected; and which was the main thing in controverſy, between the Jews and the chriſtians, as it ſtill is.

CHAP. XIX

Ver. 1. AND it came to paſs that while Apollos was at Corinth, &c.] Whither he came after the Apoſtle Paul, and where he watered what the Apoſtle had planted, and where he became very famous and eminent; inſomuch that he was ſet up, though not with his will, at the head of a party, in oppoſition to the chief of the Apoſtles, Peter and Paul; ſee 1 Cor. i. 12. and iii. 4, 5, 6. and iv. 6. Paul having paſſed through the upper coaſts; that is, of Phrygia, Galatia, Pontus, Bithynia, Lydia, Lycaonia, and Paphlagonia: came to Epheſus; into Ionia, of which Epheſus was the chief city, and lay near the ſea; wherefore the other countries are called the upper coaſts; hither he came according to his promiſe, in ch. xviii. 21. And finding certain diſciples; ſuch as believed in Chriſt, made a profeſſion of him, and had been baptized in his name, for ſuch were commonly called diſciples: theſe don't ſeem to be perſons, who were either converted by Paul, when he was at Epheſus before, or by Apollos, who had been there ſince, and was gone; but rather ſome who came hither from other parts, ſince the Apoſtle was at this place; though indeed his ſtay at Epheſus before was ſo ſhort, that they might be here, and he not hear of them, or meet with them.

Ver. 2. He ſaid unto them, have ye received the Holy Ghoſt, &c.] Meaning, not the ſpecial regenerating and ſanctifying grace of the Holy Ghoſt, for that is ſuppoſed in their being diſciples and believers, but the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt: for it follows, ſince ye believed? that is, in Chriſt; which is taking it for granted, that they had recived the ſpecial grace of the Spirit of God; for this believing, is to be underſtood of true, ſpiritual, ſpecial faith in Chriſt: and they ſaid unto him, we we have not ſo much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghoſt; by which they could not mean the perſon of the Holy Ghoſt; for they muſt have known that there was ſuch a divine perſon as the Holy Ghoſt, from the writings of the Old Teſtament, with which they were converſant; and from the miniſtry of John, into whoſe baptiſm they were baptized; who ſaw the Spirit of God deſcend on Jeſus, and bore witneſs of it; and declared, that Chriſt who was to come after him, would baptize with the Holy Ghoſt: nor could they mean the ſpecial grace of the Spirit, which they themſelves had received; but the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit of God, which they at preſent knew nothing of, and which were afterwards beſtowed upon them: they knew that there were prophecies in the Old Teſtament, concerning the effuſion of the Spirit in the laſt days, in the days of the Meſſiah; but they had not heard that theſe had had their accompliſhment; they had heard nothing of the day of pentecoſt, and of the pouring out of the Spirit upon the Apoſtles then, nor of any inſtance of this kind ſince; they did not know that the Holy Ghoſt was yet, John vii. 39. they knew he was promiſed, but not that he was given; the Ethiopic verſion, to avoid the difficulty of the text, renders it, we have only heard that there was an Holy Ghoſt.

Ver. 3. And he ſaid unto them, unto what then were ye baptized? &c.] The Apoſtle takes it for granted that they were baptized, ſince they were not only believers, but diſciples; ſuch as not only believed with the heart, but had made a profeſſion of their faith, and were followers of Chriſt; but aſks unto what they were baptized; either in whoſe name they were baptized, ſince chriſtian baptiſm was adminiſtered in the name of the Spirit, as well as in the name of the Father and of the Son; or what attended, or followed their baptiſm, ſeeing ſometimes the Holy Ghoſt fell upon perſons, either before baptiſm, or at it, or after it: and they ſaid, unto John's baptiſm; ſome think they had never been baptized at all with water baptiſm, only had received the doctrine preached by John, concerning repentance and remiſſion of ſins, and ſo were baptized unto him, profeſſing the ſame doctrine he did, juſt as the Iſraelites were baptized into Moſes; others think they were baptized, but very wrongly, being baptized in the name of John, and not in the name of Jeſus Chriſt; and ſo as it was not chriſtian baptiſm they had ſubmitted to, it was right to baptize them again: but neither of theſe are probable, for it is not likely that they ſhould receive John's doctrine, and not his baptiſm; that they ſhould be his diſciples and followers, and not attend to the more diſtinguiſhing branch of his miniſtry; and it is ſtill more unlikely that they ſhould be baptized in his name, who preached Jeſus Chriſt to his followers, and pointed out to them the Lamb of God, and declared him to be greater than he; it ſeems rather that they were baptized, and that they were baptized in the name of Chriſt, as John's diſciples were, as the Apoſtle affirms in the following words.

Ver. 4. Then ſaid Paul, &c.] In reply to their anſwer, underſtanding them that they were baptized by John, he takes it up, and gives an account of John's baptiſm; ſhowing how agreeable it was, and that it was the ſame baptiſm with the baptiſm of Chriſt, being adminiſtered in his name: John verily baptized with the baptiſm of repentance; which required repentance antecedent to it, and was a fruit and effect, and ſo an evidence of it: ſaying unto the people; the people of the Jews, the common people, the multitude that attended on his miniſtry: that they ſhould believe on him, which ſhould come after him, that is, on Jeſus Chriſt; ſo that he preached faith in Chriſt, as well as repentance towards God; and made the one as well as the other, a neceſſary pre-requiſite unto baptiſm; which ſhows, that his baptiſm and chriſtian baptiſm are the ſame.

Ver. 5. When they heard this, &c.] That is, the people to whom John preached, his hearers; when they heard of the Meſſiah, and that Jeſus was he, and that it became them to believe in him: they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jeſus; not the diſciples that Paul found at Epheſus, but the hearers of John; for theſe are the words of the Apoſtle Paul, giving an account of John's baptiſm, and of the ſucceſs of his miniſtry, ſhewing, that his baptiſm was adminiſtered in the name of the Lord Jeſus; and not the words of Luke the Evangeliſt, recording what followed upon his account of John's baptiſm; for then he would have made mention of the Apoſtle's name, as he does in the next verſe; and have ſaid, when they heard this account, they were baptized by Paul in the name of the Lord Jeſus: the hiſtorian reports two things, firſt what Paul ſaid, which lies in ver. 4, 5. then what he did, ver. 6. where he repeats his name, as was neceſſary; as that he laid his hands upon them, which was all that was needful, to their receiving the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, having been already baptized in the name of the Lord Jeſus: which ſenſe is the more confirmed by the particles μεν and δε, which anſwer to one another in ver. 4, 5, and ſhew the words to be a continuation of the Apoſtle's ſpeech, and not the words of the hiſtorian, which begin in the next verſe. Beza's ancient copy adds, for the remiſſion of ſins.

Ver. 6. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, &c.] They having been before baptized, not by him, but by John, or one of his diſciples, in the name of the Lord Jeſus; juſt as Peter and John laid their hands upon the believing Samaritans, who had been before baptized by Philip, Acts viii. 14, 15, 16, 17. and the ſame extraordinary effects followed: the Holy Ghoſt came on them; in his extraordinary gifts, whoſe ſpecial grace they had before an experience of: and they ſpake with tongues; with other tongues, or in other languages, which they had never learned, or had been uſed to, as the diſciples did at the day of pentecoſt: and propheſied; preached, having an extraordinary gift at once, of explaining the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and alſo foretold things to come.

Ver. 7. And all the men were about twelve.] The Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions, have not the word about; but affirm, that the men were twelve; and indeed, the number being ſo ſmall, the hiſtorian might be at a certainty about it: theſe ſeem to be the firſt materials of a Goſpel church at Epheſus, which afterwards was very large and flouriſhing, and very likely were ſome of the elders of it.

Ver. 8. And he went into the ſynagogue, &c.] Of the Jews at Epheſus, for it ſeems to have been a private houſe, where he had met with the twelve baptized diſciples, and had laid his hands on them; and theſe being Jews, as it ſeems moſt likely, by their having been baptized into John's baptiſm, the Apoſtle went along with them to the ſynagogue on the ſabbath-day, as was his uſual cuſtom; having a very great deſire, and an affectionate concern for, the welfare of his countrymen the Jews: and ſpake boldly for the ſpace of three months; that is, he uſed great freedom of ſpeech, and ſhewed much courage and intrepidity of mind, in preaching the Goſpel at the ſynagogue every ſabbath-day as it returned, during this ſpace of time; ſome manuſcripts read, three days: diſputing and perſuading the things concerning the kingdom of God; the kingdom of the Meſſiah, the Goſpel diſpenſation, the doctrines and ordinances of the Goſpel, and the Goſpel church-ſtate, often ſignified by the kingdom of God, and of heaven, in ſcripture; and concerning the glory of a future ſtate, the way and right unto it, and meetneſs for it; and theſe things he reaſoned upon in ſuch a ſtrong and nervous manner, and made uſe of ſuch powerful arguments, in proof and demonſtration of them, as were very perſuaſive, and engaged many to believe them, and give their aſſent unto them.

Ver. 9. But when divers were hardened and believed not, &c.] For though ſome were affected with, and convinced by the arguments the Apoſtle uſed, others were but the more hardened and remained incredulous; for the Goſpel, while it is the ſavour of life unto life to ſome, it is the ſavour of death unto death to others; as the ſun melts the wax, and hardens the clay: but ſpake evil of the way before the multitude; the Syriac verſion and Beza's ancient copy read, before the multitude of the Gentiles: the unbelieving Jews, not only contradicted the Goſpel preached by the Apoſtle, but blaſphemed it, and ſaid all the evil things of it they could, and loaded it with reproaches, and charged it with all the bad conſequences they could think of; and that publickly, before all the people, in order to prejudice them againſt it; for by the way, is meant the doctrine of the Goſpel, which the Vulgate Latin here reads, the way of the Lord; and ſo ſome copies; and two of Stephens's copies read, the way of God, as does alſo the Syriac verſion; and the Arabic verſion, the way of faith; and the Ethiopic verſion, the doctrine; the doctrine, which ſhews the way of God's ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt: he departed from them; the hardened, unbelieving, and blaſpheming Jews, as being unworthy of the means of grace; he went out of their ſynagogue, and no more entered there: and ſeparated the diſciples; from them, the twelve diſciples he had laid his hands on, and others who in this ſpace of time, the ſpace of three months, had been converted under his miniſtry: theſe he formed into a ſeparate Goſpel church-ſtate, as well as engaged them to quit the company and converſation of theſe blaſphemers, and no more attend with them in their ſynagogue, that ſo they might not be infected and corrupted by them; a ſeparation from ſuch who contradict and blaſpheme the truths and ordinances of the Goſpel, is juſtifiable: diſputing daily in the ſchool of one Tyrannus; which was either built by him, and ſo went by his name, or which one of this name poſſeſſed, and made uſe of; for it ſeems to be the proper name of a man, and ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, whoſe name was Tyrannus; though by others it is taken to be an appellative, and to deſign ſome great perſon, who patronized the Apoſtle, and in whoſe houſe he taught; the word tyrant, being formerly uſed for a king, a prince, or nobleman; and ſo the Arabic verſion renders it, in the dwelling-houſe of one of the great men; the chief of Aſia, that were his friends, ver. 31. and ſo the Ethiopic verſion, and he taught daily before the court and the governours; ſome copies read Tyrannius; mention is made of a philoſopher, whoſe name was Tyrannion, who was ſo called, becauſe he vexed and diſturbed thoſe, that were brought up in the ſame ſchool with him [f]; this man it ſeems was a ſchoolmaſter; there was one of this name a biſhop of Tyre, a martyr under Diocleſian; and another whoſe name was Tyrannus, biſhop of Antioch [g]: Beza's ancient copy, and one of Stephens's add, from the fifth hour to the tenth; as if he ſpent five hours in public teaching every day, and the reſt in his trade and devotion.

Ver. 10. And this continued by the ſpace of two years, &c.] Reckoning from the end of the three months, which had been ſpent in teaching in the ſynagogue: ſo that all they which dwelt in Aſia; in the leſſer Aſia, called the proconſular Aſia, of which Epheſus was the chief city: heard the word of the Lord Jeſus, both Jews and Greeks; theſe, as they came to Epheſus, whether on account of religion, the Aſiatic Jews to their ſynagogue, and the Greeks or Gentiles to the famous temple of Diana, or on account of trade and buſineſs, or for the ſake of ſeeing this place, had the opportunity of hearing the Apoſtle Paul preach, concerning the perſon, offices, and grace of Chriſt; and diſpute and reaſon concerning the more abſtruſe and difficult points of the chriſtian religion, in the above ſchool, for two years together; ſo that the word of the Lord went out from hence, and was ſpread in all the cities and towns in Aſia.

Ver. 11. And God wrought ſpecial miracles by the hands of Paul.] For the confirmation of the doctrine which he preached, and of his miſſion, as an Apoſtle; and theſe were not any ſort of miracles, common and vulgar ones, and much leſs things of chance, and what were merely accidental, as the word may ſignify; but they were rare and uncommon ones, and in which there was a viſible diſplay of the power of God; to whom as the efficient cauſe they are aſcribed, the Apoſtle being only an inſtrument God made uſe of.

Ver. 12. So that from his body were brought unto the ſick, &c.] The Ethiopic verſion renders it, from the extremity, or border of his garment; and the Syriac verſion, from the garments which were upon his body, were brought and put upon the ſick; that is, of the clothes which the Apoſtle wore, ſome of them were taken and carried to ſick perſons, and uſed by them: particularly handkerchiefs or aprons; the former were ſuch as he might uſe to wipe his face with, and remove ſweat, or any filth from the body; and the latter, what he might wear as a mechanic, when working at his trade: and the diſeaſes departed from them, and the evil ſpirits went out of them; who were afflicted and poſſeſſed with them; theſe were ſome of the ſpecial and uncommon miracles, wrought by the hands of the Apoſtle, and which were wrought in an uncommon way; and which moſt clearly ſhowed that they were wrought by a divine power.

Ver. 13. Then certain of the vagabond Jews, &c.] Who ſtrolled about from place to place, pretending to tell fortunes, cure diſeaſes by charms, and diſpoſſeſs devils by conjuration, and therefore are called as follows, exorciſts; ſuch there were among the Jews, as Juſtin Martyr obſerves [h], who adjured by the God of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob: theſe took upon them to call over them which had evil ſpirits, the name of the Lord Jeſus; they imitated the Apoſtle Paul, and attempted to do as he did, uſing the ſame name; hoping to get money or applauſe, or both, in this way; and it may be obſerved, that there were ſome who really did caſt out devils in the name of Chriſt, who did not belong long to him, Matt. vii. 22. Mark ix. 38. Saying, we adjure you by Jeſus, whom Paul preacheth; that is, to come out of the bodies of thoſe men which they had poſſeſſed: and the Jews made uſe of the name of Jeſus for healing diſeaſes; for it is ſaid of one[l], that "he ſwallowed ſomething which almoſt "choaked him, and one came and muttered to "him in the name of Jeſus ben Pandira, and he "was well." The Alexandrian copy, Beza's ancient one, and others, the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions read, I adjure you, &c.

Ver. 14. And there were ſeven ſons of one Sceva a Jew, &c.] Who ſtrolled about the country, and uſed exorciſms: and chief of the prieſts; that were at Epheſus; not the high prieſt of the Jews, for he would have been at Jeruſalem, and not at Epheſus; though indeed it does not neceſſarily follow from the words, that Sceva himſelf was there, only his ſeven ſons: however, no ſuch name appears in the catalogue of the Jewiſh high prieſts, nor is it reaſonable to think, that ſeven ſons of an high prieſt, ſhould follow ſuch a vagabond courſe of life: Beza's ancient copy only calls him a prieſt; and the Alexandrian copy reads his name, Sceuta, and the Ethiopic verſion omits it; it is the ſame with, סכואה, and ſignifies a ſpectator, or obſerver; ſee the Targum on 2 Sam. xiii. 34. Iſa. xxi. 6. which did ſo; adjured the devils in the name of Jeſus, to come out; at leaſt they did ſo in one caſe, as follows.

Ver. 15. And the evil ſpirit anſwered and ſaid, &c.] The Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions add, to them; to the ſeven ſons of Sceva: Jeſus I know; to be the ſon of God and Meſſiah, and own that he has power of diſpoſſeſſing ſpirits, of which there were many inſtances in the days of his fleſh: and Paul I know; and own to be a ſervant of the moſt high God, by whom miracles of this kind have been wrought: but who are ye? you are not the diſciples of Jeſus, nor the ſervants of God, but the children of the devil, and have no power over us, but on the other hand are ſubject to us.

Ver. 16. And the man in whom the evil ſpirit was, &c.] Being agitated by him: leapt upon them; with great agility and force, and laid hold on them, and ſtruggled with them, and beat and wounded them, and ſtripped them naked: and overcame them, and prevailed againſt them; the Alexandrian copy, Beza's moſt ancient one, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, and overcame both; as if only two of theſe ſeven ſons had made this attempt, and were ſo uſed; though the Ethiopic verſion reads, and overcame them all; all the ſeven ſons: ſo that they fled out of that houſe naked and wounded; having their cloaths tore off, and their bodies beat and bruiſed.

Ver. 17. And this was known to all the Jews, &c.] Theſe men being Jews: and Greeks alſo dwelling at Epheſus; for though it was done in a private houſe, yet there might be many ſpectators and witneſſes, both Jews and Greeks, who ſpread this fact about the city, and who were to be depended upon: and fear fell on them all; on the enemies of Chriſt and his Goſpel, ſo that others were deterred from making ſuch an attempt for the future: and the name of the Lord Jeſus was magnified; which had ſuch power over evil ſpirits, and whoſe power they themſelves acknowledged: this was done by them that believed in Chriſt, who thought and ſpake the more highly of him; and who more ſtrongly believed in him, and ſo magnified him, and gave more glory to him; Chriſt is great in himſelf, and he is magnified and made great, when he is declared to be ſo, and is treated as ſuch.

Ver. 18. And many that believed, &c.] In Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe name was ſpoken of with great reſpect, and which ſpread fear in every perſon: came; to the Apoſtle: and confeſſed; their ſins, and acknowledged what a wicked life they had led: and ſhewed their deeds; their former evil deeds, which they had been guilty of; one copy reads, their ſins; ſee Matt. iii. 6.

Ver. 19. Many alſo of them which uſed curious arts, &c.] Magic arts, ſoothſaying, necromancy, conjuration, and the like, being convinced of the folly and wickedneſs of them: brought their books together; by which they had learned theſe arts; Epheſus was famous for this ſort of learning; here Apollonius Tyaneus in the beginning of Nero's reign, opened a ſchool and taught magic, and ſuch like things: frequent mention is made of the Epheſian letters, which were no other than inchantments; and even Diana the goddeſs of the Epheſians, is ſaid to be a magician[k]: and burned them before all men; to ſhow their deteſtation of them, and the truth and genuineneſs of their repentance for their former ſins; and that theſe books might not be a ſnare to them for the future, nor be made uſe of by others: and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thouſand pieces of ſilver; which is thought to anſwer to one thouſand five hundred ſixty-two pounds and ten ſhillings of our money; reckoning a piece of ſilver, an Attic drachma; for ſuch might be the ſilver pieces at Epheſus, a city of Greece, and which was of the value of our money ſeven pence half-penny; but if Luke meant by pieces of ſilver, ſhekels, according to the Jewiſh way, ſee the note on Matt. xxvi. 15. then the ſum is much larger, for a ſhekel was about two ſhillings and ſix-pence of our money; ſo that fifty thouſand pieces of ſilver, amount to ſix thouſand two hundred and fifty pounds; a large ſum indeed for magic books! ſome manuſcripts read gold inſtead of ſilver, which muſt greatly increaſe the value.

Ver. 20. So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.] Over conjuring books, conjurers themſelves, yea, even the devils; the power of God going along with it, many were converted; which is meant by the increaſe of it, and were delivered from the power of darkneſs, out of the hands of ſatan, and tranſlated into the kingdom of Chriſt. Beza's ancient copy reads, the faith of God; and the Syriac verſion, faith in God.

Ver. 21. After theſe things were ended, &c.] After that the Apoſtle had diſputed with the Jews in their ſynagogue, for the ſpace of three months, and in the ſchool of Tyrannus about two years; and after many ſouls had been converted at Epheſus, and were formed into a church-ſtate, and were eſtabliſhed in the faith: Paul purpoſed in the ſpirit; either under the influence of the Spirit of God, by whom he was directed whither to go, and in all the parts of the work aſſigned unto him; or rather in his own ſpirit, as the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions read; though this might be the effect of the impulſe and influence of the divine Spirit upon him, he determined within himſelf: when he had paſſed through Macedonia and Achaia; in the former of which were the cities of Philippi, Theſſalonica, and Berea, and in the latter, Corinth; where the Apoſtle had already been, and preached the Goſpel with ſucceſs, and had laid the foundation of a Goſpel church-ſtate in each place; but was willing to viſit them again, both to confirm them in the doctrines of the Goſpel, and if it was the will of God, that he might be the inſtrument of converting others, and adding them to them, as well as to make ſome collections among them, for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem: for through theſe places he intended to go to Jeruſalem; to viſit the church there, and diſtribute to the poor what he had gathered, or ſhould gather for them among the Gentile churches: ſaying, after I have been there, I muſt alſo ſee Rome; the metropolis of the empire, and the glory of the whole world; and which to ſee was one of Auſtin's three wiſhes: but the Apoſtle's deſire was not to ſee the magnificence of the city, as the ſaints in it; and that he might impart ſome ſpiritual gift unto them, and have ſome fruit among them; and be a means of quickening and comforting them, and of gaining others to them; and it was the will of God that he ſhould go there; and this he ſpake by a prophetic ſpirit, and as being under the impulſe of the Spirit of God; ſee ch. xxiii. 11.

Ver. 22. So he ſent into Macedonia, &c.] To Philippi, or Theſſalonica, or Berea, or ſome of the places there, to let them know of his coming, and to prepare for him: two of them that miniſtered unto him; that were his aſſiſtants in preaching the Goſpel: Timotheus and Eraſtus; the former of theſe was a diſciple he found at Lyſtra, and took along with him, and to whom he afterwards wrote two epiſtles; and the latter ſeems to be the ſame with him, who was chamberlain of the city of Corinth, and is ſaid to abide there, Rom. xvi. 23. 2 Tim. iv. 20. The Ethiopic verſion inſtead of Eraſtus, wrongly reads Ariſtarchus; whereas 'tis certain he was not ſent into Macedonia, but was with the Apoſtle at Epheſus in the tumult, ver. 29. But he himſelf ſtaid in Aſia for a ſeaſon; that is, at Epheſus, as the following narration ſhows.

Ver. 23. And the ſame time there aroſe no ſmall ſtir about that way.] The Syriac verſion reads, the way of God; and the Vulgate Latin verſion, the way of the Lord; that is, the chriſtian religion, and the doctrines and ordinances of the Goſpel, which the ſaints were directed to walk in; and the Ethiopic verſion renders it, about this doctrine; which mightily grew and prevailed, and which ſuch numbers embraced; and how great the ſtir was about it, and from whence it aroſe, who began it, and what were the conſequences of it, are hereafter related.

Ver. 24. For a certain man, named Demetrius, a ſilver-ſmith, &c.] Who worked in ſilver, not in coining ſilver money, but in making ſilver veſſels, in melting ſilver, and caſting it into moulds, and forming it into different ſhapes: and particularly, which made ſilver ſhrines for Diana; who Diana was, ſee the note on ver. 27. theſe were not coins or medals of ſilver, ſtruck by Demetrius, with the figure of the temple of Diana on them, nor images of Diana, as the Ethiopic verſion reads; but they were chaplets, or little temples made of ſilver, in imitation of the temple of Diana at Epheſus, with her image included in it; the words may be rendered, ſilver temples; in ſome manuſcripts 'tis added, like little cheſts: which being ſold to the people, brought no ſmall gain to the craftſmen; who were of the ſame trade with him; maſters of the ſame buſineſs, who employed others under them, as appears by what follows.

Ver. 25. Whom he called together, &c.] That is, the craftſmen; all his co-artificers, as the Syriac verſion reads; all the chief of the trade, the maſters of it, as he himſelf was: with the workmen of like occupation; who were employed by him, and the reſt of the maſters in the ſeveral branches of the buſineſs; as founders, engravers, poliſhers, &c. ſome might make the images, and others the temples, or ſhrines; ſome do one part, and ſome another, ſo that abundance of perſons might be employed in this buſineſs: and ſaid, Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth; the workmen not only had a comfortable and ſufficient livelihood, but the maſters of the trade grew rich; ſuch a demand had they for their goods, and ſo profitable was this craft to them: this was a very ſtrong and moving argument, to influence the maſters and workmen; it ſo nearly touched them, and their worldly intereſt, than which nothing ſticks cloſer to carnal men. Demetrius's way of addreſs was very moving and perſuaſive, but his method manifeſtly betrayed what was his greateſt concern, not religion, but his own ſecular intereſt; that which he ſhould have mentioned laſt, if at all, he begins with: ſelf is the leading and governing principle in a natural man.

Ver. 26. Moreover, ye ſee and hear, &c.] Demetrius appeals to their ſenſes of ſeeing and hearing; they ſaw what was done in their own city, and they had heard how things were elſewhere; they might believe what they ſaw with their eyes, and they had reaſon to depend upon the report which was brought to their ears: that not alone at Epheſus, but almoſt throughout all Aſia, this Paul hath perſuaded and turned away much people; by all Aſia is meant, Ionia, that part of Aſia, of which Epheſus was the metropolis; from whence great multitudes came to Epheſus, and heard Paul in the ſchool of Tyrannus, ver. 10. ſo that not only many in the city of Epheſus, but even in almoſt every city and town of Aſia, had heard and received the Goſpel preached by Paul; of whom Demetrius ſpeaks very contemptibly, as if he was a worthleſs vagabond fellow, who had the art of perſuading and deluding people; he prevailed upon them to believe in Chriſt whom he preached, and turned away much people from the worſhipping of idols, to the living God: ſaying, that they be no gods which are made with hands; ſuch as was their Diana, and the images of her, which theſe workmen made; and conſequently if his doctrine prevailed, as it had much already, their trade would be nothing worth, and their livelihood be loſt, which was the grand thing they had in view; for one would think they could never believe themſelves, that the images they made were really gods; but whether they did or no, certain it is, that the Apoſtle's doctrine was true, that ſuch could not be gods, and which agrees both with reaſon and revelation.

Ver. 27. So that not only this our craft is in danger to be ſet at nought, &c.] Or to come into reproof, as the words may be literally rendered, and as they are in the Vulgate Latin verſion; that is, if this notion prevails, that they are not gods, which are made with hands, this art and buſineſs of making ſhrines and images for Diana, will be brought into contempt, and come to nothing; who will buy them, when once they believe there is no divinity in them? they'll deſpiſe them, and the makers of them; yea, the latter will be in danger of being taken up, and charged, convicted, reproved and puniſhed as idolaters, and blaſphemers of deity; to which ſenſe the Ethiopic verſion inclines, which renders it, and not only for this thing we ſhall be in danger; of being called to an account for making theſe ſhrines; our buſineſs will be put down, and we ſhall be treated with diſgrace, if not with ſeverity: but alſo that the temple of the great goddeſs Diana ſhould be deſpiſed; here religion is pretended and a concern ſhown for that; partly on purpoſe to cover as much as could be, the ſelfiſh and avaritious principles, from which Demetrius acted; and partly the more to ſtir up the meaner and more ignorant ſort of people, and irritate and provoke them, and ſet them againſt Paul and his doctrine, who generally ſpeaking are the moſt bigotted. Diana is ſaid to be the daughter of Jupiter, by Latona; ſhe is often called the goddeſs of hunting, and is ſaid to preſide at births; the moon was worſhipped by the heathens under her name; ſhe is here called the great goddeſs, for the Gentiles had their greater and their leſſer gods, and ſhe is reckoned among the former, which were in number twelve; Juno, Veſta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Neptune, Vulcan, and Apollo: the temple of Diana at Epheſus, is reckoned among the ſeven wonders of the world; it was about ſeven furlongs diſtant from the city [l], and was 425 feet long, and 220 feet broad, and had in it 127 pillars, 60 feet high; it was built on marſhy ground, that it might not be affected with earthquakes; and yet that ſuch a pile of building might not ſtand upon a ſlippery and unſtable foundation, coals and fleeces of wool were laid in the foundation and trodden in it, according to Pliny [m], from whom this account is taken; who ſays it was two hundred and twenty years in building, and elſewhere he ſays, it was four hundred years; the architect who firſt began it, he makes to be one Cherſiphron; but it is commonly aſcribed to the Amazons, and particularly to the Amazon Otrira, the wife of Mars; though Pauſanias [n], as he obſerves that the temple of Diana of the Epheſians, was built before the Ionians came into theſe parts, ſo he denies that it was built by the Amazons, but affirms that the builders of it were Creſus, and Epheſus the ſon of Cayſtrus. Solinus [o], who calls it a fabrick of the Amazons, ſays it was "ſo magnificent, that Xerxes when he burnt all the temples in Aſia, ſpared this only; but adds he, this clemency of Xerxes did not preſerve the ſacred temple from evil; for Heroſtratus ſet fire to this noble fabrick with his own hands, for no other reaſon, as he confeſſed, than to get himſelf a name." At which the Epheſians were ſo enraged, that they got an order publiſhed by the common council of Aſia, throughout all the neighbouring kingdoms and nations, that his name ſhould not be once mentioned [p]; which however, though it might be regarded for a while, was not always; for his name has ſince been both ſpoken of, and tranſmitted in writing to poſterity. The above hiſtorian obſerves, that the temple at Epheſus was burnt, the ſame day in which Alexander was born at Pella; which occaſioned Timæus facetiouſly to ſay, as is related by Cicero [q], "it is no wonder that the temple of Diana of the Epheſians, ſhould be burnt the ſame night that Alexander was born, ſeeing Diana being deſirous to be preſent at the delivery of Olympias (the mother of Alexander) was abſent from her own houſe." However, the inhabitants of Epheſus being very rich, and alſo willing to communicate to the charge of re-building this edifice, the women even bringing their gold, ſilver, and other precious ornaments, the work was ſet about, and a fabrick was raiſed much more beautiful than the former; the name of the architect by whom it was re-built, was Dinocrates; and ſo it continued to this time, the Apoſtle was at Epheſus, a very fine and grand building, and commanded great attention, veneration, and reſpect from men; and which Demetrius ſuggeſts would fall into contempt, through the doctrine of the Apoſtle, ſhould he be ſuffered to go on: and her magnificence ſhould be deſtroyed, whom all Aſia and the world worſhippeth; by her magnificence is meant, her deity; which muſt be denied her, as well as her temple deſpiſed, if Paul's doctrine was true, and ſhould obtain; ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, the goddeſs herſelf; and the Ethiopic verſion, her divinity: what Demetrius ſays of her, that ſhe was worſhipped by all Aſia, and the world, was fact; not only all Aſia was concerned in building her temple at Epheſus, as many writers affirm [r]; but ſhe was one of the higheſt claſs of deities, and received as ſuch by the whole Gentile world; yea, Diana of the Epheſians, as diſtinguiſhed from all other Diana's, was revered by all nations. There were temples of Diana of the Epheſians in other places, particularly at Corinth, as Pauſanias relates; and who alſo affirms, that all the cities celebrate Diana of the Epheſians, and men in private honour her above other deities; the reaſons are, the glory of the Amazons, from whom according to fame her image was, and becauſe of the antiquity of the temple: three other things beſides theſe, adds he, contribute to the glory of it; the magnificence of the temple, which exceeds whatever was done by man, and the ſplendor of the city of the Epheſians, and the renown of the deity in it [s]: here the ſilver-ſmith ſuggeſts the catholiciſm and univerſality of their religion, in favour of it.

Ver. 28. And when they heard theſe ſayings, &c.] Both the maſters and the workmen; they were full of wrath; againſt Paul and his doctrine: and cried out, ſaying, great is Diana of the Epheſians; this goddeſs is frequently called in heathen writers, Diana of the Epheſians, or the Epheſian Diana, becauſe of her famous temple at Epheſus; and to diſtinguiſh her from all other Diana's: Pauſanias makes mention of ſixty Diana's at leaſt, and yet ſeems not to have taken notice of them all; all of them had different epithets, by which they were diſtinguiſhed from one another; the images were in different ſhapes, and they were worſhipped with different rites: what ſeems moſt of all to diſtinguiſh the Epheſian Diana from others, is her having many paps; hence ſhe is called multi mammia; ſo Minutius Felix obſerves [t], that Diana is ſometimes girt about on high as an huntreſs, and the Epheſian Diana is mammis multis & uberibus extructa; juſt as the Iſis of the Egyptians, which Macrobius [u] ſays, ſignifies the earth; hence the whole body of the deity is covered with paps, becauſe the whole univerſe is nouriſhed by it: the prieſt of Diana of the Epheſians was an eunuch, and was obliged to abſtain from all company; neither bathed, nor eat, nor drank with others, nor might he enter into the houſe of a private perſon; there was a feaſt kept every year in honour of her, at which young men in the flower of their age, and virgins well dreſſed, uſed to go to the temple in great pomp, keep the feaſt, and marry with each other. The temple was a ſort of an aſylum, as heathen temples commonly were; and it had this particular privilege, that thoſe that fled to it were freed from ſervitude [w]. This goddeſs is called great, agreeable to her name, for, דיאנא, Diana ſignifies great and venerable; becauſe of her birth, being the daughter of Jupiter; and becauſe of her great ſervice, ſhe was ſuppoſed to be of in aſſiſting at births; and becauſe of her magnificent temple and worſhip; and becauſe ſhe was worſhiped by great perſons: and here greatneſs is aſcribed unto her, and a loud cry made of it, to animate one another, to gather a mob together, and to incenſe them and ſtir them up againſt the Apoſtle and his companions: in the Arabic verſion inſtead of Diana it is Venus, both here and elſewhere, but wrongly.

Ver. 29. And the whole city was filled with confuſion, &c.] For the workmen that made the ſilver ſhrines very likely ran up and down in the city, crying out, great is Diana of the Epheſians, which brought the people out of their houſes to enquire what was the matter; and the mob gathering and increaſing, as they went along, threw the whole city into confuſion and diſorder: and having caught Gaius and Ariſtarchus, men of Macedonia; the latter of theſe was of Theſſalonica in Macedonia, as appears from ch. xx. 4. but of what place the former was, is not certain; however, being a Macedonian, he could not be the Gaius of Derbe, mentioned in the ſame place, nor the Gaius of Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14. but ſome third perſon. They are both Greek names; Ariſtarchus ſignifies the chief of princes, or the prince of chiefs; and Gaius is a name taken from the joy of parents, and is the ſame with the Roman name, Caius; they are both reckoned among the ſeventy diſciples; the former is ſaid to be biſhop of Apamea in Phrygia, and the latter biſhop of Epheſus; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Paul's companions in travel; whom he brought with him out of Macedonia, and who had been with him to Jeruſalem and Antioch, and were now returned with him to Epheſus, where they had been with him for the ſpace of two years, or more: it is very much that this mob had not ſeized on Paul himſelf; it may be Paul was within doors, and theſe were without in the ſtreets, and ſo were laid hold upon and carried away in a moſt forcible and violent manner by them: who having got them, they ruſhed with one accord into the theatre; where the publick plays were acted in honour of the goddeſs Diana, and where, among other things, men were ſet to fight with wild beaſts; and very likely the intention of the mob in hurrying Paul's companions thither, was to throw them to the wild beaſts. A theatre is a ſpectacle or ſhew, ſo called, becauſe in them ſights were ſhown, plays were acted, games exerciſed, and battles fought between men and men, and between men and beaſts, and between beaſts and beaſts; concerning which, take the following account[x]: "theatre, among the ancients, is a public edifice for the exhibiting of ſcenic ſpectacles, or ſhews to the people——under the word theatre was comprehended not only the eminence, whereon the actors appeared, and the action paſſed, but alſo the whole area, or extent of the place common to the actors and ſpectators: in this ſenſe the theatre was a building encompaſſed with porticos, and furniſhed with ſeats of ſtone, diſpoſed in ſemi-circles, and aſcending gradually over one another, which encompaſſed a ſpace called the Orcheſtra; in the front whereof was the Proſcenium or Pulpitum, whereon the actors performed the Scena, a large front adorned with orders of architecture; behind which was Poſtſcenium, or the place where the actors made themſelves ready, retired, &c. ſo that the Scena, in its full extent, comprehended all the part belonging to the actors. In the Greek theatres, the Orcheſtra made a part of the Scena; but in the Roman theatres, none of the actors ever deſcended into the Orcheſtra, which was taken up by the ſeats of the ſenators." For the better underſtanding the terms uſed, and the ſeveral parts of the theatre, let it be obſerved, that the Scena, according to others[y], was the place from whence the actors firſt went out; and it reached from one corner of the theatre to the other, and was threefold; tragical, which was adorned in a royal manner with pillars and ſigns; comical, which repreſented private buildings; and ſatyrical, which exhibited trees, caves, mountains, &c. Likewiſe, the Scena was either verſile, when on a ſudden the whole ſcene was turned by ſome machines; or ductile, when by drawing away the boards the inward face of the ſcene appeared, or by drawing curtains. The Proſcenium was a place lower than the ſcene, in which the actors chiefly ſpoke and acted: the Poſtſcenium was a place in which theſe things were done, which could not be done fitly, and with decorum in the ſcenes: the Pulpitum was a higher place in the Proſcenium, in which thoſe that recited ſtood: the Orcheſtra was the laſt place in which they danced, and near which the ſenators ſate. Tarquinius Priſcus was the firſt who introduced plays among the Romans; and the temple of Bacchus at Athens was the firſt theatre in the world, the remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen. Of this theatre at Epheſus I have not met with any account; whether it was in the temple, or without, is not certain; very likely it might be a part of it, or adjoin unto it.

Ver. 30. And when Paul would have entered in unto the people, &c.] In the theatre, in order to have preached to the people, and to have removed their prejudices againſt him, and the Goſpel preached by him, and to have ſhown them the error and evil of their idolatrous ways and worſhip, and to have reconciled them to him, and his friends, and to have perſuaded them to do them no hurt; which ſhows the Apoſtle's greatneſs of ſoul, his firmneſs, conſtancy, and intrepidity, and his great concern and affection for his companions, to riſque his life in this manner: but the diſciples ſuffered him not; the believers, the members of the church at Epheſus would by no means agree to it, but diſſuaded him from it; who hereby, on their part, ſhewed great love to him, and what a value they had for him, and how much they eſteemed the life of ſo great an Apoſtle, and faithful preacher of the Goſpel. The Ethiopic verſion renders it, the Apoſtles prohibited him; but there were none of that office with him.

Ver. 31. And certain of the chief of Aſia, &c.] Or the Aſiarchs; theſe were not princes of Aſia, rulers or governours of provinces, or cities, or civil magiſtrates; but prieſts who preſided over the games and diverſions at the theatre, and had the management and command of things there. Such an one was Philip the Aſiarch, the church of Smyrna makes mention of in their account of the ſufferings and martyrdom of Polycarp[z], whom the people intreated that he would ſend out the lion to Polycarp; that is, out of the theatre which he had the command of; but he replied he could not do it, becauſe he had finiſhed the theatrical exerciſes; from whence it appears that he was the governour of the theatre, and had his title of Aſiarch from thence, as theſe men had; wherefore this word ſhould not be rendered, the princes of Aſia, as by the Vulgate Latin; nor the chief of Aſia, as by the Syriac and Arabic verſions, and by ours, but rather the Aſian prieſts. The Ethiopic verſion not knowing who ſhould be meant by them, only reads, and ſome of Aſia. Which were his friends; they had a good opinion of the Apoſtle, and a good liking of his doctrines, and wiſhed well to his perſon, and were concerned for his ſafety; tho' they might not have been really converted, and truly diſciples, as thoſe in the preceding verſe; for otherwiſe one would think they would have relinquiſhed their office and place. Theſe ſent unto him, meſſengers or letters, deſiring him that he would not adventure himſelf into the theatre; they obſerved to him the danger he would expoſe himſelf to, and intreated he would ſhow a greater regard to his life than to riſque it in ſuch a manner, a life that might be ſo uſeful to many; and tho' they were the governours at the theatre, yet ſuch was the rage and fury of the mob, that it was not in their power to reſtrain them from doing miſchief, till ſuch time they were appeaſed.

Ver. 32. Some therefore cried one thing, and ſome another, &c.] Not in the church at Epheſus among the diſciples, and friends of the Apoſtle, as if they were divided in their ſentiments about his going into the theatre, ſome being for it, and others againſt it; but the people that were gathered together in the theatre, theſe were not agreed about the reaſon of this tumult, ſome ſaid it was on account of one thing, and ſome another: for the aſſembly was confuſed; the multitude of people that were gathered together, were made up of different perſons, of different employments and ſentiments, and were in no manner of form or order: and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together; there was a noiſe and a hubbub in the city; but what was the reaſon and meaning of it, they were ignorant of; they were got together into the theatre in great numbers, but what was to be done there they knew not. And this is too often the caſe in religious aſſemblies, that the majority, at leaſt many, can give no account of the reaſon, end, and deſign of their aſſembling together.

Ver. 33. And they drew Alexander out of the multitude, &c.] Or ſome of the multitude brought forth Alexander; into the theatre, in order to kill him, by caſting him to the wild beaſts. Some think this is the ſame with Alexander the copperſmith, who apoſtatized upon this danger he was expoſed to, and became a blaſphemer, and a great enemy of the Apoſtle, and did him much evil, 1 Tim. i. 20. 2 Tim. iv. 14. This man, tho' his name was a Greek name, yet was a Jew, as is expreſſed in ver. 34. and from the times of Alexander the great, who was at Jeruſalem, this name became common among the Jews; ſee the note on Acts iv. 6. The Jews putting him forward; being equally enemies to him, as being under a profeſſion of Chriſtianity, as the Heathens were; or, as the Syriac verſion reads, the people of the Jews, that were there, out of themſelves, pitched upon him as a proper perſon to ſtill the uproar; and they brought him out of the multitude, to a convenient place, where he might be heard; and they the rather were forward to this, that he might lay all the blame of this confuſion and uproar upon Paul and his companions, whom the Jews had an averſion to, as well as the Gentiles: and Alexander beckned with the hand; for ſilence, that he might be heard: and would have made his defence unto the people; which looks as if he was a Chriſtian, or at leaſt was charged with being one, and was in danger of his life on that account; and therefore was deſirous of being heard, that he might make an apology for the Chriſtians, or remove ſuch an imputation from himſelf, if he was not.

Ver. 34. But when they knew that he was a Jew, &c.] And ſo equally an enemy to their idolatry, as Paul and his companions were, whether he was a Chriſtian or no. All with one voice about the ſpace of two hours cried out; all that were in the theatre lift up their voices at once to prevent Alexander's apology, or at leaſt its being heard; and which they continued about two hours, which was a long time to keep hallooing out, great is Diana of the Epheſians; ſee the note on ver. 28.

Ver. 35. And when the town-clerk had appeaſed the people, &c.] Cauſed them to ceaſe their loud out-cry, ſo as that he could be heard. This perſon ſeems to have been more than a town-clerk, as we render it; or a common ſcribe, as the Vulgate Latin, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions render it; rather as the Syriac verſion, a chief man of the city; the Septuagint interpreters in Exod. v. 6. uſe the word for the Egyptian officers that were over the Iſraelites; and the Babylonians uſed to call the prieſt of [a] Iſis by this name; and according to ſome learned men, this man's office was to regiſter the conquerors names, and their rewards in the theatre; and who was choſen into this office by the people, and was a man of ſome conſiderable authority, as it is very apparent by what follows that this man was: he ſaid, ye men of Epheſus, what man is there that knoweth not how that the city of the Epheſians is a worſhipper of the great goddeſs Diana? the word Neocorus tranſlated worſhipper, ſignifies an officer in the temple, one that looked after it, beautified and adorned it; for Neocorus is from κορεω, which ſignifies to beautify [b]; though ſome etymologiſts would have the word to ſignify to ſweep and clean, as if this officer was a ſexton; rather, he anſwered to a churchwarden, and to this agrees the Syriac verſion; tho' this office belonged not to a ſingle perſon, but to a city. Now to be a worſhipper of Diana, was not peculiar to the city of Epheſus, as appears from ver. 27. but to be Neocorus, a Sacriſt to the goddeſs, was a favour granted to ſome cities, and accounted a great honour; ſome had it twice, ſome thrice, ſome four times: and of the image which fell down from Jupiter; or of Diopetes: ſo the Palladium, or image of Pallas, was called, becauſe it was ſuppoſed to fall down from heaven, which Diomedes and Ulyſſes are ſaid to take away from Troy; and here it ſeems to be ſomething diſtinct from the goddeſs Diana, and her image, and may deſign another deity worſhipped along with her, and by them, ſince they make mention of more gods, ver. 26. The Vulgate Latin verſion takes it to be the ſame with Diana, reading the words in connection with the preceding, and the offspring of Jupiter; ſhe being ſaid to be his daughter by Latona, as before obſerved; and the Ethiopic verſion underſtands it of her image, rendering them thus, and of that molten image which was ſent from Jupiter the great god; and more expreſly the Syriac verſion, which reads, and of her image which fell from heaven; and ſo was not made with the hands of men, and could not be objected to on that account, or denied to be a deity; and this the people might be the rather induced to believe, ſince it had been in the temple before the memory of any man. The Arabic verſion reading theſe words in connection with the beginning of the next verſe, gives a very different ſenſe, but neither indeed they that fell from heaven contradict the faith of this thing; as if it was to be underſtood of the fallen angels, of which it can hardly be thought Demetrius had any knowledge. This image, Pliny ſays [c], it was doubted of what it was made; ſome ſaid of the vine-tree, others of ebony; but Athenagoras ſays, the old image of Diana of the Epheſians was made of olive [d].

[a] Alex. ab Alex. l. 2. c. 8.

[b] Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. ad Nubes, p. 125. col. 2.

Ver. 36. Seeing then that theſe things cannot be ſpoken againſt, &c.] This officer intimates, in order to quiet the mob, and make them eaſy, that theſe things were ſo certain, and well known, that no body would pretend to contradict them, and therefore they muſt be miſtaken in the men, whom they had hurried into the theatre; it was impoſſible that they, or any men, ſhould be capable of ſaying any thing againſt the truth of theſe things: therefore ye ought to be quiet and do nothing raſhly; to theſe men, to their hurt, but ſit down, and compoſe yourſelves, and think again, and conſider of this matter, and not go into any haſty meaſures, which may, in the iſſue, be prejudical to yourſelves.

Ver. 37. For ye have brought hither theſe men, &c.] The Arabic verſion reads, theſe two men; that is, Gaius and Ariſtarchus, whom they had brought by force into the theatre to fight with wild beaſts: which are neither robbers of churches; or temples; or, as the Arabic verſion renders it, robbers of the veſſels of the temple, ſacrilegious perſons; they have not ſtolen any thing out of the temple of Diana, nor any other: nor yet blaſphemers of your goddeſs; they have not made mention of her name, much leſs ſaid any thing againſt her, at leaſt this officer did not know that they had; and if he had, he did not ſtick to tell an officious lye to ſkreen them, as did the Egyptian midwives in favour of the Hebrew women.

Ver. 38. Wherefore if Demetrius, and the craftſmen which are with him, &c.] Who were the ringleaders and encouragers of this tumult: have a matter againſt any man; any accuſation, or charge, any crime to accuſe him of, and charge him with: the law is open; or court-days are kept; there are certain times fixed for the hearing and trying of cauſes, where and when ſuch an affair ſhould be regularly brought; and not uſe ſuch diſorderly methods, and throw a city into confuſion, and break the peace as theſe men had done: the Syriac verſion renders it, they are artificers; that is, Demetrius and the craftſmen with him; they are tradeſmen, and it does not belong to them, nor ſhould they take upon themſelves to judge and determine what is right or wrong: and there are deputies; or proconſuls; the proconſul and his deputy, to whom ſuch matters appertain, and who are judges in ſuch caſes, and to whom application ſhould be made, and before whom ſuch caſes ſhould be brought, and heard, and tried: the Syriac verſion reads in the ſingular number, and there is a proconſul in the city; a Roman governour and judge, whoſe province it is to determine ſuch matters: let them implead one another; let the plaintiff bring his accuſation, and charge, and let the others defend themſelves, and let things proceed in a due courſe of law, and ſo iſſue.

Ver. 39. But if ye enquire any thing concerning other matters, &c.] Than what belongs to the craft and buſineſs of Demetrius, and the artificers: it ſhall be determined in a lawful aſſembly; that is, called together according to law, and who have a right to hear, try, and judge cauſes, which ſuch a confuſed, lawleſs aſſembly as this in the theatre had not.

Ver. 40. For we are in danger of being called in queſtion, &c.] Or are liable to be called to an account, reproved, and puniſhed by the Roman proconſul, appointed over this city, or by the Roman emperor, or the Roman ſenate: for this day's uproar; it being capable of being interpreted as a riot, tumult, and ſedition: there being no cauſe whereby we may give an account of this concourſe; or no reaſon can be aſſigned, why ſuch a number of people ſhould gather together; none can be given that will juſtify it, or that can be alledged in favour of it.

Ver. 41. And when he had thus ſpoken, &c.] Or delivered this oration, made uſe of the above arguments, reaſonings, and expoſtulations: he diſmiſſed the aſſembly; he ordered them to break up, and every one to return home in peace, and go about his own buſineſs; and thus Paul, and his companions, were delivered from an imminent danger, they were expoſed to.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND after the uproar was ceaſed, &c.] Which Demetrius, and the craftſmen, had raiſed at Epheſus, and which was put an end to by the ſpeech of the town-clerk, or regiſter-keeper of the theatre: Paul called unto him the diſciples; the members of the church at Epheſus, whom he convened, either at his own lodgings, or at their uſual place of meeting: and embraced them; or ſaluted them; that is, with a kiſs, which was ſometimes done at parting, as well as at meeting; ſee ver. 37. and ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, and kiſſed them, and ſo took his leave of them, and bid them farewel; the Alexandrian copy, and ſome other copies, and the Syriac and Vulgate Latin verſions before this clauſe inſert, and exhorted, or comforted them; that is, exhorted them to continue ſtedfaſt in the faith, and hold faſt the profeſſion of it without wavering, and comforted them under all their tribulations, and in a view of what afflictions and perſecutions they muſt expect to endure for the ſake of Chriſt, with the exceeding great and precious promiſes of the Goſpel: and departed to go into Macedonia; to viſit the churches at Philippi, Theſſalonica, and Beræa, and to eſtabliſh them in the faith of the Goſpel: he did not chuſe to leave Epheſus till the tumult was over, partly on his own account, that he might not bring upon himſelf an imputation of fear and cowardice; and partly on the account of the church at Epheſus, that he might not leave them in diſtreſs, and add to it; but now it was over, he judged it proper to take his leave of them, and viſit other churches, the care of which equally lay upon him.

Ver. 2. And when he had gone over thoſe parts, &c.] Of Macedonia, and the cities in it before mentioned: and had given them much exhortation; to abide by the doctrines and ordinances of the Goſpel, and to walk worthy of it in their lives and converſations; and this exhortation he was frequently giving, as often as he had opportunity, improving his time much this way, and continued long at it: and having purſued it to a ſufficient length, he came into Greece; or Hellas; which, according to Ptolomy[e] and Solinus[f], is properly true Greece; the former makes it to be the ſame with Achaia, where Corinth was; and the latter ſays it was in his time called Attica, where Athens was; ſo Pliny[g], who alſo ſays, that Theſſaly was ſo called: this Hellas included Macedonia, Epirus, Theſſaly, Achaia, which is properly Greece, Peloponneſus, and the adjacent iſlands.

Ver. 3. And there abode three months, &c.] In Greece: and when the Jews laid wait for him, as he was about to ſail into Syria; from ſome part of Greece, in order to go to Jeruſalem; which the Jews in the parts of Greece underſtanding, laid wait for him, either by ſea or land, with an intention either to take the money from him, which he had collected in Macedonia, and in Greece, for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, or to take away his life, or both; of which lying in wait for him, the Apoſtle had ſome notice, either by divine revelation, or from ſome body who was in the ſecret, or had got knowledge of it from ſuch as were: upon which he purpoſed to return thro' Macedonia; thro' which he came from Epheſus to Greece: this wicked deſign being made known to him, obliged him, in point of prudence, and both for his own ſafety, and the good of the churches, to alter his ſcheme, and ſteer his courſe another way, to the diſappointment of his enemies; in which the wiſdom of providence, the care of God over his miniſters, and his concern for his churches manifeſtly appeared.

Ver. 4. And there accompanied him into Aſia Sopater of Berea, &c.] This Sopater is thought to be the ſame with Soſipater in Rom. xvi. 21. and in three of Beza's copies, and in as many of Stephens's, he is ſo called here; the Ethiopic verſion calls him Peter, a citizen of Berea; and the Arabic verſion, Sopater of Aleppo. The Alexandrian copy, Beza's moſt ancient copy, and others, the Complutenſian edition, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, Sopater of Pyrrhus, the Berean; that is, the ſon of Pyrrhus. He is reckoned among the ſeventy diſciples, and is ſaid to be biſhop of Iconium; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. This name was common among the Greeks; there was one of this name a native of Paphus, in the times of Alexander the great, a comical poet, and who alſo is ſometimes called Soſipater, as this man was; there was another Sopater the ſophiſt, who wrote the affairs of Alexander; and there was another of this name, who, among other things, collected much concerning painters and ſtatuaries. The name ſignifies a father ſaved. Pyrrhus is a Grecian name well known, being the name of a famous king of Greece who engaged in war with the Romans. This man went along with the Apoſtle into Aſia; and it ſeems, that of the perſons here mentioned, he only accompanied him; for the verb is in the ſingular number, and the other ſix perſons following did not go along with him, as Sopater did, but went before him to Troas, which was in Aſia, and there waited for him; though the Syriac verſion reads in the plural number; but then it renders the words, they went forth with him, as they might do from Greece, and yet not accompany him into Aſia: the phraſe into Aſia is left out in the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions. And of the Theſſalonians Ariſtarchus and Secundus; the former of theſe is before ſaid to be a Macedonian, ch. xix. 29. and here he appears to be of Theſſalonica, and his name is a Greek one; but Secundus is a Roman name, tho' he might be born at Theſſalonica, or at leaſt have lived there, and ſo be ſaid to be of it. His name ſignifies Second; very likely was his father's ſecond ſon, and therefore ſo called; tho' the name was uſed among the Grecians. We read of Secundus an Athenian, the maſter of Herod the ſophiſt, who flouriſhed under the emperor Adrian, there are ſentences under his name ſtill extant; and another called Secundus the Grammarian, a friend of Polemon, a philoſopher at Athens, who corrected his writings; ſo that this man might be a Grecian, and a native of Theſſalonica; mention is made of him no where elſe. And Gaius of Derbe, and Timotheus; the former of theſe is ſo called to diſtinguiſh him from Gaius the Macedonian in ch. xix. 29. and the latter by being joined with him ſhould be of the ſame place, as he might be; ſee ch. xvi. 1. tho' the Syriac verſion reads, and Timotheus of Lyſtra; and ſo does the Arabic verſion uſed by De Dieu; and this is mentioned with Derbe in the above cited place. And of Aſia, Tychicus and Trophimus; of the former ſee Eph. vi. 21. Col. iv. 7. 2 Tim. iv. 12. and of the latter ſee 2 Tim. iv. 20. and Acts xxi. 29. where he is called an Epheſian, as they both are here in Beza's moſt ancient copy; Epheſus being the metropolis of Aſia, ſtrictly ſo called. Theſe are both of them ſaid to be among the ſeventy diſciples: Trophimus, we are told, taught at Arles in France, and ſuffered martyrdom with the Apoſtle Paul; and that Tychicus was biſhop of Chalcedon in Bithynia; and that another of the ſame name was biſhop of Colophon; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Trophimus ſignifies nouriſhed, and is a name to be found in a funeral inſcription of the Romans[h], tho' Greek, and in the fragments of the poet Menander: and Tychicus ſignifies fortunate; whether the ſame with Fortunatus in 1 Cor. xvi. 17. may be enquired.

Ver. 5. Theſe going before, &c.] The Apoſtle into Aſia, all but Sopater, who accompanied him: Tarried for us at Troas; a city in Aſia Minor; ſee ch. xvi. 8. whither they went before hand a nearer way to provide for the Apoſtle, and where they waited for him, and for Sopater, and for Luke, the writer of this hiſtory, who appears from hence to be in company with the Apoſtle, and for as many others as were along with him.

Ver. 6. And we ſailed away from Philippi, &c.] Which was in Macedonia, from whence they came in a ſtraight courſe by Samothracia, over the Helleſpont, to Troas, where the above ſix perſons were waiting for them: and they ſet ſail after the days of unleavened bread; or the paſſover; which is mentioned only to obſerve the time of year when this voyage was taken; and not to ſuggeſt to us that Paul and his company ſtaid at Philippi, and kept this feaſt there; for the paſſover was only kept at Jeruſalem, and beſides was now aboliſhed, and not to be obſerved by Chriſtians: and came unto them to Troas in five days; not that they were five days ſailing from Philippi to Troas; but either they were ſo long in all, from their firſt ſetting out into Aſia, to their arrival at Troas; or rather, they came to Troas within five days after the above ſix perſons had got thither; ſo that they waited at Troas but five days for the Apoſtle, and thoſe that accompanied him. Where we abode ſeven days; by what follows they came into Troas on the Lord's day evening, or early on Monday morning, and ſtaid there till the next Lord's day, or firſt day of the week; for it follows,

Ver. 7. And upon the firſt day of the week, &c.] Or Lord's day, Rev. i. 10. and which Juſtin Martyr calls Sunday; on which day, he ſays [i], all, both in city and country, met in one place for religious worſhip; and on this day, it appears from hence, and from other places, that the Apoſtles and primitive churches did meet together for religious exerciſes; ſee John xx. 19, 26. 1 Cor. xvi. 2. and ſo they did at Troas at this time, as follows: when the diſciples came together to break bread; not to eat a common meal, or to make a feaſt, or grand entertainment for the Apoſtle and his company, before they departed; but, as the Syriac verſion renders it, to break the Euchariſt, by which the Lord's ſupper was called in the primitive times; or, as the Arabic verſion, to diſtribute the body of Chriſt, which is ſymbolically and emblematically held forth in the bread at the Lord's table. Now on the firſt day of the week, the diſciples, or the members of the church at Troas, met together on this occaſion, and the Apoſtle, and thoſe that were with him, aſſembled with them for the ſame purpoſe; the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions read, when we were come together; Paul and his company, together with the church at Troas: for it is plain from hence, that there was a church in this place, not only by diſciples being here, but by the adminiſtration of the Lord's ſupper to them; and ſo there was in after-ages. Who was the firſt paſtor or biſhop of this church, is not certain; perhaps Carpus, of whom mention is made in 2 Tim. iv. 13. tho' he is ſaid to be biſhop of other places; ſee the note there. In the ſecond century, in the times of Ignatius, there were brethren at Troas, from whence he wrote his epiſtles to the churches at Smyrna, and Philadelphia, and who are ſaluted in them by the brethren at Troas [k]: in the third century ſeveral martyrs ſuffered here, as Andreas, Paulus, Nicomachus, and Dionyſia a virgin: in the fifth century, Pionius, biſhop of Troas, was preſent at Conſtantinople at the condemnation of Eutyches, and afterwards he was in the council at Chalcedon; and even in the eighth century mention is made of Euſtathius, biſhop of Troas, in the Nicene council [l]. Paul preached unto them; to the diſciples that were gathered together, either before, or after, or at the time of breaking of bread; for this ordinance was not adminiſtred without ſome inſtructions about the nature, uſe, and deſign of it. Ready to depart on the morrow; this ſeems to be mentioned as a reaſon for what follows, continued his ſpeech until midnight: ſince he was about to take his leave of them, and not knowing when he ſhould ſee them again, or whether ever any more, he delivered a long diſcourſe to them; which not only ſhows that he was full of matter, but that his affection for theſe ſaints, and his deſire of doing them good, were very great, by imparting as much ſpiritual light and knowledge as he could unto them; and alſo his great zeal for the glory of God, and the intereſt of Chriſt, tho' he was to ſet forth on a journey the next morning.

Ver. 8. And there were many lights in the upper chamber, &c.] Which were lighted up, both for neceſſary uſes, to ſee by, to read the word, and to adminiſter the ordinance of the ſupper, and for the comfort and pleaſure of the whole company, both preacher and hearers; as well as to remove all ground of ſuſpicion, or occaſion of reproach, as if it was a midnight ſociety met for wicked practices: but this no ways countenances the uſe of lamps and wax candles in the day time at divine worſhip, ſince this was in the night; of the upper chamber, in which it was uſual to meet for religious exerciſes, ſee Mark ii. 4. and Acts i. 13. where they were gathered together; the Alexandrian copy, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions read, where we were gathered together.

Ver. 9. And there ſat in a window a certain young man, &c.] In the upper room, where he placed himſelf, either for air and refreſhment, the chamber being ſuffocating, thro' the number of people, and of lights; or for want of room, the place being full: named Eutychus; a Greek name, which ſignifies one of good fortune: being fallen into a deep ſleep; which may be accounted for without aggravating the caſe; as from his youth, he was a young man, and ſo more ſubject to ſleep, and more eaſily overcome with it, than perſons in years, by reaſon of the humours of the body which incline to it; and alſo from the length of ſervice, and the lateneſs of the ſeaſon of the night, all which contributed to bring on this deep ſleep: it can hardly be thought that he purpoſely compoſed himſelf to ſleep, for had he, he would never have choſe ſo dangerous a place to ſit in, as a window, and that at ſo great an height from the ground; but this ſleep ſeemed to come upon him at an unawares; what hand ſoever ſatan might have in it, with a view to the young man's hurt, both as to ſoul and body, and to bring reproach and ſcandal upon the church, and the Goſpel, it ſeems evident that the providence of God was in it, and which over-ruled it for a good end, even the greater confirmation of the Goſpel, and very probably for the ſpiritual good of the young man. And as Paul was long preaching he ſunk down with ſleep; being quite overcome, and bore down with it, not able to hold up his head, he either bowed down, or leaned backwards: and fell down from the third loft; or three ſtory high, where the upper room was. It ſeems that he did not fall inward, for then he would have fallen no further than the floor of the upper room, but outward, out of the window into the ſtreet or yard; and this is the more evident from Paul's going down to him, mentioned in the next verſe: and was taken up dead; not only for dead, or as one dead, but he really was dead, as it is no wonder he ſhould.

Ver. 10. And Paul went down, &c.] From the upper room, where they were aſſembled, into the court, yard, or ſtreet, where he fell; or into the lower room of the houſe, where he was brought, when taken up. The Apoſtle might ſee him fall, or he might be told of it, or he might have an intimation of it from the Spirit of God, by whom he might be impreſſed to go down, in order to work a miracle, for the confirmation of the Goſpel he was preaching: and fell on him and embracing him; praying over him, as Elijah and Eliſha did, 1 Kings xvii. 21. 2 Kings iv. 34. and the like effect followed: ſaid, trouble not yourſelves; which ſpeech perhaps was addreſſed to the friends and relations of the young man; or to the diſciples preſent, who were concerned at this accident, both for the young man's ſake, and leſt it ſhould be improved to the diſadvantage of the Goſpel by the enemies of it. For his life, or ſoul is in him; it being returned upon the Apoſtle's falling on him, and praying over him; or he ſaid this as being fully aſſured that it would return, in like manner as Chriſt ſaid concerning Jairus's daughter, Luke viii. 52, 55.

Ver. 11. When he therefore was come up again, &c.] Into the upper room, where he was before, and where the diſciples were gathered together: and had broken bread and eaten; adminiſtred the Lord's ſupper, and alſo eat for his bodily refreſhment: and talked a long while; about the ordinance and the doctrines of the Goſpel, and ſpiritual experience, and ſuch like divine things: even till break of day; not knowing when to leave off: ſo he departed; without taking any reſt; tho' before he departed, what follows was done; it was at this time he left his cloak, books, and parchments here, 2 Tim. iv. 13.

Ver. 12. And they brought the young man alive, &c.] Up into the upper room, and preſented him alive to the diſciples: and were not a little comforted; that is, the diſciples at the ſight of the young man, who was taken up dead, not only for his ſake, but chiefly, becauſe by this miracle the Goſpel, which the Apoſtle preached, and who was about to depart from them, was greatly confirmed to them.

Ver. 13. And we went before to ſhip, &c.] That is, Luke, the writer of this hiſtory, and the reſt of the Apoſtle's company, went before him to a ſhip, which lay at Troas, and went aboard it: and ſailed unto Aſſos; a city of Æolia, or Myſia; and is ſaid by Pliny to be the ſame with Apollonia; and which he places on the ſea-ſhore, where it is evident this Aſſos was. His words are[m], "on the "ſhore Antandros, formerly called Edonis, then Cimmeris and Aſſos, the ſame with Apollonia." And in another place[n] he calls it Aſſos of Troas; and ſays of it, that about Aſſos of Troas a ſtone grows, by which all bodies are conſumed, and is called Sarcophagus, (a fleſh devourer); of which he alſo makes mention elſewhere[o], and obſerves, that in Aſſos of Troas the ſtone Sarcophagus is cut in the pits, in which the bodies of the dead being put, are conſumed within forty days, excepting their teeth: and with him Jerom[p] agrees, as to the name and ſituation of this place, who ſays that Aſſos is a maritime city of Aſia, the ſame that is called Apollonia. It is repreſented by Strabo[q] as a place very much fortified by art, and very difficult of aſcent on that part which lies to the ſea; unleſs another Aſſos in Lycia is deſigned by him: if this was the ſituation of the Aſſos in the text, it ſeems to furniſh us with a reaſon, from the nature of the place, why the Apoſtle choſe to go on foot thither. Pauſanias[r] ſpeaks of it as in Troas, and near mount Ida. Sodamos of Aſſos in Troas, which lies near Ida, was the firſt of the Æolians, who conquered in the Olympic race the boys. In this place was born the famous philoſopher Cleanthes, a diſciple and ſucceſſor of Zeno; hence he is called Cleanthes the Aſſian[s]. No mention is made of the Goſpel being preached here, or of any church until the eighth century, when John, biſhop of Aſſos, is ſaid to be in the Nicene council[t]. Some exemplars read Thaſſos, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions ſeem to have done: there intending to take in Paul; who ſtaid behind, willing to have a little more Chriſtian converſation with the ſaints at Troas. For ſo had he appointed; that theſe ſhould go before-hand to Aſſos, and meet him there, and take him in: minding himſelf to go afoot; from Troas to Aſſos, which were not very far off from one another; hence Aſſos is, by Pliny, called Aſſos of Troas; and by Pauſanias, Aſſos, which is in Troas; that is, in the country of Troas, as before obſerved: what was his reaſon for going afoot thither, is not very evident; whether that he might have the opportunity of converſing with the diſciples of Troas, who might accompany him thither; or whether that he might be alone, and have leiſure for private meditation, and free converſe with God.

Ver. 14. And when he met with us at Aſſos, &c.] According to appointment: we took him in; to the ſhip, and ſo ſailed on: and came to Mitylene; a city in Leſbos[u], an iſland in the Ægean ſea, now Metelino: ſometimes the iſland is ſo called, and is about ſeven miles and a half from the continent: of this city Vitruvius[w] ſays, that it was magnificently and elegantly built, but not prudently ſituated; for when the ſouth wind blew, men were ſick in it, and when the north-weſt wind blew they had coughs, and when the north wind blew, they were reſtored to health. Some ſay it had its name from Mitylene, the daughter of Macaris or Pelops; others from Myto, the ſon of Neptune and Mitylene; and others from Mityle, the builder of it. [x] Hillerus enquires, whether it may not be ſo called from the Chaldee word, מטלנא, Matlana, uſed in the Targum on Job xl. 13. which ſignifies a bar, this city being as a bar to Leſbos, which ſhut it up. It was famous for being the native place of Pittacus, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, a great philoſopher and legiſlator, who, with others, conquered Melanchrus the tyrant of Leſbos, whom the inhabitants of Mitylene greatly honoured, and made him their governour; and a field, which they gave him, was called after his name Pittacius[y]: of this place was Theophanes, a famous hiſtorian, who wrote the hiſtory of Pompey the great, and was familiar with him, and honoured by him, as Cicero[z] relates: other perſons of note are ſaid to be of this place, as Alcæus a lyric poet, and Diophanes a rhetorician. It does not appear that the Apoſtle ſtaid and preached the Goſpel here, or that any Goſpel-church was here by him raiſed; no mention is made of it in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory until late: in the ſecond century heatheniſm prevailed in the iſland, the Leſbians ſacriſiced a man to Dionyſius. In the fifth century we read of a biſhop of this iſland in the Chalcedon council: in the ſixth century there was a biſhop of Mitylene, in the fifth Roman ſynod: in the ſeventh century, Gregory, biſhop of Mitylene, aſſiſted in the ſixth council at Conſtantinople, and Theodorus of the ſame place: in the eighth century Damianus, biſhop of the ſame place, was preſent in the Nicene council[a].

Ver. 15. And we ſailed thence, &c.] From Mitylene: and came the next day over-againſt Chios; which, according to R. Benjamin Tudelenſis[b], was three days ſail from Mitylene; according to Pliny[c] it was ſixty-five miles from it, and is an iſland in the Icarian or Ægean ſea, and lies between Leſbos and Samos, next mentioned; and has its name from the nymph Chione, ſo called from the exceeding whiteneſs of her ſkin, as ſnow: it was famous for marble; from hence came the beſt maſtick, and good figs, and the wine called malmeſy wine[d]. And of this place Jerom ſays[e], Chios, an iſland before Bithynia, whoſe name in the Syriac language ſignifies Maſtick, becauſe that maſtick grows there; ſome add, he called it Chia from Chione the nymph: the reaſon of its name, as Pauſanias[f] relates, was this; Neptune coming into a deſert iſland, had carnal knowledge of a nymph, and in the time of her travail, a ſnow fell from heaven on the ground; and from this Neptune called his ſon Chius, from whom the iſland has its name. Others[g] conjecture, that it was called from חויא, Chivja, which ſignifies a ſerpent; this iſland having been very much terrified, as Ælianus[h] ſays, by the hiſſes of a ſerpent of a monſtrous ſize, until it was conſumed by fire. It was common to ſail from Mitylene hither, and vice verſa: ſo we read[i] of Herod ſeeking Agrippa, he came to Chios, and from thence to Mitylene. We read nothing of the Apoſtle's ſtay and preaching here, nor of any Goſpel-church here, till ages after: in the fourth century, heatheniſm prevailed to ſuch a degree in it, that Dionyſius Omadius was worſhipped here with human ſacrifice; and yet in the fifth century, a biſhop of Chios was preſent in the council of Chalcedon; and in the ſixth century another aſſiſted in the fifth Roman ſynod; and in the ſeventh century there was a biſhop of this place at the ſixth ſynod at Conſtantinople; and in the eighth century Leon, biſhop of Chios, was in the Nicene[k] ſynod. It is now called Chio or Scio, by the Turks Saches, and is inhabited by Italian Genoeſe. And the next day we arrived at Samos; another iſland in the Icarian ſea, not a very fruitful one, unleſs for olives[l]; and for nothing more famous than for being the birth-place of Pythagoras[m], hence called the Samian, and of Meliſſus. It was ninety-three miles diſtant from Chios[n]; and, according to R. Benjamin, two days ſail from it[o]; but Paul ſailed hither in a day. Of this place Jerom[p] thus writes; Samos, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, in which, it is reported, earthen veſſels were firſt made. Herodotus[q] ſpeaks of three things for which it was famous, a very high mountain in it, a bulwark about the haven in the ſea, and a temple the largeſt of all he ever ſaw. Some ſay it has its name from the height of it, Samos ſignifying an high place. Pauſanias[r] from Aſius, a Samian, ſuggeſts, that it was ſo called from Samus, the ſon of Ancæus and Samia; and obſerves, that the inhabitants of it affirm, that Juno was born here; and here was a famous temple, ſaid to be dedicated to her by the Argonautes. One of the Sybils dwelt here, called from hence Samia, and Polycrates, a noted tyrant. Lycurgus, the famous law-giver, died in this place, as did alſo Pherecydes, the Syrian[s]. It is now called Samo. The Apoſtle ſtaid not here to preach the Goſpel; nor do we read of its being preached here by any: idolatry greatly prevailed in this place in the ſecond century; and ſo it did in the fourth; tho' in the ſame we alſo read of ſome Chriſtians here that ſuffered perſecution; and ſo low as the eighth century Heraclius, biſhop of this place, was in the Nicene ſynod[t]. And tarried at Trogyllium; which according to Ptolomy[u], was a promontory in the Icarian ſea: it was about forty furlongs diſtant from Samos, acccording to Strabo[w]. It was a promontory of Mycale; and Trogilias, called alſo Trogilia, is mentioned with Mycale and Samos by Pliny[x], as near to Miletus. It follows here, and the next day we came to Miletus; which was once the chief city of Ionia: it was famous for being the birth-place of Thales, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, and of Timotheus the muſician, and of Anaximander, and Anaximenes, and the famous Democritus, philoſophers[y], and of Cadmus, the firſt inventor of proſe[z]. Pliny ſays[a], it was formerly called Lelegeis, Pityuſa, and Anactoria; and it ſeems it had its name Miletus from Miletus, the ſon of Apollo, who is ſaid to build it[b]; and Apollo himſelf is ſometimes called Apollo Mileſius, and who had a famous temple in this place[c]. Though rather it was ſo called from מילתא, Milata, or Melote, which ſignifies pure, white, fine, ſoft wool, for which this place was famous; which was uſed for carpets, but chiefly for cloth, which being dyed purple, was ſent into divers parts: Melote in Greek ſignifies the ſame; it is uſed in Heb. xi. 37. and tranſlated ſheepſkin. Ptolomy[d] places this city in Caria, by the ſea; and certain it is from this account, that it was a ſea-port: it is ſaid to have four ports or havens, one of which would hold a fleet. Of it Jerom[e] ſays; Miletus, a maritime city in Aſia, diſtant ten furlongs from the mouth of the river Mæander: by the Apoſtle's ſending from hence to Epheſus, for the elders of the church there to meet him at this place, as is afterwards related, and taking no notice of any brethren, elders, or church here, it looks as if there were none at this time: and in the ſecond century, Gentiliſm was embraced at Miletus; and in the fourth century Licinius conſulted the oracle of Apollo Didymæus in this place, concerning the event of the war againſt Conſtantine; but in the fifth century we read of a church here, a biſhop of this place being in the Chalcedon council; in the ſeventh century a biſhop of this church aſſiſted at the ſixth council at Conſtantinople, whoſe name is ſaid to be George; and in the eighth century Epiphanius, biſhop of Miletus, was preſent in the Nicene council[f].

Ver. 16. For Paul had determined to ſail by Epheſus, &c.] That is, to ſail by it, without calling at it, as he did, for it lay by the ſhore before he came to Miletus; but he choſe not to ſtop there, fearing he ſhould be detained by the brethren there: becauſe he would not ſpend the time in Aſia; of which Epheſus was the metropolis: for he haſted, if it were poſſible, for him to be at Jeruſalem the day of Pentecoſt; which was near at hand; for it was but fifty days from the ſecond day of the paſſover, which feaſt was over when he ſailed from Philippi; and at Troas he ſtaid ſeven days, and he had been ſeveral days ſailing already; ſee ver. 6, 13—15. And his great deſire to be at the feaſt of Pentecoſt was not in order to keep that feaſt, according to the uſage of the Jews; but that he might have an opportunity of preaching the Goſpel to a great number of Jews, out of all countries, whom he knew would come to that feaſt.

Ver. 17. And from Miletus he ſent to Epheſus, &c.] Which is ſaid, by ſome, to be about four hundred furlongs from Miletus, and, by others, ten German miles. And called the elders of the church; that is, at Epheſus; not the ancient members of the church, but the officers of it; the paſtors, biſhops, and overſeers, as they are called, ver. 28. and are ſo ſtiled from their office, and not their age. The twelve diſciples the Apoſtle found in this place, and the numerous converts made by him here, firſt compoſed this church, which doubtleſs was formed into Goſpel-order by himſelf; to which he afterwards wrote an epiſtle, when at a diſtance from them, called the Epiſtle to the Epheſians; and in the latter end of the firſt century, another Epiſtle was ſent from Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, by the Apoſtle John, to this church, Rev. ii. 1. and which had an angel, paſtor, or biſhop over it; but who he was, is not certain; Caius, who is reckoned among the ſeventy diſciples, is ſaid to be biſhop of it; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Some ſay Timothy was the firſt biſhop of this church, and after him Oneſimus; but theſe accounts are uncertain, and not to be depended on: but certain it is, that the Apoſtle John dwelt here, and in the parts adjacent, unto his death, and was a ſuperintendant and overſeer in common of this church, and others near it; concerning whom Irenæus [g], a very ancient writer near his times, ſays, the church at Epheſus was founded by Paul; but John remained with them to the times of Trajan. In the ſecond century Ignatius [h] wrote an epiſtle to this church, in which he ſpeaks highly of it, ſaying, there was no hereſy in it; and makes mention of Oneſimus as biſhop of it: in the third century there was a church in this place, and a very memorable affair happened here in the times of Decius; he having obliged all to ſacrifice to the idols in the temple, ſeven perſons, by name Maximianus, Malchus, Martinianus, Dionyſius, Johannes, Serapion, and Conſtantine, were accuſed of Chriſtianity, which they owned; but being ſoldiers, they had ſpace given them to repent until the return of the emperor, who was going elſewhere: whilſt he was gone they fled and hid themſelves in the caves of mount Cælius; upon the emperor's return they were enquired after, and found to be there; who, being provoked, ordered the mouth of the caverns to be ſhut up with ſtones, that they might be famiſhed; and it is ſaid, that what thro' fear and grief they fell aſleep, and ſlept to a great age; ſome pretend to ſay to the times of Theodoſius, and then awaked; and theſe are they that are called the ſeven ſleepers: in the beginning of the fourth century there was a biſhop of this church at the council of Nice: in the fifth century Epheſus was famous for a general ſynod, convened in it againſt Neſtorius; and in this age we read of ſeveral biſhops of this place: at the time of that ſynod, Memnon was biſhop of it, and before him Antonius and Heraclides, and after him Baſil, Baſſianus, Stephen, and Paul: in the ſixth century there was a biſhop of this church preſent at the ſynod of Rome and Conſtantinople; and in the ſame age Ruffinus was biſhop at Epheſus, who flouriſhed under Mauritius the emperor: in the ſeventh century a biſhop of this place aſſiſted at the ſixth council at Conſtantinople; in this century it was a metropolitan church, and Theodorus was archbiſhop of it: in the eighth century, one Theodoſius preſided over the church here; to which church the emperor Conſtantine gave a hundred pounds of gold [i]; ſo far down Chriſtianity is to be traced in this place.

Ver. 18. And when they were come to him, &c.] That is, when the elders or paſtors of the church at Epheſus, were come to the Apoſtle at Miletus: he ſaid unto them, ye know, from the firſt day I came into Aſia; to Epheſus, the chief city in it: after what manner I have been with you at all ſeaſons; what was his conduct, converſation, and conſtant manner of life; which the Apoſtle takes notice of, not to commend himſelf, or to obtain applauſe of men; but either in vindication of himſelf, againſt thoſe that were ready to charge and cenſure him; or to recommend the doctrine which he taught; and chiefly for the imitation of theſe elders, he had ſent for, and convened in this place; and he appeals to themſelves, as eye-witneſſes of what he was going to ſay.

Ver. 19. Serving the Lord with all humility o mind, &c.] Meaning, in the miniſtration of the Goſpel, being conſcious to himſelf of his own weakneſs and inſufficiency in himſelf for ſuch ſervice; no ways elated with thoſe excellent and extraordinary gifts beſtowed upon him; aſcribing all his ſucceſs to the power, grace and ſpirit of God; treating no man with contempt and diſdain; nor lording it over God's heritage, or claiming a dominion over the faith of men; nor ſeeking honour, nor riches for himſelf, nor even what he had a juſt right unto, a maintenance from the people; but laboured with his own hands, and miniſtred to his own and the neceſſities of others: and with many tears; at the obſtinacy and unbelief of ſome, and at the diſtreſſes and afflictions of others, both corporal and ſpiritual; as well as on account of the unbecoming walk of ſome profeſſors: and temptations which befel me by the lying in wait of the Jews; who were hardned againſt his miniſtrations, and believed not the Goſpel preached by him, but ſpoke evil of it, and lay in wait to take away his life; by reaſon of which, his afflictions, which he calls temptations, becauſe they were trials of his faith and patience, were very great.

Ver. 20. And how I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, &c.] The Syriac verſion ſupplies, to your ſouls; to lead them into a true knowledge of the doctrines of the Goſpel, and to confirm them in the ſame, and to preſerve them from errors in principle, and immoralities in practice, and to encourage the exerciſe of every grace, and to inſtruct them in every branch of duty; nothing of this kind, or which had this tendency, did the Apoſtle diſſemble, conceal or drop, either thro' ſloth and indolence, or thro' fear of men, or for the ſake of reputation, wealth and friends. The things the Apoſtle may have chiefly in view are the truths of the Goſpel, which are very profitable to the ſouls of men; ſuch as relate to the knowledge of God, his being, perfections and perſons; as that there are three perſons in the Godhead, Father, Son, and Spirit, which is profitable to be known, in order to underſtand the œconomy of ſalvation, in which each perſon has his diſtinct concern; and that both the Son and Spirit are equally God with the Father, which accounts for the virtue and efficacy of the blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice of Chriſt, and how ſafely he may be depended upon for ſalvation, and how equal the holy Spirit is to his work and office; likewiſe wiſe ſuch doctrines as relate to the ſin of Adam and his poſterity in him, to the imputation of the guilt of that ſin unto them, and the derivation of a corrupt nature from him, and which reſpect the impurity and impotence of human nature; all which is profitable, ſince it accounts for the origin of moral evil, and many of the diſpenſations of providence in involving thoſe that don't know the right hand from their left in public calamities; and ſince it ſhews the neceſſity of regenerating-grace, tends to the humiliation of men, and makes for the magnifying the riches of God's grace: alſo ſuch doctrines as expreſs the grace of God in man's ſalvation, as the doctrines of God's everlaſting love, of election, redemption, juſtification, pardon, reconciliation, union to Chriſt, and final perſeverance; all which are exceeding profitable, for the peace, comfort, and refreſhment of the ſouls of God's people. Moreover, the ordinances of the Goſpel, baptiſm, and the Lord's ſupper, which are the priviledges of believers, and the means of their ſpiritual profit, may be included, together with all the duties of religion; which tho' not profitable by way of merit, yet contribute to the peace and pleaſure of the mind; and none of theſe things did the Apoſtle with-hold from the elders and church at Epheſus, as his epiſtle to that church does abundantly ſhew, in which, doctrines, ordinances, and duties are taken notice of: now to keep back theſe, is either to keep them back wholly, to ſay nothing of any of them, but in the room of them to deliver out morality and legal righteouſneſs; or in part, to mix the truths of the Goſpel with the doctrines of men, and not give out the ſincere milk of the word; or to draw and fetch back what has been delivered thro' the fear of men, and in order to gain reputation and applauſe: but ſo did not the Apoſtle, nor ſhould any miniſter of the Goſpel; and that for the reaſon in the words, becauſe they are profitable; as alſo becauſe they are the counſel of God; and becauſe it is the will of Chriſt that nothing ſhould be hid, but every thing ſhould be publiſhed, which he has ſignified to his ſervants; and this is enforced by his own example, who whatever he heard of his Father, he made known to his diſciples; and for the miniſters of Chriſt to do otherwiſe, would argue unfaithfulneſs in them both to Chriſt and to the ſouls of men: but have ſhewed you; all the doctrines of the Goſpel, and pointed to every path of duty, and declared, as he ſays hereafter, the whole counſel of God: and have taught you publickly; firſt in the Jewiſh ſynagogue, then in the ſchool of Tyrannus, chap. xix. 8, 9, 10. and in whatſoever place the church, when formed, might meet together for publick worſhip; there the Apoſtle taught them the truths of the Goſpel openly, and without any reſerve, before all the people, as Chriſt ordered his Apoſtles to do, and as he himſelf did, Matt. x. 27. John xviii. 20. and from houſe to houſe; as he viſited the ſaints at their own houſes, to know their perſonal caſes, and the ſtate of their ſouls, he inſtructed them privately and perſonally, one by one; he taught the ſame publickly as privately, and privately as publickly; and took every opportunity of inſtilling Goſpel-truths into them, and of enriching them with a larger knowledge of them; which ſhews his affection and zeal, his laboriouſneſs, induſtry and indefatigableneſs in the miniſtry.

Ver. 21. Teſtifying both to the Jews, and alſo to the Greeks, &c.] To the Jews firſt in their ſynagogue, and then to both Jews and Greeks, or Gentiles, in the ſchool of Tyrannus; opening and explaining to both the nature and uſe, urging and inſiſting upon, and proving by undeniable teſtimonies the neceſſity of, repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: the former of theſe is not a legal repentance, but an evangelical one; which flows from a ſenſe of the love of God, and an application of pardoning-grace and mercy, and is always attended with hope, at leaſt of intereſt in it, and as here with faith in Chriſt Jeſus: it lies in a true ſight and ſenſe of ſin, as exceeding ſinful, being contrary to the nature and law of God, and a deformation of the image of God in man, as well as followed with dreadful and pernicious conſequences; and in a godly ſorrow for it, as it is committed againſt a God of infinite purity and holineſs, and of love, grace and mercy; and it ſhows itſelf in ſhame for ſin, and bluſhing at it, and in an ingenuous confeſſion of it, and forſaking it: and the latter of theſe is not an hiſtorical faith, or an aſſent of the mind to whatſoever is true concerning the perſon, office, and grace of Chriſt; but is a ſpiritual act of the ſoul upon him; it is a looking and going out to him, a laying hold and leaning on him, and truſting in him, for grace, righteouſneſs, peace, pardon, life, and ſalvation. Now theſe two were the ſum of the Apoſtle's miniſtry; this is a breviary or compendium of it; a form of ſound words held faſt and publiſhed by him: and as theſe two go together as doctrines in the miniſtry of the word, they go together as graces in the experience of the ſaints; where the one is, there the other is; they are wrought in the ſoul at one and the ſame time, by one and the ſame hand; the one is not before the other in order of time, however it may be in order of working, or as to viſible obſervation; repentance is mentioned before faith, not that it precedes it, tho' it may be diſcerned in its outward acts before it; yet faith as to its inward exerciſe on Chriſt is full as early, if not earlier; ſouls firſt look to Chriſt by faith, and then they mourn in tears of Evangelical repentance, Zech. xii. 10. tho' the order of the Goſpel-miniſtry is very fitly here expreſſed, which is firſt to lay before ſinners the evil of ſin, and their danger by it, in order to convince of it, and bring to repentance for it; and then to direct and encourage them to faith in Chriſt Jeſus, as in the caſe of the goalor, Acts xvi. 29, 30. and this is generally ſpeaking, the order and method in which the holy Spirit proceeds; he is firſt a ſpirit of conviction and illumination, he ſhews to ſouls the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin, cauſes them to loath it and themſelves for it, and humbles them under a ſenſe of it; and then he is a ſpirit of faith, he reveals Chriſt unto them as God's way of ſalvation, and works faith in them to believe in him. Moreover, theſe two, repentance and faith, were the two parts of Chriſt's miniſtry, Mark i. 15. and are what he would have publiſhed and inſiſted on, in the preaching of the word, Luke xxiv. 47. Mark xvi. 16. ſo that the miniſtry of the Apoſtle, was very conformable to the mind and will of Chriſt.

Ver. 22. And now behold, I go bound in the Spirit unto Jeruſalem, &c.] Not in his own ſpirit, tho' the Ethiopic verſion reads, in my ſpirit; as if he was preſſed and ſtraitned, and troubled within himſelf, at what afflictions and bonds he was to endure at Jeruſalem; for this is not conſiſtent with what he ſays in ver. 24. nor is the ſenſe, that he was bound in conſcience and duty to go to Jeruſalem, to carry the collections of the churches made for the poor ſaints there, which the Gentile churches importuned him to take upon him, and which he undertook, and promiſed to perform, and ſo was under obligation to do it; but rather that he was reſolved and determined in his own mind, within himſelf, or he purpoſed in his ſpirit, as in chap. xix. 21. to go to Jeruſalem: but it is beſt to underſtand it of the Spirit of God; as that either the Apoſtle, by the revelation of the Spirit of God, knew that when he came to Jeruſalem he ſhould be laid in bonds, and under a deep impreſſion of that upon his mind, he went thither, as tho' he was bound already; or rather that he was under ſuch a ſtrong impulſe of the Spirit of God, by which he was moved to ſuch a vehement deſire to go thither, that the bonds and afflictions he ſaw waited for him there, could not deter him, and all the intreaties of his friends could not diſſuade him from it: not knowing the things that ſhall befall me there; that is, the particular things he ſhould ſuffer there, nor how they would iſſue with reſpect to life or death; and if the latter, whether he ſhould ſuffer death, there or elſewhere; theſe things were not as yet revealed to him; he only in general knew, that bonds and afflictions would be his lot and portion, and which therefore he excepts in the next verſe: after this it was revealed to him by Agabus a prophet, in the name, and under the influence of the Holy Ghoſt, that he ſhould be apprehended at Jeruſalem, and ſhould be bound and delivered to the Gentiles; which was ſignified by the prophet's taking his girdle and binding his hands and feet with it, but ſtill he knew not whether he ſhould die there or no, tho' he was ready for it, Acts xxi. 10, 11, 13. afterwards when he was come to Jeruſalem, and had been bound, and was in priſon, the Lord himſelf appeared to him, and told him that he muſt bear witneſs at Rome, as he had teſtified of him at Jeruſalem, Acts xxiii. 11. ſo that he was not to ſuffer death there, only bonds and impriſonment.

Ver. 23. Save that the Holy Ghoſt witneſſeth in every city, &c.] As he paſſed along, where there was a church, or any number of ſaints: in the churches of thoſe times there were prophets who foretold things to come, and by theſe the Holy Ghoſt teſtified to the Apoſtle, as he travelled along, and called upon the churches in every city, what would befall him when he came to Jeruſalem; this ſenſe the natural order of the words requires, unleſs there ſhould be a tranſpoſition of them, thus, ſave that the Holy Ghoſt witneſſeth, ſaying, that bonds and afflictions abide me, or wait for me in every city; that is, this in general was only made known to him by the Spirit of God, that wherever he came, affliction and perſecution would attend him, and he muſt expect bonds and impriſonment; theſe were ready for him, and he muſt prepare for them, as he did; and therefore whenere they came, he was not ſurpriſed at them, they were no other than what he looked for; but the other ſenſe ſeems beſt, for ſuch a tranſpoſition is not very eaſy, and beſides, can by no means be admitted, if the ſenſe is, as the words are read in Beza's ancient copy, and in others, and in the Vulgate Latin verſion, that bonds and afflictions abide me at Jeruſalem; however, ſince the Holy Ghoſt teſtified beforehand of the afflictions and bonds of the Apoſtle, whether in every city or in Jeruſalem, or both; it is no inconſiderable proof of the proper deity of the ſpirit of God, and is an inſtance of his affectionate regard to the Apoſtle, to give him previous notice of theſe things.

Ver. 24. But none of theſe things move me, &c.] From the hope of the Goſpel, nor from the miniſtry of the word, nor from his journey to Jeruſalem; they did not ſhake his faith, nor inject fear into him, nor cauſe him to alter his purpoſe and deſign: neither count I my life dear unto myſelf; life is a very valuable thing, no outward or temporal enjoyment can be dearer to a man than life; all that he has he'll give for his life; this therefore muſt not be underſtood in an abſolute ſenſe, as if the Apoſtle deſpiſed his life, and eſteemed of it meanly, when it was the gift of God, and had been not only ſo eminently preſerved in providence, but had been ſo uſeful in a way of grace to ſo many valuable purpoſes; but it muſt be taken in a comparative ſenſe, with reſpect to Chriſt and his Goſpel, and when it ſhould be called for to be laid down for him; and that, in ſuch circumſtances, and under ſuch conſiderations, he made no account of it at all, but preferred Chriſt and his Goſpel to it: this ſenſe appears by what follows, ſo that I might finiſh my courſe with joy; the courſe and race of his life, ending it by ſuffering chearfully and joyfully for Chriſt; or his chriſtian courſe and race, which began at his converſion, ending that with a joyful proſpect of being with Chriſt in an endleſs eternity; or elſe the courſe of his miniſtry, ſealing that with his blood, and rejoicing that he was counted worthy to ſuffer for the name of Chriſt, and ſo he did finiſh his courſe, 2 Tim. iv. 7. and the miniſtry which I have received of the Lord Jeſus; which ſeems to be explanative of the former, or of what is meant by his courſe, namely his miniſtry, the miniſtry of the Goſpel: Beza's ancient copy, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, the miniſtry of the word; this he had received from Chriſt, both the Goſpel which he miniſtred, and gifts qualifying him for it, and a miſſion and commiſſion to miniſter it; and which he was deſirous of fulfilling in ſuch a manner, as to give up his account with joy to him from whom he had received it, and to whom he was accountable; namely, to teſtify the Goſpel of the grace of God; to profeſs and preach it, to bear a conſtant and publick teſtimony to it at death, as in life, and faithfully to declare it, and aſſert it to the laſt; which he calls not only the Goſpel, or good news of ſalvation by Chriſt; but the Goſpel of the grace of God: which brings the account of the free-grace, love, and 1 mercy of God, diſplayed in the ſcheme of ſalvation; of the grace of God the Father, in pitching his 2 love upon any of the ſons of men; not becauſe they were better and more deſerving of his favour, than others, but becauſe of his ſoveraign will and pleaſure, who will be gracious to whom he will be gracious; and in chuſing them in Chriſt unto ſalva- 3 tion, before they had done good or evil, and without any conſideration or foreſight of, or motive from good works hereafter done by them; in drawing the ſcheme and model of their ſalvation in Chriſt, appointing him to be the author of it; and in making 4 a covenant of grace with him, ſtored with all the bleſſings and promiſes of grace; and in ſending him, 5 in the fulneſs of time, to ſuffer and die for them, not ſparing him, but delivering him up for them all, and giving all things freely with him; and in 6 accepting the ſacrifice, ſatisfaction and righteouſneſs of his ſon on their account, as if done by themſelves. It alſo gives an account of the grace of Chriſt in 1 undertaking the ſalvation of men; in aſſuming their 2 nature, and becoming mean and low in it; in dying 3 for their ſins; in his interceſſion for them at the right hand of God; and in the care he takes of them in this world, until he has brought them ſafe home to himſelf. Likewiſe it gives an account of the grace of the Spirit in regeneration and ſanctification; in working faith in the hearts of men; in being a comforter to them, a witneſſer of their adoption, the earneſt of their inheritance, and the ſealer of them unto the day of redemption. And the Goſpel may may be ſo called, becauſe all the doctrines of it are doctrines of grace; it aſſerts election to be of grace, and not of works; and aſcribes the juſtification of a ſinner to the free-grace of God, thro' the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, imputed without works and received by faith, which faith is the gift of God, and it denies it to be of the deeds of the law; it repreſents the pardon of ſin to be according to the riches of God's grace, tho' it is thro' the blood of Chriſt, and not owing to humiliation, repentance, confeſſion, and new obedience, as cauſes of it; it attributes regeneration and converſion to the abundant mercy, the free favour of God, and to the efficacy of his grace, and not to the will of the fleſh, or the will of man; and in a word, as the great doctrine of it is ſalvation, whence it is called the Goſpel of ſalvation, it declares that the whole of ſalvation from firſt to laſt, is all of grace. And it may alſo bear this name, becauſe it is a means of conveying grace unto, and implanting it in the hearts of men; regenerating-grace comes this way; God begets men by the word of truth, they are born again of incorruptible ſeed by it; the Spirit of God, as a ſpirit of ſanctification, is received thro' it, and faith comes by hearing it; and both that and hope and every other grace, are quickened, encouraged, and drawn forth into exerciſe by it; all which is, when it is attended with the Spirit of God and power: and this being the nature and uſe of the Goſpel, made it ſo precious and valuable to the Apoſtle, and made him ſo intent upon teſtifying it, and fulfilling the miniſtry of it, and to prefer it to life and every thing in this world; and it cannot but be highly valued and greatly deſired by all thoſe who have taſted that the Lord is gracious. Beza's ancient copy, and ſome others read, to teſtify to Jews and Greeks, the Goſpel of the grace of God.

Ver. 25. And now behold, &c.] This is not only a note of aſſeveration, but of attention, ſtirring up to obſerve what is here aſſerted: I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, ſhall ſee my face no more; the ſenſe is, that none of them ſhould ever ſee him again, none of the churches of Aſia, or the members of them; among whom he had been ſome years preaching the Goſpel, the things concerning the Meſſiah, his kingdom and glory, and the meetneſs of the ſaints for, and their right unto the heavenly inheritance, prepared by God, and given by him to all that love him: Beza's ancient copy reads, the kingdom of Jeſus: this the Apoſtle knew by divine revelation, by the ſame ſpirit in which he was going bound to Jeruſalem, tho' he knew not whether he ſhould die there or elſewhere; however, he knew, and was perſuaded, he ſhould viſit theſe parts no more.

Ver. 26. Wherefore I take you to record this day, &c.] This is a ſolemn appeal to the elders of the church at Epheſus, who knew his doctrine and manner of life for a conſiderable time among them: that I am pure from the blood of all men; or of you all, as ſome copies, and the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions read; which ſeems moſt natural, ſince they could only bear a teſtimony for him with reſpect to themſelves, and the people at Epheſus, where he had ſo behaved both in the faithful diſcharge of his miniſtry, and in his exemplary life and converſation; as that the ruine and deſtruction of no one of them could be laid to his charge, or any one periſh for want of knowledge, or thro' any negligence of his; ſee Ezek. xxxiii. 6.

Ver. 27. For I have not ſhunned to declare unto you all the counſel of God.] By which is meant, not the purpoſes and decrees of God, latent in his own breaſt, theſe the Apoſtle could not declare; but his revealed will in the Goſpel, concerning the ſalvation of men by Jeſus Chriſt, even the whole of the Goſpel, every truth and doctrine of it, neceſſary to ſalvation, and to the peace, joy, and comfort of the ſaints; together with all the ordinances of it, and every thing that had any tendency to promote the glory of God, and the good of ſouls; ſee Luke vii. 30. none of theſe things did the Apoſtle withhold from the knowledge of the church at Epheſus, but freely imparted and communicated them to them; ſee the note on ver. 20.

Ver. 28. Take heed therefore unto yourſelves, &c.] Since the blood of men may be required of thoſe, who are negligent or partial in their office, and ſhun to declare the whole counſel of God: this exhortation is given them not merely as men, to take care of their bodily health, the outward concerns of life, and provide for themſelves and families; nor merely as chriſtians, but as miniſters of the Goſpel; that they would take heed to their gifts, to uſe and improve them, and not neglect them; to their time that they ſpend it aright, and not ſquander it away; and to their ſpirit, temper and paſſions, that they are not governed by them; and to their lives and converſations, that they be exemplary to thoſe who are under their care; and to their doctrine, that it be according to the ſcriptures; that it be the doctrine of Chriſt, and the ſame with the Apoſtles; that it be according to godlineſs, and that it tends to edification; that it be ſound, and incorrupt, pure and unmixed, and all of a piece and conſiſtent with itſelf; and that they be not infected and carried away with errors and hereſies: and to all the flock; the church and all the members of it, which are compared to a flock of ſheep, which are to be looked after and watched over, by the miniſters of the word, who are as ſhepherds to them, leſt they ſhould be infected, or any damage done them. The people of God are compared to ſheep on many accounts; before converſion, for their going aſtray, when they are as loſt ſheep; after converſion, for their meek and inoffenſive carriage and behaviour, and for their patience in bearing ſufferings, to which they are expoſed: and a church of Chriſt is compared to a flock of them, being in Goſpel order, folded together and feeding in the ſame paſture, attending the word and ordinances, under the care of ſhepherds appointed by Chriſt the chief ſhepherd; whoſe buſineſs it is to take heed unto them, and care of them, to learn to know their ſtate and condition, to watch over them, and to feed them with knowledge and with underſtanding, for which they are qualified by Chriſt; and they are to take heed unto every one in the flock, the poor of the flock as well as others, the lambs as well as the ſheep, and the ſick and the diſeaſed, the torn, and ſtraying, and driven away, as well as the fat and the ſtrong: and this flock, tho' a little flock, is a holy and beautiful one, a flock of men, and of the ſouls of men dear to God, to Chriſt and the bleſſed Spirit; and a ſpecial regard ſhould be had unto them, and that for reaſons following: over which the Holy Ghoſt hath made you overſeers; or biſhops; this is ſaid to the elders of the church, ver. 17. which ſhews that the office of an elder and a biſhop is one and the ſame office; and this contains in it more then one argument why they ſhould take heed to the flock; as becauſe they are the overſeers of it, who have the care and overſight of the flock, that is under their inſpection, and is their proper province, and office; and this they were put into by the Holy Ghoſt, who gave them gifts to qualify them for it, and called, and inclined them to undertake it, as well as moved the people to make choice of them for this purpoſe; and ſince therefore, this was an affair in which the Holy Ghoſt was ſo much concerned, it became them very diligently to attend it: to feed the church of God; with knowledge and underſtanding; and diſcharge the whole office of faithful ſhepherds to the flock, by feeding the flock and not themſelves, ſtrengthening the diſeaſed, healing the ſick, binding up the broken, bringing again that which was driven away, and ſeeking up that which was loſt: and here is another argument ſuggeſted, to ſtir up to a diligent performance of this work; and that is, that this flock is the church of God, a ſett of men whom God has choſen for himſelf, and called by his grace out of the world, and ſeparated for his own uſe and glory, and among whom he dwells; and therefore to be fed with the faithful word, with the fineſt of the wheat, and not with the chaff of human ſchemes, and with the wind of falſe doctrine, nor with any thing that is vain, trifling, and deceitful; but with the ſolid doctrines of the Goſpel, with the words of faith and good doctrine, with the wholeſome words of Chriſt Jeſus, which have in them milk for babes and meat for ſtrong men, and with and by the Ordinances of the Goſpel, which are the green paſtures they are to be guided into, and abide in; and in all they are to be directed to Chriſt the ſum of the word and ordinances, who is the bread of life, and food of faith; and that the church ſhould be thus fed, is the will of Chriſt, who has appointed and ordered his miniſters to feed his lambs and ſheep, and has furniſhed them with what is neceſſary for this work; this is the deſign of the miniſtry of the Goſpel, and the adminiſtration of ordinances; and the churches of Chriſt are placed where food may be had, where the word is faithfully preached, and the ordinances truly adminiſtred: ſome copies read, the church of the Lord; and others, and ſo the Complutenſian edition, the church of the Lord and God: which he hath purchaſed with his own blood; which being the blood not only of a pure and innocent man, but of one that is truly and properly God as well as man, was a ſufficient ranſom price to redeem the church and people of God from ſin, the law, its curſe and condemnation: ſo that this is no inconſiderable proof of the true and proper deity of Chriſt; and contains a freſh argument, or reaſon why the flock of God and church of Chriſt, as the Syriac verſion reads; or the church of the Lord and God, as in five of Beza's exemplars; or of the Lord God, as the Arabic verſion, ſhould be taken heed unto and fed; becauſe it muſt needs be dear to God and Chriſt, and precious to them, ſince ſo great a price has been paid for it. The purchaſer is God, Chriſt who is God over all, bleſſed for ever, not a creature; that could never have made ſuch a purchaſe, it could not have purchaſed a ſingle ſheep or lamb in this flock, no man can redeem his brother, or give to God a ranſom for him, much leſs the whole flock; but Chriſt being God, was able to make ſuch a purchaſe, and he has actually made it, and given a ſufficient price for it; not to ſatan, with whom theſe ſheep were a prey, and from whom they are taken in virtue of the ranſom given; but to God, from whom they ſtrayed, againſt whom they ſinned, and whoſe law they broke; and this price was not ſilver and gold, nor men, nor people; but Chriſt himſelf, his life and blood; and which were his own, the human nature, the blood of which was ſhed, and its life given being in union with his divine perſon, and was in ſuch ſenſe his own, the property of the Son of God, as the life and blood of no mere man are theirs: and this purchaſe now being made in this way, and by ſuch means, is a very proper one; it is not made without price, but with an invaluable one; and it is a legal purchaſe, a valuable conſideration being given for it, perfectly equivalent to it; and therefore is a compleat one, there is nothing wanting to make it more firm, it is a finiſhed purchaſe; and it is a very peculiar one, it is a peculiar people that are purchaſed, called the purchaſed poſſeſſion, Epheſ. i. 14. and a peculiar price which is paid for it; there is no other of the ſame kind, nor any thing like it, and it is made by a peculiar perſon, one that is God and man in one perſon.

Ver. 29. For I know this, &c.] By divine revelation: that after my departing; either out of this world, or after his leaving them now, and proceeding on his journey: ſhall grievous wolves enter in among you; falſe teachers, comparable to wolves, for their craft and cunning, and for their greedy, covetous, and voracious diſpoſitions; and who would be very grievous, troubleſome, and even intolerable to them; theſe he knew would enter privily, at an unawares, into their churches, and ſet up themſelves for preachers, without being called or ſent: not ſparing the flock; fleecing it inſtead of feeding it, making merchandize of it, and like the Phariſees, under religious pretences, devour widows houſes, and drain the purſes of men; and having as little compaſſion upon their ſouls, poiſoning them with their errors and hereſies, ſubverting their faith, and bringing them into ſwift ruine and deſtruction, as much as would in them lie.

Ver. 30. Alſo of your own ſelves ſhall men ariſe, &c.] Not only falſe teachers from abroad ſhould come and enter among them, but ſome would ſpring up out of their own communities, ſuch as had been admitted members of them, and of whom they had hoped well; ſuch were Hymenæus, Philetus, Alexander, Hermogenes, and Phygellus: ſpeaking perverſe things; concerning God, and Chriſt, and the Goſpel; diſtorted things, wreſting the ſcriptures to their own deſtruction, and that of others; things that are diſagreeable to the word of God, and pernicious to the ſouls of men: to draw away diſciples after them; to rend away members from the churches, make ſchiſms and diviſions, form parties, ſet themſelves at the head of them, and eſtabliſh new ſects, called after their own names; ſee 1 John ii. 19. Jud. v. 19.

Ver. 31. Therefore watch, &c.] Meaning both over themſelves, and the flock; to prevent, if poſſible, falſe teachers entring in, and to nip the buds of hereſy and ſchiſm, as ſoon as they appear, and to preſerve themſelves, and the church, from being carried away with the error of the wicked. And remember that by the ſpace of three years; reckoning from his firſt coming to Epheſus, unto this time, that he now called at Miletus; ſee ch. xviii. 19, 20. and xix. 8, 10, 22. and xx. iii. 6, 17. I ceaſed not to warn every one night and day with tears; that is, he was conſtantly and continually cautioning them againſt falſe teachers, and their doctrines, in the moſt tender and affectionate manner; ſhedding tears at the thoughts of what miſchief would be done, and how many ſouls would be ruined by them; which gives a lively idea of the Apoſtle, and his miniſtry, of his affection, zeal, and diligence, very worthy of the imitation of all the preachers of the Goſpel. Several copies, and all the Oriental verſions, read, every one of you.

Ver. 32. And now brethren, &c.] So the Apoſtle calls the elders of the church at Epheſus; tho' they had not the ſame gifts, and were not in the ſame high office as he was, yet he puts himſelf upon a level with them, as if he and they were fellow elders, as Peter calls himſelf, 1 Pet. v. 1. which is an inſtance of the Apoſtle's humility and affection: I commend you to God; to God the Father; to his grace, to ſupply all their need; to his wiſdom, to direct them in all their affairs; and to his power, to keep them from the ſins and corruptions of the times, and from the errors and hereſies now broaching, or to be broached. And to the word of his grace; either the Goſpel, before called the Goſpel of the grace of God, ver. 24. This is ſometimes called the Word, the word of faith, of truth, of righteouſneſs, of reconciliation and ſalvation; and is his word, the word of God, and not of man; it comes from him, is concerning him, and is ſucceeded by him; and it is the word of his grace, ſince it publiſhes his free grace and mercy in Chriſt Jeſus, and declares ſalvation to be wholly of the grace of God; to which this church is commended by the Apoſtle as a rule of faith and practice, to attend unto, and abide by, and as a preſervative from thoſe errors and hereſies which he had obſerved would ſpring up among them, and which would be for their inſtruction, comfort, and eſtabliſhment: or elſe the Lord Jeſus is intended, who is the eternal and eſſential word of God; who, as the word, inwardly conceived, is the image of the mind, equal to it, and yet diſtinct from it, ſo Chriſt is the image of the inviſible God, equal to him, and yet a diſtinct perſon from him; and as the word expreſſed is the interpreter of the mind, ſo Chriſt the word, who was in the beginning with God, and lay in his boſom, has ſpoke all things from him, declared his mind, and explained his will: beſides, he is the word who in the everlaſting council and covenant ſpoke on the behalf of all his people, aſked for every bleſſing for them, and engaged to be the ſurety of them; and is the word, who, in the beginning of time, ſpoke all things out of nothing; and now is the advocate, and ſpeaks for the ſaints in heaven, as well as he has been the word ſpoken of by all the holy prophets from the beginning of the world: and he may be thought the rather to be deſigned, ſince the ſaints never commend themſelves, or others, either in life, or in death, to any but to a divine perſon; nor is any but a divine perſon capable of taking the care and charge of the ſaints, and of making it good; nor will they truſt any other; nor are the ſaints ever ſaid to be committed or commended to the Goſpel, but on the other hand, that is ſaid to be committed to them: the written word is committed to the care and keeping of the ſaints, but not the ſaints to the care and keeping of that; nor does it appear ſo agreeable, to put the written word upon a level with the divine being; a commendation of the ſaints, equally to the written word, as to God himſelf, ſeems to be a leſſening of the glory of the divine being, and an aſcribing too much to the word, but ſuits well with Chriſt the eſſential word: and who may be called the word of his grace, becauſe the grace of God is greatly diſplayed in him; and becauſe all fulneſs of grace dwells in him; and he is the author, donor, and object of all grace, and ſo a proper perſon to be commended to; and what follows is very applicable to him: which is able to build you up; in faith and holineſs, and on himſelf, the ſure foundation; for tho' the Goſpel is an inſtrument in the hands of the Spirit of God, in building up ſaints on their moſt holy faith, yet Chriſt is the maſter-builder; it is he that builds the temple, the church, and every particular believer, and muſt bear the glory. The ſaints, tho' they are built on Chriſt the foundation, againſt which the gates of hell cannot prevail, and ſo are ſafe; yet they ſtand in need of building up, or of edification; and a church may be ſaid to be built up, or edified, when additions are made unto it of ſuch as ſhall be ſaved; and particular members are built up, when additions are made to their grace, or they grow in the exerciſe of it; when their ſpiritual ſtrength increaſes, when their underſtandings are more enlightened, their judgments better informed, and their memories filled with divine truths and Goſpel-doctrines; when they are more and more confirmed in the faith of Chriſt, both as a grace, and as a doctrine; and their wills are brought to a greater reſignation to the will of God, as well as their affections are ſet upon things in heaven, and their ſouls are more ſeeking after them: and now this is what God is able to do, and does do; for except he builds, in vain do the builders build; he cauſes all grace to abound; and ſo does his word, his eſſential word; he is the author and finiſher of faith, and gives both grace and glory, as it follows: And to give you an inheritance among all them which are ſanctified; by the inheritance is meant the heavenly glory, which is a free-grace gift, and not obtained by the works of the law, or the induſtry of men. It is a diſtribution by lot, as the land of Canaan was, even by the lot of God's eternal purpoſe and decree: it is what belongs to children, to the children of God, and them only; and therefore bears this name, and comes unto them upon, and in conſequence of the death of Chriſt the teſtator: it is his righteouſneſs which entitles unto it; and it is the grace of God which makes meet for it; and the Spirit of God is the earneſt of it: it is an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reſerved in the heavens, and is an eternal one; it lies in light, and among the ſaints there. God is able to give it; it is a gift of his grace, of his ſovereign will, which he gives to whom he pleaſes; it is an inheritance of his preparing and diſpoſing, which he calls unto, makes meet for, and beſtows: and Chriſt, the word of his grace, is able to give it; it is in his hands, not only the promiſe of it, but that itſelf; he is in poſſeſſion of it, and it is in his power to give it; and he does give it to all that the Father has given him, and who are here deſcribed from their ſanctification; for this is only enjoyed by ſuch, who are ſet apart by God the Father, whoſe ſins are expiated by the blood of Chriſt, and to whom he is made ſanctification, and who are ſanctified by the bleſſed Spirit. Now tho' the Goſpel, the written word, may be as a map, which ſhows where this inheritance lies, and which is the way to it; yet it is Chriſt, the living word, who gives the right unto it, the meetneſs for it, the earneſt of it, and will put into the poſſeſſion of it.

Ver. 33. I have coveted no man's ſilver, or gold, or apparel.] This the Apoſtle ſays, not merely in vindication of himſelf, and his character, from all charge or ſuſpicion of avarice; but chiefly for the inſtruction of theſe elders, and all others of the ſame office, not to indulge the ſin of covetouſneſs, which is very diſagreeable, and ought not to be in a miniſter of the word; and it may be obſerved, that many things which the Apoſtle ſays before of himſelf to thoſe elders, is ſaid not to commend himſelf, nor ſo much in his own vindication, as for their imitation; compare with this Numb. xvi. 15. 1 Sam. xii. 3. and to point out the character of falſe teachers that would come in, or ſpring up among them, who would make merchandize of them. Beza's ancient copy, and others, read, the ſilver, &c. of none of you; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion.

Ver. 34. Yea, you yourſelves know, &c.] So far was the Apoſtle from deſiring to have other mens money, or to wear their apparel, or to eat their bread, that he could appeal to theſe elders for the truth of it, they having been eye-witneſſes of it: that theſe hands have miniſtred unto my neceſſities; meaning, that he had wrought with his hands, which he then held up, or ſtretched out, at tent-making, along with Aquila and Priſcilla, at Epheſus, as he had done before at Corinth, chap. xviii. 2, 3, 18, 19. and therewith ſupplied himſelf with neceſſaries for food and clothing; for tho' he had a power, as a miniſter of the Goſpel, to forbear working, and to inſiſt upon a maintenance from the churches, yet in ſome caſes, and in ſome places, he choſe rather to forego that, leſt he ſhould either any ways hinder the progreſs of the Goſpel at the firſt preaching of it, or be burdenſome to the churches, or give the falſe teachers any handle againſt him; and he not only ſupported himſelf in this way, but aſſiſted others alſo: and to them that were with me; as Luke, Timothy, and others; ſee ver. 4.

Ver. 35. I have ſhewed you all things, &c.] Both as to doctrine and practice, and had ſet them an example how to behave in every point, and particularly in this: how that ſo labouring ye ought to ſupport the weak; the ſenſe of which is, that they ſhould labour with their hands as he did, and ſo ſupport the weak; either ſuch who were weak in body, and unable to work and help themſelves, and therefore ſhould be helped, aſſiſted, relieved, and ſupported by the labours of others, that were able; or the weak in faith, and take nothing of them, leſt they ſhould think the preachers of the word ſought only their own worldly advantage, and ſo they ſhould be ſtumbled and fall from the truth: and to remember the words of the Lord Jeſus; which the Apoſtle had either collected as the ſenſe of ſome paſſages of his, ſuch as Luke vi. 30, 35, 38. and xiv. 13, 14. Matt. xxv. 34, 35, &c. or which, tho' not recorded in any of the Goſpels, the Apoſtle might have received from one or other of the twelve diſciples, as what were frequently uſed by Chriſt in the days of his fleſh; and which the Apoſtle had inculcated among the Epheſians, and now puts them in mind of them, they being worthy of remembrance: how he ſaid, it is more bleſſed to give than to receive; it is more comfortable, honourable, pleaſant, and profitable: the giver is in a more comfortable ſituation, having an abundance, at leaſt a ſufficiency, and ſomething to ſpare; whereas the receiver is often in want and diſtreſs, and ſo uncomfortable: it is an honour to give; an honour is reflected upon the giver, both by the receiver, and others; when to receive is an inſtance of meanneſs, and carries in it, among men, ſome degree of diſhonour: it is a pleaſure to a liberal man to diſtribute to the neceſſities of others; and it cannot be grateful to a man to be in ſuch circumſtances, as make it neceſſary for him to receive from others, and be dependant on them; and great are the advantages and profit which a chearful giver reaps, both in this world, and that to come: wherefore the concluſion which the Apoſtle would have drawn from hence is, that it is much more eligible for a man to work with his own hands, and ſupport himſelf, and aſſiſt others, than to receive at the hands of others.

Ver. 36. And when he had thus ſpoken, &c.] And finiſhed his ſpeech to the elders: he kneeled down; upon the floor, which was a prayer-geſture, uſed by Chriſt, and others; for, it ſeems, the diſuſe of kneeling in prayer, between the paſſover and pentecoſt, which Tertullian[k], and other writers, ſpeak of, had not yet obtained, which was in memory of Chriſt's reſurrection from the dead, for this was now the time; ſee ver. 6, 16. and prayed with them all; and no doubt for them all; the Syriac verſion renders it, and he prayed, and all the men with him; the Apoſtle, and the elders, joined together in prayer.

Ver. 37. And they all wept ſore, &c.] At the thoughts of parting with ſuch a faithful and affectionate friend and ſervant of Chriſt; and no doubt but their affections were greatly moved by his prayers for them, as well as by his diſcourſe to them. Chriſtians are not Stoicks, religion does not take away and deſtroy the natural affections, but regulates and governs them, and directs to a right uſe of them: and fell on Paul's neck and kiſſed him; as Eſau fell on Jacob's neck and kiſſed him, Gen. xxxiii. 4. and Joſeph on his brother Benjamin's, and his father Jacob's, Gen. xlv. 14. and xlvi. 29. And it was uſual with the Eaſtern nations, particularly the Perſians[l], for friends and relations to kiſs at parting, as well as at meeting; ſee Ruth i. 9, 14.

Ver. 38. Sorrowing moſt of all for the words which he ſpake, &c.] In ver. 25. it filled them with ſorrow to part with him; but this was increaſed, and made almoſt intolerable by what he ſaid, that they ſhould ſee his face no more: could they have hoped to have ſeen him again, it would have made their parting with him more eaſy; but to be told they ſhould never ſee him more in this world, it cut them to the heart; which ſhows what a ſhare the Apoſtle had in their hearts and affections, and not without good reaſon: however, that they might have a ſight of him as long as they could, they went along with him to ſee him take ſhipping, and to ſee the laſt of him. And they accompanied him unto the ſhip; which lay at Miletus waiting for him.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. AND it came to paſs, that after we had gotten from them, &c.] Which was with great difficulty, with many tears, and much wringing of hands: the word ſignifies that they were plucked from them; they clung about them, as huſband and wife, and parents and children do; ſo ſtrong were their affections; and their parting was like the parting of ſuch near relations, or like the plucking of the fleſh from the bones, or the drawing and ſeparating one member from another; ſuch is the cement of true Chriſtian love: and had launched; the veſſel into the ſea, from the port at Miletus: we came with a ſtrait courſe unto Coos; an iſland in the Ægean ſea. Pomponius Mela[m] calls it Cos in Caria; and ſo Pauſanias[n] reckons it a city of the Carians and Lycians, mentioning it along with Rhodes. It was famous for being the birth-place of Apelles the painter, and Hippocrates the phyſician. Pliny[o] places it in Caria, and calls it moſt noble, and ſays that it was fifteen miles diſtant from Halicarnaſſus, naſſus, was a hundred miles in circumference, as many think, and was called Merope: and who elſewhere obſerves [p], that it is reported that the ſilk-worms are bred in this iſland, and that a ſort of raiment called Bombycine was firſt made here by Pamphila, the daughter of Latoius. And ſo Solinus [q], from Varro, teſtifies, that this iſland firſt gave a fine ſort of cloathing for the ornament of women: hence becauſe ſilks or bombycines, from the ſilk-worms, were firſt wove here by women, ſome think the iſland had its name, for מקוה, which ſignifies ſomething ſpun, in 1 Kings x. 28. 2 Chron. i. 16. it is by us tranſlated linnen yarn; but the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, from Coa. This iſland was taken by Hercules, and Eurypylus, the king of it, was ſlain by him [r]. It is now in the hands of the Turks, by whom it is called Stancora; but by others Lango. When, and by whom the Goſpel was firſt preached here, is not certain; it does not appear that the Apoſtle Paul ſtaid to preach it now: however, in the beginning of the fourth century there was a church here, and a biſhop of it was preſent at the council of Nice; and in the fifth century, a biſhop of the church here aſſiſted in the council of Chalcedon; and in the ſixth century, a biſhop of the ſame place was in the fifth ſynod at Conſtantinople [s]. Hither Paul and his company came with a good wind, a proſperous gale, and nothing to hinder them; which perhaps is rather meant than a ſtrait or direct line, in which they ran from Miletus to this place: and the day following unto Rhodes; this is an iſland in Lycia, according to Mela [t], and had in it theſe three cities, Lindos, Camitos, and Jalyſos: it is ſaid of it [u], that the heavens are never ſo cloudy, but the ſun is ſeen here in one part of the day, or another. R. Benjamin [w] makes this to be three days ſail from Samos; and ſays, he found four hundred Jews in it, and almoſt three hundred at Samos. It is aſſerted by ſeveral writers [x], that this iſland was once covered with the ſea, and in proceſs of time appeared out of it, and became dry land. The account which Pliny [y] gives of it is, that "it is moſt beautiful and free, and was in circumference a hundred and thirty miles; or, if Iſidorus is rather to be credited, a hundred and three: the cities in it were Lindus, Camirus, Jalyſus, now Rhodes: it is diſtant from Alexandria in Egypt five hundred ſeventy-eight miles, as Iſidorus reports; but according to Eratoſthenes, four hundred ſixty-nine; and according to Mutianus, five hundred; and from Cyprus it was a hundred and ſixty-ſix;" a place after-mentioned, which the Apoſtle left on the left hand, having ſailed from Patara to Phenicia. The ſame writer proceeds and adds, "it was before called Ophiuſa, Aſteria, Æthrea, Trinacria, Cotymbia, Pæeſſa, Atabyria, from the king of it, afterwards Macria and Oloeſſa." Jerom [z] ſays of it, that "it is the moſt noble of the iſlands Cyclades, and the firſt from the eaſt, formerly called Ophiuſſa; in which was a city of the ſame name, famous for the brazen Coloſſus, which was ſeventy cubits high: it was diſtant from the port of Aſia twenty miles." This ſtatue, called the Coloſſus of the ſun, and was one of the ſeven wonders of the world, according to Pliny [a], was made by Chares, a diſciple of Lyſippus, at the expence of king Demetrius: it was twelve years in making, and coſt three hundred talents: it was ſeventy cubits high (as Jerom before ſays): it fell by an earthquake, after it had ſtood fifty, or ſixty years (ſome ſay 1360); and as it lay along it was a miracle, few men with their arms ſtretched out could embrace the thumb, and the fingers were bigger than moſt ſtatues: and from this ſtatue the Rhodians have been ſometimes called Coloſſians; and ſome have fancied, that theſe are the perſons the Apoſtle Paul wrote his Epiſtle to under that name. This iſland, and the city in it, were called Rhodes, as ſome think, from roſes, with which it might abound, or becauſe of the beautifulneſs of the place; and others, that it had its name from ירוד, Jarod, which, in the Chaldee and Syriac languages, ſignifies a ſerpent; and ſo it was called Ophiuſa from the multitude of ſerpents in it [b]; tho' others ſay it took its name from Rhodia, a fair and beautiful maid beloved by Apollo. This iſland, in the ſeventh century, about the year 653, was taken by Mauvia, king of the Saracens, who ſold the Coloſſus, which lay on the ground ever ſince the earthquake, to a merchant, who is ſaid to load nine hundred camels with the braſs of it: it afterwards came into the hands of the Chriſtians, and in the year 1522 was taken by Solyman the Turk, after a ſiege of ſix months, being betrayed by Andreas Meralius, a Portugueze knight [c]. When the Goſpel was firſt preached here, and a church-ſtate formed, cannot be ſaid; but in the beginning of the fourth century there was a biſhop of this place in the council of Nice; and in the fifth century there was a church here, and it was a metropolitan; and in the ſixth century a biſhop of this place was in the fifth Roman ſynod under Symmachus; and in the ſeventh century a biſhop of Rhodes aſſiſted in the ſixth council at Conſtantinople; and in the ſame century it was taken by the Saracenes, as before obſerved, when the church here was the metropolitan of the Cyclades; and yet in the eighth century, Leo, biſhop of this place, was in the Nicene ſynod; and even tho' in the ninth century it was grievouſly haraſſed by the Saracenes, yet its church-ſtate was not quite deſtroyed [d]. And from thence to Patara; Beza's ancient copy adds, and Myra; ſee ch. xxvii. 5. a city of Lycia: hence it is called by Herodotus [e], and Pliny [f], Patara of Lycia, and mentioned with Rhodes: it was famous for the temple of Apollo, which was in it, in which anſwers were given ſix months in the year, and were on equal credit with the oracle at Delphos [g]; the Arabic verſion here calls it Sparta. According to Pliny [h] it was firſt called Sataros. Some ſay it had its name Patara from Patarus, the ſon of Apollo; Ptolomy Philadelphus, king of Egypt having enlarged it, called it after his ſiſter's name Arſinoe. How long the Apoſtle ſtaid in this place is not known, nor whether he preached here, nor if he did, what ſucceſs he had: in the ſecond century, the ſtatues of Jupiter and Apollo were in this place: in the fourth century, there was a church here, and a biſhop of it: and in the ſixth century, a biſhop of the church at Patara was in the fifth ſynod at Rome and Conſtantinople: and in the eighth century, Anaſtaſius, biſhop of this place, was in the Nicene ſynod [k].

Ver. 2. And finding a ſhip ſailing over unto Phenicia, &c.] For it ſeems that the ſhip they went aboard at Aſſos, ch. xx. 13. went no further, at leaſt in the way the Apoſtle was going, than Patara; but lighting on another ſhip, which was bound for Phœnicia, for the city of Tyre, which bordered on the land of Iſrael, and indeed originally belonged to Canaan; ſee chap. xi. 19. we went aboard; the ſaid ſhip: and ſet forth; on the voyage.

Ver. 3. Now when we had diſcovered Cyprus, &c.] An iſland, as the Syriac verſion here calls it, which lay between Syria and Cilicia; ſee the note on ch. iv. 36. and was, according to R. Benjamin [l], four days ſail from Rhodes, before mentioned: we left it on the left hand, and ſailed into Syria; that part of it called Phœnicia: and landed at Tyre; the chief city of Phœnicia, famous for navigation and commerce: it ſtood about four furlongs diſtant from the ſhore, and was joined to the continent by Alexander the great [m]. The account Jerom [n] gives of it is this, "Tyre the metropolis of Phœnicia in the tribe of Nephthalim, is near twenty miles from Ceſarea Philippi; this was formerly an iſland, but made continent land by Alexander:—its chief excellency lies in ſhell-fiſh and purple." It was a very ancient city, tho' it ſeems not ſo ancient as Sidon, from whence it was diſtant about two hundred furlongs. Herodotus [o] ſays, that in his time it had been inhabited two thouſand three hundred years; Hiram was king of it in Solomon's time; yea, mention is made of it in Joſhua's time, if the text in Joſh. xix. 29. is rightly tranſlated: ſome ſay it was built ſeventy-ſix years before the deſtruction of Troy. It is to be diſtinguiſhed into old Tyre, which was deſtroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and the iſland of Tyre which was conquered by Alexander, and new Tyre annexed by him to the continent. In the Hebrew language it is called צור, Tzur or Tzor, which ſignifies a rock, being built on one; tho' ſome think it has its name from צהור, Tzehor, which ſignifies brightneſs; it is now called Sur or Suri, and is quite deſolate, being only a receptacle of thieves and robbers: tho' R. Benjamin ſays, in his time, new Tyre was a very good city, and had a port within it, into which ſhips go between two towers; and that there were in it four hundred Jews, and ſome of them ſkilful in the Talmud;—who further obſerves, that if any one aſcended the walls of new Tyre, he might ſee Tyre the crowning city, Iſ. xxiii. 8. which was a ſtone's caſt from the new; but if a man would go in a boat on the ſea, he might ſee towers, ſtreets, and palaces in the bottom [p]: for there the ſhip was to unlade her burden; which ſhe had taken in, in the ports where ſhe had been, but where is not certain; for that ſhe had been at Epheſus, and took in her lading there, as Grotius thinks, does not appear; ſince this was not the ſhip the Apoſtle and his company ſailed in from Miletus, but which they went aboard at Patara, ver. 1, 2.

Ver. 4. And finding diſciples, &c.] At Tyre, for the Goſpel had been preached in Phenicia by the miniſters of the word, who were ſcattered by the perſecution raiſed at the death of Stephen; and here were brethren, ſuch as had believed in Chriſt, embraced and profeſſed his Goſpel, and were baptized in his name; ſee chap. xi. 19. and xv. 3. and who alſo had extraordinary gifts, as appears by what follows; and there was no doubt a Goſpel-church founded in this place, tho' who preſided over it in the firſt century, we have no account; in the ſecond century there was a church here, and Caſſius was biſhop of it [q]; in the third century there were ſome martyrs in this place, who ſuffered under Diocleſian, and bore innumerable ſtripes with great courage and conſtancy, and after that fought with beaſts, as bears, leopards, boars, and bulls, and at the ſame time Tyrannio, biſhop of this church, alſo ſuffered martyrdom [r]; in the fourth century there was a ſynod at Tyre under Conſtantine, to which he wrote a letter [s]. There was a biſhop of this church preſent at the council of Nice, in the times of the ſaid emperor; in this age Paulinus and Dorotheus were biſhops of Tyre; in the fifth century Irenæus was biſhop of Tyre, and then it was the metropolitan of Phœnicia; and in the ſixth century, there was a biſhop of the ſame church preſent at the fifth council of Rome and Conſtantinople [t]. Of the biſhops of Tyre in the ſeveral centuries, the learned Reland [u] gives a more particular account; according to him, Caſſius, biſhop of this church, was in the ſynod held at Ceſarea, about the year 198. Paulinus, another biſhop of Tyre, was in another council held at the ſame place, in the year 318. Zeno ſubſcribed in the council of Nice, in the year 325. the firſt among the biſhops of Phœnicia; Vitalis was in the council at Sardica, in the year 347. Uranius ſubſcribed in the council held at Seleucia by the Semiarians, in the year 359. another Zeno biſhop of this church was preſent at the ſecond council at Conſtantinople, in the year 381. and mention is made of Photius biſhop of Tyre, in the acts of the Chalcedon council, held in the year 451. as is alſo Euſebius in the acts of the council at Conſtantinople, in the year 553. we tarried there ſeven days; either waiting for a ſhip to proceed on further; or in choice, to enjoy the converſation of the diſciples, which was very delightful, and to confirm them in the faith: who ſaid to Paul thro' the Spirit, that he ſhould not go up to Jeruſalem; not that the Spirit of God in theſe perſons contradicted his own impulſe in the Apoſtle, by which he was moved to go to Jeruſalem, chap. xx. 22. The ſenſe is, that theſe diſciples, by the ſpirit of prophecy, knew that if the Apoſtle went to Jeruſalem, many evil things would befall him; wherefore of their own ſpirit, and out of love to him, they adviſe him not to go.

Ver. 5. And when we had accompliſhed thoſe days, &c.] The ſeven days before mentioned: we departed and went our way; from their quarters where they lodged, or from ſome one houſe of the diſciples, where they met and had converſed together: and they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city; that is, the diſciples, even all of them that dwelt in that city, with their whole families, their wives and children, accompanied the Apoſtle and thoſe that were with him, thro' the ſtreets of the city of Tyre, till they came out of it to the ſhore, where lay the ſhip they were to go aboard; and which was a mark of their affection and reſpect to the Apoſtle, as well as a token of their publick ſpirit, that they were not aſhamed of Chriſt and his miniſters, nor of their profeſſion of the Goſpel: and we kneeled down on the ſhore and prayed; which was agreeable to the cuſtom of the Jews, who had, as Tertullian obſerves [w], their orationes littorales, their prayers at the ſea-ſhore; ſee the note on chap. xvi. 13.

Ver. 7. And when we had finiſhed our courſe from Tyre, &c.] Or ſailed from thence, we came to Ptolemais; the Syriac verſion calls it, Aco or Acu; and the Arabic verſion, Aca; and Ptolemais according to Pliny[x] and Harpocratian[y], was called Ace. Frequent mention is made of Aco in the Jewiſh writings, and which according to them was a ſea-port, for they ſpeak of נמלה דעכו, the port of Aco[z], and of כיפי דעכו, the banks of Aco[a], or its rocks: it was upon the borders of the land of Iſrael, and in the tribe of Aſher to the north of it; part of it they ſay was without the land, and part of it within[b]: according to R. Benjamin, it was one day's ſail from Tyre, and who alſo ſays, it was upon the borders of Aſher, and had a very ſpacious port[c]; it is ſaid to be about two and thirty miles from Tyre; between that and Tyre, the ſhore was full of heaps of ſand, from whence the ſand that glaſs is made of was fetched; it is mentioned with Tyre, Sidon, and Galilee, in 1 Maccab. v. 15. it had the mountainous part of Galilee on the eaſt, the ladder of Tyre on the north, and mount Carmel on the ſouth, and thus it is deſcribed by Joſephus[d]: "Ptolemais is a "city of Galilee on the ſea-coaſt, built in a large "champaign country, but is ſurrounded with "mountains, on the eaſt with the mountains of "Galilee ſixty furlongs off; on the ſouth with "Carmel, diſtant a hundred and twenty furlongs; "on the north with a very high mountain called "the Climax, or ladder of the Tyrians, which is a "hundred furlongs from it; two miles from the "city runs a very ſmall river called Beleus, near "which is the ſepulchre of Memnon, taking up the "ſpace of an hundred cubits, and is worthy of admiration; it is round and hollow, (i. e. the river) "caſting up glaſſy ſand, which ſhips in great "numbers come and take up, and the place is "filled up again." The account Jerom[e] gives of it is, "Ptolemais a maritime city in Judea near mount "Carmel, which was formerly called ſo from one "Ptolomy;" from Ptolomy king of Egypt: it was called Ace or Aco, from its being a city of merchandiſe; tho' ſome ſay it was ſo called from Hercules being healed of the bite of a ſerpent, by an herb which grew near the river Beleus. It is now called St. John de Acra or Acri: and ſaluted the brethren; that were at Ptolemais or Aco; for the Goſpel had been preached here with ſucceſs; ſome had believed and profeſſed it, and very likely were in a church-ſtate; for there was a church here in the ſecond century, and Clarus was biſhop of it; and in the beginning of the fourth century, there was a biſhop preſent in the ſynod at Nice, and in the fifth century there was a church here; in the time of Arcadius the emperor, Antiochus was biſhop of Ptolemais, a very eloquent man, called therefore by ſome Chryſoſtom; in the ſixth century there was a biſhop of this church, who aſſiſted at the ſynod held both at Rome and Conſtantinople[f]. The biſhops of this church are reckoned up, as Reland[g] ſays, as he found them thus; Clarus, who was in the council at Ceſarea held in the year 198. Æneas who was in the council at Nice, in the year 325. and in another at Antioch, in the year 341. Nectabus who ſubſcribed in the firſt council at Conſtantinople, held in the year 381. Paulus who was preſent in the Chalcedon council in the year 451, and Joannes, who was in the council at Jeruſalem, in the year 536. and perhaps theſe brethren might be Jews, ſince thoſe who firſt preached the Goſpel in Phenicia preached only to Jews; and certain it is that there were many in this place; we often read of Jewiſh doctors here, as R. Tanchum the ſon of R. Chaja a man of Caphar Aco[h], and R. Simeon ben Judah a man of Caphar Aco[i], and R. Aba of Aco[k], and R. Judah ben Gamdah[l]; and in R. Benjamin's time, there were about two hundred Jews in this place[m]: theſe brethen Paul and his company viſited, and ſaluted them; and abode with them one day; conferring together about ſpiritual things, and employing their time, no doubt in religious exerciſes.

Ver. 8. And the next day we that were of Paul's company departed, &c.] From Ptolemais, as Sopater, Ariſtarchus, Secundus, Timotheus, Tychicus, Trophimus, and Luke the writer of this hiſtory; ſee chap. xx. 4. and came unto Ceſarea; not Ceſarea Philippi, mentioned in Matt. xvi. 13. but that Ceſarea which was formerly called Strato's tower, and was a very good ſea-port; ſee chap. viii. 40. and ix. 30. and x. 1. and xviii. 22. and we entered into the houſe of Philip the Evangeliſt; not a writer of a Goſpel, but a preacher of the Goſpel, and perhaps not an ordinary one, but was one of thoſe ſpoken of in Epheſ. iv. 11. which was an office inferior to an Apoſtle, and yet above an ordinary paſtor and teacher; this man very likely was the ſame that taught in Samaria, and baptized the Eunuch, and who after that ſettled at Ceſarea; ſee chap. viii. 40. which was one of the ſeven; of the ſeven deacons of the church at Jeruſalem, chap. vi. 5. and abode with him; ſo long as they continued at Ceſarea.

Ver. 9. And the ſame man had four daughters, &c.] So that he was a married man, which may be obſerved againſt the Papiſts, who forbid marriage to eccleſiaſticks: and they were, virgins; not under any vow of virginity, but they had not as yet changed their ſtate of life, and were pure and incorrupt: which did propheſy; not explain and interpret ſcripture, or preach in publick aſſemblies; for this were not allowed women, neither in the Jewiſh ſynagogues, nor in chriſtian aſſemblies; but they were endowed with a gift of foretelling future events, as was promiſed ſuch ſhould have in Goſpel times, Joel ii. 28.

Ver. 10. And as we tarried there many days, &c.] How many days is not ſaid, it could not be very many, if the Apoſtle got to Jeruſalem by Pentecoſt, as he deſired, chap. xx. 6, 15, 16. and xxi. 4, 7. there came down from Judea a certain prophet named Agabus; of whom mention is made in chap. xi. 28. who is there ſaid to come from Jeruſalem, to Antioch, and here from Judea to Ceſarea; he had been many years going about from place to place propheſying, for between that and this account muſt be a ſpace of about ſixteen or ſeventeen years.

Ver. 11. And when he was come unto us, &c.] In Philip's houſe: he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet; and ſo propheſied by types and ſymbols, and geſtures, as the prophets of old did; as Iſaiah in ch. xx. 2, 3. and Jeremiah, in ch. xiii. 1—9. and xxvii. 2, 3. and Ezekiel, in ch. iv. 1—13. and xii. 3, 7. and Hoſea, in ch. i. 2, 3. ſome underſtand this of his binding Paul's hands and feet, but it ſeems rather to deſign his own: and ſaid, thus ſaith the Holy Ghoſt; who was in Agabus, and ſpoke by him, and foretold ſome things to come to paſs; and which did come to paſs, and is a proof of the foreknowledge, and ſo of the deity of the bleſſed Spirit: ſo ſhall the Jews at Jeruſalem bind the man that owns this girdle; meaning Paul, and who accordingly was bound in like manner, a very little time after this; ſee ver. 33. and ſhall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles; the Romans, as they afterwards did.

Ver. 12. And when we heard theſe things, &c.] Theſe prophecies, concerning the binding of the Apoſtle by the Jews, and the delivery of him to the Romans, and ſaw the ſymbolical repreſentations of theſe things: both we; the companions of the Apoſtle, Luke and the reſt: and they of that place; of Ceſarea, Philip and his daughters, and the diſciples that lived there: beſought him not to go up to Jeruſalem; which was an inſtance of weakneſs in them, though an expreſſion of their affection to the Apoſtle; in the diſciples of Ceſarea it might ariſe from pure love to him, and a concern for his ſafety, and the continuance of his uſeful life; and in his companions it might be owing, partly to their ſincere love to him, and partly to the fear of danger which they themſelves might conclude they ſhould be expoſed to; and this requeſt was made with tears, as is evident from what follows.

Ver. 13. Then Paul anſwered, what mean ye to weep, &c.] For they were crying about him, both his companions and the diſciples of Ceſarea; which affected him, and gave him great uneaſineſs, even more than the prophecies of Agabus did: and to break my heart? for though he was reſolved to go to Jeruſalem, and nothing could move him from it, his heart was firm as a rock; there was no ſhaking him, or making impreſſions upon him that way; yet their tears and importunity greatly afflicted him, and the more becauſe he could by no means comply with their requeſt: for I am ready not to be bound only, but to die at Jeruſalem for the name of the Lord Jeſus; for as yet, he knew not but he ſhould die there; it was revealed to him that he ſhould be bound there, but it was not yet ſuggeſted to him where he ſhould ſuffer death, whether there or elſewhere; and ſince he knew not but it might be there, he was ready for it; bonds were ſo far from diſtreſſing his mind, and deterring him from his intended journey, that death itſelf could not do it; which ſhowed great intrepidity, courage, and firmneſs of mind.

Ver. 14. And when he would not be perſuaded, &c.] But was determined to go to Jeruſalem at all events; we ceaſed; both from tears and arguments: ſaying, the will of the Lord be done; which was right, and to which they ought to have ſubmitted, and acquieſced in at firſt, without uſing any arguments to have diſſuaded the Apoſtle from going to Jeruſalem; ſince they might have concluded from Agabus's prophecy, that it was the will of the Lord he ſhould go thither, and be bound; and the revelation was made to him, not to deter him from it, and to take methods for his own ſafety, which his friends would have put him upon, but to acquaint him with the will of God, and make him ſtill more certain of it, and to prepare for it, and this effect it had upon him. This will of the Lord, is not the will of the Lord revealed in his word, either reſpecting the ſalvation, ſanctification, and final perſeverance of the ſaints, which is always accompliſhed; for who hath reſiſted his will, or can reſiſt it, ſo as to fruſtrate his deſigns, or hinder theſe things taking place? or the duty which is to be performed by them, the good, perfect, and acceptable will of God, which every gracious ſoul deſires may be perfectly done, even as it is done in heaven: but here the ſecret will of God relating to the events of providence is deſigned, and which is the rule of all the divine proceedings; and though it is unknown to men, until facts make it appear, it is ever fulfilled, and ſometimes by perſons who have no regard to the revealed will of God; and ſhould be continually thought of; and every thing that is determined, or attempted to be done, ſhould be reſolved upon, and undertaken in ſubmiſſion to it; and whilſt it is performing ſhould be patiently bore, even in things not ſo agreeable to the minds and wills of men: it becomes ſaints to be ſtill and acquieſce in it, when things are not ſo well with them in ſpiritual affairs as to be wiſhed for; and when their worldly circumſtances are not ſo thriving and flouriſhing; yea, though they may be attended with much poverty and meanneſs, and be reduced to ſo low a condition as Job was; as alſo when they part with their near and dear friends and relations by death, and with the miniſters of the Goſpel, who have been their ſpiritual fathers, inſtructors, and comforters; and even when they are called to ſuffer in the ſevereſt manner, for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel: not that they are to be indolent, unconcerned, and unaffected, with things of this nature; nor ſhould they neglect the means of having things otherwiſe with them; but it becomes them to exerciſe patience, faith, and courage, under every diſpenſation of providence; as knowing that what is done by the Lord, is done well and wiſely, and is for the good of them; and when the people of God are helped to act ſuch a part, they are the moſt comfortable in themſelves, and to all that are about them; ſuch a ſpirit and diſpoſition is very commendable, and what makes men like to Chriſt, who in the moſt diſagreeable circumſtances, ſubmitted his will to his Father's. Beza's ancient copy reads, the will of God; and ſo the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions.

Ver. 15. And after thoſe days we took up our carriages, &c.] Or prepared themſelves, both for their journey, and for whatever trials and exerciſes they were to meet with; they took up their bundles, which hitherto were brought by ſea, and now put them upon beaſts, going by land from Ceſarea: and went up to Jeruſalem; which ſtood on higher ground, and was, as Joſephus[n] ſays, ſix hundred furlongs, or ſeventy-five miles diſtant.

Ver. 16. There went with us alſo certain of the diſciples of Ceſarea, &c.] Members of the church at Ceſarea; of the church here, ſee the note on ch. x. 48. To which may be added, the account of the paſtors or biſhops of this church, as given by Reland[o]; Theophilus, who was in the council held at Ceſarea, in the year 198; Agricola, who ſubſcribed in the council at Ancyra, in the year 314;

though ſome, he ſays, do not acknowledge this Agricola, but give the order of them after Theophilus thus; Theoctiſtus, Domnus, Theotecnus, Agapius, Euſebius; which laſt was in the council at Paleſtine, in the year 318, and in the council at Nice in the year 325. Acacius ſucceeded him, and was in a little council at Seleucia, in the year 359, and in another at Antioch in the year 363. Thalaſſius ſubſcribed in the council at Conſtantinople, in the year 381. Eulogius, or perhaps Euzoius, was in the council at Dioſpolis, in the year 415. Glyco biſhop of this church, ſubſcribed by Zozimus in the Chalcedon council, held in the year 451. Mention is made of Irenæus, who preſided over it in the acts of the ſame council; and Elias, another biſhop of it, ſubſcribed in the council at Jeruſalem, in the year 536; and there is an account of John biſhop of this church, in the acts of the council at Conſtantinople, in the year 553. And brought with them one Mnaſon of Cyprus; the name of Mnaſon is Greek; there was one of this name among the diſciples of Ariſtotle, who was of Phocea, or Phocis, a place in Greece [p]; and another called Mnaſeon, which ſeems to be the ſame whom Ammonius [q] makes mention of; and we frequently read of Mnaſeas, the name of an author in Greek writers, and Mneſtheus, in 2 Maccab. iv. 21. all which are ſo called from remembrance, and ſignify one that has a memory, is mindful of, and remembers things; ſo Zachariah with the Jews, is a name that is taken from remembrance, as this: ſome copies read Jaſſon, for Mnaſon. This Mnaſon was an old diſciple; not of Ariſtotle, or of his ſect of philoſophers, or any other, but of Jeſus Chriſt; probably he might have ſeen Chriſt in the fleſh, and he is by ſome thought to be one of the ſeventy diſciples; or at leaſt he might be one of thoſe who became diſciples and followers of Chriſt, through the miniſtry of Paul and Barnabas in that iſland, ch. xiii. 4. though that ſeems ſcarcely long enough ago, being but fifteen years before this time, to denominate him an old diſciple: with whom we ſhould lodge; when come to Jeruſalem; for though he was of the iſland of Cyprus, as Barnabas was, ch. iv. 36. yet he dwelt at Jeruſalem; and if he was one of the ſeventy diſciples, it ſhould ſeem that he had not ſold his houſe at Jeruſalem, when others did; nor did all that had houſes and land, nor were they obliged to do it; or he might have bought or hired one ſince; however, he had one at Jeruſalem; and here the Apoſtle and his company were fixed to lodge, during their ſtay there; and there was the more reaſon to provide for a lodging at this time, becauſe of the feaſt of pentecoſt, when the city was full of people: unleſs this is to be underſtood of any place by the way, where they ſhould lodge; ſince Beza's ancient copy adds, and coming to a certain village, we were with one Mnaſon.

Ver. 17. And when we were come to Jeruſalem, &c.] That is, Paul and his companions, attended with the diſciples of Ceſarea, and Mnaſon the old diſciple with them: the brethren received us gladly; readily, willingly, and chearfully; they did not treat them with an air of coldneſs and indifference, or look ſhy of them, or ſhew any reſentment to them, notwithſtanding the various reports which had been brought them, concerning the miniſtry of the Apoſtle among the Gentiles.

Ver. 18. And the day following, &c.] After they were come into Jeruſalem: Paul went in with us to James; not the ſon of Zebedee and brother of John, for he was killed by Herod ſome years ago; but James the ſon of Alpheus, and brother of our Lord, who preſided over this church; it ſeems there were no other Apoſtles now at Jeruſalem, but they were all diſperſed abroad that were living, preaching the Goſpel in the ſeveral parts of the world: Paul took the firſt opportunity of paying a viſit to James, very likely at his own houſe, to give him an account of his ſucceſs among the Gentiles, and to know the ſtate of the church at Jeruſalem, and confer with him about what might be moſt proper and ſerviceable to promote the intereſt of Chriſt; and he took with him thoſe who had been companions with him in his travels, partly to ſhow reſpect to James, and partly to be witneſſes of what he ſhould relate unto him: and all the elders were preſent; by whom are meant, not the ancient private members of the church, but the miniſters of the word in this church; who hearing of the coming of the Apoſtle, and of his viſit to James, aſſembled together to ſee him, and converſe with him.

Ver. 19. And when he had ſaluted them, &c.] James and the elders with him; which was either done by a kiſs, as the Arabic verſion adds; or by aſking of their health, and wiſhing a continuance of it, and all proſperity to attend them: the Ethiopic verſion reads, they ſaluted him; and no doubt the ſalutations were recipocral: he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his miniſtry; it is very likely that this account begins where that ends, which he had delivered in the preſence of James, and others, ſome years ago, ch. xv. 12. and takes in all his travels and miniſtry, and the ſucceſs of it; not only in Syria, Cilicia, and Lycaonia, after he had ſet out from Antioch again, but in Macedonia, Achaia, and Aſia; as at Philippi, Theſſalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, Epheſus, and elſewhere: he declared what multitudes of ſouls were converted, and what numbers of churches were planted; and this he aſcribes not to himſelf, but to the power and grace of God, which had attended his miniſtry; he was only an inſtrument, God was the efficient, and ought to have the glory.

Ver. 20. And when they heard it, &c.] The narrative, of the wonderful ſpread of the Goſpel among the Gentiles, and the numerous converſions of them: they glorified the Lord; or God, as the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions read; as Paul aſcribed all to God, ſo they give the glory of it to him, and in this they were both agreed: and ſaid unto him; perhaps James in the name of them all, and as their mouth: thou ſeeſt, brother; for ſo he was to James, both as a believer, and a miniſter of the word, and as an Apoſtle: how many thouſands of Jews there are which believe; there were many thouſands converted at Jeruſalem upon the firſt preaching of the Goſpel, after Chriſt's aſcenſion; ſee ch. ii. 41, 47. and iv. 4. and v. 14. and vi. 7. and the number might be much increaſed ſince; though it may be, that reference is had not only to the number of the members of the church at Jeruſalem, but to all the believing Jews in Judea, who were now come up to Jeruſalem, to keep the feaſt of pentecoſt; ſince it is in the Greek, how many myriads there are, and one myriad contains ten thouſand: and they are all zealous of the law; of the law of Moſes, of the ceremonial law, as Paul might ſee by their being at Jeruſalem, to keep this feaſt; for though they believed in Jeſus of Nazareth as the true Meſſiah, yet they had not light enough to ſee, that he was the ſum and ſubſtance of all the ceremonies of the law, and that they all ended in him; and therefore were zealous in the obſervance of them, and could not bear to hear of their abrogation.

[p] Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 19.

[q] περι ομοιων in voce Nereides.

Ver. 21. And they are informed of thee, &c.] By perſons that came from the ſeveral parts of the Gentile world, where the Apoſtle had been preaching; and by letters which came from the Jews in thoſe parts, who were no friends to the Apoſtle's miniſtry: that thou teacheſt all the Jews which are among the Gentiles, to forſake Moſes: or apoſtatize from Moſes, that is, the law of Moſes; that he taught the Gentiles not to regard the rituals of the law of Moſes gave them no uneaſineſs; but that he ſhould teach the Jews that were ſcattered among the Gentiles, and as many of them that believed in Chriſt, to diſregard and drop the obſervance of them, who had been always brought up in them, this they could not bear; and that the Apoſtle ſo taught, they had credible information: particularly, ſaying, that they ought not to circumciſe their children; though this does not appear; it is true the Apoſtle taught that circumciſion was aboliſhed, and that it was nothing; yea, that to ſubmit to it as neceſſary to ſalvation, was hurtful and pernicious; but as a thing indifferent, he allowed of it among weak brethren; and in condeſcenſion to their weakneſs, did adminiſter it himſelf; in which he became a Jew to the Jew, that he might gain ſome: neither to walk after the cuſtoms; either of the law of Moſes, meaning other rites there enjoined, beſides circumciſion; or of their fathers, and their country, the traditions of the elders, which as yet they had not got clear of; the diſuſe of old cuſtoms is not eaſily brought about, or it is not eaſy to bring perſons off of them.

Ver. 22. What is it therefore? &c.] Is it true or no? or what muſt be done in this caſe? what method muſt be taken to remove theſe objections, and reconcile the minds of the people? the multitude muſt needs come together; either the whole church at Jeruſalem, or the great confluence of people, even of believing Jews, that were come from all parts thither; there's no hindering of their coming together, to ſee the Apoſtle, and to hear what he has to ſay to the objections againſt him, and complaints of him: for they will hear that thou art come; this can never be kept a ſecret, and as ſoon as they hear it, they'll flock in great numbers; they'll come open mouthed, and be loud in their complaints, and it will be difficult to pacify them; there is danger in the caſe, the conſequence may be bad; and therefore ſomething muſt be done, to remove the opinion they had formed of the Apoſtle, and the prejudice they had entertained againſt him; and therefore what follows is adviſed to.

Ver. 23. Do therefore this that we ſay to thee, &c.] This is ſaid not as commanding, but as adviſing; and not to what was a duty, and neceſſary to be done as ſuch, but as a point of prudence: we have four men which have a vow on them; that is, there were four men who were of the church at Jeruſalem, believers in Chriſt, but weak ones, who were zealous of the law, and bigots to it, and who had voluntarily vowed a vow of the Nazarites; ſee Numb. vi. 2.

Ver. 24. Them take, and purify thyſelf with them, &c.] That is, join thyſelf to them, make one of their number, and attend to the rules preſcribed to a Nazarite, who is to be holy to the Lord; and in caſe of any ceremonial uncleanneſs, is to be cleanſed, or purified in the manner directed, Numb. vi. 5, 8, 9. And be at charges with them; join with them in the expence, for the offerings to be made at the end of the vows, or when the days of ſeparation are fulfilled, Numb. vi. 13, 14, 15. That they may ſhave their heads; according to the law in Numb. vi. 18. This was done in, לשכת הנזירים the chamber of the Nazarites [r]; for there the Nazarites boiled their peace-offerings, and ſhaved their hair, and put it under the pot, in the fire that was under it: Maimonides ſays [s], "if he ſhaved in the city it was excuſable; "but whether he ſhaved in the city or in the ſanctuary, under the pot his hair muſt be caſt; and "he did not ſhave until the door of the court was "opened, as it is ſaid, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, Numb. vi. 18. not that he "ſhaved over againſt the door, for that would be a "contempt of the ſanctuary." Moreover, it may be obſerved, that a perſon who had not made a vow, or fulfilled a Nazariteſhip himſelf, which was the Apoſtle's caſe, yet he might join in bearing the expences of others, at the time of their ſhaving and cleanſing: for ſo run the Jewiſh canons [t]; "he that ſays upon me be the ſhaving of a Nazarite, he is bound to bring the offerings of ſhaving "for purification, and he may offer them by the "hand of what Nazarite he pleaſes; he that ſays "upon me be half the offerings of a Nazarite, or "if he ſays upon me be half the ſhaving of a Nazarite, he brings half the offerings by what Nazarite he will, and that Nazarite perfects his offerings out of that which is his." That all may know that thoſe things whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; that there is no truth in them; that they are mere lies and calumnies; as they will eaſily judge by this ſingle inſtance, in complying with the law concerning a Nazarite's vow: but that thou thyſelf walkeſt orderly, and keepeſt the law; and therefore can never be thought to teach others to walk diſorderly, or to neglect the law, the rites and cuſtoms of it.

Ver. 25. As touching the Gentiles which believe, &c.] This is ſaid, to ſhew that the Jews were not offended with Paul, for not inſiſting upon the circumciſion of the believing Gentiles, and their conformity to the ceremonial law; and to remove an objection that Paul might make, that ſhould he comply with this advice, and the believing Gentiles ſhould hear of it, it might be a ſtumbling-block and a ſnare to them; who by his example, might think themſelves obliged to regard the law: Beza's ancient copy adds, they have nothing to ſay to thee; for as it follows, we have written and concluded; ſome years ago, at a meeting of the Apoſtles, elders, and brethren at Jeruſalem, when Paul was preſent; and of which he reminds him, to prevent any objection of this kind; where it was unanimouſly agreed on and determined, that they obſerve no ſuch things; as circumciſion, and other rites and cuſtoms of the law, and particularly the vow of the Nazarite, which Gentiles are free from: hence it is ſaid [u], "Gentiles have no Nazariteſhip;" upon which one of the commentators ſays [w], if a Gentile vows Nazariteſhip, the law of the Nazarite does not fall upon him, he is not obliged to it: ſave only that they keep themſelves from things offered to idols, &c. ſee Acts xv. 19, 20, 28, 29.

Ver. 26. Then Paul took the men, &c.] The four men that had the vow on them; he joined himſelf to them, and put himſelf in the ſame condition, and under a like vow: this he did, not as what he thought himſelf bound to do in obedience to the law, and much leſs as neceſſary to ſalvation; but to ſatisfy weak minds, and remove their prejudices, that he might gain them, and be uſeful to them; and in ſuch a caſe he would very eaſily and readily condeſcend; but when ſuch like things were inſiſted upon as points of duty, and eſpecially when urged as neceſſary to ſalvation, no one more ſtifly oppoſed them: and the next day purifying himſelf with them; that is, not ſeparating himſelf along with them, from what they were obliged by the vow of the Nazarite, as from drinking of wine and ſhaving, and from every thing that was unclean by the law; for this was now done, but cleanſing himſelf afterwards with them: he entered into the temple, to ſignify the accompliſhment of the days of the purification; the ſenſe is, that when the days of ſeparation were fulfilled, which the four men had vowed, as every one might vow what time he pleaſed, he went to the prieſts in the temple, to ſignify it to them, that the time of their purification was expiring: until that an offering ſhould be offered for every one of them; as the law directs in Numb. vi. 13—20. when he propoſed to pay the charges of it, or at leaſt part of it.

Ver. 27. And when the ſeven days were almoſt ended, &c.] The Syriac verſion renders it, when the ſeventh day was come; from the time that Paul came to Jeruſalem: ſome underſtand this of the ſeven weeks from the paſſover to pentecoſt, and that it was when they were almoſt ended, and the day of pentecoſt was at hand, for which Paul came up to Jeruſalem; but rather, the ſeven days of purification of the Nazarites are meant: the Jews which were of Aſia; and it may be chiefly of Epheſus, the metropolis of Aſia; who knew Paul there, and were his implacable enemies; for this is to be underſtood of the unbelieving Jews, who were come up to the feaſt of pentecoſt: when they ſaw him in the temple; where he was come to bring his offering, on account of his vow: ſtirred up all the people; againſt the Apoſtle; incenſed them with ſtories about him, how that he was an oppoſer of Moſes and his laws, and was now defiling the temple, by bringing in heathens into it: and laid hands on him; in a violent manner, and dragged him out of the temple.

Ver. 28. Crying out, men of Iſrael, help, &c.] the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions read, help us; to hold Paul, on whom they had laid their hands, and to aſſiſt in beating him: but why ſuch an outcry for help againſt a ſingle man, and he but little of ſtature, and weak in body, and ſo eaſily held and overpowered? it may be they choſe to engage others with them, to give the greater countenance to their actions, and for their own ſecurity and protection, ſhould they be oppoſed or called to an account; this is the man that teacheth all men every where againſt the people; the people of the Jews, ſaying that they were not the only people of God; that God was the God of the Gentiles, as well as of the Jews; that God had choſen, and called, and ſaved ſome of the one, as well as of the other; that the Gentiles ſhared in the favour of God, and the bleſſings of the Meſſiah; that the Goſpel was to be preached to them, and a people taken out of them for his glory; and that the people of the Jews would be rejected for their unbelief and impenitence, and in a little time utterly deſtroyed as a nation; which and the like, theſe Aſiatic Jews interpreted as ſpeaking againſt them; whereas no man had a ſtronger natural affection for his countrymen, or a more eager and importunate deſire for their ſpiritual and eternal welfare, than the Apoſtle had: and the law; the law of Moſes, both moral and ceremonial; for they not only were diſpleaſed with him for aſſerting the abrogation of the latter, but traduced him as an enemy to the former; repreſenting him as an Antinomian, becauſe he denied juſtification to be by the works of the law, and aſſerted Chriſt to be the end of the law for righteouſneſs; whereas he was ſo far from making void the law hereby, that he eſtabliſhed it, and ſecured the rights and honours of it; yea, they went further, and repreſented him as a libertine, ſaying, let us do evil that good may come; but this was all calumny: and this place; meaning the temple, in which they then were; the Alexandrian copy reads, this holy place, as it is expreſſed in a following clauſe; the reaſon of this charge was, becauſe that he had taught, that the ſacrifices of God, were the ſacrifices of prayer and of praiſe, and that theſe were to be offered up in every place; and that divine ſervice and religious worſhip were not tied to the temple at Jeruſalem, but that agreeable to the doctrine of Chriſt, men might worſhip the Father any where, and lift up holy hands in every place; and perhaps he might have aſſerted, that the temple of Jeruſalem would be deſtroyed in a ſhort time, as Chriſt had predicted: and farther brought Greeks alſo unto the temple, and hath polluted this holy place; that part of the temple, which they ſuppoſed Paul had brought Greeks or Gentiles into, could not be the moſt holy place, for into that only the high-prieſt went once a year; nor that part of the holy place called the court of the prieſts, for into that only prieſts went, and other Iſraelites were not admitted, unleſs on ſome particular occaſions; as to lay hands on the ſacrifice, for the ſlaying of it, or waving ſome part of it[x]; but it muſt be either the court of the Iſraelites, or the court of the women, into which Paul, with the four men that had the vow, entered; and as Dr. Lightfoot thinks, it was the latter; for in the ſouth-eaſt of this court, was the Nazarites chamber, in which they boiled their peace-offerings, ſhaved their heads, and put the hair under the pot[y]: now though Gentiles might come into the mountain of the houſe, which was all the outmoſt circumambient ſpace within the wall, which incompaſſed the whole area, yet they might not come into any of theſe courts, no, nor even into what they call the Chel; for they ſay, that the Chel is more holy than the mountain of the houſe, becauſe no Gentile, or one defiled with the dead, enters there[z]; now the Chel was an incloſure before theſe courts, and at the entrance into it, pillars were erected, and upon them were inſcriptions in Greek and Latin, ſignifying that no ſtrangers ſhould enter into the holy place[a].

Ver. 29. For they had ſeen before with him in the city, &c.] Not of Epheſus, but of Jeruſalem: Trophimus an Epheſian; the ſame that is mentioned in ch. xx. 4. whom theſe Jews of Aſia, and who very probably were inhabitants of Epheſus, knew very well to be a Gentile: whom they ſuppoſed Paul had brought into the temple; for ſeeing him walk with the Apoſtle very familiarly through the ſtreets of Jeruſalem, they concluded from thence, that he took him with him into the temple, which was a very raſh and ill grounded concluſion; and which ſhows the malignity and virulence of their minds, and how ready they were to make uſe of any opportunity, and take up any occaſion againſt him, even a bare ſurmize, and which had no ſhew of probability in it; for it can never be thought, that while Paul was uſing methods to remove the prejudices of the Jews againſt him, he ſhould take ſuch a ſtep as this, to introduce a Gentile into the holy place, which he knew was unlawful, and would greatly irritate and provoke them.

[a] Joſeph. Antiqu. l. 15. c. 14. §. 5.

Ver. 30. And all the city was moved, and the people ran together, &c.] The outcry in the temple reached the ears of ſome that were without, and theſe alarmed others; ſo that the report of a diſturbance in the temple, ſoon went through the whole city, and brought people out of their houſes, who ran together in great numbers, to ſee what was the matter: and they took Paul and drew him out of the temple; as unworthy to be in that holy place; and that it might not be defiled with his blood; for their intention was nothing leſs, than to take away his life: and forthwith the doors were ſhut; not of themſelves, as if there was ſomething miraculous in it, as ſome have thought, but by the door-keepers, the Levites; and which might be done, partly to prevent Paul's returning into it for refuge at the horns of the altar, and partly to keep out the Gentiles from coming in, they were alarmed with.

Ver. 31. And as they went about to kill him, &c.] In the manner as zealots did, without bringing him before any court of judicature, without any charge, trial, and condemnation: tidings came unto the chief captain of the band; the Roman band of ſoldiers, who were placed near the temple, to keep the peace of the city, and perſons in order; and who were more eſpecially needful, at ſuch a time as the feaſt of pentecoſt, when there was ſuch a great concourſe of people in the city, and indeed always were in arms at ſuch times [b]; this chief captain was Claudius Lyſias, as appears from ch. xxiii. 26. to him the report of the diſturbance was brought; or as it is in the Greek text, the fame aſcended to him; who very likely might be in the tower of Antonia, which joined to the temple: that all Jeruſalem was in an uproar; or in confuſion, and therefore it became him, as a Roman officer, to take care to quell it, leſt it ſhould iſſue in ſedition and rebellion.

Ver. 32. Who immediately took ſoldiers and centurions, &c.] A very large number of ſoldiers, for they are called an army, in ch. xxiii. 27. with a ſufficient number of officers called centurions, who were each of them over an hundred men, to command them, and put them in order: and ran down unto them; from the tower to the temple, the outer part of it; perhaps the mountain of the houſe, where they had dragged Paul, and were beating him; hither the captain, with his officers and ſoldiers, came in great haſte; all which ſhows his vigilance, prudence, and quick diſpatch; and in which there was a remarkable appearance of divine providence in favour of the Apoſtle, who otherwiſe in all likelihood would have quickly loſt his life: and when they ſaw the chief-captain and the ſoldiers; coming down upon them in great haſte, with ſword in hand: they left beating of Paul; this beating was what the Jews call, מכות מרדות, the rebels beating; or beating, on account of rebellion and obſtinacy; and differed from whipping or ſcourging, which was done by the order of the Sanhedrim, and in meaſure with forty ſtripes ſave one; but this beating was without any order from a court of judicature, and was without meaſure and mercy: this was inflicted upon various offenders, particularly on ſuch who received not admonitions given them, or tranſgreſſed by doing what was forbidden by the words of the wiſe men [c]; or if any defiled perſon entered into the court of the women; and ſuch the people would fall upon at once, and beat them unmercifully with their fiſts, or with clubs and ſtaves, and which often iſſued in death; ſo for inſtance, when a prieſt miniſtered in his uncleanneſs, his brethren the prieſts did not bring him to the Sanhedrim, but the young prieſts brought him without the court, and daſhed his brains out with clubs [d].

Ver. 33. Then the chief captain came near, &c.] To the place where the Jews were beating Paul: and took him; the Arabic verſion adds, from them; he reſcued him out of their hands, as he himſelf ſays, ch. xxiii. 27. And commanded him to be bound with two chains; partly to appeaſe the people, and partly to ſecure Paul; who he ſuppoſed, had been guilty of ſome miſdemeanor, which had occaſioned this tumult; theſe two chains were put, one on one arm, and the other on the other arm; and were faſtened to two ſoldiers, who walked by him, having hold on thoſe chains, the one on his right-hand, and the other on his left; and thus Agabus's prophecy in ver. 11. was fulfilled: and demanded who he was; or aſked and enquired about him, who he was, of what nation he was, what was his character, buſineſs, and employment: this enquiry was made, either of the Apoſtle himſelf, or of the people; and ſo the Arabic verſion renders it, he enquired of them who he was; alſo and what he had done; what crime he had been guilty of, that they uſed him in ſuch a manner.

Ver. 34. And ſome cried one thing, and ſome another among the multitude, &c.] For though they agreed to beat him, and even to kill him, yet ſome of them knew not for what; being led by a blind zeal for Moſes, the law and temple, or rather by fury and madneſs: and when he could not know the certainty for the tumult; could not come at the truth of the matter, or any certain knowledge of it, not any thing that could be depended upon, becauſe of the noiſe of the people, and the different notes they were in: he commanded him to be carried into the caſtle; of Antonia, formerly called Baris, of which Joſephus [e] gives this account; “on the north ſide (of the wall) was built a four-ſquare tower, well fortified and ſtrong; this the kings and prieſts of the Aſmonæan race, who were before Herod, built and called it Baris; that there the prieſtly robe might be laid up by them, which the high-prieſt only wore, when he was concerned in divine ſervice:” this tower king Herod made more ſtrong, for the ſecurity and preſervation of the temple; and called it Antonia, for the ſake of Antony his friend, and the general of the Romans: the deſcription of it, as given by Dr. Lightfoot [f], which is collected by him out of Joſephus and other writers, is this; “upon the north ſide, and joining up to the weſtern angle (but on the outſide of the wall) ſtood the tower of Antonia, once the place where the high-prieſts uſed to lay up their holy garments; but in after times a garriſon of Roman ſoldiers, for the awing of the temple: when it ſerved for the former uſe, it was called Baris (it may be from בר, ad extra, becauſe it was an outer building) but when for the latter, it bare the name of Antonia; Herod the great, having ſumptuouſly repaired and called it after the name of the Roman prince Antony: it ſtood upon the north-weſt point of Moriah, and was a very ſtrong and a very large pile; ſo ſpacious a building with all “ its appurtenances, that it took up two furlongs compaſs; the rock it ſtood upon was fifty cubits high and ſteep, and the building itſelf was forty cubits above it; it was four ſquare, encompaſſed with a wall of three cubits high, which encloſed its courts, and had a turret at every corner, like the white tower at London; but that it was more ſpacious, and that the turrets were not all of an heighth; for thoſe at the north-eaſt and north-weſt corners were fifty cubits high, but thoſe on the ſouth-eaſt and ſouth-weſt were ſeventy cubits high, that they might fully overlook the temple: it had cloiſters or walks about it, and baths and lodgings, and large rooms in it; ſo that it was at once like a caſtle, and like a palace. There was a paſſage out of it, into the north and weſt cloiſters of the mountain of the houſe, and by that the Roman garriſon ſoldiers went down at every feſtival of the Jews, to take care againſt tumults and ſeditions, in thoſe great concourſes of the people.” And it was by this paſſage that the chief captain, with the centurions and ſoldiers, came down ſo quickly and ſuddenly upon the Jews, while they were beating Paul in the temple; and this caſtle being on ſuch an eminence as deſcribed, hence he with the ſoldiers is ſaid to run down, ver. 32. and it was in this way that the Apoſtle was had up to the caſtle.

Ver. 35. And when he came upon the ſtairs, &c.] Or ſteps, which led up to the caſtle; for it was built upon a very high place, as appears from the account of it in the preceding verſe; to which agrees what Ariſtæas [g] ſays of it in the following words; “ in order to have knowledge of all things, we went up to a caſtle adjoining to the city, which is ſituated in a very high place, fortified with very high towers, built with large ſtones, as we ſuppoſed for the preſervation of the places about the temple, if there ſhould be any lying in wait, or tumult, or enemies ſhould enter; ſo that none might be able to make way in at the walls about the temple; for in the towers of the caſtle lay very ſharp darts and various inſtruments, and the place was upon a very great eminence.” So it was that he was born of the ſoldiers for the violence of the people; the ſenſe is, either that the crowd of the people was ſo great, and they ſo preſſed upon Paul and the ſoldiers that conducted him, that he was even thrown upon them, and bore up by them; or elſe ſuch was the rage of the people againſt him, that the ſoldiers were obliged to take him up in their arms, and carry him, in order to ſecure him from being tore in pieces by them.

Ver. 36. For the multitude of the people followed after, &c.] The captain and the ſoldiers, who had taken away Paul from them, and were carrying him to the caſtle: crying, away with him; or take him away, that is, by death; or lift him up, upon the croſs, crucify him, crucify him, as they ſaid concerning Chriſt.

Ver. 37. And as Paul was to be led into the caſtle, &c.] Juſt as he was got up to the top of the ſteps, or ſtairs, that led up to the caſtle, and was about to go into the door of it: he ſaid unto the chief captain, may I ſpeak unto thee? the Apoſtle was one that had had a good education, and was a man of addreſs, and this his modeſt and reſpectful way of ſpeaking to the chief captain ſhows; and the queſtion he put to him, was in the Greek language: hence it follows, who ſaid to him, canſt thou ſpeak Greek? or doſt thou know the Helleniſtic language? which the Jews who were born and lived in Greece ſpoke; hence ſuch were called Helleniſts; ſee ch. vi. 1. of this language we read in the Talmud [h]; “ R. Levi bar Chajethah went to Ceſarea, and heard them reading Shema (hear O Iſrael, &c. Deut. vi. 4.) אלוניסתין, in the Helleniſtic language; he ſought to hinder them; R. Joſe heard of it, and was angry; and ſaid, he that knows not to read in the Hebrew language, muſt he not read at all? yea, he may read in whatſoever language he underſtands.” The neareſt to this language ſpoken by the Jews diſperſed in Greece, muſt be the Greek language, in which Jews have written; as the books of the Old Teſtament tranſlated by the ſeventy interpreters, who were Jews; and indeed it was this bible which the Jews called Helleniſts made uſe of; and the writings of Joſephus, and Philo the Jew of Alexandria, and even the books of the New Teſtament, which are written by Jews; and Paul being a Jew of Tarſus, and ſo an Helleniſt, could ſpeak this language; as he did, when he diſputed againſt the Helleniſts, in ch. ix. 29. This the chief captain ſaid, either as wondering to hear him ſpeak Greek, when he thought he had been a Jeruſalem Jew, or rather an Egyptian, as in the next verſe; or it may be he put this queſtion to him, as chuſing rather that he ſhould ſpeak in Greek, it being the language he might beſt underſtand himſelf, and was the leaſt known to the people, who he might not care ſhould hear what he had to ſay; ſince if he took him for the Egyptian, the Greek tongue was what was chiefly ſpoken by ſuch.

Ver. 38. Art thou not that Egyptian, which before theſe days madeſt an uproar, &c.] Joſephus ſpeaks [i] of one that came out of Egypt to Jeruſalem, and gave out that he was a prophet, and deceived the people, whom he perſuaded to follow him to the mount of Olives, where they ſhould ſee the walls of the city fall at his command, and ſo through the ruins of it they might enter into the city; but Felix the Roman governour fell upon them, killed four hundred, and took two hundred priſoners, and the Egyptian fled: the account which he elſewhere [k] gives of him, and Euſebius [l] from him, is this; a certain Egyptian falſe prophet, did much more miſchief to the Jews; for he being a magician, and having got himſelf to be believed as a prophet, came into the country (of Judea) and gathered together about thirty thouſand perſons, whom he had deceived; theſe he brought out of the wilderneſs to the mount of Olives, from thence deſigning to take Jeruſalem by force, and ſeize the Roman garriſon, and take the government of the people——but Felix prevented his deſign, meeting him with the Roman ſoldiers, aſſiſted by all the people; ſo that when they engaged, the Egyptian fled with a few, and moſt of thoſe that were with him, were deſtroyed or taken: now it was ſome little time before this, that this affair happened; and by theſe accounts of Joſephus, though the Egyptian was diſcomfited, yet he was not taken; he had made his eſcape, ſo that he might be yet in being; and therefore the captain could not tell but Paul might be he, who had privately got into the city, and was upon ſome bad deſigns: and leddeſt out into the wilderneſs four thouſand men that were murderers? Joſephus ſays, that he brought them out of the wilderneſs, or led them through it to the mount of Olives, from thence to ruſh into Jeruſalem, ruſalem, when the walls ſhould fall down at his command; but he ſays, the number of men that he led out, were about thirty thouſand; it may be at firſt there were no more than four thouſand, but afterwards were joined by others, and increaſed to thirty thouſand; or among theſe thirty thouſand, he had four thouſand murderers, or ſicarii; ſo called from the little ſwords which they carried under their cloaths, and with them killed men in the day time, in the middle of the city, eſpecially at the feaſts, when they mingled themſelves with the people [m].

Ver. 39. But Paul ſaid, I am a man which am a Jew of Tarſus, &c.] And not that Egyptian; he was not of that country, much leſs that man; but a Jew, both by birth and religion; he was born of Jewiſh parents, and brought up in the Jewiſh religion; though his native place was Tarſus, a city in Cilicia, where it is placed by Pliny [n], Ptolomy [o], and Mela [p]; and is by ſome thought to be the ſame with the Tarſhiſh of the Old Teſtament: a citizen of no mean city; Pliny [q] calls it a free city, and Solinus [r] ſays it is the mother, or chief of cities, and Curtius [s] ſpeaks of it as a very opulent one; which when Alexander drew near to with his army, the inhabitants of it ſet fire to, that he might not poſſeſs their riches; which he underſtanding, ſent Parmenio to prevent it: through this city, as the ſame hiſtorian, in agreement with Pliny and others, obſerves, ran the river Cydnus; and it being ſummertime when Alexander was here, and very hot weather, and being covered with duſt and ſweat, he put off his cloaths, and caſt himſelf into the river to waſh himſelf; but as ſoon as he was in, he was ſeized with ſuch a numbneſs of his nerves, that had he not been immediately taken out by his ſoldiers, and for the extraordinary care of his phyſician, he had at once expired. Joſephus [t] calls this city, the moſt famous of the cities in Cilicia; and derives it, and the whole country from Tarſhiſh, the grandſon of Japhet, Gen. x. 4. his words are, "Tharſus gave name to the Tharſians, for ſo Cilicia was "formerly called, of which this is an evidence; "for the moſt famous of the cities with them, and "which is the metropolis, is called Tarſus; Thetá "being changed into Tau for appellation ſake." Though ſome ſay it was built by Perſeus, the ſon of Jupiter and Danae, and called Tharſus, of the hyacinth-ſtone, which is ſaid to be found about it: others think it was ſo called, ϖαρα το τερσανθηναι, becauſe the places of this country were firſt dried up after the flood: it was not only a city of ſtately buildings, as it was repaired by Sardanapalus, and increaſed after the times of Alexander; but there was a famous academy in it, which for men of learning, exceeded Athens and Alexandria [u]; though theſe exceeded that in number of philoſophers: here it is thought lived Aratus the poet, from whom the Apoſtle cites a paſſage, in ch. xvii. 28. and of this place was the famous Chryſippus, who is called Ταρσευς, a Tarſian [w], as the Apoſtle is here. Hermogenes, a very celebrated rhetorician, ſome of whoſe works are ſtill extant, came from hence [x]. Jerom [y] reports it as a tradition, that the parents of the Apoſtle Paul were of Giſcalis, a town in Judea; which with the whole province being deſtroyed by the Romans, they removed to Tarſus, a city of Cilicia, whither Paul when a young man followed them; but certain it is, that the Apoſtle was born there, as he himſelf ſays, in ch. xxii. 3. Ignatius in [z] the ſecond century, writing to the church at Tarſus, calls them citizens and diſciples of Paul; citizens, becauſe he was of this city; and diſciples, becauſe of the ſame faith with him; and very likely the firſt materials of the church in this place, were converts of his; ſince it is evident, that he went hither after he was a preacher; ſee ch. ix. 30. and xi. 25. And I beſeech thee ſuffer me to ſpeak unto the people; firſt he deſired to ſpeak with the captain, and that was in order to obtain leave to ſpeak to the people; and which he aſks in a very handſome and ſubmiſſive manner, and hopes to have his requeſt granted him, ſince he was not the perſon he took him for, but was a Jew by birth, and a citizen of a very conſiderable Roman city; and was not a mean, ſordid, vagabond creature, nor need he fear that he would ſow any diſcord and ſedition among the people.

Ver. 40. And when he had given him licence, &c.] To ſpeak to the people, which he could not well deny him, after he had ſo freely declared who he was, and in ſo courteous a manner addreſſed him, and aſked leave of him: Paul ſtood on the ſtairs; on the ſteps of the aſcent to the caſtle, on the top of them: and beckened with the hand unto the people; to deſire ſilence, which he might be able to do, notwithſtanding his chains; for his being bound with a chain to a ſoldier, did not hinder the moving and lifting up of his hand: and when there was made a great ſilence; either through the authority of the captain, who might command it, or through the deſire of the people, to hear what he could ſay for himſelf: he ſpake unto them in the Hebrew tongue; which the people he ſpoke to beſt underſtood, and was his own mother tongue; the Alexandrian copy reads, in his own dialect; this was not pure Hebrew that was ſpoke in common in thoſe times, but the Syro Chaldean language: ſaying; as in the following chapter.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. MEN, brethren, and fathers, &c.] A common form of addreſs uſed by the Jews; ſee ch. vii. 2. but that the Apoſtle ſhould introduce his ſpeech to theſe people in this manner, after they had treated him ſo inhumanly, as to drag him out of the temple, and beat him ſo unmercifully, is remarkable, and worthy of obſervation, when they ſcarcely deſerved the name of men; and yet he not only gives them this, but calls them brethren, they being his countrymen and kinſmen according to the fleſh; and fathers, there being ſome among them, who might be men in years, and even members of the Sanhedrim, and elders of the people, that were now got among the crowd: this ſhows how ready the Apoſtle was to put up with affronts, and to forgive injuries done him: hear ye my defence, which I make now unto you; in oppoſition to the charges brought againſt him, of ſpeaking ill of the people of the Jews, the law of Moſes, and of the temple, and in order to clear himſelf of theſe imputations, and vindicate his character and conduct.

Ver. 2. And when they heard that he ſpake in the Hebrew tongue to them, &c.] See the note on ch. xxi. 40. they kept the more ſilence; it being their mother-tongue, and which they beſt underſtood; and which the captain and the Roman ſoldiers might not ſo well underſtand; and chiefly becauſe the Helleniſtic language was not ſo agreeable to them, nor the Helleniſtic Jews, who ſpoke the Greek language, and uſed the Greek verſion of the bible; and ſuch an one they took Paul to be, beſides his being a chriſtian; wherefore when they heard him ſpeak in the Hebrew tongue, it conciliated their minds more to him, at leaſt engaged their attention the more to what he was about to ſay: and he ſaith; the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions add, to them, as follows.

Ver. 3. I am verily a man which am a Jew, &c.] By birth, a thorough genuine one; an Hebrew of the Hebrews, both by father and mother ſide, both parents being Jews, and ſo a true deſcendant from Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob: born in Tarſus, a city in Cilicia; ſee the note on ch. xxi. 39. yet brought up in this city; the city of Jeruſalem; though Tarſus was the place of his birth, he had his education at Jeruſalem: at the feet of Gamaliel; of whom ſee ch. v. 34. it was the cuſtom of ſcholars among the Jews, to ſit at the feet of their maſters, when inſtructed by them; ſee Deut. xxxiii. 3. hence that ſaying of Joſe ben Joezer [a]; "let thy houſe be an houſe of reſort for the wiſe men, and be thou duſting thyſelf, בעפר רגליהם, with the duſt of their feet:" which by one of their commentators [b] is interpreted two ways, either "as if it was ſaid that thou ſhouldſt walk after them; for he that walks raiſes the duſt with his feet, and he that goes after him is filled with the duſt which he raiſes with his feet; or elſe that thou ſhouldſt ſit at their feet upon the ground, for ſo it was uſual, that the maſter ſat upon a bench, and the ſcholars ſat at his feet upon the floor." This latter ſenſe is commonly underſtood, and adapted to the paſſage here, as illuſtrating it; though it may be, that the ſenſe may only be this, that the Apoſtle boarded in Gamaliel's houſe, eat at his table, and familiarly converſed with him; which he modeſtly expreſſes by being brought up at his feet, who was a man that was had in great reverence with the Jews; and this ſenſe ſeems the rather to be the ſenſe of the paſſage, ſince his learning is expreſſed in the next clauſe; and ſince till after Gamaliel's time, it was not uſual for ſcholars to ſit when they learned; for the tradition is [c], that "from the times of Moſes to Rabban Gamaliel, they (the ſcholars) did not learn the law but ſtanding; after Rabban Gamaliel died, ſickneſs came into the world, and they learned the law ſitting; and hence it is ſaid, that after Rabban Gamaliel died, the glory of the law ceaſed." It follows, and taught according to the perfect law of the fathers; not the law which the Jewiſh fathers received from Moſes, though Paul was inſtructed in this, but in the oral law, the Miſna, or traditions of the elders, in which he greatly profited, and exceeded others, Gal. i. 14. And was zealous towards God; or a zealot of God; one of thoſe who were called Kanaim, or zealots; who in their great zeal for the glory of God, took away the lives of men, when they found them guilty of what they judged a capital crime; ſee Matt. x. 4. John xvi. 2. the Vulgate Latin verſion reads, zealous of the law; both written and oral, the law of Moſes, and the traditions of the fathers: as ye all are this day; having a zeal for God, and the law, but not according to knowledge.

Ver. 4. And I perſecuted this way unto the death, &c.] That is, the chriſtian religion, and the profeſſors of it; whom the Apoſtle breathed out threatenings and ſlaughter againſt, haled out of their houſes, and committed to priſon; conſented to their death, as he did to Stephen's; and whenever it was put to the vote, whether they ſhould die or no, he gave his voice againſt them; ſo that he was a moſt bitter enemy, and an implacable perſecutor of them; which ſhows how very averſe he was to this way, and how great his prejudices were againſt it; wherefore it muſt be a work of divine power, and there muſt be the ſingular hand of God in it, to reconcile him to it, and cauſe him to embrace and profeſs it: binding and delivering into priſons, both men and women; ſee Acts viii. 3. and ix. 2.

Ver. 5. As alſo the high prieſt doth bear me witneſs, &c.] Either Annas, or Caiaphas, who was at that time high prieſt; and it ſhould ſeem by this, that he was ſtill in being; or elſe that the Apoſtle had preſerved his letter, written with his own hand, which he was able to produce at any time, as a teſtimony of the truth of what he had ſaid, or was about to ſay; ſince he ſpeaks of him as now bearing him witneſs, or as one that could: and all the eſtate of the elders; the whole Jewiſh Sanhedrim, for this character reſpects not men in years, but men in office, and ſuch who were members of the high court of judicature in Jeruſalem: from whom alſo I received letters unto the brethren; ſome render it, againſt the brethren, as if the chriſtians were meant; whereas the Apoſtle intends the Jews, of the ſynagogue at Damaſcus, whom the Apoſtle calls brethren; becauſe they were of the ſame nation, and his kinſmen according to the fleſh; and at that time, of the ſame religion and principles with him; and this is put out of doubt, by the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions, which render it, the brethren that were at Damaſcus; and theſe letters were to recommend him to them, and to empower him to perſecute the chriſtians, and to demand and require their aſſiſtance in it; the Ethiopic verſion calls them, letters of power; and it ſeems from hence, that theſe letters were received from the whole Sanhedrim, as well as from the high prieſt, and were ſigned by both: and went to Damaſcus to bring them which were there bound unto Jeruſalem, for to be puniſhed; with ſtripes, or with death, as they ſhould be judged worthy; ſee Acts ix. 2.

Ver. 6. And it came to paſs, that as I made my journey, &c.] And had almoſt made an end of it: and was come nigh unto Damaſcus; about a mile from it, as ſome ſay: about noon; this circumſtance is omitted in the account in Acts ix. 3. and is mentioned here, not ſo much to inform what time of day it was, that Saul came to Damaſcus, as to obſerve, how extraordinary that light muſt be, which then appeared, as follows: ſuddenly there ſhone from heaven a great light round about me; and not only about him, but thoſe that were with him, Acts xxvi. 13. This muſt be a great light indeed, to be diſtinguiſhed at noon, and to be above the brightneſs of the ſun, and to have ſuch effect upon the Apoſtle and his company as it had; ſee the note on Acts ix. 3.

Ver. 8. And I anſwered, who art thou, Lord? &c.] See the note on Acts ix. 5.

Ver. 9. And they that were with me ſaw indeed the light, &c.] For it ſhone about them, as well as Saul: and were afraid; the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, and Syriac verſions have not this clauſe; but it ſtands in the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions; the ſuddenneſs, greatneſs, and extraordinarineſs of the light ſurprized them, for it was even miraculous: but they heard not the voice of him that ſpake to me; they heard the voice of Saul, but not the voice of Chriſt; at leaſt they did not hear it ſo as to underſtand it; ſee the note on Acts ix. 7.

Ver. 10. And I ſaid, what ſhall I do Lord? &c.] See the note on Acts ix. 6.

Ver. 11. And when I could not ſee for the glory of that light, &c.] Which was above the brightneſs of the ſun, and ſo dazzled his eyes, that he could not ſee his way into the city, ſome of his company took him by the hand, and led him: and being led by the hand of them that were with me, I came into Damaſcus; but not with the ſame view he ſet out with: he took his journey thither, and purſued it, in order to perſecute the ſaints there; but now he enters into it, to be informed by one of them what he muſt do for Chriſt, whom he had perſecuted.

Ver. 12. And one Ananias, a devout man according to the law, &c.] The Alexandrian copy, and Vulgate Latin verſion, read only, a man according to the law; one whoſe walk, life, and converſation were agreeable to it; a ſtrict obſerver of the law of Moſes, both moral and ceremonial: he not only lived a holy life and converſation, according to the moral law, but he religiouſly and devoutly attended to the rituals of the ceremonial law; and this part of his character the Apoſtle choſe to mention, as what would recommend him to the notice of the Jews he now addreſſed; for tho' he was a diſciple, a believer in Chriſt, yet as many of the believing Jews did, ſo he ſtrictly obſerved the rituals of the law. The Ethiopic verſion adds, who was of the Apoſtles; one of that number, and in that office, which is no where ſaid that he was; and had he, it would not have been agreeable to the Apoſtle's deſign to have mentioned it; and he is ſaid to be one of the ſeventy diſciples, and biſhop or paſtor of the church at Damaſcus; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Of this Ananias, his name and character, ſee the note on Acts ix. 10. Having a good report of all the Jews that dwelt there; that is, at Damaſcus, as the Ethiopic verſion reads; and ſo do the Complutenſian edition, the Alexandrian copy, and ſeveral other copies; for tho' he was a Chriſtian, yet being not only a man of an unblemiſhed life and converſation, but zealous and devout in the obſervance of the ceremonial law, was very much intereſted in the affections and eſteem of the Jews.

Ver. 13. Came unto me, &c.] Being at the houſe of Judas, in that ſtreet of Damaſcus called Straight, Acts ix. 11. and ſtood; at the ſide of him, or by him, putting his hands on him: and ſaid unto me, brother Saul; ſee the note on Acts ix. 17. receive thy ſight, or look up, and the ſame hour I looked up upon him; that is, immediately, directly; for ſo the phraſe, that ſame hour, is frequently uſed by the Jews: the words in Numb. xvi. 21. that I may conſume them in a moment, are rendered by Onkelos, that I may conſume them in an hour; for an hour is uſed for a moment with them.

Ver. 14. And he ſaid, the God of our fathers hath choſen thee, &c.] From all eternity, in his everlaſting purpoſes and decrees; or he hath taken thee into his hand; in order to form, and fit, and qualify for his ſervice; and may deſign both his call by grace, and to apoſtleſhip. The Apoſtle repreſents Ananias as ſpeaking of God, as the God of the Jewiſh fathers, of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, to ſhew that the Chriſtian doctrine was not contrary to the faith of the one God of Iſrael; nor did it introduce any other, or any new deity. The ends of this choice or ſeparation were, that thou ſhouldſt know his will; his revealed will, concerning the ſalvation of men by Jeſus Chriſt, which is no other than the Goſpel, of which the Apoſtle had been entirely ignorant; for though he knew the will of God, as revealed in the law, or his will of command, yet not ſpiritually; and he was altogether a ſtranger, till now, to God's will, way, and method of ſaving ſinners by Chriſt, of juſtifying them by his righteouſneſs, and of pardoning their ſins thro' his blood, and of giving them eternal life by him; and the knowledge of this he came at by the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation, in conſequence of his being choſen and called: and ſee that juſt one; Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, who is ſo both as he is God, and as he is man, and alſo as he is mediator, having faithfully diſcharged his office, and performed his engagements; him the Apoſtle ſaw, both with the eyes of his body, when he met him in the way, and called unto him, and with the eyes of his underſtanding beholding his beauty, fulneſs, and ſuitableneſs as a ſaviour; the former of theſe was what many kings, prophets, and righteous men deſired; and the latter is what is inſeparably connected with eternal life and ſalvation. And ſhouldſt hear the voice of his mouth; both his human voice in articulate ſounds, when he ſpoke to him in the Hebrew tongue, as in ver. 7. and the voice of his Goſpel, of which he appeared to make him a miniſter; which is a voice of love, grace, and mercy, of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation, and is very powerful when accompanied by the Spirit, and is ſoul-charming, alluring, and comforting.

Ver. 15. For thou ſhalt be his witneſs unto all men, &c.] Gentiles as well as Jews, an eye and an ear-witneſs to them: of what thou haſt ſeen and heard; as that he ſaw him perſonally and alive, and ſo could witneſs to the truth of his reſurrection; for after he had been ſeen by all the Apoſtles, he was laſt of all ſeen of Paul; and alſo, that he heard him and received from him the Goſpel, and a miſſion and commiſſion to preach it; for what he preached he did not receive of man, nor was he taught it by any, but he had it by revelation from Jeſus Chriſt.

Ver. 16. And now why tarrieſt thou? &c.] Tho' it might not be the Apoſtle's caſe, yet it is often the caſe of many, to procraſtinate and delay obedience to the commands of Chriſt, and particularly to the ordinance of baptiſm: the reaſons of which delay are, the ſtrength of their corruptions, and the weakneſs of their graces, which cauſe them to queſtion whether they have any intereſt in Chriſt; as alſo fears of falling away, and ſo of diſhonouring Chriſt, his Goſpel, and ordinance; and in ſome the reproaches of men; and ſometimes ſuch a delay is made, waiting for more comfortable frames, or for a greater fitneſs; but no ſuch delay, nor on ſuch accounts, ought to be; for it is a command of Chriſt, and ought to be forthwith complied with, as ſoon as a man believes; and to obey it is a following of Chriſt, in which no time ſhould be loſt; and the conſequences of a delay are very bad: it is a prevention of the glory of Chriſt, as well as ſhows ingratitude to him, and a bereaving of ourſelves of that comfort, which might be hoped to be enjoyed; and it often induces a careleſſneſs about the ordinance, and even a loſing the ſenſe of the duty: ariſe, and be baptized; this ſhows that Ananias was a Chriſtian, ſince he directs to an ordinance of Chriſt, and that he was a preacher of the word, and had a right to adminiſter baptiſm; for that it was adminiſtred by him, though not in expreſs terms aſſerted, yet ſeems to be naturally concluded from Acts ix. 18. as alſo this paſſage ſhows, that baptiſm was not adminiſtred by ſprinkling, ſince Saul might have ſat ſtill, and have had ſome water brought to him, and ſprinkled on him; but by immerſion, ſeeing he is called upon to ariſe, and go to ſome place proper and convenient for the adminiſtration of it, according to the uſage of John, and the Apoſtles of Chriſt. And waſh away thy ſins; or be waſhed from thy ſins; not that it is in the power of man to cleanſe himſelf from his ſins; the Ethiopian may as ſoon change his ſkin, or the leopard his ſpots, as a creature do this; nor is there any ſuch efficacy in baptiſm as to remove the filth of ſin; perſons may ſubmit unto it, and yet be as Simon Magus was, in the gall of bitterneſs, and bond of iniquity; but the ordinance of baptiſm may be, and ſometimes is, a means of leading the faith of God's children to the blood of Chriſt, which cleanſes from all ſin: calling on the name of the Lord; the name of the Lord is not only to be uſed by the adminiſtrator of baptiſm in the performance of it; but it ſhould be called upon by the perſon who ſubmits to it, both before and at the adminiſtration of it, for the preſence of Chriſt in it; and this invocation of the name of the Lord in baptiſm, ſignifies an exerciſe of faith in Chriſt, at this time, a profeſſion of him, and obedience to him.

Ver. 17. And it came to paſs, that when I was come again to Jeruſalem, &c.] Which was three years after his converſion; for he did not immediately return to Jeruſalem, but went into Arabia; and when he returned to Damaſcus, which were three years after, he came to Jeruſalem; ſee Gal. i. 17, 18. even while I prayed in the temple: the temple was an houſe of prayer; hither perſons reſorted for that purpoſe; and as the Apoſtle had been uſed to it, he continued this cuſtom, and during the time of prayer he fell into an extaſy: I was in a trance; and knew not whether he was in the body, or out of the body: whether this was the time he refers to in 2 Cor. xii. 2. is not certain, tho' probable.

Ver. 18. And I ſaw him ſaying unto me, &c.] That is, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that juſt one, whom he had ſeen in his way to Damaſcus, and whoſe voice he had heard, and whoſe name he had called upon at his baptiſm: make haſte, and get thee quickly out of Jeruſalem; not becauſe his life was in danger, but becauſe Chriſt had work for him to do elſewhere, which required haſte; and that he might not continue here uſeleſs and unprofitable, as he would have been, had he ſtaid: for they will not receive thy teſtimony concerning me; Chriſt the omniſcient God, and the ſearcher of the hearts, knew the hardneſs and unbelief of the Jews; and that they would continue therein, notwithſtanding the miniſtry of the Apoſtle; and that they would give no credit to any teſtimony of his, that he ſaw him, as he went to Damaſcus, and heard words from his mouth. The Ethiopic verſion renders it without the negative, for they will receive thee, my witneſs concerning me; as if Chriſt ſent the Apoſtle away in all haſte from Jeruſalem, leſt he preaching there, the Jews ſhould believe and be healed; compare with this Matt. xiii. 14, 15. Very likely this interpreter might be induced to leave out the negative, as thinking that the Apoſtle's reaſoning in the following words required ſuch a ſenſe and reading.

Ver. 19. And I ſaid, Lord, they know that I impriſoned, &c.] Men and women, that made a profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion, Acts viii. 3. and beat in every ſynagogue them that believed on thee; in Jeruſalem there were many ſynagogues, and in theſe ſcourging and beating of offenders were uſed; ſee the note on Matt. x. 17.

Ver. 20. And when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was ſhed, &c.] Stephen was a martyr for Chriſt, both by confeſſion with his mouth, and by the effuſion of his blood; he was the protomartyr, or the firſt martyr that ſuffered for Chriſt; and there are copies, as one of Stephens's, and the Complutenſian edition, which ſo read in this place; his blood was ſhed by ſtoning: I alſo was ſtanding by; to ſee the inhuman action performed; nor was he an idle and indifferent ſpectator: and conſenting unto his death; being pleaſed and delighted with it, and rejoicing at it; ſee Acts viii. 1. and kept the raiment of them that ſlew him; the accuſers of him, and witneſſes againſt him, whoſe hands were firſt on him, and caſt the firſt ſtones at him, and continued to ſtone him, until they killed him: theſe laid their garments at the feet of Saul, who looked after them, that no body ſtole them, and run away with them, whilſt they were ſtoning Stephen; which ſhows how diſpoſed he was to that fact, and how much he approved of it: and theſe things he mentions to ſuggeſt, that ſurely the Jews would receive his teſtimony, ſince they knew what a bitter enemy he had been to this way; and therefore might conclude, that he muſt have ſome very good and ſtrong reaſons, which had prevailed upon him to embrace this religion againſt all his prejudices, and ſo might be willing to hear them; and it alſo ſhows what an affection the Apoſtle had for the Jews, and how much he deſired their ſpiritual welfare, for which reaſon he choſe to have ſtaid, and preached among them.

Ver. 21. And he ſaid unto me, depart, &c.] At once from Jeruſalem, and out of the land of Judea: for I will ſend thee far hence unto the Gentiles; to the nations afar off, even as far as Illyricum, Pannonia, or Hungary, where the Apoſtle went and preached, Rom. xv. 19. and ſo by a divine miſſion and commiſſion he became the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and preached the Goſpel among them with great ſucceſs, to the converſion of many thouſands of them, and to the planting of many churches in the midſt of them.

Ver. 22. And they gave him audience unto this word, &c.] The Ethiopic verſion reads, and I heard him ſo ſpeaking unto me; as if it was to be underſtood of the Apoſtle hearing Chriſt ſpeaking to him concerning his miſſion to the Gentiles; whereas the words refer to the Jews attending quietly to the Apoſtle, till he came to that part of his oration. They heard him patiently, and did not offer to moleſt him, or hinder his ſpeaking, and being heard, till he came to mention his miſſion to the Gentiles: all the reſt they either did not underſtand, or looked upon it as an idle tale, as the effect of madneſs and enthuſiaſm, at leaſt as containing things they had nothing to do with; but when he came to ſpeak of the Gentiles, and to pretend to a divine miſſion to them, this they could not bear; for nothing was more offenſive, irritating, and provoking to them, than to hear of the calling of the Gentiles, whom they were for depriving of all bleſſings, and for engroſſing all to themſelves; ſee Rom. x. 20. and then lift up their voices; in a very loud and clamorous manner, as one man: and ſaid, away with ſuch a fellow from the earth; take away his life from the earth: this they ſaid either to the chief captain, to do it, or as encouraging one another to do it: for it is not fit that he ſhould live; he does not deſerve to live, he is unworthy of life; it is not agreeable to the rules of juſtice that he ſhould be ſpared; it is not convenient, and it may be of bad conſequence ſhould he be continued any longer; he may do a deal of miſchief, and poiſon the minds of the people with bad notions, and therefore it is not expedient that he ſhould live.

Ver. 23. And as they cried out, &c.] In this furious manner: and caſt off their clothes; either like madmen, that knew not what they did, or in order to ſtone him; ſee Acts vii. 57, 58. and threw duſt into the air; either with their hands, or by ſtriking the earth, and ſcraping it with their feet, thro' indignation and wrath, like perſons poſſeſſed, or mad.

Ver. 24. The chief captain commanded him to be brought into the caſtle, &c.] Into the inſide of it; for till now he was upon the top of the ſtairs, or ſteps, which led up to it; which might be done in order to ſave him from the rage of the people, and that he might privately examine him, and get the true ſtate of his caſe, though he took a very wrong and unjuſtifiable method to do it in, as follows: and bade that he ſhould be examined by ſcourging; he gave a centurion, with ſome ſoldiers, orders to ſcourge and whip him, and to lay on ſtripes more and harder, until he ſhould tell the whole truth of the matter, and confeſs the crime or crimes he was guilty of, which had ſo enraged the populace: that he might know wherefore they cried ſo againſt him; for tho' he had reſcued him out of their hands, when they would in all likelihood have beat him to death; and tho' he took him within the caſtle to ſecure him from their violence; yet he concluded he muſt be a bad man, and muſt have done ſomething criminal; and therefore he takes this method to extort from him a confeſſion of his crime, for which the people exclaimed againſt him with ſo much virulence.

Ver. 25. And as they bound him with thongs, &c.] To a pillar, in order to be ſcourged, according to the Roman manner [d]. Nor was the Jewiſh form of ſcourging much unlike, and perhaps might be now uſed, which was this; when they ſcourge any one they bind both his hands to a pillar, here and there ——and they don't ſtrike him ſtanding nor ſitting, but inclining [e]; for the pillar to which he was bound was fixed in the ground, and ſo high as for a man to lean upon [f]; and ſome ſay it was two cubits, and others a cubit and a half high [g]: and the word here uſed ſignifies an extenſion, or diſtenſion; perhaps the ſtretching out of the arms to the pillar, and a bending forward of the whole body, which fitly expreſſes the ſtooping, inclining poſture of the perſon ſcourged, and was a very proper one for ſuch a puniſhment: now as they were thus faſtening him with thongs to the pillar, and putting him in this poſition, Paul ſaid unto the centurion that ſtood by; to ſee the ſoldiers execute the orders received from the chief captain: is it lawful for you to ſcourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned? Tho' the Apoſtle puts this by way of queſtion, yet he knew full well what the Roman laws were in ſuch caſes; he did not put this thro' ignorance, or for information, but to let them know who he was, and to put them in mind of theſe laws, and of their duty; for, according to the Porcian law, Roman citizens were not to be beaten [h]. Hence, ſays [i] Cicero, "it is a heinous ſin to bind a Roman "citizen, it is wickedneſs to beat him, it is next "to parricide to kill him, and what ſhall I ſay to "crucify him?" And, according to the Valerian law, it was not lawful for magiſtrates to condemn a Roman without hearing the cauſe, and pleading in it; and ſuch condemned perſons might appeal to the populace [k].

Ver. 26. When the centurion heard that, &c.] The queſtion put by Paul, which ſtrongly ſuggeſted that he was a Roman: he went and told the chief captain; what Paul had ſaid: ſaying, take heed what thou doſt; or art about to do; leſt ſome bad conſequences ſhould follow; leſt he ſhould affront the Roman people and ſenate, and loſe his place, if not incur ſome corporal puniſhment: for this man is a Roman; and it can never be anſwered to bind and beat a Roman.

Ver. 27. Then the chief captain came, and ſaid unto him, &c.] To Paul; tell me, art thou a Roman? he had told him before that he was a Jew of Tarſus, and which was true, and had ſaid nothing of his being a Roman; wherefore the chief captain deſires that he would tell him the whole truth of the matter, whether he was a Roman or no: he ſaid yea; that he was one.

Ver. 28. And the chief captain anſwered, with a great ſum obtained I this freedom, &c.] For, it ſeems, he was not a Roman born, but very likely a Grecian, or Syrian, by his name Lyſias; and as all things were now venal at Rome, the freedom of the city was to be bought with money, tho' a large ſum was inſiſted on for it: this the chief captain ſaid, as wondering that ſo mean a perſon, and who he underſtood was a Jew by birth, ſhould be able to procure ſuch a privilege, which coſt him ſo much money: and Paul ſaid, but I was free born; being born at Tarſus; which, as Pliny ſays [l], was a free city, and which had its freedom given it by Mark Antony, and which was before the birth of Paul; and therefore his parents being of this city, and free, he was born ſo.

Ver 29. Then ſtraightway they departed from him, which ſhould have examined him, &c.] By ſcourging; namely, the ſoldiers, who under the inſpection of the centurion, and by the order of the chief captain, were binding him with thongs to ſcourge him, and thereby extort from him his crime, which was the cauſe of all this diſturbance; but hearing that he was a Roman, either of their own accord, or rather at the order of their officers, either the centurion or chief captain, or both, left binding him, and went their way: and the chief captain alſo was afraid after he knew that he was a Roman; leſt he ſhould be called to an account for his conduct, and his commiſſion ſhould be taken from him: chiefly, and becauſe he had bound him; not only had commanded him to be bound with thongs to a pillar, in order to be ſcourged, but he had bound him with two chains, when he firſt ſeized him; and, as before obſerved on ver. 25. it was a heinous crime to bind a Roman.

Ver. 30. On the morrow, &c.] The next day; ſo that Paul was kept in the caſtle all night: becauſe he would have known the certainty wherefore he was accuſed of the Jews; which, as yet, he could not come at, ſome ſaying one thing, and ſome another; and which he ought to have known before he had bound him, and ordered him to be ſcourged: he looſed him from his bands; not from his being bound with thongs to the pillar, that he had been looſed from before, but from the two chains with which he was bound, and held by two ſoldiers; ſee ch. xxi. 33, 35. and commanded the chief-prieſts, and all the council to appear; the whole Jewiſh Sanhedrim, which was now very much under the direction and influence of the Romans: and this he the rather did, becauſe, though he could not come at the certainty of the charge and accuſation, he perceived it was a matter of religion, and ſo belonged to them to examine and judge of: and brought Paul down; from the caſtle of Antonia, into the temple, and to the place where the Sanhedrim ſat, which formerly was in the chamber Gazith, but of late years it had removed from place to place, and indeed from Jeruſalem itſelf, and was now at Jabneh; only this was the time of Pentecoſt, and ſo the chief-prieſts and Sanhedrim were at Jeruſalem on that account: and ſet him before them; or among them; in the midſt of them, to anſwer to what charges ſhould be brought againſt him.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. AND Paul earneſtly beholding the council, &c.] Faſtening his eyes upon them, looking wiſhly and intently at them, and thereby diſcovering a modeſt chearfulneſs, and a becoming boldneſs, confidence, and intrepidity, as being not conſcious of any guilt, and well aſſured of the goodneſs of his cauſe: ſaid, men and brethren; ſee ch. xxii. 1. I have lived in all good conſcience before God until this day; not only from the time of his converſion, but throughout the whole of his life; for though, ſtrictly ſpeaking, there is no good conſcience but what is awakened by the Spirit of God, and is imprincipled by his grace, and is purged from ſin by the blood of Chriſt; in which ſenſe he could only have a good conſcience, ſince he believed in Chriſt; yet whereas in his ſtate of unregeneracy, and even while he was a blaſphemer, and perſecutor, he did not act contrary to the dictates of his conſcience, but according to them, in which his view was to the glory of God, and the honour of his law; he therefore ſays he lived before God, or unto God, in all good conſcience, tho' an erroneous and miſtaken one; he thought he ought to do what he did; and what he did, he did with a zeal for God, tho' it was not according to knowledge: beſides, the Apoſtle has here reſpect to his outward moral converſation, which before and after converſion was very ſtrict, and even blameleſs, at leaſt unblemiſhed before men; no body could charge him with any notorious crime, tho' he did not live without ſin in the ſight of the omniſcient God.

Ver. 2. And the high-prieſt Ananias, &c.] This could not be the ſame with Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas, but rather Ananus his ſon; tho' this is more generally thought to be Ananias the ſon of Nebedæus, whom Joſephus [m] ſpeaks of. There is one R. Ananias, the ſagan of the prieſts, often ſpoken of in the Jewiſh writings [n], who lived about theſe times, and was killed at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; and in the times of king Agrippa, there was one Chanina, or Ananias the prieſt, who was a Sadducee [o]; and from the number of Sadducees in this Sanhedrim, who very likely were the creatures of the high-prieſt, one would be tempted to think he might be the ſame with this: who commanded them that ſtood by him; that is, by Paul, who were neareſt to him, ſome of the members of the Sanhedrim; unleſs they ſhould be thought to be ſome of the high-prieſt's officers, or ſervants, as in John xviii. 22. tho' if they were, one would think they would be ſo called: theſe he ordered to ſmite him on the mouth; or give him a ſlap on the face, by way of contempt, and as if he had ſpoken what ought not to be ſaid, and in order to ſilence him; the reaſon of which might be, either becauſe Paul did not directly addreſs him, and give him ſuch flattering titles as he expected; or becauſe he ſet out with ſuch declarations of his innocence, and ſpotleſs behaviour, and with ſo much courage and boldneſs.

Ver. 3. Then ſaid Paul unto him, God ſhall ſmite thee, &c.] Which may be conſidered either as a prophecy of what would be, that God would ſmite him with ſome judgment here, or with death quickly, or with eternal damnation hereafter; taking up his own words, and ſuggeſting that a retaliation would be made, and that the meaſure he meted, would be meaſured to him again; or elſe as an imprecation upon him; for the words may be rendered, may God ſmite thee; the future tenſe being often uſed by the Jews for the imperative, and that in this very phraſe; for certain it is, that this is the form of an imprecation with them: for 'tis ſaid, if any one ſhould ſay, יכבה אלהים, may God ſmite, or ſo may God ſmite; this is אלה, a curſe, written in the law [p]; tho' this inſtance of the Apoſtle ought not to be drawn into example, any more than thoſe of other ſaints, who might be under a direction of the Holy Ghoſt to deliver out ſuch things, which would come to paſs in righteous judgment: and if this was Ananias, the ſon of Nebedæus, as is generally thought, it is remarkable, that five years after this, in the beginning of the wars of the Jews with the Romans, this Ananias hiding himſelf under the ruins of a conduit, was diſcovered, and taken out, and killed [q]: and no doubt but he very fitly calls him, thou whited wall; or hypocrite, in like manner, as Chriſt compares the hypocritical Scribes and Phariſees to whited ſepulchres, Matt. xxiii. 27. for ſitteſt thou to judge me after the law; the law of Moſes, which was the rule of judgment in the Sanhedrim, at leaſt profeſſed to be, and which was allowed of by the Romans, eſpecially in matters relating to the Jewiſh religion: and commandeſt me to be ſmitten contrary to law? which condemns no man before he is heard, and much leſs puniſhes him, John vii. 51. and which is contrary not only to the Jewiſh laws, but to the Roman laws, and all others founded upon the law of nature and reaſon.

Ver. 4. And they that ſtood by, &c.] The members of the Sanhedrim that were next to the Apoſtle; or the ſervants of the high-prieſt, ſince they are ſaid to ſtand, whereas thoſe of that court ſat:

ſaid, revileſt thou God's high-prieſt? which ſeems to confirm that the Apoſtle's words were not a bare prediction, but an imprecation; ſince they are charged with reproaching, reviling, and ſpeaking evil of him; and the aggravation of which was not only that the perſon reviled was a prieſt, an high-prieſt, but an high-prieſt of God; tho' this could not have been proved; for there was now no high-prieſt of God but Jeſus Chriſt; the prieſthood was changed and abrogated, and there were no more high-prieſts among men of God's appointing and approving.

Ver. 5. Then ſaid Paul, I wiſt not brethren, that he was the high-prieſt, &c.] Or I did not know that he was the high-prieſt; and the ſenſe is, that he did not really know him, either becauſe he had been long abſent from Jeruſalem; and beſides there were new high-prieſts made, ſometimes every year, and ſometimes oftener, that it is no wonder he ſhould not know him; or becauſe he might not ſit in his uſual place; or chiefly becauſe he was not in his habit, an high-prieſt; for the prieſts, both the high-prieſt, and the common prieſts, only wore their prieſtly robes, when they miniſtred in their office, and at other times they wore other clothes, as laymen did, according to Ezek. xliv. 19. which the Targum paraphraſes thus; “when they (the prieſts) ſhall go out of the holy court into the outer court, to be mixed with the people, they ſhall put off their garments in which they miniſtred, and lay them up in the holy chamber, and ſhall clothe themſelves with other garments, that they may not be mingled with the people, בלבושיהון, in their garments.” For as ſoon as they had performed their office, there were ſervants that attended them, who ſtripped them of their robes, and laid them up in cheſts which were in the temple [r], till they came to ſervice again, and put them on common garments; for they might not appear among the common people in their prieſtly garments; which when they were off of them, they were, as Maimonides ſays [s]; כזרים, as ſtrangers, or as laymen, like the reſt of the people; for which reaſon Paul might not know Ananias to be the high-prieſt: and this points to another ſenſe of theſe words; for it was a rule with the Jews [t], that “at the time the prieſts garments were upon them, their prieſthood was upon them, but when their garments were not on them, אין כהונתם עליהן, there was no prieſthood upon them; for lo they were as ſtrangers.” And then the ſenſe is, Ananias not being in the diſcharge of his office, nor in his habit, the Apoſtle did not know, or own him as an high-prieſt, or conſider him as in ſuch a ſtation; or rather, ſince the prieſthood was changed, and there was no other high-prieſt of God but Jeſus Chriſt, he did not own him as one; had he, he ſhould not have ſpoke to him in the manner he did. Moreover, if this was Ananias, the ſon of Nebedæus, as is the opinion of many, he had no right to the office of the prieſthood when he was firſt made an high-prieſt; after which he was ſent a priſoner to Rome; during which time ſeveral ſucceeded in the prieſthood; and at this time not he, tho' he had got the management of affairs in his hands, was high-prieſt, but Jeſus the ſon of Gamaliel; ſo that the Apoſtle's ſenſe might be, he did not own or acknowledge him high-prieſt. Some take the Apoſtle's words in an ironical ſenſe; he an high-prieſt, I ſhould not have known him to be an high-prieſt! he looks and acts more like a furioſo, a madman, an unjuſt judge, and a tyrant, than an high-prieſt, who ought to behave in another-guiſe manner. But what follows ſhows rather, that the Apoſtle ſpoke ſeriouſly, unleſs the words can be thought to be a citation made by Luke, for it is written, in Exod. xxii. 28. thou ſhalt not ſpeak evil of the ruler of thy people; which the Jewiſh writers generally underſtand of the head of the great Sanhedrim, as Ananias might be, or of a king [u].

Ver. 6. But when Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, &c.] That is, that one part of the Sanhedrim conſiſted of Sadducees, which was often the caſe; ſometimes the high-prieſt was of this ſect, as Ananias probably was, and ſometimes the greater part of the Sanhedrim were Sadducees, and even ſometimes the whole; ſee the note on Acts v. 17. but this Sanhedrim were only part of them Sadducees: and the other Phariſees; of both theſe ſects, ſee the note on Matt. iii. 7. he cried out in the council; with a loud voice, that he might be heard by all: men and brethren, I am a Phariſee; he was not only brought up in that ſect from his youth, and lived according to it before his converſion, but he was ſtill a Phariſee; wherefore he does not ſay, I was, but I am a Phariſee; for whatever diſtinguiſhed the Phariſee from the Sadducee, whether in principle, or in practice, and manner of living, which agreed with chriſtianity, the Apoſtle ſtill retained; as the belief of the immortality of the ſoul, the reſurrection of the dead, and a future ſtate, and ſtrict holineſs of life and converſation. The ſon of a Phariſee; the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read in the plural number, the ſon of Phariſees; his father and his mother were both Phariſees; for there were women Phariſees [w], as well as men; ſo that he was a Phariſee of the Phariſees, as well as an Hebrew of the Hebrews; and this is ſaid to ſhow that he was by education of that ſect. Of the hope and reſurrection of the dead, I am called in queſtion; that is, either for the hope of the reſurrection of the dead, ſee ch. xxiv. 15. or for profeſſing the hope of eternal life, and happineſs in a future ſtate, and the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, when the ſoul and body will be reunited, and enjoy endleſs felicity together: not that theſe were the particular things now charged upon him, and for which he was now trying and judging; but that theſe were the ground and foundation of the hatred and perſecution of him, becauſe he preached the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, and the reſurrection of men thro' him, and that there was hope of eternal life and ſalvation by him. And in this the Apoſtle ſhewed the prudence and wiſdom of the ſerpent, along with the innocence of the dove, hereby to divide the aſſembly, and free himſelf from them; and it was but juſt and right; for ſince they would not hear him about to make a fair and open defence of his cauſe, but ordered him to be ſmitten on the mouth, it was but juſtice to throw them into confuſion, and ſave himſelf.

Ver. 7. And when he had ſo ſaid, &c.] He ſtopped and made a pauſe: and there aroſe a diſſenſion between the Phariſees and the Sadducees; about the things which he had ſpoken of, particularly the reſurrection of the dead; and this was what the Apoſtle intended, ſo that his end was anſwered by the ſpeech he made: and the multitude was divided; that is, the members of the Sanhedrim were divided, ſome being on one ſide of the queſtion, and ſome on the other; for this multitude cannot deſign

Ver. 8. For the Sadducees ſay that there is no reſurrection, &c.] Of the dead, being ignorant of the ſcriptures, and the power of God; ſee Matt. xxii. 23, 29. neither angel nor ſpirit; the Ethiopic verſion reads, nor holy ſpirit: but the ſenſe ſeems to be, that they did not believe any ſuch ſpecies of beings as angels, nor indeed any ſpirits whatever, which were immaterial or immortal; for as for the ſpirit or ſoul of man, they took that to be only the temperament of the body, and that it died with it, and did not exiſt in any ſeparate ſtate after this life: for ſo Joſephus [x] ſays, that they deny the permanence of the ſoul, and rewards and puniſhments in the inviſible ſtate. And, according to the Talmudic [y] writers, they denied that there was any other world than this: but the Phariſees confeſs both; the reſurrection of the dead, and that there are ſpirits, both angels and the ſouls of men, which are immortal. Joſephus, in the place before referred to, ſays, that they hold that every ſoul is incorruptible or immortal; and that they held the reſurrection of the dead, is manifeſt from the Talmud [z], and other writings of theirs; the Syriac verſion renders it, the Phariſees confeſs all theſe things; to which agree the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions.

Ver. 9. And there aroſe a great cry, &c.] Or noiſe, a loud clamour; they began to be very noiſy, and to talk loud, and in high ſpirits, one againſt another: and the Scribes that were of the Phariſees part aroſe; there were Scribes in the Sanhedrim, and theſe were ſome of them on the ſide of the Sadducees, and ſome on the ſide of the Phariſees; tho' generally ſpeaking they agreed with the latter, and are often in ſcripture mentioned with them, and for them: however, that part in this Sanhedrim that were on their ſide roſe up from their ſeats, and ſtrove; that is, contended, diſputed, and litigated the point with the Sadducees: ſaying, we find no evil in this man; why he ſhould be hated, perſecuted, and puniſhed: but if a ſpirit or an angel hath ſpoken to him; that is, if the holy Spirit, as the Ethiopic verſion reads, has inſpired him, or God by an angel has revealed any thing to him, who has to ſay any thing againſt it? This they ſaid in agreement with their own principles, and more for the ſake of eſtabliſhing them, and in oppoſition to the Sadducees, than in favour of Paul: let us not fight againſt God; as in Acts v. 39. Theſe words are not in the Alexandrian copy, nor in the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions.

Ver. 10. And when there aroſe a great diſſenſion, &c.] When that was come to a very great height, hot words were ſpoken, and they were ready to come to blows, and there was like to be a riot and tumult among them: the chief captain fearing leſt Paul ſhould be pulled in pieces of them;' either of the Sadducees, whom he had greatly offended and provoked, or of both Sadducees and Phariſees, the one laying hold on him to preſerve him from the fury of the other, and the other endeavouring to pluck him out of their hands; and the fears of the chief captain were not ſo much out of affection to Paul, but leſt there ſhould be an uproar, which might iſſue in ſedition, and rebellion againſt the Roman government, of which the Roman officers were always jealous; and becauſe that Paul was a Roman, and ſhould he ſuffer him to be deſtroyed in an illegal manner, he muſt be accountable for it: wherefore he commanded the ſoldiers to go down; either from the caſtle of Antonia, or from a ſuperior part of the temple, where he with his guards were, to hear this cauſe before the Sanhedrim, to that part where it ſat, and Paul was: and take him by force from among them; if they refuſed to deliver him up, to make uſe of their arms: and bring him into the caſtle; of Antonia, where he was before.

Ver. 11. And the night following, &c.] The day, in which Paul was brought before the Sanhedrim, and pleaded his own cauſe before them, and had thrown them into confuſion and diviſion: the Lord ſtood by him; the Lord Jeſus Chriſt appeared in a viſion to him, and ſtood very near him, by the ſide of him, by the bed or couch on which he might lie: and ſaid, be of good cheer, Paul; tho' he was now a priſoner in the caſtle; and tho' the high-prieſt, and the Sadducees eſpecially, were enraged againſt him; and tho' a plot was about to be formed to take away his life; for this exhortation ſeems to be deſigned to prepare him for further trials, and to prevent diſcouragement under them; which ſhows the great care of Chriſt over him, his concern for him, and love to him: the word Paul is not in the Alexandrian copy, nor in the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions; but the calling him by name ſeems to expreſs not only ſingular knowledge of him, but greater familiarity and affection; it is in the Arabic verſion, and in other Greek copies: for as thou haſt teſtified of me in Jeruſalem; not only in the Chriſtian church, and before the Apoſtle James, and the elders, but in the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, and before the high-prieſt, Scribes, Phariſees, and Sadducees, where and before whom, tho' not particularly recorded, he bore a teſtimony for Jeſus, that he was the true Meſſiah; and that, tho' he died, he was riſen from the dead, and was at the right hand of God, and was the only ſaviour of men: ſo muſt thou bear witneſs alſo at Rome; as he had bore a public and faithful witneſs to the perſon, office, and grace of Chriſt at Jeruſalem, the metropolis of Judea; ſo it was neceſſary, by the decree of God, and for the glory of Chriſt, that he ſhould bear a like teſtimony at Rome, the chief city in the whole world; hereby ſignifying, that he ſhould not die at Jeruſalem, and giving him a hint that he ſhould appeal to Cæſar, which he afterwards did.

Ver. 12. And when it was day, &c.] As ſoon as it was light, very early in the morning: certain of the Jews banded together; theſe very likely were of the ſect of the Sadducees, who had been exceedingly irritated and provoked, by what Paul had ſaid the day before in the council; theſe therefore gathered together, entered into a conſpiracy to take away Paul's life, and united in it, as one man: and bound themſelves under a curſe; or anathematized themſelves; the Hebrew word חרם, which anſwers to Anathema, is ſometimes uſed for an oath, חרם היא שבועה, Cherem or anathema is an oath [a], a vow made to be puniſhed with an anathema if not kept; ſo theſe men ſwore to it, bound themſelves with an oath, or wiſhed they might be an anathema, accurſed of God, and cut off from his people; they imprecated the moſt dreadful evils upon themſelves: ſaying, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul; it was a common form of a vow or oath with the Jews [b], שלא אוכל, that I will not eat; ſometimes they only vowed abſtinence from particular things, and then others were lawful; as for inſtance, if one vowed that he would not eat boiled meat, he might eat roaſt, or that he would not eat fleſh, he might eat broth, or that he would abſtain from milk, then he might drink whey [c]; but this oath and vow here were, that they would neither eat nor drink any thing, till they had deſtroyed Paul: theſe were a ſett of zealots, who in imitation of Phinehas, and pretending the glory of God, took upon them to take away the lives of men, without any judicial procedure, or the authority of the civil magiſtrate; of whom, ſee the note on Matt. x. 4. it may be aſked, what became of this vow? or how did they get clear of it, ſince they did not accompliſh the fact? to which it may be anſwered, that it was a pretty eaſy thing to be freed from oaths and vows, among the Jews, whoſe doctors had a power to abſolve men from them; and in ſuch caſes as this, and ſuch a vow as this, might be looſed upon more accounts than one, as on account of keeping another law, the obſerving the ſabbath and other feſtivals, when men were obliged to eat and drink: and thus it is ſaid [d], "if a man ſwears, that he will not drink wine, or that he will not eat fleſh, for ſo many days, then they ſay to him, if thou hadſt known at the time of the oath, that the ſabbath or a feaſt-day were within theſe days, in which thou art obliged to eat fleſh and drink wine, as it is ſaid, Iſ. lviii. 13. and call the ſabbath a delight; wouldſt thou have ſwore at all? if he ſays no, they looſe his oath:" and likewiſe it might be looſed on account of life, which a man is bound to preſerve; for ſo they likewiſe ſay [e], "if a man vows that he will not eat any thing, wo be to him if he eats, and wo be to him if he does not eat; if he eats he breaks his vow, if he does not eat he ſins againſt his own ſoul, or life; what muſt he do? let him go to the wiſe men, ויתורו לו את נדרו, and they will looſe his vow for him; as it is written, Prov. xii. 18. but the tongue of the wiſe is health;" and no doubt but theſe men very eaſily got their vow looſed, ſince it was made on ſuch a deſign.

[b] Miſna Nedarim, c. 2. §. 2, 3.

Ver. 13. And they were more than forty which had made this conſpiracy.] Who met together, formed this reſolution, entered into this ſcheme, and bound themſelves with this oath; the word rendered conſpiracy, ſignifies an agreement by oath; ſuch a number of them banded together, that they might have ſtrength ſufficient to take Paul out of the hands of the ſoldiers, as he was conducted by them from the caſtle to the temple.

Ver. 14. And they came to the chief prieſts, and elders, &c.] Who were members of the Sanhedrim, to acquaint them with their deſigns: and ſaid, we have bound ourſelves under a great curſe, that we will eat nothing until we have ſlain Paul: theſe chief-prieſts and elders, had they acted according to the character they bore, on ſuch an information, would have taken up thoſe men, and puniſhed them, at leaſt would have diſſuaded them from ſo vile an action; but they knew the men to whom they applied, and very likely they were all of them of the ſect of the Sadducees, whom Paul had ſo much offended the day before; and therefore were pleaſed with what they had done, approved of their ſcheme, and readily fell in with the following propoſal.

Ver. 15. Now therefore ye with the council, &c.] The whole Sanhedrim; their ſenſe is, that they would have the Sanhedrim convened by the chief-prieſts and elders, and being met together, then to ſignify to the chief-captain; or let him know that they were aſſembled together, upon the affair of Paul, and that they were deſirous he might be brought before them: that he bring him down unto you to-morrow; from the caſtle of Antonia to the place where the Sanhedrim met; the word to-morrow is not in the Alexandrian copy, nor in the Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Ethiopic verſions; and then it ſhould ſeem that they deſired him to be brought down forthwith, or otherwiſe they muſt propoſe to faſt all that day, and ſo long on the morrow, till Paul was brought down; but that the common reading is right, appears from the chief-captain's ſending away Paul at the third hour of the night following, to prevent their deſigns on the morrow, ver. 23. The pretence formed for his being brought down is, as though ye would enquire ſomething more perfectly concerning him; what he had done, which had occaſioned this uprore, what it was he was charged with, and whether he was guilty or no: and we, or ever he come near; where the Sanhedrim ſat; are ready to kill him; lying in wait in ſome private place between the caſtle and the temple, from whence they intended to ruſh out at once upon him, and murder him; far enough both from the temple and the council, that both the one might not be defiled, tho' they did not greatly ſtick at that in thoſe times, and that the other might not be charged with having any hand in his death.

Ver. 16. And when Paul's ſiſter's ſon heard of their lying in wait, &c.] Paul might have a ſiſter living in Jeruſalem; or this her ſon might be there on account of his ſtudies; he might be a pupil to one of the doctors, by which means he might come at this ſecret, that ſuch a number of men were in ambuſh, in order to take away his uncle's life: wherefore having got intelligence of it, he went and entred into the caſtle; the Alexandrian copy reads, the ſynagogue; but Paul was not there, but in the caſtle of Antonia; the Ethiopic verſion renders it, the priſon; tho' it is plain that he was not very cloſely confined, it was eaſy to have acceſs to him; the reaſon might be, not only becauſe he was a Roman, but becauſe he was uncondemned, nor was any charge proved againſt him: and told Paul; what he had heard, that ſuch a number of men had entered into a conſpiracy to take away his life, and lay in wait for him; and this was an inſtance both of duty and affection to his unkle, and worthy of imitation, whether it proceeded from natural relation, or from religion, or both.

Ver. 17. Then Paul called one of the centurions unto him, &c.] For under this chief-captain, there muſt have been ten of them, if the company of which he was captain, conſiſted of a thouſand men, as his title chief-captain or chiliarch imports; for a centurion was over an hundred men, as his title ſignifies; perhaps this might be the ſame, as in chap. xxii. 25, 26. and ſaid, bring this young man to the chief-captain; which was a very prudential ſtep, not to let the centurion into the ſecret, but to deſire him to introduce the young man to the chief-captain; for had he truſted the centurion with it, he might not have acquainted his officer with it, but have informed the liers in wait of it: now tho' the Apoſtle was aſſured by Chriſt that he ſhould not die at Jeruſalem, but ſhould bear witneſs of him at Rome, and tho' he did not diſtruſt the truth of Chriſt's words, but moſt firmly believed them; yet he thought it his duty to make uſe of the means, which providence had put in his way, for his preſervation and ſafety; the Ethiopic verſion reads, bring this young man by night to the chief-captain; that ſo he might not be ſeen, and obſerved to have carried any intelligence to him: for he hath a certain thing to tell him; which was of ſome moment and importance, and proper for him to know.

[d] Maimon. in Miſn. Nedarim, c. 9. §. 6.

[e] T. Hieroſ. Avoda Zara, fol. 40. 1.

Ver. 18. So he took him, and brought him to the chief-captain, &c.] Immediately, without any more to do, without curiouſly enquiring into the thing, or examining the young man about it; which ſhewed him to be a man of a good diſpoſition, and ready to do a kind office, even to a priſoner: and ſaid, Paul the priſoner called me to him; either vocally or by ſome geſture, beckoned him to him: and prayed me to bring this young man unto thee, who hath ſomething to ſay unto thee; in which may be obſerved the Apoſtle's manner of addreſs to the centurion, on this occaſion, it was by way of intreaty; he aſked it as a favour of him, to introduce his nephew to the chief-captain; and the honour and modeſty of the centurion, he did not ſeek by any methods to get the ſecret out, either of Paul or the young man; but readily undertakes the affair, honourably performs it, acquaints the captain with the circumſtances of it, tells him the young man had ſomething to ſay to him, he could not tell what, and then departs.

Ver. 19. Then the chief-captain took him by the hand, &c.] Some have thought that the reaſon of this was, that he expected that the young man had brought him a preſent in his hand, from Paul; but this is to repreſent him as a ſordid mercenary man, which ought not to be ſaid, without ſufficient proof; rather this ſhould be conſidered as an inſtance of civility and humanity, and what ſhewed him to be a man of breeding and good manners; and might be done partly out of reſpect to Paul, and partly to encourage the young man to uſe freedom in the account he was about to give him: and went with him aſide privately; concluding by his coming from Paul, and perceiving by the account of the centurion, that he had a ſecret to communicate to him; wherefore it was acting a wiſe and prudent part to take him into a private room, and hear what he had to ſay: and aſked him, what is that thou haſt to tell me? thereby giving the young man an opportunity, and encouraging him to relate the ſecret to him.

Ver. 20. And he ſaid the Jews have agreed to deſire thee, &c.] By the Jews are meant, the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, for the young man had not only intelligence of the conſpiracy, and lying in wait of the forty men or more; but alſo of the agreement which the Sanhedrim at the motion of theſe men were come into, to make the following requeſt to the chief-captain; which ſeems to confirm the above conjecture, that this young man might be a ſtudent under the preſident of the council, or one of the doctors, whereby he came at the knowledge of theſe things: that thou wouldſt bring down Paul to-morrow into the council, &c. ſee the note on ver. 15.

Ver. 21. But do not thou yield unto them, &c.] Or be perſuaded by them, to bring Paul down from the caſtle to the Sanhedrim; this muſt not be imputed to the young man's pride and vanity, in taking upon him to give advice to the chief-captain; but to his great affection for his uncle, which moved him to intreat, rather than to direct him, for which he gives a good reaſon: for there lie in wait for him more than forty men, which have bound themſelves with an oath, that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him; ſee the notes on ver. 12, 13. and now are they ready; to execute their deſigns, being met together, and lying in ambuſh in ſome place, between the caſtle and the place where the Sanhedrim met: looking for a promiſe from thee; that when the Sanhedrim ſhould apply to him, he would promiſe them to bring Paul down according to their requeſt; and for the making and performing of this promiſe, theſe men were waiting.

Ver. 22. So the chief-captain then let the young man depart, &c.] After he had had the account from him, and was maſter of the whole affair: and charged him, ſee thou tell no man that thou haſt ſhewed theſe things to me; which was prudently ſaid; it was a right and wiſe thing, to conceal this matter, that the men might go on with their deſigns, and an opportunity be taken to convey Paul away, before the time came fixed by them to execute them; for otherwiſe, ſhould it have been known, that their plot was diſcovered, they would have entred upon new meaſures.

Ver. 23. And he called to him two centurions, &c.] Who had each of them an hundred ſoldiers under them: ſaying, make ready two hundred ſoldiers to go to Ceſarea; which was formerly called Strato's tower, a ſea-port town, where Felix the Roman governor now was; it was ſix hundred furlongs, or ſeventy-five miles [f] from Jeruſalem: theſe two hundred ſoldiers were foot ſoldiers, as appears by their being diſtinguiſhed from horſemen in the next clauſe, and were juſt the number that the two centurions had the command of; the making of them ready, was their ſeeing to it, that they were properly clothed, and accoutred with arms and ammunition, and with ſufficient proviſion for their journey: and horſemen threeſcore and ten; the Ethiopic verſion reads, a hundred; but without ſupport from any copy: and ſpearmen two hundred; who carrried ſpears in their right hand; the word uſed ſignifies ſuch who receive, lay hold on, or hold any thing in their right hand: ſome think it deſigns ſuch who were employed in the militia, to lay hold on guilty perſons, and hold them; the Alexandrian copy reads, δεξιοβολους, thoſe that caſt with the right hand; and ſo reads the Syriac verſion, to which the Arabic agrees, which renders it darters; ſuch as carried darts in their hands, and did not ſhoot out of a bow, but caſt darts with their hands: now theſe being got ready, were ordered to march, at the third hour of the night; at nine o'clock at night, that they might go out unobſerved, and before the petition from the Sanhedrim was preſented to him.

Ver. 24. And provide them beaſts, &c.] Horſes or mules; the Syriac verſion reads in the ſingular number, a beaſt; and one being ſufficient for Paul, here may be a change of number; the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions leave out theſe words, but the following clauſe makes them neceſſary: that they may ſet Paul on; on the beaſt, or on one of the beaſts provided; if more than one were provided, they might be for his companions, to go along with him: and bring him ſafe unto Felix the governour; this man of a ſervant was made a freed-man by Claudius Cæſar [g], and by him appointed in the room of Cumanus governour of Judea [h]; he was the brother of Pallas, who had the chief management of affairs under the emperor; and this Felix married three perſons ſucceſſively, that were of royal families; hence Suetonius [i] calls him the huſband of three queens; one of theſe was Druſilla, afterwards mentioned in chap. xxiv. 24. who was ſiſter to king Agrippa. Tacitus calls him Antonius Felix [k], which name he had from Antonia the mother of Claudius, whoſe ſervant he was; Joſephus[l] calls him Claudius Felix, which name he took from the emperor Claudius, who from ſo low and mean a condition raiſed him to ſuch honour and dignity; his name Felix ſignifies happy: according to Tacitus[m], when Felix was firſt ſent into Judea, the government was divided between him and Cumanus; Felix had Samaria, and Cumanus the other part, which was called the nation of the Galileans; but Joſephus takes no notice of any ſuch diviſion, he ſays[n], that Cumanus was baniſhed; and after that Felix was ſent by Cæſar, governour of Judea, of Galilee, Samaria, and Peræa; and ſo he ſeems to be governour of the whole country at this time; he was now at Ceſarea, and it is plain that Judea was under his government, ſince Paul a priſoner at Jeruſalem is ſent down unto him; and in this his government he continued during the life of Claudius; and when Nero became emperor, and added four cities to the kingdom of Agrippa; he conſtituted Felix governour of the reſt of Judæa[o]; which character he bore till he thought fit to remove him, and put Feſtus in his room, of whom mention is made hereafter: after theſe words the following ones are added, in the Vulgate Latin verſion, for he was afraid leſt perhaps the Jews ſhould take him by force and kill him, and afterwards he ſhould bear the reproach, as if he had took money; but they are not to be found in any Greek copies.

[k] Hiſt. l. 5.

Ver. 25. And he wrote a letter after this manner.] The chief-captain wrote a letter to Felix the governour, the form and ſum of which were as follow; this letter he ſent by one of the centurions to him.

Ver. 26. Claudius Lyſias, unto the moſt excellent governour Felix, &c.] This is the inſcription of the letter, and by it we learn the name of the chief-captain, ſo often ſpoken of in this and the two preceding chapters, which was Claudius Lyſias; the firſt of theſe names is a Roman one, and which he might take from the emperor Claudius, for he was not a Roman born; and the latter ſeems to be a Greek name, and was his proper name, and he himſelf very likely was a Greek, ſince he purchaſed his freedom with money; one of this name was Archon of Athens[p]; and another is reckoned by Cicero[q], among the famous orators of Greece, and is often cited by Harpocratian[r]; one of Antiochus's noblemen, and who was of the blood royal, and acted as a general againſt the Jews, was of this name[s]. The chief-captain calls Felix the governour, the moſt excellent, which was a title of honour that belonged to him as a governour; the ſame is given to Theophilus, Luke i. 3. ſendeth greeting; or wiſhes all health and proſperity.

Ver. 27. This man was taken by the Jews, &c.] Meaning Paul, who was preſented by the centurions to the governour, and was in his preſence when the letter was opened and read, and who was taken by the Jews in the temple, and from thence dragged out and beaten by them: and ſhould have been killed of them; and would have been killed, had it not been for the chief-captain; he was very near being killed by them, he was nigh unto death: then came I with an army and reſcued him; he came with the Roman band, which he had the command of, perhaps a thouſand ſoldiers; for ſuch a number he ſhould have under him by his title; with theſe he came upon the Jews on a ſudden, as they were beating Paul, and took him out of their hands, and ſaved him: having underſtood that he was a Roman; but this he did not know till afterwards; after he had bound him with two chains, and after he had ordered him to be bound with thongs, and examined by ſcourging; all which he covers and hides from the governour, and ſuggeſts that it was his great concern for the Roman name, and for a Roman citizen, which put him upon this enterprize.

Ver. 28. And when I would have known the cauſe, &c.] Or crime, he was guilty of: wherefore they accuſed him; which they charged him with, and for which they beat him almoſt to death: I brought him forth into their council; their court of judicature, the great Sanhedrim.

Ver. 29. Whom I perceived to be accuſed of queſtions of their law, &c.] As about the reſurrection of the dead, and a future ſtate, which ſome in the council denied, and ſome aſſerted, which with this heathen man were idle and fooliſh queſtions; or about the defiling of the temple, and ſpeaking contemptibly of the law of Moſes, the people of the Jews, and the holy place, which was the cry of the populace againſt him, and were things the captain knew little of: but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death, or of bonds; by the laws of the Romans; and yet he himſelf had bound him with two chains at the firſt taking of him, and afterwards ordered him to be bound with thongs, and ſcourged, of which he ſays nothing, being convinced of his error, and willing to hide it; however he bears a full teſtimony to the innocence of the Apoſtle.

Ver. 30. And when it was told me, &c.] As it was by Paul's ſiſter's ſon, how that the Jews laid wait for the man; had formed a conſpiracy to take away his life, and laid a ſcheme in order to it, and at leaſt intended, if they were not actually in ambuſh to ſeize him, as he ſhould be brought from the caſtle to the Sanhedrim: I ſent ſtraightway to thee; the priſoner Paul, under a guard of ſoldiers; this he did directly, as ſoon as ever he heard of the deſign of the Jews; and he ſent him to Felix, as being governour, to whom the judgment of this affair properly belonged, and who was beſt qualified for it, at leaſt in the chief-captain's account; and who doubtleſs conſulted his own honour and ſafety, leſt he ſhould incur blame and diſgrace, ſhould a Roman have been ſlain thro' any neglect or want of care in him: and gave commandment to his accuſers alſo, to ſay before thee what they had againſt him; it is reaſonable to conclude, that he ſaid nothing of this, to them, tho' he might have determined he would, till after Paul was ſent away; otherwiſe the affair would have been diſcovered, which he deſired might be concealed: farewell; which is the concluſion of the epiſtle, and is a wiſh of health and happineſs.

Ver. 31. Then the ſoldiers, as it was commanded them, took Paul, &c.] Out of the caſtle, and put him upon a beaſt, as the chief-captain had ordered the centurions, and they had directed the ſoldiers to do: and brought him by night to Antipatris; they ſet out from Jeruſalem at the third hour, or about nine o'clock at night, and travelled all night, and by break of day came to Antipatris; a city which lay in the road from Jeruſalem to Ceſarea: it was built by Herod the great, in the beſt ſoil of his kingdom, enriched with rivers and woods[t]; and was ſo called by him, in memory of his father Antipater; it before went by the name of Chabar Zaba[u], or Capharſaba; the Jewiſh writers place it in the utmoſt borders of the land of Judea[w]; hence that phraſe ſo often uſed by them, from Gebath to Antipatris[x], in like ſenſe as from Dan to Beerſhebah, theſe two places being the utmoſt borders of the land; here it was that Simon the juſt with ſome of the principal inhabitants of Jeruſalem, met Alexander the great, who travelled all night, as theſe ſoldiers with Paul did, and came to Antipatris at ſun-riſing[y]. It was forty-two miles from Jeruſalem. It was in the road from Judea to Galilee, as appears from the following canon of the Jews, concerning divorces[z]; "if a huſband ſays to his wife, lo, this "is thy divorce, if I do not come thirty days hence, "and he goes from Judea to Galilee, and comes to "Antipatris and returns, it becomes void:" the way from Jeruſalem to Ceſarea lay thro' Nicopolis, Lydda, Antipatris, and Betthar; from Jeruſalem to Nicopolis, according to the old Jeruſalem Itinerary[a], were twenty-two miles; from thence to Lydda, ten miles; and from Lydda to Antipatris ten more, (which make forty-two miles, as before obſerved;) and from Antipatris to Betthar ten miles, and from thence to Ceſarea, ſixteen more: ſo that when the Apoſtle was at Antipatris, he had twenty-ſix miles more to go to Ceſarea; and hence it appears, that the length of the journey from Jeruſalem to Ceſarea, was ſixty-eight miles; tho' Joſephus[b] makes the diſtance to be ſix hundred furlongs or ſeventy-five miles: and that the way from the one to the other, lay thro' the places before mentioned, may be illuſtrated from what the ſame writer ſays, of ſome perſons travelling from Ceſarea to Jeruſalem; ſo he relates[c], concerning Quadratus governour of Syria, that from Tyre he came to Ceſarea, from Ceſarea to Lydda, and from Lydda to Jeruſalem; and of Ceſtius the Roman general, he ſays[d], that from Ceſarea he came to Antipatris, and from Antipatris to Lydda, and from Lydda to Jeruſalem, which clearly ſeems to be the ſame road the Apoſtle went; and ſo Jerom[e] in the account he gives of the journey of Paula, ſays, that ſhe came to Ceſarea, where ſhe ſaw the houſe of Cornelius, the cottage of Philip, and the beds of the four virgin propheteſſes; and from thence to Antipatris, a little town half pulled down, which Herod called after his father's name; and from thence to Lydda, now Dioſpolis, famous for the reſurrection of Dorcas, and the healing of Æneas. Antipatris is by Ptolomy[f], placed at the weſt of Jordan, and is mentioned along with Gaza, Lydda, and Emmaus; ſome take it to be the ſame with Capharſalama, mentioned in 1 Maccab. vii. 31. and others ſay, it is the ſame that is ſince called Aſſur or Arſuf, a town on the ſea-coaſt, which is not likely, ſince it does not appear that Antipatris was a maritime city. The Apoſtle could not now ſtay to preach the Goſpel in this place, nor do we elſewhere read or hear of a Goſpel-church-ſtate in it, until the fifth century; when it appears[g] there was a church here, and Polychronius was biſhop of it, who was preſent at the council of Chalcedon, held in the year 451. and in the eighth century there were many chriſtians dwelt here, for in the year 744, there were many of them killed by the Arabians.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. A*ND after five days Ananias the high-prieſt deſcended with the elders*, &c.] From Jeruſalem to Ceſarea: theſe five days are to be reckoned not from the ſeizing of Paul in the temple, but from his coming to Ceſarea; the Alexandrian copy reads, after ſome days, leaving it indetermined how many: the high-prieſt, with the elders, the members of the Sanhedrim, with ſome of them, as the ſame copy, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, came down hither; not merely as accuſers, by the order of the chief captain, but willingly, and of their own accord, to vindicate themſelves and their people, leſt they ſhould fall under the diſpleaſure of the Roman governour, for encouraging tumults and riots: the high-prieſt muſt be conſcious to himſelf that he had acted in an illegal manner, in ordering Paul to be ſmitten on the mouth, in the midſt of the council, in the preſence of the chief captain; and if it had not been for the ſoldiers, Paul had been pulled to pieces in the council: and the elders knew what a hand they had in the conſpiracy againſt his life; and they were ſenſible that this plot was diſcovered, and Paul was ſecretly conveyed away; and what the captain had wrote to the governour, they could not tell, and therefore made the more haſte down to him, to ſet themſelves right, and get Paul condemned: and with a certain orator named Tertullus: this man, by his name, ſeems to have been a Roman; and becauſe he might know the Roman, or the Greek language, or both, which the Jews did not ſo well underſtand, and was very well acquainted with all the forms in the Roman courts of judicature, as well as was an eloquent orator; therefore they pitched upon him, and took him down with them to open and plead their cauſe. The name Tertullus is a diminutive from Tertius, as Marullus from Marius, Lucullus from Lucius, and Catullus from Catius. The father of the wife of Titus, before he was emperor, was of this name [k]; and ſome ſay her name was Tertulla; and the grandmother of Veſpaſian, by his father's ſide, was of this name, under whom he was brought up [l]. This man's title, in the Greek text, is Ρητωρ, Rhetor, a rhetorician; but tho' with the Latines an orator and a rhetorician are diſtinguiſhed, an orator being one that pleads cauſes in courts, and a rhetorician, a profeſſor of rhetoric; yet with the Greeks, the Rhetor is an orator; ſo Demoſthenes was called; and ſo Cicero calls himſelf [m]. Who informed the governour againſt Paul; brought in a bill of information againſt him, ſetting forth his crimes, and declaring themſelves his accuſers; they appeared in open court againſt him, and accuſed him; for this is not to be reſtrained to Tertullus, but is ſaid of the high-prieſt, and elders with him; for the word is in the plural number, tho' the Syriac verſion reads in the ſingular, and ſeems to refer it to the high-prieſt.

Ver. 2. And when he was called forth, &c.] Not Tertullus the orator; for this is not to be underſtood of him, and of his being admitted to ſpeak, as is thought by ſome, but the Apoſtle Paul; which is put out of doubt by the Vulgate Latin verſion, which reads, and Paul being cited; he was ordered to be brought out of cuſtody into the court, to hear his inditement, and anſwer for himſelf: Tertullus began to accuſe him; to ſet forth his crimes, which he introduced with a flattering preface to Felix: ſaying, ſeeing that by thee we enjoy great quietneſs, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence; very likely he might refer to his purging the country of robbers; he took Eleazar, the chief of them, who had infeſted the country for twenty years, and many others with him, whom he ſent bound to Rome, and others of them he crucified; and whereas there aroſe up another ſett of men, under a pretence of religion, who led people into the wilderneſs, ſignifying, that God would ſhow them ſome ſigns of liberty; theſe ſeemed, to Felix, to ſow the ſeeds, and lay the foundation of diviſion and defection, which ſhowed his ſagacity, and which Tertullus here calls providence; wherefore foreſeeing what would be the conſequence of theſe things, if not timely prevented, he ſent armed-men, horſe and foot, and deſtroyed great numbers of them; and particularly he put to flight the Egyptian falſe prophet, who had collected thirty thouſand men together, and diſperſed them [n]; and yet his government was attended with cruelty and avarice; witneſs the murder of Jonathan the high-prieſt, by a ſort of cut-throats, who were connived at by him; particularly by the means of Dora his friend, whom he corrupted; and the pillaging of many of the inhabitants of Ceſarea [o]: ſo that this was a piece of flattery, uſed by Tertullus, to catch his ear, and gain attention, and inſinuate himſelf into his affections.

Ver. 3. We accept it always, and in all places, &c.] The ſenſe is, that the Jews obſerved with pleaſure the provident care the governour took of their nation, and at all times ſpoke well of him; and where-ever they came commended his conduct, and owned the favours they received from him, and the bleſſings they enjoyed under his government: and then giving him his title of honour, moſt noble Felix; Tertullus adds, that this the Jews did with all thankfulneſs; as ſenſible of the obligations they were under to him; but this was all a farce, mere artifice, and wretched flattery.

Ver. 4. Notwithſtanding, that I be not further tedious unto thee, &c.] Suggeſting, that he could ſay a great deal more under this head, but, for brevity ſake, ſhould omit it; and becauſe he would not tire his patience, and hinder buſineſs going forward: I pray thee, that thou wouldſt hear us of thy clemency a few words; he praiſes him for his humanity and good nature, and for his patience in hearing cauſes, and promiſes him great conciſeneſs in the account he ſhould give him; and intreats that, according to his wonted goodneſs, be would condeſcend to hear what he had to lay before him; all which was artfully ſaid to engage attention to him.

Ver. 5. For we have found this man a peſtilent fellow, &c.] Pointing to Paul the priſoner at the bar; the word here uſed, ſignifies the peſt or plague itſelf; and it was uſual with orators among the Romans, when they would repreſent a man as a very wicked man, as dangerous to the ſtate, and unworthy to live in it, to call him the peſt of the city, or of the country, or of the empire, as may be obſerved in ſeveral places in Cicero's orations. And a mover of ſedition among all the Jews throughout the

the world: ſedition was ſeverely puniſhed by the Romans, being what they carefully watched and guarded againſt, and was what the Jews were ſuppoſed to be very prone unto; and Tertullus would ſuggeſt, that the ſeveral riots, and tumults, and ſeditions, fomented by the Jews, in the ſeveral parts of the Roman empire, here called the world, were occaſioned by the Apoſtle: the crime charged upon him is greatly aggravated, as that not only he was guilty of ſedition, but that he was the mover of it, and that he ſtirred up all the Jews to it, and that in every part of the world, or empire, than which nothing was more falſe; the Jews often raiſed up a mob againſt him, but he never rioted them, and much leſs moved them againſt the Roman government: and to this charge he adds, and a ringleader of the ſect of the Nazarenes; not Nazarites, as Calvin ſeems to underſtand the paſſage; for theſe were men of great repute among the Jews, and for Paul to be at the head of them would never be brought againſt him as a charge; but Nazarenes, that is, Chriſtians, ſo called by way of contempt and reproach, from Jeſus of Nazareth; which name and ſect being contemptible among the Romans, as well as Jews, are here mentioned to make the Apoſtle more odious.

Ver. 6. Who alſo hath gone about to profane the temple, &c.] By introducing a Greek into it; ſee ch. xxi. 28, 29. which was only a ſuppoſition and conjecture of the Aſiatic Jews, and was a falſe and groundleſs one: whom we took; as they did in the temple, and dragged him out of it: and would have judged according to our law; which was another untruth, for they had him not before any court of judicature; they brought no charge in form againſt him, nor did they examine his caſe, and enquire into the truth of things, or hear what he had to ſay, but fell upon him, and beat him; and if it had not been for the chief captain and his ſoldiers, would have deſtroyed him, ſo far were they from proceeding according to their law: it ſeems by Tertullus calling the law, our law, that he was a Jewiſh proſelyte; or elſe he ſpeaks after the manner of lawyers, who call what is their clients, theirs.

Ver. 7. But the chief captain Lyſias came upon us, &c.] Suddenly, and at unawares, immediately, and with great haſte, before they could execute their deſigns; which were not to judge Paul according to law, but to kill him, in the manner the zealots did: and with great violence took him away out of our hands; for he came with an army, and reſcued him, ch. xxiii. 27. Some copies add, and ſent him to thee; and ſo the Syriac verſion reads.

Ver. 8. Commanding his accuſers to come unto thee, &c.] But this was not done till after Paul had ſet forth his caſe before the people, upon the ſtairs leading to the caſtle; and after he had pleaded his own cauſe before the Sanhedrim; and after the chief captain had had intelligence of the Jews lying in wait to kill him: Tertullus would inſinuate that the captain was blame-worthy, that he hindered a legal proceſs againſt Paul; and that it was owing to him, that this trouble was given the governour, as well as the high-prieſt and elders, who by his orders came down from Jeruſalem to Ceſarea; and that had it not been for him this affair might have been finiſhed with more diſpatch, and leſs trouble. By examining of whom; not the accuſers, but either the chief captain, as ſome think, or rather Paul: thyſelf mayſt take knowledge of all theſe things whereof we accuſe him; ſo impudent was Tertullus, and of ſuch effrontery and aſſurance, that he feared not to ſay, that the governour, by examining Paul himſelf, would eaſily come to the knowledge of the things he was accuſed of, and plainly ſee that he was guilty of them; ſo that there would be no need of their atteſtations, or of producing witneſſes againſt him.

Ver. 9. And the Jews alſo aſſented, &c.] That is, Ananias the high-prieſt, and the elders that were with him, agreed to what Tertullus ſaid, and confirmed the ſame. Saying, that theſe things were ſo; that Paul was ſuch a perſon, and was guilty of the crimes he had ſet forth; and that the chief captain had taken the ſteps, and done the things he had related.

Ver. 10. Then Paul, after the governour had beckened unto him to ſpeak, &c.] Tertullus having finiſhed his account, Paul was ſilent to his charge and calumnies, until the governour beckened with his hand or head, or made ſome ſign to him to ſpeak for himſelf; which he might not do, until leave was given him; and then he anſwered as follows: foraſmuch as I know that thou haſt been of many years a judge unto this nation; ſome ſay he was in the thirteenth, others in the tenth year of his government; ſome copies read a juſt judge; but this does not ſo well agree with the character of Felix; ſee the note on ver. 27. I do the more chearfully anſwer for myſelf; ſince if he had been ſuch a mover of ſedition every where, he muſt in this courſe of years have known or heard ſomething of it; and ſeeing alſo he could be no ſtranger to the temper of the Jews, that they were given to envy, revenge, lying, and perjury, and therefore would not eaſily believe all they ſaid, or raſhly take their part, but rather would pity the Apoſtle, who had fallen into ſuch hands, and do him juſtice.

Ver. 11. Becauſe that thou mayſt underſtand, &c.] By what Paul now aſſerted, and by the witneſſes which he could produce to certify the truth of it: that there are yet but twelve days ſince I went up to Jeruſalem for to worſhip; that is, from the time that he went up from Ceſarea to Jeruſalem, to the preſent time, in which he ſtood before Felix, pleading his own cauſe; which may be reckoned thus, he came in one day from Ceſarea to Jeruſalem, ch. xxi. 16, 17. the next day he viſited James and the elders, ver. 18. on the third day he purified himſelf in the temple, ver. 26. where he was taken and uſed ill by the Jews; on the fourth day, he was brought before the Sanhedrim, and defended himſelf, ch. xxii. 30. on the fifth day forty Jews conſpire to take away his life, ch. xxiii. 11, 12. on the ſixth day he came to Ceſarea, being ſent there by Lyſias, ver. 32. and five days after this, which make eleven, Ananias and the elders, with Tertullus, came down to accuſe him; and this day was the twelfth, on which his trial came on. And of theſe twelve days he was a priſoner nine, and therefore could not have done ſo much miſchief, and ſtirred up ſo much ſedition as was inſinuated; and in oppoſition to the charge of profaning the temple, he obſerves that he came up to Jeruſalem to worſhip; namely, at the feaſt of Pentecoſt.

Ver. 12. And they neither found me in the temple diſputing with any man, &c.] Either about civil or religious affairs: not that it was criminal to diſpute in the temple; it was a common thing for the doctors to diſpute about matters of religion, in the porches, and courts, and chambers of the temple, as it may be obſerved they often did with Chriſt; but the Apoſtle mentions this to ſhow, that he was ſo far from moving ſedition among the people of the Jews, that he never ſo much as entered into any converſation with them, upon any ſubject whatever: true indeed, he was in the temple, and was found there, but not diſputing with any, but puriſying himſelf according to the law of Moſes: neither raiſing up the people; ſtirring them up to ſedition, and tumult, to rebel againſt the Roman government: neither in the ſynagogues; where there were the greateſt concourſe of people, and the beſt opportunity of ſowing ſeditious principles, and of which there were many in the city of Jeruſalem. The Jews ſay [p] there were four hundred and ſixty ſynagogues in Jeruſalem; ſome ſay [q] four hundred and eighty: nor in the city; of Jeruſalem, in any of the public ſtreets or markets, where there were any number of people collected together; the Apoſtle mentions the moſt noted and publick places, where any thing of this kind might moſt reaſonably be thought to be done.

Ver. 13. Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuſe me.] As that he was a peſtilent fellow, a mover of ſedition, and a prophaner of the temple: theſe things they could not ſet forth in any clear light, and bring teſtimonies, or give demonſtration of; they could not make them appear to be true, which it lay upon them to do, or otherwiſe in courſe he ought to be acquitted: this was challenging and defying them to make good their aſſertions.

Ver. 14. But this I confeſs unto thee, &c.] What was truth he was not aſhamed of, but ready to own, and bear his teſtimony for, whatever was the conſequence of it: that after the way which they call hereſy; referring to the charge of his being a ringleader of the ſect of the Nazarenes, ver. 5. and meaning by the way the chriſtian religion, or the doctrines of chriſtianity, which the Jews called hereſy; and as early as this were the chriſtians, by them, called hereticks: ſo we read [r] of, ברכת המינים, a prayer againſt the hereticks, which Samuel (the little) compoſed before, or in the preſence of R. Gamaliel the elder, he approving of it; which R. Gamaliel was Paul's maſter; and ſome have thought, that Samuel the little, the compoſer of this prayer, was Saul himſelf; ſo that he knew very well that the chriſtian doctrine was called hereſy, and the chriſtians hereticks, for he had called them ſo himſelf in the time of his unregeneracy; but now he was not aſhamed to profeſs that way, and walk in it, and according to it worſhip God, as follows: ſo worſhip I the God of my fathers; even Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, ſuggeſting, that by embracing chriſtianity, he had not denied, and gone off from the worſhip of the one, only, living, and true God, the God of Iſrael; and that there was an entire agreement between the ſaints of the Old Teſtament, and the chriſtians of the New, in the object of worſhip; the Vulgate Latin verſion reads, ſo ſerve I the Father, and my God; that is, God the Father, who is the Father of Chriſt, and the God and Father of believers in him: believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets; which the Sadducees did not; and ſtrictly adhering to theſe, and not to the traditions of the elders, as did the Scribes and Phariſees; ſo that ſince he believed whatever was contained in the ſacred writings, he could not be charged juſtly with hereſy; and as he believed, ſo he taught nothing but what was agreeable to the ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament.

Ver. 15. And have hope towards God, &c.] Of an intereſt in him, and of enjoying eternal life and happineſs with him in a future ſtate: which they themſelves alſo allow; that is, ſome of the Jews, not the Sadducees, for they denied what is afterwards aſſerted; but the Phariſees, who believed the immortality of the ſoul, and its exiſtence in a future ſtate: and that there ſhall be a reſurrection of the dead, both of the juſt and unjuſt; agreeable to the doctrine of Chriſt in John v. 28, 29. In this article the Phariſees of thoſe times were ſounder than the modern Jews; for tho' the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead is one of their thirteen articles of faith, and is a fundamental one, which he that does not believe, cannot be ſaid to be of the Jewiſh religion; yet they limit it entirely to the righteous [s], and will not allow that the wicked ſhall riſe again: and this notion obtained alſo very early; for in their Talmud [t] it is reported, as the ſaying of R. Abbu, that "the day of rain is greater than the "reſurrection of the dead; the reſurrection of the "dead is, לצדיקים, for the righteous, but the rain "is both for the righteous, and the wicked." Tho' Abarbinel [u] ſays, that the ſenſe of this expreſſion is not, that they that are not juſt ſhall have no part in the reſurrection, but that hereby is declared the benefit and reward to be enjoyed at the reſurrection; that that is not like rain, from whence both juſt and unjuſt equally receive advantage; whereas only the reward is for the righteous, but not for the ungodly: moreover, he obſerves, that this ſaying was not received and approved of by all the wiſe men, particularly that R. Joſeph diſſented, and others agreed with him; and as for himſelf, he openly declares, that that aſſertion that the juſt among the Iſraelites only, ſhall riſe again, is foreign from truth, ſince the ſcripture affirms, Dan. xii. 2. that many of them that ſleep in the duſt of the earth ſhall awake; but if there ſhould be no other than the righteous in the reſurrection, they would without doubt be very few; beſides it is ſaid, ſome to everlaſting life, and ſome to everlaſting contempt; and Iſaiah ſays, chap. lxvi. 24. and they ſhall go forth and look upon the carcaſſes of the men that have tranſgreſſed againſt me; which ſhews, that the ungodly ſhall riſe again, to receive their due puniſhment: and Menaſſeh ben Iſrael [w], in the laſt century, argued for the reſurrection of both the godly and ungodly, from the ſame paſſages of ſcripture; and yet he was not of opinion, that the reſurrection would be general and common to all men, only that ſome of all ſorts, good, and bad, and middling, would riſe again, and which he ſuppoſed was the ſenſe of the ancients. It is certain the Jews are divided in their ſentiments about this matter; ſome of them utterly deny that any other ſhall riſe but the juſt; yea, they affirm [x], that only the juſt among the Iſraelites, and not any of the nations of the world ſhall riſe; others ſay that all ſhall riſe at the reſurrection of the dead, excepting the generation of the flood [y]; and others [z] think, that only they that have been very bad, or very good, ſhall riſe, but not thoſe that are between both; but certain it is, as the Apoſtle affirms, that all ſhall riſe, both juſt and unjuſt: the juſt are they who are made ſo by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, and who being created anew unto righteouſneſs and true holineſs, live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly; the unjuſt are they who are deſtitute of righteouſneſs, and are filled with all unrighteouſneſs; and theſe latter, as well as the former, will riſe again from the dead; which is clear, not only from the words of Chriſt, and the writings of the Apoſtles, but from the ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament, particularly Dan. xii. 2. and alſo from the juſtice of God, which requires that they who have ſinned in the body, ſhould be puniſhed in the body; wherefore it is neceſſary on this account, that the bodies of the wicked ſhould be raiſed, that they with their ſouls may receive the full and juſt recompenſe of reward; and likewiſe from the general judgment, which will include the righteous and the wicked, and who muſt all ſtand before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, to receive for the deeds done in the body, whether good or evil; in order to which there muſt be a reſurrection of them; to which add, the account the ſcripture gives of the puniſhment of the wicked in hell, which ſuppoſes the reſurrection of the body, and in which the body and ſoul will be both deſtroyed. Indeed there will be a difference between the reſurrection of the juſt and of the unjuſt, both in the time of their riſing, the dead in Chriſt will riſe firſt at the beginning of the thouſand years, the wicked not until they are ended; and in the means and manner of their riſing; they will be both raiſed by Chriſt, but the one by virtue of union to him, the other merely by his power; the juſt will riſe in bodies not only immortal, and incorruptible, but powerful, ſpiritual, and glorious, even like to the glorious body of Chriſt; the wicked will riſe with bodies immortal, but not free from ſin, nor glorious: yea, their reſurrection will differ in the end of it; the one will riſe to everlaſting life and glory, the other to everlaſting ſhame and damnation.

Ver. 16. And herein do I exerciſe myſelf, &c.] Or becauſe of this; on account of this doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, which is a doctrine according to godlineſs, and promotes and engages to a holy life and converſation, as the contrary tends to encourage a diſſolute and ſinful manner of living; ſee 1 Cor. xv. 32. The Apoſtle ſtudied, and laboured, and bent himſelf, and employed his thought, care, and time, to have always a conſcience void of offence toward God and toward man; that is, to diſcharge every duty which God requires, and to give to every man what is due to him; ſo as to pleaſe God, and not offend men, neither Jew nor Gentile, nor the church of God; and ſo as that conſcience may be clear of guilt, and may not be defiled with ſin, being purged and purified by the blood of Chriſt. By a conſcience void of offence, is meant a good converſation; which as it reſpects God, lies in a carefulneſs not to offend him, but to do his will; and as it reſpects men, a ſhunning what may give offence, or be a ſtumbling to them; and tho' this cannot be perfectly attained to in each of its branches, yet there is in every good man a concern to have ſuch a conſcience; and the conſideration of the reſurrection of the dead; the general judgment, and a future ſtate, induce him to it.

Ver. 17. Now after many years, &c.] Abſence from Jeruſalem; it was now about five and twenty years ſince his converſion, and moſt of this time he ſpent among the Gentiles; three years after it he went up to Jeruſalem, and fourteen years after that, Gal. i. 18. and ii. 1. but it had now been ſome years ſince he had been there: I came to bring alms to my nation; the collections which were made among the Gentile churches, particularly in Macedonia, for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, Rom. xv. 25, 26, 27. 2 Cor. viii. 1—4. and offerings; either for the day of Pentecoſt, according to the uſages of that feaſt, or the offerings on the account of the vow of the Nazarite, ch. xxi. 26. The Vulgate Latin verſion adds, and vows; unleſs the ſpiritual and evangelical ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe can be thought to be meant, ſince the ceremonial law was now abrogated; tho' it is manifeſt the Apoſtle did at ſome times, and in ſome caſes, comply with the Jews in the obſervance of it, in order to gain ſome.

Ver. 18. Whereupon, &c.] Or among which; while the Apoſtle was buſy about the offerings of the Nazarites: certain Jews from Aſia found me purified in the temple; and therefore could not be ſaid to prophane it; this he obſerves in anſwer to the charge of his attempting to prophane it, and acquaints the governour how that was; as that having joined himſelf to four men that had a vow upon them, and being in the temple purifying himſelf with them, certain Jews that came from Epheſus, in Aſia, who knew him there, and had a pique againſt him, found him here; not prophaning the temple, as they pretended, but acting according to the worſhip and ſervice of it; and that, neither with a multitude; for there were but four men with him; nor with tumult; making any noiſe and riot, or ſtirring up perſons to ſedition and rebellion.

Ver. 19. Who ought to have been here before thee, &c.] For they were the only perſons who ſaw him in the temple, and what he was doing; and who by an hideous outcry raiſed a mob upon him, who took things upon hearſay from them: and object, if they had ought againſt me; either with reſpect to ſedition, or blaſphemy, error or hereſy, if they were capable of proving any thing.

Ver. 20. Or elſe let theſe ſame here ſay, &c.] They that are preſent, the high-prieſt and the elders, who were come down to accuſe him: if they have found any evil-doing in me, while I ſtood before the council; or Jewiſh Sanhedrim; when he was brought before them by the chief-captain, chap. xxii. 30. and xxiii. 1. meaning, if any evil was then done by him, or any iniquity proved upon him, let it be declared; for as for his imprecation, or prophecy, that God would ſmite the high-prieſt, he excuſed himſelf on that head, as not knowing it was the high-prieſt.

Ver. 21. Except it be for this one voice, &c.] Sentence or expreſſion following, which declares his faith about the reſurrection; not that he thought or owned that this was an evil in him, but that it was the only one, that any of them, the Jews, a part among them, namely, the Sadducees, could condemn, or judge to be evil in him: that I cried, ſtanding among them; whereby they were thrown into confuſion and diviſion among themſelves: and it was this, touching the reſurrection of the dead I am called in queſtion by you this day; ſee ch. xxiii. 6.

Ver. 22. And when Felix heard theſe things, &c.] Which were ſaid on both ſides, both by plaintiff and defendant, the charges brought againſt Paul, and his anſwer to them, as a judge ought to do: having more perfect knowledge of that way; the chriſtian religion, which the Jews called hereſy, and Paul had embraced; the ſenſe is, either that he had a more perfect knowledge of it than he had before; and by what Paul had ſaid, he ſaw that it was not contrary to the law, nor had any tendency to promote ſedition and tumult; or rather, when he ſhould have more perfect knowledge of this new way, called the ſect of the Nazarenes, he would determine this cauſe, and not before: wherefore he deferred them; put them off to longer time, and would make no deciſion in favour of one ſide or the other: and ſaid, when Lyſias the chief captain ſhall come from Jeruſalem to Ceſarea, I will know the uttermoſt of your matters: as for the way, or religion of the chriſtians, he propoſed doubtleſs to conſult other perſons; and as for the profanation of the temple, and eſpecially about ſtirring up of ſedition, he would enquire of Lyſias about that; and when he had got full information of theſe particulars, then he promiſed them to bring things to an iſſue, and finiſh the cauſe.

Ver. 23. And he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, &c.] In cuſtody, to watch and guard him, and look after him, that he went not away, ſince he was neither condemned nor acquitted; and therefore muſt be retained a priſoner, till one or other was done: and to let him have liberty; not to go where he pleaſed, or out of the place of confinement, for then there would have been no need of the after direction, not to prohibit his friends from coming to him; but to free him from his bonds and cloſe confinement; which was done, partly on account of his being a Roman, and partly becauſe he took him to be an innocent man, and it may becauſe he hoped to receive money from him: that he ſhould forbid none of his acquaintance to miniſter or come unto him; but that they ſhould have free acceſs to him, and the liberty of converſation with him; which favours granted ſhows, that he was inclined to the ſide of Paul, both through the defence that he had made for himſelf, and through the letter which Lyſias ſent him, as well as through the knowledge he had gained by long obſervation and experience, of the temper and diſpoſition of the Jews, their prieſts and elders.

Ver. 24. And after certain days, &c.] Some days after this trial: when Felix came with his wife Druſilla, which was a Jeweſs; to Ceſarea, having been to fetch her from ſome other place, or to meet her: this woman was the daughter of Herod Agrippa, who was eaten by worms, ch. xii. 23. and ſiſter to king Agrippa, mentioned in the next chapter; but though ſhe was born of Jewiſh parents, and ſo a Jeweſs, as ſhe is here called, yet her name was a Roman name, and is the diminutive of Druſus; the firſt of which name took it from killing Drauſus, an enemy's general, and who was of the Livian family; and the name of the mother of Tiberius Cæſar, was Livia Druſilla; Caius Caligula the Roman emperor, had alſo a ſiſter whoſe name was Druſilla [a]; this name Herod took from the Romans, and gave to his daughter; though the maſculine name is often to be met with in Jewiſh writings; we frequently read of, ר׳ דרוסאי, Rabbi Druſai [b]: Herod Agrippa left three daughters, born to him of Cypris, Bernice, Mariamne, and Druſilla; and a ſon by the ſame, whoſe name was Agrippa; Agrippa when his father died was ſeventeen years of age, Berenice was ſixteen, and was married to her uncle Herod; Mariamne and Druſilla were virgins, but were promiſed in marriage by their father; Mariamne to Julius Archelaus, ſon of Chelcias, and Druſilla to Epiphanes, the ſon of Antiochus, king of Comagene; but after Herod's death, he refuſed to marry her, being unwilling to embrace the Jewiſh religion and relinquiſh his own, though he had promiſed her father he would; wherefore her brother Agrippa married her to Azizus king of the Emeſenes, who was willing to be circumciſed; but this marriage was quickly diſſolved; for Felix coming to the government of Judea, ſeeing Druſilla, was enamoured with her beauty; and by the means of one of his friends, one Simon a Jew, and a native of Cyprus, who pretended to be a magician, he enticed her from her huſband, and prevailed upon her to marry him [c]: he ſent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Chriſt; which he did, chiefly on account of his wife, who being brought up in the Jewiſh religion, had ſome notion of the Meſſiah the Jews expected, and could better underſtand what Paul talked of than he did; who at this time doubtleſs ſhewed, that Chriſt was come, and that Jeſus of Nazareth was he; that he is truly God and man, that he died, and roſe again from the dead on the third day, and that he has obtained ſalvation for ſinners, and that whoever believes in him ſhall be ſaved; this was the faith in Chriſt Paul diſcourſed of, and Felix and his wiſe heard; but it does not appear that it was attended with the power of God, to the converſion of either of them; it ſeems to have been merely out of curioſity, and as a diverſion to them, and to do his wife a pleaſure, that he ſent for Paul and heard him.

Ver. 25. And as he reaſoned of righteouſneſs, temperance, and judgment to come, &c.] The Apoſtle not only diſcourſed concerning the doctrine of faith in Chriſt, but inſiſted upon the duties of religion: and particularly he reaſoned upon righteouſneſs; not juſtifying righteouſneſs, that is only the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and which rather belongs to the doctrine of faith in Chriſt; but the exerciſe of juſtice, or the doing of righteouſneſs between man and man; which was agreeable to the light of nature, to the law of God, and Goſpel of Chriſt, and is a virtue highly neceſſary in a judge, and was greatly wanting in Felix; who as the hiſtorian ſays [d], was guilty of much cruelty and injuſtice throughout his government, and therefore very appoſitely did the Apoſtle fall on this ſubject: and he might alſo reaſon concerning the neceſſity of a righteouſneſs, in order to juſtify before God, and to appear before him with acceptance, and to enter into heaven; he might ſhew, that it was the loſs of righteouſneſs which was the reaſon of the firſt man being removed from his place and ſtate of happineſs, in which he was whilſt innocent; and that to admit perſons into heaven without a righteouſneſs, is contrary to the pure and holy nature of God, who loves righteouſneſs, and hates iniquity; and particularly would not be agreeable to his juſtice, which requires a perfect righteouſneſs; yea, it would be uncomfortable to holy men themſelves, to have ungodly and unrighteous perſons with them in heaven: he might alſo reaſon upon the want of righteouſneſs, which is in every man; how that the firſt man having loſt his righteouſneſs, all his poſterity are deſtitute of one; and that they are not able to work out one acceptable to God, and which will juſtify in his ſight; that the thing is impracticable and impoſſible, and that that which men call a righteouſneſs, is not one, at leaſt is not a juſtifying one: he might inſiſt upon the unprofitableneſs of a man's own works of righteouſneſs for ſuch a purpoſe, by obſerving the imperfection of them; and that juſtification by them, is contrary to God's declared way of juſtifying ſinners, is derogatory to his free grace, would make null and void the death of Chriſt, and encourage boaſting in men; and all this he might reaſon about, in order to convince him of the neceſſity and ſuitableneſs of the righteouſneſs of faith in Chriſt, he had before been diſcourſing of: and very pertinently in the next place did he inſiſt on temperance; or continence, and chaſtity; ſince Felix had enticed away another man's wife, and now lived in adultery with her; and who was now with him, whilſt hearing this diſcourſe; which concluded with an account of judgment to come; how that Jeſus Chriſt is appointed the judge of quick and dead, and that all muſt appear before him, ſtand at his bar, and be accountable to him for all their actions, and be judged by him, which will be done in the moſt righteous manner: he might argue this, not only from the ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament, of which Druſilla might have ſome knowledge, ſuch as Pſal. xcvi. 13. Eccleſ. iii. 17. and xi. 9. and xii. 14. Dan. vii. 9, 10. but from reaſon, from the relation which men ſtand in to God, as his creatures, and therefore are accountable to him for their actions; and from the juſtice of God, which in many inſtances in the preſent ſtate of things, is not manifeſt: good men are afflicted and ſuffer much, and bad men flouriſh and enjoy great proſperity; wherefore there muſt be another ſtate in which things will have another turn, and juſtice will take place: he might from hence conclude, the certainty of a future judgment; and the univerſality of it, that it would reach to all men and things; and would proceed according to the ſtrict rules of juſtice, and in the moſt awful manner; and that a true and juſt ſentence would be pronounced, and ſtrictly executed: upon which account of things, Felix trembled; his conſcience was awakened, accuſed him of the injuſtice and incontinence he had been guilty of; and his mind was filled with horror, at the thought of the awful judgment, he could not eſcape, which Paul had deſcribed unto him; nor could he bear him to diſcourſe any longer on theſe ſubjects: and anſwered, go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient ſeaſon, I will call for thee; he ſignifying he was not at leiſure now to hear him any longer; when he had a ſpare hour he would ſend for him, and hear him out; but this was only an excuſe to get rid of him now, and lull his conſcience aſleep, and make it quiet and eaſy; which he was afraid would be more and more diſturbed, ſhould he ſuffer Paul to go on preaching in this manner: it is a ſaying of R. Judah [e], "ſay not when I am at leiſure I will learn, "perhaps thou wilt never be at leiſure."

Ver. 26. He hoped alſo that money would have been given him of Paul, &c.] For he obſerved from his own defence, that he came up to Jeruſalem to bring alms and offerings; and he perceived by Tertullus's indictment, that he was at the head of a large body of men; that he was ſome conſiderable perſon, at leaſt who was in great eſteem among ſome ſort of people, and whoſe life and liberty were valuable: and he might hope if Paul had not money of his own, yet his friends would ſupply him with a ſufficiency to obtain his freedom; and it may be that it was with this view, that he ordered that they ſhould have free acceſs to him and miniſter to him, that ſo he might have to give to him: that he might looſe him; from all confinement, and ſet him at entire liberty: wherefore he ſent for him the oftner and communed with him; but not about religious matters, but about his civil affairs; ſuggeſting he would releaſe him for a ſum of money, which the Apoſtle did not liſten to, being unwilling to encourage ſuch evil practices, or to make uſe of unlawful means to free himſelf.

Ver. 27. But after two years, &c.] Not of Felix's government, for he had been judge many years in that nation, but of the Apoſtle's confinement at Ceſarea: Porcius Feſtus came in Felix's room; was made governour of Judea by Nero in his ſtead; who having had many and loud complaints againſt him for male practices, removed him: and ſo Joſephus [f] ſays, that Feſtus ſucceeded Felix in the government of Judea, and calls him as here, Porcius Feſtus; in the Arabic verſion he is called Porcinius Feſtus, and in the Vulgate Latin verſion Portius Feſtus; but his name was not Portius from porta a gate, but Porcius, a porcis from hogs; it was common with the Romans, to take names from the brute creatures; ſo Suillius from ſwine, Caprarius and Caprilius from goats, Bubulcus from oxen, and Ovinius from ſheep. The famous Cato was of the family of the Porcii, his name was M. Porcius Cato, and came from Tuſculum, a place about twelve miles from Rome, where there is a mountain which ſtill retains the name of Porcius; we read alſo of Porcius Licinius, a Latin poet, whoſe fragments are ſtill extant; whether this man was of the ſame family, is not certain, it is very likely he might: his ſurname Feſtus ſignifies joyful and chearful, as one keeping a feaſt; this was a name common with the Romans, as Rufus Feſtus, Pompeius Feſtus, and others: and Felix willing to ſhew the Jews a pleaſure, left Paul bound; he had done many injuries to their perſons and properties, he had greatly abuſed them, and incenſed them againſt him; and now he was ſent for to Rome, to anſwer for his male adminiſtration; wherefore to gratify the Jews, and to oblige them, in hopes that they would not follow him with charges and accuſations, at leaſt would mitigate them, and not bear hard upon him, he leaves Paul bound at Ceſarea, when it was in his power to have looſed him, and who he knew was an innocent perſon: but this piece of policy did him no ſervice, for the perſons he had wronged, the chief of the Jews at Ceſarea, went to Rome, and accuſed him to Cæſar; and he was ſent by his ſucceſſor thither, to appear before Nero, and anſwer to the charges exhibited againſt him; and had it not been for his brother Pallas, who was in great authority at court, he had been ſeverely puniſhed [g], CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. NOW when Feſtus was come into the province, &c.] Of Judea, which was a Roman province, over which he was made governour by Nero the Roman emperor, in the room of Felix; he now being landed in ſome part of the province, namely at Ceſarea, and ſo might be ſaid to have entered upon the government of it, as the phraſe will bear to be rendered; after three days he aſcended from Ceſarea to Jeruſalem; he very likely came by ſea from Italy to Judea, and landed at Ceſarea; for though Joppa was the neareſt port to Jeruſalem, yet Ceſarea was the ſafeſt, and moſt commodious port, being made ſo by Herod; ſee the note on ch. xviii. 22. and beſides, it ſeems to have been very much the reſidence of the kings and governours of Judea, ch. xii. 19. and xxiii. 24, 35. here Feſtus ſtayed three days after his landing, to reſt himſelf after the fatigue of the voyage, and then went up to Jeruſalem, the metropolis of the province of Judea.

Ver. 2. Then the high prieſt, &c.] Ananias, as in ch. xxiii. 2. and xxiv. 1. the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin verſion, and all the Oriental verſions read, the chief prieſts, the whole college of the prieſts: and the chief of the Jews; their rulers and elders, the members of the Jewiſh Sanhedrim: informed him againſt Paul; they took the firſt opportunity of waiting upon him, when he was come to Jeruſalem; hoping it might be a favourable one to them, ſince he was juſt entering upon his government, and might be willing to gratify the chief of the nation, and gain their affection and eſteem, and ſince as yet he was not acquainted with their wicked diſpoſitions and artifices; and brought a bill of information againſt Paul, and gave a large account of him, what a wicked man he was, and what evils he had committed; they laid many things to his charge, and very heavily accuſed him, and endeavoured to prepoſſeſs the governour, and prejudice him againſt him: and beſought him; that he would grant them the following requeſt.

Ver. 3. And deſired favour againſt him, &c.] Paul; they aſked what would be a favour to them, and a prejudice to him; or of him, that is, of Feſtus; they aſked a favour of him, and deſired it as ſuch, as what would be gratefully accepted and acknowledged by them; which ſenſe is confirmed by the Syriac verſion; the Arabic verſion renders it to, or upon them; that is, they aſked him to grant a favour to them, or beſtow one on them, which is as follows: that he would ſend for him to Jeruſalem; that his caſe might be heard before him, and he might be tried and judged by him, as they pretended: laying wait in the way to kill him; this was their deſign, though they concealed it, and pretended no other view than that juſtice might take place: their ſcheme was, that if they could have prevailed upon Feſtus to have ſent for Paul to Jeruſalem, from Ceſarea, they would have provided men, perhaps the ſame forty and upwards as before, in ch. xxiii. 12, 13. to have laid in wait for him in the way as he came, and to have killed him: the whole of this ſhows the malice of theſe men, the badneſs of their cauſe, their indefatigableneſs and diligence to attain their end, the danger the Apoſtle was in, and the care of providence over him.

Ver. 4. But Feſtus anſwered, that Paul ſhould be kept at Ceſarea, &c.] Or that he was kept there, and was in proper cuſtody, under the care of a centurion, and ſhould continue there; nor was there any reaſon why he ſhould be removed, eſpecially ſince he ſhould return thither ſpeedily, as he adds: and that he himſelf would depart ſhortly thither; the anſwer was a very wiſe and prudent one, and the reaſons given were juſt and ſtrong; as that Paul had been ſent to Ceſarea, was left bound by his predeceſſor there; there he found him, and there he was under a proper guard, and there it was right for him to continue; and beſides, he himſelf ſhould make no ſtay in Jeruſalem, but ſhould depart for Ceſarea in a few days, and therefore it was very improper to ſend for Paul thither.

Ver. 5. Let them therefore, ſaid he, which among you are able, &c.] Who are at leiſure, can ſpare time, and to whom it will be convenient, without interrupting other buſineſs, to take ſuch a journey; and who are able to bear the expences of it, without hurting their families, and whoſe health and age will admit of it; and above all, who are maſters of this affair, and are capable of forming charges, and of ſupporting them with proper proofs and evidences: let ſuch go down with me; from Jeruſalem to Ceſarea: and accuſe this man; in proper form, according to the rules of law, of what he is guilty, and can be proved upon him: if there is any wickedneſs in him; or committed by him, any thing that is abſurd and unreaſonable, notoriouſly flagitious and criminal; that is, contrary to the rules of reaſon, the common ſenſe of mankind, and the laws of God and men; and eſpecially of the Roman empire, or that is blaſphemous or ſeditious.

Ver. 6. And when he had tarried among them more than ten days, &c.] The Alexandrian copy, and three of Beza's copies, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, no more than eight or ten days; and the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions leave out the phraſe no more, and read when he had ſtaid there, as the former; that is, at Jeruſalem; or when he had remained among them, as the latter; the Jews, chief prieſts, and others, eight or ten days; the hiſtorian not being certain to a day, expreſſes himſelf in this manner: he went down to Ceſarea; from whence he came, and where Paul was: and the next day ſitting in the judgment ſeat; the day after he was come to Ceſarea, he ſat upon the bench in the court of judicature, to try cauſes, and particularly the Apoſtle's, which he was very deſirous of knowing, for which reaſon he ſo ſoon took the bench: and commanded Paul to be brought; from the place where he was kept a priſoner, to the judgment-hall where Feſtus was.

Ver. 7. And when he was come, &c.] Into court: the Jews which came down from Jeruſalem; along with Feſtus, perhaps the high prieſt with the elders, and Tertullus the orator, as before: ſtood round about; either the Apoſtle Paul, or the judgment ſeat; the witneſſes and accuſers were to ſtand, as well as the perſon accuſed; ſee the note on Mark xiv. 57. And laid many and grievous complaints againſt Paul, which they could not prove; for his moral converſation both before and after converſion, was very ſtrict and conformable to the laws of God and man; and yet as pure and inoffenſive as he was, he was not exempt from the calumnies of men; and theſe many and very grievous; but it was his happineſs, and to his honour through the grace of God, that his enemies could not make good any one thing againſt him.

Ver. 8. While he anſwered for himſelf, &c.] As he was allowed by the Roman laws to do, he pleaded his own cauſe, and ſhewed the falſhood of the charges exhibited againſt him; by obſerving, that as the crimes alledged againſt him were reducible to three heads, neither of them were juſt and true: neither againſt the law of the Jews; the law of Moſes, whether moral, ceremonial, or judicial; not the moral law, that he was a ſtrict obſerver of, both before and ſince his converſion; nor the ceremonial law, for though it was aboliſhed, and he knew it was, yet for peace ſake, and in condeſcenſion to the weakneſs of ſome, and in order to gain others, he ſubmitted to it, and was performing a branch of it, when he was ſeized in the temple; nor the judicial law, which concerned the Jews as Jews, and their civil affairs: neither againſt the temple; at Jeruſalem, the profanation of which he was charged with, by bringing a Gentile into it; which was a falſhood, at leaſt a miſtake: nor yet againſt Cæſar, have I offended at all; for he was charged with ſedition, ch. xxiv. 5. Cæſar was a common name to the Roman emperors, as Pharaoh was to the kings of Egypt; and which they took from Julius Cæſar the firſt of them, who was ſucceeded by Auguſtus Cæſar, under whom Chriſt was born; and he by Tiberius, under whom he ſuffered; the fourth was Caius Caligula; the fifth was Claudius, mentioned in Acts xi. 28. and xviii. 2. and the preſent Cæſar to whom Paul now appealed, was Nero; and though ſucceeding emperors bore this name, it was alſo given to the ſecond in the empire, or the preſumptive heir to it: authors are divided about the original of Cæſar, the ſurname of Julius; ſome ſay he had it from the colour of his eyes, which were Cæſii, grey; others from Cæſaries, his fine head of hair; others from his killing of an elephant, which in the language of the Moors is called Cæſar: the more common opinion is, that he took his name from his mother's womb, being Cæſo, cut up at his birth, to make way for his paſſage into the world; in which manner alſo our king Edward the ſixth came into the world.

Ver. 9. But Feſtus willing to do the Jews a pleaſure, &c.] As did his predeceſſor Felix, ch. xxiv. 27. he being juſt entred upon his new government, and having met with ſome careſſes and civilities from the Jews at Jeruſalem, by whom he had been much preſſed and urged about the affair of the Apoſtle: anſwered Paul, and ſaid, wilt thou go up to Jeruſalem, and there be judged of theſe things before me? meaning by the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, he Feſtus being preſent: this was what the Jews had requeſted of him when he was at Jeruſalem, that he would ſend for Paul thither, and there let him be judged, and which requeſt he had denied; but having been ſollicited and importuned by the Jews, perhaps as they came down together, he was inclined to gratify them, and to admit of it that he ſhould be tried at Jeruſalem, before the Sanhedrim, he being preſent; and yet he was unwilling to do this without the priſoner's conſent, he being a freeman of a Roman city; fearing he ſhould be charged with delivering up a Roman into the hands of the Jews, which might be reſented by the emperor and the Roman ſenate, ſhould it come to their knowledge.

Ver. 10. Then ſaid Paul, I ſtand at Cæſar's judgment ſeat, &c.] Not that here was a ſeat in the judgment-hall built by Herod for Cæſar himſelf to ſit in, ſhould he ever come there, as ſome have thought; but the ſeat on which Feſtus ſat, is called Cæſar's judgment ſeat, becauſe it was in a Roman court of judicature, and becauſe Feſtus who filled it, perſonated Cæſar himſelf: where I ought to be judged; being a Roman citizen, and not at Jeruſalem by the Sanhedrim of the Jews, who had nothing to do with him: to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knoweſt; it may be by his predeceſſor Felix, who had informed him of this caſe; or by Lyſias's letter, which might come to his hands; or by the Apoſtle's anſwer and vindication of himſelf, which he now made.

Ver. 11. For if I be an offender, &c.] Againſt the law of Moſes, or the temple at Jeruſalem, or Cæſar the Roman emperor: or have committed any thing worthy of death; by the laws of the Romans, as ſedition, murder, &c. I refuſe not to die; ſignifying that he did not decline going to Jeruſalem, either through any conſciouſneſs of guilt, or fear of death; for if any thing could be proved againſt him, that was of a capital nature, he did not deſire to eſcape death; he was ready to die for it; this was no ſubterfuge, or ſhift, to evade or defer juſtice: but if there be none of theſe things; to be found, or proved, and made to appear: whereof theſe accuſe me; pointing to the Jews, that came down to be his accuſers, and had laid many and grievous charges againſt him: no man may deliver me unto them; not juſtly, or according to the Roman laws; ſuggeſting that Feſtus himſelf could not do it legally: I appeal unto Cæſar; to this the Apoſtle was induced, partly by the conduct of the governour, who ſeemed inclined to favour the Jews; and partly by the knowledge he might have of their intention to lie in wait for him, ſhould he go up to Jeruſalem; and chiefly by the viſion he had, which aſſured him that he muſt bear witneſs of Chriſt at Rome, ch. xxiii. 11.

Ver. 12. Then Feſtus when he had conferred with the council, &c.] Not with the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, or any part of it that came down on this occaſion; but with Roman counſellors, which he had to aſſiſt him in judgment, when any difficult matters were before him; the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions render it, with his counſellors; and the Arabic reads in the ſingular number, with his counſellor; with theſe he adviſed, whether it was proper to admit of Paul's appeal, or no; and having had their opinion, he anſwered, haſt thou appealed unto Cæſar? unto Cæſar ſhalt thou go: the queſtion is put, partly for the more certain knowledge of the thing, that there might be no miſtake in it; and partly on account of the Jews, that they might ſee that though he was diſpoſed to do them a favour, it was not in his power, becauſe of this appeal; and it may be with ſome reſentment in himſelf, ſince it carried in it a ſort of reflection upon him, as if he was uncapable of iſſuing this affair, or would not be juſt and faithful in it.

Ver. 13. And after certain days, &c.] Several days after the above appeal made by Paul: king Agrippa and Bernice came unto Ceſarea to ſalute Feſtus: this king Agrippa was the ſon of Herod Agrippa, who killed James the brother of John, and of whoſe death mention is made in ch. xii. the Jewiſh chronologer [h] calls him Agrippa the ſecond, the ſon of Agrippa the firſt, the fifth king of the family of Herod: he was not king of Judea, this was reduced again into a province by Claudius; and upon the death of his uncle Herod king of Chalcis, he was by the ſaid emperor made king of that place, who afterwards removed him from thence to a greater kingdom, and gave him the tetrarchy, which was Philip's, his great uncle's; namely, Batanea, Trachonitis, and Gaulanitis, to which he added the kingdom of Lyſanias; (ſee Luke iii. 1.) and the province which Varus had; and to theſe Nero added four cities, with what belonged to them; in Peræa, Abila, and Julias, and in Galilee, Tarichea, and Tiberias [i]. The Jewiſh writers often make mention of him, calling him, as here, king Agrippa; ſee the note on ch. xxvi. 3. and ſo does Joſephus [k]. According to the above chronologer [l], he was had to Rome by Veſpaſian, when he went to be made Cæſar; and was put to death by him, three years and a half before the deſtruction of the temple; tho' others ſay he lived ſome years after it: and ſome of the Jewiſh writers affirm, that in his days the temple was deſtroyed [m]. Agrippa, though he was a Jew, his name was a Roman name; Auguſtus Cæſar had a relation of this name [n], who had a ſon of the ſame name, and a daughter called Agrippina; and Herod the great being much obliged to the Romans, took the name from them, and gave it to one of his ſons, the father of this king: the name originally was given to ſuch perſons, who at their birth came forth not with their heads firſt, as is the uſual way of births, but with their feet firſt, and which is accounted a difficult birth; and ab ægritudine, from the grief, trouble, and wearineſs of it, ſuch are called Agrippa's[o]. Bernice, who is ſaid to be with king Agrippa, is not the name of a man, as ſome have ſuppoſed, becauſe ſaid to ſit in the judgment-hall with the king, but of a woman; ſo called in the dialect of the Macedonians, for Pheronice, which ſignifies one that carries away the victory; and this ſame perſon is in Suetonius[p], called queen Beronice, for whom Titus the emperor is ſaid to have a very great love, and was near upon marrying her: ſhe was not wiſe of Agrippa, as the Arabic verſion reads, but his ſiſter; his father left beſides him, three daughters, Bernice, Mariamne, and Druſilla, which laſt was the wife of Felix, Acts xxiv. 24. Bernice was firſt married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis[q], and after his death to Polemon, king of Cilicia, from whom ſhe ſeparated, and lived in too great familiarity with her brother Agrippa, as ſhe had done before her ſecond marriage, as was ſuſpected[r], to which inceſt Juvenal refers[s]; and with whom ſhe now was, who came together to pay a viſit to Feſtus, upon his coming to his government, and to congratulate him upon it.

Ver. 14. And when they had been there many days, &c.] Indulging themſelves in pleaſure, and ſpending their time in converſing on various ſubjects; and in order to carry on the converſation, and paſs away time, Feſtus declared Paul's caſe unto the king; in the following manner: ſaying, there is a certain man left in bonds by Felix; the former governour in Ceſarea, meaning Paul.

Ver. 15. About whom, when I was at Jeruſalem, &c.] Quickly after he came to his government: the chief prieſts and elders of the Jews informed me; brought an accuſation to him, exhibited to him charges againſt him, preſented to him a bill of information, ſetting forth various crimes he had been guilty of: deſiring to have judgment againſt him; not barely to have his cauſe tried, but to have a ſentence of condemnation paſſed upon him; ſome copies read condemnation, as the Alexandrian copy, and two of Beza's; and that puniſhment is deſigned, and even death itſelf, is manifeſt from the following words.

Ver. 16. To whom I anſwered, &c.] As follows: it is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die; or to give any man to deſtruction; to paſs ſentence of death upon him, without hearing his cauſe, and purely at the requeſt of another, and merely to gratify him: before that he which is accuſed have the accuſers face to face; ſo as to ſpeak to his face, or before him, what they have to charge him with: and have licence to anſwer for himſelf, concerning the crime laid againſt him; and this was alſo according to the law of the Jews, John vii. 51. though Feſtus from ſuch an application to him by the chief prieſts and elders, might conclude that their manner was different, he being ignorant of their laws and cuſtoms; but their prejudice to the Apoſtle carried them to act ſuch an illegal part, or at leaſt to deſire it might be acted: it is one of the Jewiſh canons, that it is unlawful for a judge to hear one of the contending parties, before the other is come in.

Ver. 17. Therefore when they were come hither, &c.] To Ceſarea, namely the chief prieſts and elders of the Jews: without any delay on the morrow, I ſat on the judgment ſeat; that is, the next day after they came down, Feſtus went into the judgment hall, and took his place there, in order to hear this cauſe; which circumſtance he mentions, to ſhew how expeditious he was: and I commanded the man to be brought forth; from his place of confinement, to the hall, to anſwer for himſelf.

Ver. 18. Againſt whom when the accuſers ſtood up, &c.] As they were obliged to do, whilſt they were exhibiting their charges, bearing their teſtimonies, and producing their proofs; ſee ver. 7. They brought none accuſation of ſuch things as I ſuppoſed; for by his being left in bonds, and by the information of the chief prieſts and elders, and their violence againſt him, he imagined he muſt be chargeable with ſome notorious capital crime.

Ver. 19. But had certain queſtions againſt him of their own ſuperſtition, &c.] Or religion; as about their law, which they ſaid Paul had ſpoke againſt; and about their temple, which they pretended he had polluted; and about the reſurrection of the dead, which he aſſerted, and ſome denied: and of one Jeſus which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive; for it ſeems more was ſaid on each ſide, than is recorded by Luke: the Jews objected to him among other things, his belief in Jeſus of Nazareth, whom they traduced as an impoſtor and deceiver; Paul on the other hand argued, that he was the true Meſſiah; and in proof of it, affirmed that though they had put him to death, he was riſen from the dead, and ſo was declared to be the Son of God with power: Feſtus it is very likely, had never heard of Jeſus before, and therefore ſpeaks of him in this manner; or if he had, he had entertained a contemptible opinion of him, as well as of the Jewiſh religion; and which he expreſſes, even in the preſence of the king, who had outwardly at leaſt embraced it.

Ver. 20. And becauſe I doubted of ſuch manner of queſtions, &c.] Or was ignorant of them, and knew not what to make of them, or to ſay to them, and was at an entire loſs what to do in this affair: I aſked him whether he would go to Jeruſalem, and there be judged of theſe matters; before the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, who beſt underſtood them.

Ver. 21. But when Paul had appealed to be reſerved, &c.] In cuſtody at Ceſarea: unto the hearing of Auguſtus; to have his cauſe heard, tried, and judged of, by the Roman emperor Nero, here called Auguſtus; for as it was uſual for a Roman emperor to be called Cæſar, from Julius Cæſar, the firſt of them, ſo to be called Auguſtus, from Octavius Auguſtus, the ſecond emperor: his original ſurname was Thurinus, but this being objected to him as a reproachful one, he afterwards took the name of Cæſar, and then of Auguſtus; the one by the will of his great uncle, the other by the advice of Munatius Plancus; when ſome thought he ought to be called Romulus, as if he was the founder of the city, it prevailed that he ſhould rather be called Auguſtus; not only this ſurname being new, but more grand, ſeeing religious places, and in which any thing was conſecrated by ſoothſaying, were called Auguſta, ab auctu, vel ab avium geſtu, guſtuve, according to Ennius[t]: in the Greek text the name is Sebaſtos, which ſignifies venerable and worſhipful. I commanded him to be kept; in Ceſarea, by a centurion, and not ſent to Jeruſalem: till I might ſend him to Cæſar; till he could have an opportunity of ſending him to Rome, to take his trial before the emperor.

Ver. 22. Then Agrippa ſaid to Feſtus, &c.] After he had given him the above account: I would alſo bear hear the man myſelf; Agrippa being a Jew by profeſſion, and knowing more of theſe things than Feſtus did, and very likely had heard much concerning Jeſus Chriſt; and if not of the Apoſtle, yet however of the chriſtian religion; and therefore he was very deſirous, not only out of curioſity to ſee the man, but to hear him; and get ſome further information and knowledge about the things in diſpute, between the Jews and chriſtians, in which Feſtus was very ready to gratify him: to-morrow, ſaid he, thou ſhalt hear him; and ſooner things could not well be prepared for an affair of this kind, and for ſo grand a meeting.

Ver. 23. And on the morrow when Agrippa was come, &c.] Into the hall, or court of judicature: and Bernice; his ſiſter, along with him: with great pomp; in rich dreſs, with the regalia, or enſigns of royalty carried before them, and attended with a large train and retinue of ſervants: and was entered into the place of hearing; the cauſes that were tried in court, that particular part of the hall, which was aſſigned for that purpoſe; for as there were the proper places for the judge and council, and for the plaintiffs and defendants, ſo for thoſe that came to hear: with the chief captains; or tribunes, who had the command of the Roman ſoldiers; and who had each of them a thouſand men under them, as their title ſignifies: and principal men of the city; that is, of Ceſarea; the magiſtrates, and chief inhabitants of the place: at Feſtus's commandment Paul was brought forth; and became a ſpectacle to a vaſt number of men, as he himſelf ſays; and which in part fulfilled what Chriſt had foretold to his diſciples, that they ſhould be brought before kings and governours for his ſake; ſee 1 Cor. iv. 9. Matt. x. 18.

Ver. 24. And Feſtus ſaid, king Agrippa, &c.] He addreſſed himſelf to him in the firſt place, as being the principal perſon, and of great dignity, as well as knowledge: and all men which are here preſent with us; the chief captains, and principal inhabitants of the city: ye ſee this man; the priſoner at the bar, meaning Paul: about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with me; applied unto him, interceded with him, and very importunately preſſed and deſired him to give judgment againſt him: both at Jeruſalem and alſo here; at Ceſarea, whither they came from Jeruſalem to accuſe him: crying; in a very noiſy and clamorous way: that he ought not to live any longer; as they did before Lyſias the chief captain, ch. xxii. 22. and ſo in the hearing of Feſtus; for it was his death they ſought, and nothing elſe would ſatisfy them.

Ver. 25. But when I found that he had committed nothing worthy of death, &c.] Which was a public teſtimony of the Apoſtle's innocence, to the great mortification of his enemies, ſome of whom might be preſent; a like teſtimony was given of him by Lyſias, ch. xxiii. 29. And that he himſelf hath appealed to Auguſtus; the emperor Nero; ſee ver. 21. I have determined to ſend him; having had the opinion of his council upon it.

Ver. 26. Of whom I have no certain thing, &c.] No certain crime, charge, or accuſation; nothing of any moment or conſequence, no particular thing, nothing but a heap of confuſed notions, of I know not who or what: to write unto my lord; meaning the Roman emperor, under whom he ſerved as governour of Judea: wherefore I have brought him before you; the whole company then preſent: and eſpecially before thee, O king Agrippa; as being not only a man of eminence, dignity, and authority, but of knowledge in ſuch matters, which the Jews accuſed Paul of; ſee ch. xxvi. 2, 3. That after examination had; of Paul, and his caſe: I might have ſomewhat to write; concerning him, and the charges exhibited againſt him to the emperor.

Ver. 27. For it ſeemeth to me unreaſonable to ſend a priſoner, &c.] A man bound as if he was a malefactor, and guilty of ſome heinous crimes, to Rome, to be tried before Cæſar: and not withal to ſignify the crimes laid againſt him; for which he is a priſoner, and for which he is ſent to the emperor: it ſeemed to Feſtus an abſurd thing, and what might be juſtly looked upon by his maſter, a fooliſh, ſilly, and ſtupid piece of conduct, and void of common ſenſe and reaſon, mere madneſs and folly; to ſend him a priſoner, and not ſignify in his letter to him, what was laid to his charge; and yet this was ſo dark and obſcure, that he could not tell what to make of it, nor what to write to his lord about it; and hoped therefore upon this re-examination of Paul before Agrippa, he ſhould come to a more certain knowledge of this affair, and be better furniſhed to give Nero an account of it, to whom the Apoſtle had appealed.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. THEN Agrippa ſaid unto Paul, &c.] After Feſtus had made the above ſpeech to him, and to all preſent, and had introduced the affair of Paul, who now ſtood before them: thou art permitted to ſpeak for thyſelf; which a priſoner might not do, until he had leave; and this leave was granted by Feſtus the Roman governour, who was properly the judge, and not Agrippa, though the permiſſion might be by both; and ſo the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions read, we have ordered, or permitted thee, &c. Then Paul ſtretched forth the hand; as orators uſed to do, when they were about to ſpeak; or elſe to require ſilence; or it may be to ſhow the freedom of his mind, and how ready he was to embrace the opportunity of pleading his own cauſe; being conſcious to himſelf of his innocence, and relying on the ingenuity and integrity of his judge; and eſpecially of the king, before whom he ſtood: and anſwered for himſelf; or made an apology, or ſpoke in vindication of himſelf, in order to remove the charges brought againſt him.

Ver. 2. I think myſelf happy, king Agrippa, &c.] This was an handſome and artificial way of introducing his defence, and of gaining the affection and attention of the king, and yet was not a mere compliment; for it had been his unhappineſs hitherto, that his caſe was not underſtood; neither Lyſias the chief captain, nor the governors Felix and Feſtus, knew any thing of the rites and cuſtoms of the Jews, and could not tell what to make of the queſtions of their law, of which Paul was accuſed; but it was otherwiſe with Agrippa, he was maſter of them, and this the Apoſtle looked upon as a circumſtance in his own favour: becauſe I ſhall anſwer for myſelf this day before thee; not before him as a judge, for Feſtus was judge, but in his preſence; and he being verſed in things of this kind, was capable of informing, counſelling, directing, and aſſiſting the judge, in what was proper to be done; wherefore it was an advantage to the Apoſtle to plead his own cauſe, and vindicate himſelf before ſuch a perſon, from the charges exhibited againſt him: touching all the things whereof I am accuſed of the Jews; ſuch as violation of the law, profanation of the temple, contempt of the people of the Jews, and their cuſtoms, and of blaſphemy, and ſedition; all which he was able to clear himſelf from, and doubted not but he ſhould do it to the entire ſatisfaction of the king.

Ver. 3. Eſpecially, becauſe I know thee to be expert in all cuſtoms, &c.] Rites and ceremonies of the Jews, whether enjoined by the law of Moſes, or by the elders, fathers, and wiſe men: and queſtions which are among the Jews; concerning angels, ſpirits, and the reſurrection of the dead; which were moved and agitated between the Sadducees and Phariſees; and a multitude of others, which were diſputed between the ſchools of Hillell and Shammai, of which their Miſna and Talmud are full, and with theſe Agrippa was well acquainted; and to their rites and cuſtoms he conformed, of which we have ſome inſtances recorded in their writings: when they went with their firſt-fruits to Jeruſalem[w]; "a pipe ſounded before them till they came to the mountain of the houſe, and when they came to the mountain of the houſe, (the temple) even king Agrippa carried the baſket upon his ſhoulder, and went in till he came to the court." So concerning the reading of the law by a king, they give this following account[x]; "a king ſtands and takes (the book of the law) and reads ſitting; king Agrippa ſtood and took it, and read ſtanding, and the wiſe men praiſed him; and when he came to that paſſage, Deut. xvii. 15. Thou mayeſt not ſet a ſtranger over thee, his eyes flowed with tears; they ſaid unto him, fear not Agrippa, thou art our brother, thou art our brother." Some of their writers ſay[y], this was a piece of flattery in them: they alſo elſewhere commend him for his modeſty and humility[z]; "according to the tradition of the doctors, when perſons attending a funeral met a bride (with her retinue) the former gave way, and both to a king of Iſrael, when they met him; but they ſay concerning king Agrippa, that he met a bride, and gave way, and they praiſed him." And whereas it was forbidden to eat on the eve of the paſſover, before the Minchah, though ever ſo little, that they might eat the unleavened bread with appetite[a]; it is obſerved, that even king Agrippa, who was uſed to eat at the ninth hour, that day did not eat till it was dark[b]: ſo that from hence it appears, that king Agrippa was famous for his exact knowledge and obſervance, of the cuſtoms and manners of the Jews, and which was well known, and was by the Apoſtle: wherefore I beſeech thee to hear me patiently; ſince he was charged with a breach of the laws and cuſtoms of the Jews; and his defence would proceed upon things which Agrippa was not altogether ignorant of.

Ver. 4. My manner of life from my youth, &c.] That is, his conduct and deportment, his behaviour among men, from the time that he was capable of performing religious exerciſes, and of knowing the difference between one ſect and another, and of being obſerved and taken notice of by men: which was at the firſt among mine own nation at Jeruſalem; for though he was born in Tarſus in Cilicia, he was very early brought, or ſent by his parents to Jeruſalem, where he had his education under Gamaliel; ſo that the firſt part of his life was ſpent in Jeruſalem, the metropolis of Judea, and among the Jews there; the more learned and knowing part of them, Gamaliel's pupils, and the wiſe men and their diſciples: and his courſe of life muſt be well known to them, as he ſays, this know all the Jews; that had any knowledge of him, and converſation with him.

Ver. 5. Which knew me from the beginning, &c.] From his youth, from his firſt coming to Jeruſalem: if they would teſtify; what they know, and ſpeak out the truth of things, they muſt ſay, that after the moſt ſtraiteſt ſect of our religion I lived a Phariſee: there were three ſects of religion among the Jews, the Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenes; the firſt of theſe was the moſt exact, and came neareſt to truth of doctrine, and was the ſtricteſt as to outward holineſs of life and converſation, and of this ſect the Apoſtle was; and according to it he lived, and that in ſuch a manner, as not to be charged with any notorious crime; and indeed in his own, and very likely in the opinion of others, he was then blameleſs.

Ver. 6. And now I ſtand and am judged, &c.] Before the Roman governour, and in the preſence of Agrippa: for the hope of the promiſe made of God unto our fathers; either for the hope of righteouſneſs, life, and ſalvation, by the Meſſiah; who was promiſed to the Jewiſh fathers, Abraham, Iſaac, Jacob, and others; ſee Gen. xxii. 18. and xlix. 10. Or for the hope of the reſurrection of the dead, and eternal life; of which there are various teſtimonies in the writings of the Old Teſtament, committed to the people of the Jews, Job xix. 26, 27. Iſa. xxvi. 19. Dan. xii. 2. and others; and both theſe ſenſes may be very well joined together, for it was for aſſerting that the promiſed Meſſiah was come, and that Jeſus of Nazareth was he; that he was riſen from the dead, and that all the dead will be raiſed by him; and that life and righteouſneſs, ſalvation, and everlaſting glory and happineſs, are only by him; for aſſerting theſe things, I ſay, the Apoſtle was now a priſoner, and ſtood at the bar of a Roman judge, being accuſed by the Jews.

Ver. 7. Unto which promiſe, &c.] Of the Meſſiah, and ſalvation by him; and of the reſurrection of the dead, and eternal glory, as following upon it: our twelve tribes inſtantly ſerving God day and night, hope to come; and enjoy the Meſſiah, and all bleſſings along with him, and the happy ſtate of the reſurrection and eternal life: the people of Iſrael were diſtinguiſhed into twelve tribes, according to the names of the twelve patriarchs, the ſons of Jacob; and though ten of the tribes had been carried captive, and had not returned as tribes, yet there were many of the ſeveral tribes, who either were left in the land, or returned along with the two tribes, and were mixed with them: and this way of ſpeaking here uſed by Paul, and alſo by James, ch. i. 1. is juſtified by Jewiſh writers; the Miſnic doctors ſay[c], "the twelve tribes bring twelve heifers, and for idolatry they bring twelve heifers and twelve goats:" compare with this Ezra vi. 17. and viii. 35. yea they ſay[d], "twelve tribes are called, קהל, a congregation, eleven tribes are not called a congregation." This ſuggeſts a reaſon of the Apoſtle's uſe of this phraſe, for he here repreſents the Iſraelites as a worſhipping aſſembly, ſerving God continually, night and day, as they were by their repreſentatives, the prieſts and ſtationary men in the temple; and that with intenſeneſs, ardour, and fervency, as the word rendered inſtantly ſignifies; being in a longing and earneſt expectation of the coming of the Meſſiah, and of his world to come, and of the reſurrection of the dead, and a future ſtate of happineſs. For which hopes ſake, king Agrippa, I am accuſed of the Jews; for preaching that the Meſſiah, the twelve tribes hope for, is already come; and that there is ſalvation in him, and in no other; and that there will be a reſurrection of the dead, both juſt and unjuſt; and that there is another world and ſtate after this, in which men will be happy and miſerable; and theſe were the charges and accuſations, or the ſum of what were exhibited againſt him.

Ver. 8. Why ſhould it be thought a thing incredible with you, &c.] You Heathens and Sadducees; for the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead was thought an incredible doctrine by the Heathens in general, and therefore was laughed at by the Stoic and Epicurean philoſophers at Athens, when preached by the Apoſtle there; and by a particular ſect among the Jews, the Sadducees: and the Apoſtle may be thought either to addreſs himſelf to Feſtus, the Roman governour, and to the chief captains, who were preſent, and being Heathens diſbelieved this doctrine; or elſe to king Agrippa, who might be a Sadducee, and to ſuch of the Sadducees as were in court, and expoſtulate with them, why it ſhould be looked upon as a thing by no means to be credited, that God ſhould raiſe the dead; which may be underſtood both of the particular reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, which was not believed, neither by the Romans nor by the Jews, and neither by Phariſees nor Sadducees; or of the general reſurrection of the dead, which was judged from the nature of things to be impracticable, and impoſſible by the latter, as well as by the Heathens: but ſince God is omniſcient and omnipotent, and juſt and true, knows where every particle of a dead body lies, and can gather all together, and inſpire with life; which he can as eaſily do, as to form all things out of nothing, as he did; and his juſtice and veracity ſeem to require, that the ſame bodies which have been partners with their ſouls in ſinning, or in ſufferings, ſhould ſhare with them in wo or in happineſs; it can neither be abſurd, unreaſonable, nor incredible, to ſuppoſe that God will raiſe them from the dead.

Ver. 9. I verily thought with myſelf, &c.] This ſeems to be a correction of himſelf, why he ſhould wonder at their ignorance and unbelief, particularly with reſpect to Jeſus being the Meſſiah, and his reſurrection from the dead, and expoſtulate with them about it; when this was once his own caſe, it was the real ſentiments of his mind, what in his conſcience he believed to be right and juſt; namely, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jeſus of Nazareth; to him himſelf, to his religion, to his Goſpel, and ordinances, and people; by blaſpheming his name, by denying him to be the Meſſiah, by condemning his religion as hereſy, by diſputing againſt his doctrines, and manner of worſhip, and by perſecuting his followers.

Ver. 10. Which thing I alſo did in Jeruſalem, &c.] The metropolis of Judea, where he had had his education, and was well known; here he conſented to the death of Stephen, and held the clothes of the witneſſes while they ſtoned him; and here he haled men and women out of their houſes, and committed them to priſon, and made havock of the church of Chriſt, and deſtroyed the faith, and thoſe that profeſſed it, as much as in him lay. And many of the ſaints I ſhut up in priſon; at Jeruſalem; ſee Acts viii. 3. having received authority from the chief-prieſts; to take them up, and impriſon them. And when they were put to death; for it ſeems there were more than Stephen put to death, tho' we have no account of them: I gave my voice againſt them; not that he ſat in council, or was a member of the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, and voted for the execution of the Chriſtians, but he was pleaſed with the ſentence they paſſed, and approved of it; or he joined the zealots, who, without any form of law, ſeized on the Chriſtians, and put them to death where-ever they found them; and this he aſſented to, and encouraged: ſome render the words, I carried the ſentence, as the Vulgate Latin verſion; that is, the ſentence of condemnation, which the Jewiſh Sanhedrim paſſed upon the diſciples and followers of Chriſt: this Saul took, and carried, it may be, both to the Roman governour, to be ſigned by him, and to the officers to put it in execution; ſo induſtrious and forward was he in perſecuting the ſaints.

Ver. 11. And I puniſhed them oft in every ſynagogue, &c.] In Jeruſalem, where there were many; ſee the note on ch. xxiv. 12. by beating and ſcourging them there, as the manner was; ſee Matt. x. 17. and compelled them to blaſpheme; the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, both to deny him to be the Meſſiah, and to call him accurſed; as the Jews and Heathens obliged ſome profeſſors of Chriſtianity to do, who were only nominal ones, and had not grace and ſtrength to ſtand againſt their threatnings, and to endure their perſecutions: and being exceeding mad againſt them; full of malice, envy, and hatred: I perſecuted them even to ſtrange cities; particularly Damaſcus; and of his journey thither, he gives an account in the following verſe; or thro' the violence of his perſecution he obliged them to fly to ſtrange cities, where they were foreigners and ſtrangers; tho' he himſelf might not follow them there, ſince we don't read of his going any where but to Damaſcus; whereas they that were ſcattered by the perſecution, in which he was concerned, travelled as far as Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch, ch. xi. 19. The phraſe may be rendered, even to cities without; i. e. without the land of Iſrael: frequent mention is made in Jewiſh writings of ſuch and ſuch cities being חוצה לארץ, without the land.

Ver. 12. Whereupon as I went to Damaſcus, &c.] Being intent, upon the aboveſaid things, to puniſh the ſaints, compel them to blaſpheme, impriſon them, and even put them to death on account of theſe things: upon this errand and buſineſs he went to Damaſcus, the chief city of Syria, where he knew there were many that believed in Chriſt, who had removed from Jeruſalem thither, on account of the perſecution, or were ſettled there before: with authority and commiſſion from the chief-prieſts; the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, to bring thoſe of them at Damaſcus bound to Jeruſalem, in order to be puniſhed, as in ch. ix. 2. and xxii. 5. and which the Ethiopic verſion adds here.

Ver. 13. At mid-day, O king, &c.] So in ch. xxii. 6. This circumſtance is omitted in ch. ix. 3. King Agrippa is called upon by the Apoſtle, to excite his attention to what he was about to relate, it being very wonderful, and of great importance. I ſaw in the way; that is, to Damaſcus, when near the city: a light from heaven; which deſcended from thence: above the brightneſs of the ſun; it was a greater light than that, or otherwiſe it could not have been diſcerned at noon, or have had the effect it had upon Saul, and his company. This account of the greatneſs of the light, is not in the other places where this narrative is given: ſhining round abou about me; ſo in ch. ix. 3. and xxii. 6. and them which journeyed with me; this is not mentioned in the other accounts.

Ver. 14. And when we were all fallen to the earth, &c.] Saul, and the men that were with him, for fear of the divine majeſty, who by this extraordinary light was thought to be preſent: the other narratives only relate Saul's falling to the earth; how this is to be reconciled to their ſtanding ſpeechleſs, in ch. ix. 7. ſee the note there. I heard a voice ſpeaking unto me, &c. ſee the note on ch. ix. 4, 5.

Ver. 15. And I ſaid, who art thou, Lord? and he ſaid, &c.] Or the Lord ſaid, as the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, and Syriac verſions read, I am Jeſus whom thou perſecuteſt; the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions read, Jeſus of Nazareth; ſee the note on ch. ix. 5.

Ver. 16. But riſe and ſtand upon thy feet, &c.] This, and what follows in this and the two next verſes, are not in any of the former accounts; and theſe words are uſed not only becauſe Saul was fallen to the earth, and are an encouragement to riſe up, and ſtand corporally, but to take heart, and be of good cheer; for tho' he had acted ſo vile and cruel a part by Chriſt, and his people, yet he had deſigns of grace, and good-will to him; and this appearance was not for his deſtruction, but for his honour, comfort, and uſefulneſs: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpoſe; not to take vengeance for paſt offences, but for the ends hereafter mentioned: and this appearance of Chriſt was real, corporal, and perſonal, and not imaginary, or merely viſionary and intellectual; and it was to this ſight of Chriſt he more than once refers, partly in proof of Chriſt's reſurrection from the dead, and partly to demonſtrate the truth of his apoſtleſhip, 1 Cor. ix. 1. and xv. 8. to make thee a miniſter and a witneſs, both of thoſe things which thou haſt ſeen, and of thoſe things in the which I will appear unto thee; ſo that he was an Apoſtle, not of men, nor by man, but by Jeſus Chriſt, as he himſelf ſays, Gal. i. 1. He was a miniſter, not of man's making, but of Chriſt's; and they are the only true miniſters of the Goſpel, who are made by Chriſt, who have their miſſion and commiſſion, their qualifications, gifts, and abilities, their doctrine, work, and wages from him: and the Apoſtle's work, as a miniſter, was to be a witneſs; it was to teſtify what he had ſeen of Chriſt corporally; and what knowledge of his perſon, office, and grace was now communicated to him by the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation; and what ſhould hereafter be made known to him, either mediately by Ananias, or immediately by Chriſt and his Spirit; for the Apoſtle had after-appearances, viſions, and revelations; ſee ch. xxii. 17, 18. and xxiii. 11. 2 Cor. xii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7.

Ver. 17. Delivering thee from the people, &c.] That is, the people of the Jews, as they are diſtinguiſhed from the Gentiles; and ſo the Syriac verſion, and two of Beza's copies, and two of Stephens's, read; for the Lord knew, that as ſoon as ever Saul was converted, and profeſſed his name, and preached his Goſpel, the people of the Jews would immediately become his implacable enemies, and ſeek to deſtroy him; wherefore he promiſes him before-hand deliverance, and ſecurity from them: and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I ſend thee; to both Jews and Gentiles; to the Jews firſt, and then to the Gentiles; which method the Apoſtle obſerved, and which courſe he ſteered, until the Jews put away the Goſpel from them; and then he turned to the Gentiles, to whom he chiefly preached, as their Apoſtle, and was ſaved from many dangers among them, as is here promiſed.

Ver. 18. To open their eyes, &c.] The eyes of their underſtandings, which were ſhut, and darkened, and blind: one copy reads, the eyes of the blind; and the Ethiopic verſion renders it, the eyes of their heart; and to have them opened, is to have them enlightened, to ſee their loſt ſtate and condition by nature, the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin, the plague of their own hearts, the impurity of nature, the impotence of man to that which is ſpiritually good, the imperfection of obedience, and the inſufficiency of a man's righteouſneſs to juſtify him before God; and to ſee where help is laid, and where ſalvation is; to behold Chriſt as the only able, willing, compleat, and ſuitable ſaviour; to ſee that there is life and righteouſneſs, peace, pardon, grace, and glory in him; and to have an inſight into the doctrines of the Goſpel, and a glimpſe of the inviſible things of another world. Now tho' this is all the work of the Spirit, by whom only the eyes of the underſtanding are enlightened; yet this is aſcribed to the Apoſtle, not as the efficient cauſe, but as the inſtrument and means thro' preaching of the Goſpel, which the Spirit of God would, and did make uſe of: and to turn them from darkneſs to light; or that they might be turned, as the Vulgate Latin, and all the Oriental verſions render it: by darkneſs is meant, the darkneſs of nature, the darkneſs of ſin, of ignorance, and unbelief, in which all men by nature are; who are in the dark about, and are ignorant of God, and the perfections of his nature; and about ſin, and the evil there is in it, and that comes by it; and the way of peace righteouſneſs and ſalvation by Chriſt; and the work of the Spirit in regeneration and ſanctification upon the heart; and about the ſcriptures of truth, and the doctrines of the Goſpel, and what will be their ſtate and portion in another world; they don't know where they are, what they are, nor where they are going: and in effectual vocation this darkneſs is in a great meaſure removed, and they are turned to light; to God, who is light itſelf, and to Chriſt the light of the world, and to the light of the word, and to a participation of the light of grace here, in which they ſee light, and behold the above things, and of the light of glory hereafter. This is a phraſe uſed by the Jews, at the time of the paſſover, when they praiſe the Lord, and give thanks unto him for the wonders he wrought for their fathers and for them; as that he had brought them out of bondage to liberty, and from ſorrow to joy, and מאפלה לאור גדול, from darkneſs to a great light[*]. Converſion is the end of the Goſpel-miniſtry, and illumination is neceſſary to it; yea, it lies in a turn from darkneſs to light, as is here expreſſed: and this converſion is not a mere external one, or a reformation of manners; this is indeed ſometimes called a converſion, and is a man's turning from the evil of his ways, from a vicious life and converſation, to a ſober way of living, and is often brought about thro' the miniſtry of the word; but then this may be where true converſion is not, and where there is no ſpecial illumination of the Spirit, nor any true ſpiritual light; and there may be a turning again to the former courſe of life; beſides, this external converſion, when it is right and genuine, is the fruit and effect of inward converſion, or true grace, and is at moſt but the evidence of it: nor is it a converſion to a doctrine in a profeſſional way; men may be converted in this ſenſe, and remain wicked; they may have the form, but not the power of godlineſs; know the doctrine and profeſs it, and yet be ſtrangers to the experience of it: nor does it deſign a reſtoration after backſlidings; which ſometimes goes by the name of converſion, ſuch as was Peter's after his fall: but the firſt work of converſion is here meant, which is internal, and is a turn of the hearts of men; and is not the work of man, but of God, who has the hearts of all in his hands, and can turn them as he pleaſes; and is what man is paſſive in, he does not turn himſelf, but is turned by the Lord; tho' miniſters may be, and are inſtruments in it. It follows, and from the power of ſatan unto God: this power of ſatan regards not his power over the reſt of the devils, whoſe prince and head he is; hence he is called the prince of devils, and the prince of the power of the air; but his power over the world of men, which he has by uſurpation, and therefore is called the prince of the world; but not his power over the bodies of men, by poſſeſſing them, inflicting diſeaſes, and death itſelf upon them, nor over their eſtates; all which is only by permiſſion of God, whenever he exerciſes it; but over the ſouls of men, in whom he rules as in his own kingdom: he is the ſtrong man armed, and the hearts of men are his palaces, which are guarded with devils and unclean luſts; when all the goods are kept in peace by him, there's no concern about ſin, no enquiry after ſalvation, no dread of the curſes of the law, nor fear of hell and damnation, but all in the utmoſt ſecurity: and he not only dwells in the hearts of unregenerate perſons, but he works effectually there; by ſtirring up their corruptions, putting ill things into their minds, and inſtigating them againſt true ſpiritual and powerful religion, and the profeſſors of it: he has power over the minds of them that believe not, to blind them, by keeping them in blindneſs, and increaſing it; which he does by diverting their minds from hearing the Goſpel; and whilſt hearing it, by filling them with enmity againſt it. Moreover, they are led by him as captives at his will; they are in his power, as the bird is in the ſnare of the fowler, and as a priſoner in the hands of a jailor; and are entirely at his beck and command, and do his luſts, and obey his will: and this alſo may have a particular reſpect to the power and authority which he exerciſed over the Heathens, before the Goſpel came among them; ſatan uſurped a power over the Gentile world, and took upon him to be the God of it; and for many hundreds of years was worſhipped in their idols; and he held them faſt bound unto him in the fetters of ignorance, ſuperſtition, and idolatry; but now the Goſpel was ſent among them to free them from this power and tyranny of his; and it was made effectual to the turning of multitudes of them from him, and ſubjection to him, which is done in the effectual vocation of every perſon; not that ſatan then has no more power over them to tempt and diſtreſs them, but not to rule over them, and lead them about at pleaſure, and much leſs to devour and deſtroy them: and then alſo are they turned to God, to have true knowledge of him, and an hearty deſire after him, which they had not before; and to a love of him, whoſe hearts before were enmity to him; and to believe in him, and truſt in him as the God of providence, and of grace; and to have communion with him; and to be ſubject to his government, and yield a chearful obedience to him, both externally and internally. That they may receive forgiveneſs of ſins; as an act of God's free grace, thro' the blood of Chriſt, which was ſhed for it; and which free and full forgiveneſs of ſins is publiſhed in the Goſpel, that whoever believes in Chriſt, may by faith receive it. This is what every enlightened ſoul ſees it needs, and is deſirous of; it is the firſt thing it wants, and aſks at the hands of God; and nothing can be more ſuitable to its caſe, and welcome to it; and this is the good news which is declared in the miniſtry of the Goſpel: and it is had in a way of receiving; for it is not purchaſed with money, nor procured by the merits of men; but is a gift of God, which is received by the hand of faith into the conſcience of the enlightened ſinner; the conſequences of which are peace, joy, and comfort. And inheritance among them which are ſanctified by faith that is in me: by the inheritance is meant, either ſomething enjoyed now, as God himſelf, who is the portion of his people, and the lot of their inheritance; or a part and intereſt in Chriſt, who is that good part and portion which ſhall never be taken away; and the bleſſings of grace in him, which, beſides forgiveneſs of ſins, are peace with God, a juſtifying righteouſneſs, and adopting grace: or rather eternal glory and happineſs hereafter is here deſigned, which is called an inheritance or lot, in alluſion to the land of Canaan, which was diſtributed by lot; not that heaven is a caſual thing; but it ſignifies that every Iſraelite indeed will have their ſhare and portion in it. There are many things which ſhow an agreement between heaven, and the land of Canaan; that was a goodly land, and ready prepared for the Iſraelites; and ſo heaven is the better country, and the city and kingdom God has prepared for his people from the foundation of the world: a wilderneſs was paſſed thro' firſt, and many battles fought before it was poſſeſſed; the people of God paſs thro' the wilderneſs of this world, and fight the good fight of faith, and then enter into reſt: the Iſraelites were introduced into it, not by Moſes, but by Joſhua; and ſaints get to heaven, not by the works of the law, but by Chriſt the Saviour, another Jeſus or Joſhua: and laſtly, Canaan was a place of reſt; and ſo is heaven. Moreover, it may be ſo called, in alluſion to inheritances among men, tho' it vaſtly exceeds all earthly ones, being incorruptible, undefiled, which fadeth not away, reſerved in the heavens; yet it bears ſome likeneſs to them; it is what is bequeathed to the children of God by their heavenly Father, and comes to them thro' the death of Chriſt the teſtator, and is for ever: it is neither purchaſed nor acquired, but is freely given; belongs only to the children of God, and is their Father's free gift unto them, and is only enjoyed by ſuch who are ſanctified; and it lies among them, and will be jointly and equally poſſeſſed by them. The heirs of ſalvation are ſaid to be ſanctified in different ſenſes; they are ſanctified by God the Father in eternal election, being ſeparated from others, and choſen thro' ſanctification to it; and they are ſanctified in and by the Lord Jeſus Chriſt: they are ſanctified in him repreſentatively, he being the covenant-head of his people, has all grace, and ſo all holineſs in him for them, which is perfect and compleat; and this is the ſource of all that holineſs that is in them, and which they have communicated to them by virtue of their union to him; and alſo they are ſanctified in him thro' the imputation of the holineſs of his human nature to them, which is a branch of their juſtification before God; and they are ſanctified by him meritoriouſly, or by his blood, thro' which their ſins are expiated, and fully atoned for; and ſo in this ſenſe they are ſanctified by it: and they are ſanctified internally by the Spirit of God, who in regeneration produces principles of grace and holineſs in them, which were not there before; man was originally poſſeſſed of a perfect moral holineſs, but thro' ſin is become an unholy creature; and in the ſame ſtate and condition are the children of God by nature, as others, and need the ſanctifying influences of the divine Spirit to make them meet for the undefiled inheritance: and this inheritance theſe ſanctified ones receive by faith now, as they do the forgiveneſs of their ſins; that is, they now receive by faith the promiſe of the inheritance, and the earneſt and pledge of it, and their right unto it, and claim upon it: for the phraſe, by faith that is in me, is not to be connected with the word ſanctified, but with the word receive, in the preceding clauſe; and has reſpect to both benefits, which it receives from Chriſt, the object of it here expreſſed; for it is not any faith, but faith which is in Chriſt, by which theſe bleſſings of grace are received and enjoyed: and the whole of this ſhows the great ends and uſefulneſs of the Goſpel-miniſtry.

Ver. 19. Whereupon, O king Agrippa, &c.] Having been favoured with this illuſtrious appearance of the Lord, and with this declaration and commiſſion from him: I was not diſobedient unto the heavenly viſion; to Chriſt himſelf, who appeared from heaven in ſo much light and glory, and ſpoke unto him, and appointed him what he ſhould be, and do, and declared what uſe he ſhould be of: he did not diſbelieve what Chriſt ſaid, nor was he diſobedient to the orders he gave, but immediately ſet about the work he called him to, without conſulting fleſh and blood; ſee Gal. i. 16.

Ver. 20. But ſhewed firſt unto them of Damaſcus, &c.] The Jews at Damaſcus, to whom the Apoſtle firſt preached; ſee ch. ix. 20, 22. and at Jeruſalem, and throughout all the coaſts of Judea; obſerving the order of his miſſion, ver. 17. tho' it was not until after he had been in Arabia, and had returned to Damaſcus, that he went to Jeruſalem, and preached there; ſee Gal. i. 17, 18. compared with Acts ix. 28. and then to the Gentiles; as at Antioch in Piſidia, at Iconium, Derbe, and Lyſtra in Lycaonia; and at Philippi, Theſſalonica, and Berea in Macedonia; and in many places in Greece and Aſia, as at Athens, Corinth, Epheſus, and others, as this hiſtory ſhows; and indeed he preached the Goſpel from Jeruſalem round about to Illyricum: that they ſhould repent; that is, that they ſhould repent of their ſins; of ſin in general, as it is committed againſt God, is a tranſgreſſion of his law, and as it is in itſelf exceeding ſinful, and in its effects dreadful; and of particular ſins, ſuch as men have been more eſpecially addicted to, and of which the Jews and Gentiles, the Apoſtle was ſent unto, and to whom he preached, had been guilty: as the former of their will worſhip, and following the commandments and traditions of men, thereby making void the law of God; of their rejection and crucifixion of the Meſſiah; of their perſecution of his Apoſtles, miniſters, and people; and of their truſt in, and dependance upon their own righteouſneſs for juſtification: and the latter of their immoralities, ſuperſtition, and idolatry; and both not of the outward groſs actions of life only, but of inward ſins and luſts: and repentance of each of theſe lies in a different ſentiment of them; in a deteſtation and abhorrence of them; in ſhame and confuſion on account of them; in ſelf-reflexions upon them, and humiliation for them; in an ingenuous acknowledgment of them, and turning from them: and this is not a national repentance, which the miniſters of the Goſpel are to ſhew to men the neceſſity of; tho' this is not unworthy of them, when there is a call in providence to it, and the ſtate of things require it; much leſs a legal one, but an evangelical repentance; which has along with it faith in Chriſt Jeſus, dealing with his blood and righteouſneſs for the remiſſion of their ſins, and their juſtification before God; and which ſprings from, and is encouraged and heightened by a ſenſe of the love of God: and now this being a part of the Goſpel-miniſtry, does not ſuppoſe it to be in the power of men to repent of themſelves, ſince no man whilſt he remains inſenſible of the evil nature of ſin, and the hardneſs of his heart continues, which none but God can remove, can repent; and when he becomes truly ſenſible, he then prays to God to give him repentance, and to turn him: nor does it at all contradict its being a bleſſing of the covenant, a gift of Chriſt, and a grace of the Spirit of God; nor does it ſuggeſt, that the preaching of the word is ſufficient of itſelf to produce it; the contrary of which the miniſtry of John the Baptiſt, of Chriſt, and of his Apoſtles, declare; but the deſign of its being inſiſted on in the Goſpel-miniſtry, is to ſhew that men are ſinners, and in ſuch a ſtate and condition, that they are in need of repentance, and that without it they muſt periſh; and the rather this is to be frequently inculcated, ſince true repentance is unto life, is the beginning and evidence of ſpiritual life, and iſſues in eternal life; and ſince there is a cloſe connexion between that and ſalvation, and that without it there is no ſalvation. It follows, and turn to God; this is to be underſtood, not of the firſt work of converſion, which is God's work, and not man's act, and in which man is paſſive, and which is before repentance, whereas this follows upon it; tho' the miniſters of the word have a concern with this; to bring about this is the deſign and uſe of their miniſtrations; their buſineſs is to ſhew the nature of converſion, what it is, and wherein it lies; to rectify miſtakes about it, and to obſerve the neceſſity of it: but here is deſigned a turning to God, in conſequence of the grace of firſt converſion; by an acknowledgment and confeſſion of ſin to God, by an application to him for pardoning-grace and mercy, by a truſt and dependance on him for righteouſneſs, life, and ſalvation, and by obedience to his commands and ordinances. It intends a turning of the Jews from their evil principles and practices, from the traditions of their elders to the law of God, the Goſpel of Chriſt, and the ordinances of it, and of the Gentiles from their idols to the worſhip of the true and living God: and do works meet for repentance; the ſame with fruits meet for repentance, Matt. iii. 8. And ſuch as are particularly mentioned in 2 Cor. vii. 11. they are they which are the reverſe of the evil actions they have been guilty of, and which are properly good works. And they are they which are done according to the will of God declared in his word, this is a requiſite of a good work; what is not according to the word of God is not a good work, nor can it be any evidence of repentance; and they are alſo ſuch as ſpring from love to God, for if they are done thro' fear of puniſhment, or for ſiniſter and ſelfiſh ends, they ſhew repentance to be a mere legal one; and they are ſuch as are done in faith, in the name and ſtrength of Chriſt, and to the glory of God by him. All external good works are deſigned, which ſhow, that the inward repentance profeſſed, and that the outward change made in religion and worſhip, are genuine and ſincere: the doctrines of internal repentance, and outward ward worſhip, and all good works, are parts of the Goſpel-miniſtry, and to be inſiſted on in their proper places.

Ver. 21. For theſe cauſes the Jews caught me in the temple, &c.] He means the Aſiatic Jews, who finding him in the temple, laid hold on him, and dragged him out of it: and, as he ſays, went about to kill me; for no other reaſon, but for preaching to the Gentiles, and for preaching the above doctrines to them: what he refers to is in chap. xxi. 27—31.

Ver. 22. Having therefore obtained help of God, &c.] Both to preach the Goſpel, and eſcape danger; for he had delivered him many a time both from Jews and Gentiles, according to his promiſe, ver. 17. and particularly from the Aſiatic Jews, when they were about to kill him, by the means of Lyſias the chief captain, who reſcued him out of their hands; and alſo from the lying in wait of the Jews to take away his life, and the various methods they uſed both with Felix and Feſtus to get him into their power: but the Lord appeared for him, and ſaved him from all their pernicious deſigns againſt him; and therefore he could ſay as follows, I continue unto this day; in the land of the living, tho' in bonds: witneſſing both to ſmall and great; to kings and ſubjects, as now to Agrippa, Feſtus, the chief captains and principal inhabitants of Ceſarea, and to the common people aſſembled; to high and low, rich and poor, bond and free, male and female, young and old; to perſons of every ſtate, age, and ſex: ſaying none other things than thoſe which the prophets and Moſes did ſay ſhould come. This he mentions in oppoſition to the charge againſt him, as that he ſpoke againſt the law of Moſes, as well as againſt the temple, and the people of the Jews; whereas his doctrine was perfectly agreeable to the writings of Moſes, and the prophets, concerning the Meſſiah, they ſpeak of in many places, and the Jews expected. There's an entire harmony and agreement between the writings of Moſes, and the prophets of the Old Teſtament, and the Apoſtles of the New, in all the doctrines of the Goſpel-revelation; in the doctrine of a Trinity of perſons in the unity of the divine eſſence, and of the proper deity of each perſon; in the doctrines reſpecting the perſon, offices, and work of Chriſt; that he is the Son of God, God and man in one perſon, and the only mediator between God and man; and that he is prophet, prieſt, and king; and that the great work he was appointed to, undertook, and came about, and has fulfilled, is the redemption of his people; and in the ſeveral doctrines of grace concerning the choice of men to ſalvation, the covenant made with Chriſt on account of them, their redemption, juſtification, and pardon, their repentance and good works, the reſurrection of the dead, and a future ſtate: the particular things inſtanced in, the Apoſtle preached, and Moſes and the prophets ſaid ſhould be, and in which they agreed, are as follow.

Ver. 23. That Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, &c.] Great afflictions in ſoul and body, and death itſelf; this is recorded by Moſes, Gen. iii. 15. and is the ſenſe of many of the types, as of the paſſover, brazen ſerpent, &c. and of all the ſacrifices which from God were appointed by him, and is the conſtant account of all the prophets from the beginning to the end; ſee Pſ. xxii. 1, 2, 6, 7, 11—21. Iſ. liii. 2, 3. to the end, Dan. ix. 26. Zech. ix. 9. and xii. 10. and xiii. 6, 7. The ſufferer is Chriſt, or the Meſſiah, not the Father, nor the Spirit, but the Word, or Son of God, and not in his divine nature, which was uncapable of ſuffering, but in his human nature; tho' ſufferings may be aſcribed to his whole perſon, both natures being united in him; and hence they became efficacious to anſwer the purpoſes for which they were endured; and which he endured, not for himſelf, nor for angels, but for choſen men, ſinners, and ungodly perſons; in order to make peace and reconciliation for them, procure the pardon of their ſins, obtain eternal redemption for them, deliver them from all evil, and from all enemies, and bring them nigh to God: and what he ſuffered were no other than what had been foretold in the writings of the Old Teſtament, which all along repreſent the Meſſiah as a ſuffering one; and in particular that he ſhould ſuffer in his character, be reproached, and accounted a worm, and no man, Iſ. liii. 3. Pſ. xxii. 6. and lxix. 9. and in his ſoul and body, and be put to death and buried, as the above propheſies referred to ſhew; the ſeveral circumſtances leading on to, or attending his ſufferings and death, are diſtinctly expreſſed; as the betraying him by one of his diſciples, ſelling him for thirty pieces of ſilver, his being forſaken by all his diſciples, his crucifixion between two thieves, the parting of his garments, giving him gall and vinegar to drink, and the piercing his ſide with a ſpear, Pſ. xli. 9. Zech. xi. 12, 13. and xiii. 7. Iſ. liii. 12. Pſ. xxii. 18. and lxix. 21. Zech. xii. 10. And to this agreed the doctrine of the Apoſtle, who taught, that Jeſus of Nazareth was the Chriſt that was to come, and that he had ſuffered all that Moſes and the prophets did ſay ſhould come upon him: but theſe were not the preſent ſentiments of the Jews, who expected the Meſſiah to be a temporal prince and ſaviour, and to live in great outward proſperity, and for ever. And that he ſhould be the firſt that ſhould riſe from the dead; by his own power, and to an immortal life, as Jeſus did; and ſo is the firſt-born from the dead, and the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept: a type of this, in the deliverance of Iſaac, is recorded by Moſes in Gen. xxii. 12, 13, 14. compared with Heb. xi. 19. and the thing itſelf is foretold by many of the prophets, Pſ. xvi. 10. Iſ. xxvi. 19. Hoſ. vi. 2. and ſhould ſhew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles; in his own perſon to the people of the Jews, and by his Apoſtles to the Gentiles. In the writings of Moſes he is ſpoken of as the great prophet God would raiſe up in Iſrael, to whom they ſhould hearken; and as the Shiloh to whom the gathering of the people ſhould be, Deut. xviii. 15. Gen. xlix. 10. and that he ſhould be a light to both Jews and Gentiles, thro' the miniſtration of the Goſpel, is ſaid by the prophets, Iſ. ix. 2. and xlii. 6. and xlix. 6. and theſe were the things which the Apoſtle aſſerted in his miniſtry, in perfect agreement with thoſe writings.

Ver. 24. And as he thus ſpake for himſelf, &c.] Aſſerting the integrity and innocence of his paſt life and converſation, in proof of which he appealed to the Jews themſelves; ſetting forth the prejudices to the chriſtian religion he had been under; declaring the heavenly viſion that had appeared to him, and the divine orders he had received; alledging, that in his miniſtry there was an entire harmony between him, and the writings of Moſes, and the prophets, for which the Jews profeſſed a veneration: as he was thus vindicating himſef, ere he had well finiſhed his apology, Feſtus ſaid with a loud voice; that all might hear, and being moved with reſentment at what he had heard; and it may be, he was diſpleaſed with Paul that he took ſo much notice of Agrippa, and ſo often addreſſed him, and appealed to him, when he ſcarce ever turned to, or looked at him: Paul, thou art beſide thyſelf; not in thy ſenſes, or right mind, to talk of ſuch an appearance and viſion, and eſpecially of the reſurrection of a perſon from the dead. This is no unuſual thing for the miniſters of the Goſpel to be reckoned mad men, and the doctrines they preach madneſs and folly: our Lord himſelf was ſaid to be beſide himſelf, and to have a devil, and be mad; and ſo were his Apoſtles, Mark iii. 21. John x. 20. 2 Cor. v. 13. and it is not to be wondered at, that natural men ſhould entertain ſuch an opinion of them, ſince what they deliver is quite out of their ſphere and reach: Feſtus added, much learning doth make thee mad; the Apoſtle was a man of much learning, both Jewiſh, Greek, and Roman; and Feſtus perceived him to be of great reading by his making mention of Moſes, and the prophets, writings which he knew nothing at all of. And as this ſometimes is the caſe, that much reading, and hard ſtudy, do cauſe men to be beſide themſelves, he thought it was Paul's caſe: ſo the philoſopher [f] ſuggeſts, that men of great wit and learning, and who are cloſely engaged in ſtudy, whether in philoſophy, or politicks, or poetry, or in technical affairs, are inclined to be melancholy, and phrenetic.

Ver. 25. But he ſaid, I am not mad, moſt noble Feſtus, &c.] That is, Paul ſaid, as the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions read: he replied to Feſtus, to whom he gives his title of honour, not out of fear, nor flattery, but according to cuſtom; and tho' he uſed him in ſuch a reproachful manner, as if he was not himſelf, which he denies; nor did what he had ſaid ſhew any thing of that kind, but the reverſe, to which he appeals: but ſpeak forth the words of truth and ſoberneſs; which are true in themſelves, being perfectly agreeable to the ſcriptures of truth; and are what Chriſt, who is truth itſelf, had ſpoken, and of which he is the ſubject; and which the ſpirit of truth leads into, and owns and bleſſes: the Goſpel in general, and all the doctrines of it, are words of truth; they are true, in oppoſition to that which is falſe, there is nothing of falſhood in them, no lye is of the truth; and to that which is fictitious, as the counterfeit Goſpel of falſe teachers, which looks like the Goſpel, and has the appearance of truth, but in reality is not; and to that which is but ſhadow, the Goſpel, and the truths of it, are ſolid and ſubſtantial ones; hence the law and truth are oppoſed to each other, John i. 17. and there are particular doctrines of the Goſpel, and ſuch as the Apoſtle had been ſpeaking of, or referred unto, which are called truth, words of truth, and faithful ſayings; as that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of God; that he is God manifeſt in the fleſh, or is God and man in one perſon; that he came into the world to ſave the chief of ſinners; that he ſuffered, died, and roſe again from the dead; that juſtification is by his righteouſneſs; and that as he is the firſt that roſe from the dead, others will riſe alſo; or that there will be a reſurrection of the dead by him; ſee 1 John ii. 21, 22. 1 Tim. iii. 15, 16. and i. 15. 1 Cor. xv. 1, 3, 4. Gal. iii. 1. 2 Tim. ii. 18. And theſe are words of ſoberneſs alſo; they are words of the higheſt wiſdom, which contain the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, even hidden wiſdom, the deep things of God, and ſuch as could never have been found out by the wiſdom of men; they are the means of bringing a man to himſelf, to his right mind, who before was not himſelf; of cauſing a man to think ſoberly of himſelf, and not more highly than he ought to think, even to think of himſelf, that he is the chief of ſinners, and the leaſt of ſaints; and of ſpeaking ſoberly, wiſely, and prudently; and of living ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly: they are doctrines, as delivered by the faithful miniſters of them, which come from a ſound and ſober mind, and have a tendency to make wiſe and ſober; and therefore ſhould be ſpoken forth, openly and boldly, freely and faithfully, conſtantly and continually, as they were by the Apoſtle, whatever reproaches, calumnies, and reflexions may be caſt upon them for ſo doing, even tho' they may be called fools and madmen.

Ver. 26. For the king knoweth of theſe things, &c.] Something of them, of the ſufferings and reſurrection of the Meſſiah, and of his ſhewing light to Jews and Gentiles, as they are ſpoken of by Moſes and the prophets, whoſe writings Agrippa was converſant with, and of theſe things as fulfilled in Jeſus of Nazareth; at leaſt he had heard the report of them, how that they were ſaid to be accompliſhed in him. Before whom alſo I ſpeak freely; becauſe of the knowledge he had of theſe things: for I am perſuaded that none of theſe things are hidden from him; as that Moſes and the prophets have foretold them, and that they have had their fulfilment in Jeſus; for this thing was not done in a corner; the miniſtry of Jeſus was public, his miracles were done openly, his ſuffering the death of the croſs under Pontius Pilate was generally known, and his reſurrection from the dead was a well-atteſted fact, and the miniſtration of his Goſpel to Jews and Gentiles was notorious. The Arabic and Ethiopic verſions refer this to Paul's words and actions, that what he had ſaid and done were not private but public, and of which Agrippa had had by one means or another a full account; but the other ſenſe is beſt.

Ver. 27. King Agrippa, believeſt thou the prophets? &c.] What they have ſaid concerning the perſon, office, ſufferings, death, and reſurrection of Chriſt, and that what they have ſaid is fulfilled in Jeſus of Nazareth? I know that thou believeſt; that what the prophets ſaid were true, and are accompliſhed.

Ver. 28. Then Agrippa ſaid unto Paul, &c.] Either ſeriouſly or ironically; rather the former, ariſing from the convictions of his mind, which he could not ſtifle nor conceal: almoſt thou perſuadeſt me to be a chriſtian; to profeſs faith in Jeſus as the Meſſiah, to embrace his doctrine, and ſubmit to his ordinances, which is to be a chriſtian, at leaſt externally: and when he ſays almoſt, or in a little, his meaning is, that within a little, or very near, he was of being perſuaded to embrace chriſtianity; or in a little matter, and in ſome reſpects; or rather in a few words, and in a ſmall ſpace of time, Paul had ſtrangely wrought upon him to incline to the chriſtian religion; tho' the firſt ſenſe, that he was almoſt, or within a little of being a chriſtian, ſeems to be the beſt, as appears by the Apoſtle's reply to it: what it is to be a real chriſtian, ſee the note on chap. xi. 26. An almoſt chriſtian is one that has much light and knowledge, but no grace; he may know ſomething of himſelf and of ſin, of its being a violation of the law of God, and of the bad conſequences of it, but has not true repentance for it; he may know much of Chriſt in a ſpeculative way, concerning his perſon and offices, as the devils themſelves do, and of the good things which come by him, as peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and ſalvation;

[f] Ariſtotel. Problem. ſ. 30.

but has no application of theſe things to himſelf; he may have a large notional knowledge of the doctrines of the Goſpel, but has no experience of the power, ſweetneſs, and comfort of them in his own ſoul; all his knowledge is unſanctified, and without practice: he is one that has a taſte of divine things, but has not the truth of them; he may taſte of the heavenly gift, of the good word of God, and of the powers of the world to come; yet it is but a taſte, a ſuperficial one, which he has; he does not ſavour and reliſh theſe things, nor is he nouriſhed by them: he has a great deal of faith in the hiſtorical way, and ſometimes a bold confidence and aſſurance of everlaſting happineſs; but has not faith of the right kind, which is ſpiritual and ſpecial, which is the faith of God's elect, the gift of God, and the operation of his ſpirit; by which the ſoul beholds the glory, fulneſs and ſuitableneſs of Chriſt, under a ſenſe of need, and goes forth to him, renouncing every thing of ſelf, and lays hold upon him, and truſts in him for ſalvation; and which works by love to Chriſt and his people, and has with it the fruits of righteouſneſs: he may expreſs a great deal of flaſhy affection to the word, and the miniſters of it, for a while, but has nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial in him; he may partake of the Holy Ghoſt, of his gifts largely, but not of ſpecial and internal grace; and indeed he can only be an almoſt chriſtian, that becomes one merely thro' the perſuaſion of men: it is one part of the Goſpel-miniſtry to perſuade men, but this of itſelf is ineffectual; a real chriſtian is made ſo by the power of divine grace. Agrippa was only perſuaded, and but almoſt perſuaded by the Apoſtle to be a chriſtian, but not by the Lord, nor altogether, who perſuades Japheth to dwell in the tents of Shem.

Ver. 29. And Paul ſaid, I would to God, &c.] This prayer of the Apoſtle's ſhews his affection for the ſouls of men, and his great deſire for their converſion, and alſo his ſenſe of the power and grace of God, as neceſſary to it: that not only thou, but alſo all that hear me this day, were both almoſt and altogether ſuch as I am; that is, his wiſh was that not only Agrippa, but that all that were preſent, were not only within a little, or in ſome low degree, but entirely, in the higheſt and fulleſt ſenſe, chriſtians, as he was; that they knew as much of Chriſt, and had as much faith in him, and love to him, as he had, and were as ready to ſerve and obey him: he does not wiſh that Agrippa and the reſt that heard him, were as he had been, a bigot for traditions and ceremonies, that truſted in his own righteouſneſs, did many things contrary to the name of Jeſus, was a blaſphemer of him, a perſecutor of his ſaints, and an injurious perſon; but as he now was, not meaning with reſpect to his civil circumſtances, as a mean poor man, and a tent-maker, or with reſpect to his ſingle ſtate of life, which he elſewhere adviſes to, 1 Cor. ix. 5. or with reſpect to his miniſterial capacity, as an Apoſtle of Chriſt, and a preacher of the Goſpel; but as a chriſtian, and in a private capacity: his ſenſe is, he wiſhed, that they were as he, regenerated by the ſpirit of God, new creatures in Chriſt, called by the grace of God with an holy calling, believers in Chriſt, lovers of him, pardoned by his blood, juſtified by his righteouſneſs, ſanctified by his grace, children of God, and heirs of eternal life: and all this he wiſhes for of God, ſaying, would to God, &c. knowing that the whole of this is not of men, but of God; all grace, and every bleſſing of it, which make or ſhew a man to be a chriſtian indeed, are from him. And this wiſh is expreſſive of true grace, which deſires the good of others, and alſo of a ſpirit truly generous, that is not ſelfiſh and monopolizing; and which is concerned for the glory of God, the intereſt of Chriſt, and the weakening of ſatan's kingdom: and from the whole of this it appears, that a perſon may arrive to true ſatisfaction of his own ſtate; and that it is an evidence of grace, when the heart is drawn out in deſires, after the ſalvation of others; and that altogether chriſtians are the only deſireable ones; and that to be made a real chriſtian, is the work of God, and to be aſcribed to him. This the Apoſtle wiſhed for, for Agrippa and all that heard him; as does every Goſpel-miniſter for their hearers, the hearing of the word, being the ordinary means of believing; and the rather it is deſired by them, becauſe the condemnation of thoſe that hear the word is otherwiſe thereby aggravated: the Apoſtle adds, except theſe bonds; which were both troubleſome and reproachful: not but that he chearfully endured them himſelf, and thought it the duty of chriſtians to bear them patiently, when called to it, but then they were not things to be deſired and wiſhed for; the exception is not only chriſtian like, but humane and genteel.

Ver. 30. And when he had thus ſpoken, &c.] Theſe words are omitted in the Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions: the king roſe up; from the judgment-ſeat; that is, king Agrippa: and the governour; the Roman governour, Feſtus: and Bernice; the ſiſter of king Agrippa: and they that ſat with them; either in council, or to hear; the chief-captains, and principal inhabitants of Ceſarea.

Ver. 31. And when they were gone aſide, &c.] Into ſome apartment adjoining to the judgment-hall: they talked between themſelves; that the common people might not hear their debates, and the reſult of them, and what were their ſentiments concerning Paul and his caſe: ſaying, this man doth nothing worthy of death, or of bonds; according to the Roman laws; for as yet there were no law among the Romans, againſt the chriſtians as ſuch, or againſt their profeſſing and preaching Chriſt.

Ver. 32. Then ſaid Agrippa unto Feſtus, &c.] As declaring his ſenſe, and by way of advice and counſel; but not as determining any thing himſelf, for that lay in the breaſt of Feſtus, the Roman governour and judge: this man might have been ſet at liberty; from his bonds and impriſonment; for ought that appears againſt him, or any law to the contrary: if he had not appealed unto Cæſar; wherefore an inferior judge could not releaſe him; but ſo it was ordered in divine providence, that he ſhould appeal to Cæſar, that he might go to Rome, and there bear a teſtimony for Chriſt; however, this declaration of Agrippa, and what he and the governour and the reſt, ſaid among themſelves, are a conſiderable proof of the innocence of the Apoſtle.

C H A P. XXVII.

Ver. 1. A*ND when it was determined that we ſhould ſail into Italy*, &c.] The chief city of which was Rome, the metropolis of the empire, where Cæſar had his palace, to whom the Apoſtle had appealed; and his voyage thither was determined by Feſtus, with the advice of Agrippa and his council, purſuant to the Apoſtle's appeal, and which was founded on the will of God; all which concurred in this affair: it was the decree and will of God, that the Apoſtle ſhould go to Rome, which was made known to him; and it was his reſolution upon that, to go thither, wherefore he appealed to Cæſar; and it was the determination of the Roman governour, not only as to his going there, but as to the time of it, which was now fixed: the Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions read, he inſtead of we; and the Ethiopic verſion reads expreſsly Paul; but the Greek copies read we; by whom are meant the Apoſtle, and his companions; as Luke the writer of this hiſtory, and Ariſtarchus the Macedonian mentioned in the next verſe, and Trophimus the Epheſian, who was afterwards left at Miletus ſick, 2 Tim. iv. 20. and who elſe cannot be ſaid; theſe were to ſail with him to Italy, not as priſoners, but as companions: this reſolution being taken, they delivered Paul and certain other priſoners; who very likely had alſo appealed to Cæſar, or at leaſt the governour thought fit to ſend them to Rome, to have their caſes heard and determined there; and theſe by the order of Feſtus were delivered by the centurions, or goalers, in whoſe cuſtody they had been, unto one called Julius; in the Alexandrian copy of the 3ᵈ verſe, he is called Julianus; he was either one of the Julian family, or rather was one that had been made free by ſome of that family, and ſo took the name: a centurion of Auguſtus band; of a Roman band of ſoldiers, which belonged to that legion which was called Auguſta; for it ſeems there was a legion that bore that name, as Lipſius obſerves, and it may be from Auguſtus Cæſar.

Ver. 2. And entring into a ſhip of Adramyttium, &c:] Which was in the port of Ceſarea; for from thence they ſet ſail to the place where this ſhip was bound, which very likely was the place here mentioned: there was a city of this name in Africa, and which was built upon the ſea-ſhore, and is ſometimes called Hadrumentum [g], as this is called Adramantos, in the Syriac verſion; and in the Alexandrian copy, and in another manuſcript, a ſhip of Adramyntum; it is mentioned with Carthage, a city in Africa, by Pliny [h] and Solinus [i]; the one calls it Adrumetum, and the other Adrymeto; and the latter ſays, that it, as well as Carthage, was built by the people of Tyre; and ſo Salluſt [k] ſays, that the Phœnicians built Hippo, Adrumetum, Leptis, and other cities on the ſea-coaſt; and the name ſeems to be a Phœnician name חרדמות, Hadarmuth, which ſignifies the court of death; perhaps it might be ſo called, either from the badneſs of the air in which it was, or the dangerouſneſs of its haven: Jerom calls it Hadrumetus, and ſays [l] it is a city in Byzacium, a country in Africa; he ſeems to deſign another place, the metropolis of the Byzacian country, the moſt fruitful of all the parts of Africa, and which in the Phœnician language was, חרדמאות, Hadarmeoth; which ſignifies, the court of a hundred; that is, it was a place ſo fruitful that it brought forth a hundred fold; and agreeable to which is what Pliny ſays [m], they are called Libyphœnicians, who inhabit Byzacium, a country ſo named, in circuit two hundred and fifty miles, and of ſuch great fruitfulneſs that the land returns to the huſbandmen an hundred-fold. The former of theſe is moſt likely to be the place here meant; and tho' we no where read of the Apoſtle being here, nor of the Goſpel being preached here in the early times of chriſtianity; yet in the fourth century there was a church in this place, and Philologus was biſhop of it, who ſubſcribed at a council held at Carthage in this century; and in the fifth century we read of ſeveral biſhops of this place, as Aurelius, who was in the Chalcedon council, Flavianus in that at Epheſus, which was reckoned an infamous one, and Helladius who was in the firſt Epheſine council, and Felix, who was baniſhed by Genſericus [n]. There was another city of the ſame name in Æolia, or Myſia [o], and which was formerly called Pedaſus, and ſince Landermiti, and was a ſea-port, and bids fair to be the place here intended; tho' ſince there was an iſland of Lycia called Adramitis [p], now Andromety, and it was at Myra, a city of Lycia, where this ſhip ſtopped, ver. 5. and where the paſſengers changed their ſhip, this ſeems moſt likely to be deſigned: we lanched; in the ſaid ſhip from Ceſarea: meaning to ſail by the coaſt of Aſia; the leſſer Aſia, along by Epheſus and Miletus, as they did; for in this laſt place, as before obſerved, Trophimus was left ſick; the Alexandrian copy reads, μελλοντι, that was about to ſail; that is, the ſhip of Adramyttium, was about to ſail, or juſt ready to ſail by the coaſt of Aſia, wherefore the company entred, and ſet forth in it on their voyage: one Ariſtarchus a Macedonian, of Theſſalonica, being with us; the ſame perſon that was with the Apoſtle at Epheſus, and accompanied him into Aſia, chap. xix. 29. and xx. 4. the ſame went thro' with him to Rome, and became his fellow-labourer, and fellow-priſoner there, Philem. ver. 24. Col. iv. 10.

Ver. 3. And the next day we touched at Sidon, &c.] This was a famous city in Phœnicia, upon the northern border of the land of Iſrael; it was a maritime place, and noted for trade and navigation; Mela [q] calls it rich Sidon, and the chief of the maritime cities; Jerom [r] calls it the ancient city Sidon; and Curtius ſays [s], it was renowned for the antiquity and fame of its founders; it is thought to be built by Sidon, the firſt-born of Canaan, Gen. x. 15. from whom it took its name; ſo Joſephus [t] affirms, that Sidonius, as he calls him, built a city in Phœnicia after his own name, and it is called by the Greeks Sidon; ſome ſay it was built by Sidus the ſon of Ægyptus, and named after him: according to R. Benjamin [u], it was a day's journey from hence to Tyre; and with others [w], it was not more than two hundred furlongs, about twelve or thirteen miles, which was another city of Phœnicia, as this was: Jerom's [x] account of Sidon is this, "Sidon a famous "city of Phœnicia, formerly the border of the "Canaanites, to the north, ſituated at the foot of "mount Libanus, and the artificer of glaſs:" and ſo Pliny [y] calls it, it being famous for the making of glaſs; and Herodotus [z] ſpeaks of it as a city of Phœnicia: Juſtin the hiſtorian ſays [a], it was built by the Tyrians, who called it by this name from the plenty of fiſh in it; for the Phœnicians call a fiſh Sidon: and indeed Sidon or Tzidon ſeems to be derived from צוד, Tzud, which ſignifies to fiſh; and the place is to this day called Said or Sait; and ſo R. Benjamin calls it Tzaida [b]: to this city they came from Ceſarea, the day following that they ſet out on, and here they ſtopped a while: and Julius courteouſly entreated Paul; the centurion into whoſe hands the Apoſtle was delivered, uſed him with great humanity and civility; he found grace in his ſight, as Joſeph did in the ſight of Potiphar, and as he himſelf had done before with Lyſias, Felix, Feſtus, and Agrippa: and gave him liberty to go unto his friends to refreſh himſelf; for as there were diſciples at Tyre, chap. xxi. 3, 4. ſo it ſeems there were at Sidon, both which cities were in Phœnicia, and are often mentioned together; and the Apoſtle was allowed to go aſhore, and viſit his friends, and be refreſhed by them, both in body and ſpirit, and be provided for by them, with things convenient for his voyage. It is highly probable that there was here a Goſpel-church, but by whom planted cannot be ſaid; our Lord himſelf was at the borders of this place, Matt. xv. 21. and the miniſters of the word ſcattered at the death of Stephen, went as far as Phœnicia preaching the Goſpel, Acts xi. 19. and that there were brethren there, appears from chap. xv. 3. ſee the note there, in which country Sidon was: in the third century there was a church in this place, and Zenobius was preſbyter of it, who ſuffered martyrdom under Diocleſian[c]; in the fourth century there was a biſhop of the church here, at the ſynod held at Nice; in the fifth century the biſhop of the Sidonians, in the council of Chalcedon, declared his opinion with others againſt Dioſcorus, whoſe name was Damianus; in the ſixth century, mention is made of a biſhop of Sidon, in the acts of the council held at Rome and Conſtantinople, and in the ſame century a ſynod met at Sidon, in the 20th year of Anaſtaſius the emperor[d]: the account of the biſhops of Sidon, as given by Reland[e], is as follows; Theodorus biſhop of Sidon ſubſcribed in the firſt Nicene council, in the year 325. Paulus ſubſcribed in the firſt council at Conſtantinople, in the year 381. Damianus was in the council held at Chalcedon, in the year 451. Megas is mentioned in the acts and epiſtles ſubjoined to the Chalcedon council; Andreas, biſhop of this place, is taken notice of in a letter of John of Jeruſalem.

Ver. 4. And when we had lanched from thence, &c.] From Sidon: we ſailed under Cyprus, becauſe the winds were contrary; that is, they ſailed below the iſland of Cyprus; of which ſee chap. iv. 36. and xiii. 4. whereas if the wind had been right for them, they would have ſailed above the iſland; leaving it on the right hand, in a ſtrait courſe to Myra; but now they were obliged to go below it, leaving it on the left hand, going in part about it, thro' the ſeas of Cilicia and Pamphylia to Lycia, as follows.

Ver. 5. And when we had ſailed over the ſea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, &c.] For theſe two ſeas joined, as Pliny ſays[f], mare Pamphylium Cilicio jungitur, the Pamphylian ſea is joined to the Cilician; and in another place[g] he obſerves, that in the Pamphylian ſea were iſlands of no note, and in the Cilician ſea of the five chiefeſt was Cyprus (an iſland mentioned in the preceding verſe), and a little after the ſea of Cilicia is diſtant from Anemurius fifty miles: we came to Myra a city of Lycia; not Limyra in Lycia, tho' that lay by the ſea-ſide; for according both to Pliny[h] and Ptolomy[i], Limyra and Myra were two diſtinct places in Lycia; which was a country according to the latter, which had on the weſt and north Aſia; (according to others, Caria on the weſt, and part of Lydia on the north) on the eaſt part of Pamphylia, and on the ſouth the Lycian ſea, or as others the Rhodian ſea: much leſs was this the city of Smyrna, as ſome have ſaid, which lay another way in Ionia, over againſt the Ægean ſea; and ſtill leſs Lyſtra, as the Alexandrian copy, and Vulgate Latin verſion read, which was in Lycaonia, and in the continent many miles from the ſea: Lycia was a country of the leſſer Aſia, and lay between Caria and Pamphylia, and ſo it is mentioned with Caria and Pamphylia, in 1 Maccab. xv. 23. and the Carians, Pamphylians, and Lycians, are frequently put together in hiſtory; and the Lycians are ſaid[k] to be originally of Crete, and to have their name from Lycus the ſon of Pandion; tho' ſome think that Lycia took its name a luce, from light, and of this country Myra was the metropolis: Ptolomy calls it Myrra, as if it had the ſignification of Myrrhe; and ſo Jerom or Origen[l] reads it here, and interprets it bitter; but Pliny and others call it Myra, as here, and it ſignifies ointment; and here the Apoſtle ſtaying ſome time, tho' it cannot be ſaid how long, no doubt opened the box of the precious ointment of the Goſpel, and diffuſed the ſavour of it in this place; for in the beginning of the fourth century in Conſtantine's time, we read of one Nicolaus a famous man, biſhop of Myra in Lycia, who was preſent at the council of Nice, and there ſhewed the ſcars and marks upon him, becauſe of his conſtant confeſſion of Chriſt under Maximinus; in the fifth century there was a biſhop of this place, whoſe name was Romanus, and was in two ſynods, in the infamous one at Epheſus, where he favoured Eutyches, and in that at Chalcedon; in the ſixth century mention is made of a biſhop of this church in the acts of the ſynod at Rome and Conſtantinople; in the ſeventh century Polyeuctus biſhop of Myra, was in the ſixth ſynod at Conſtantinople, and in this century Myra was the metropolitan church of Lycia; in the eighth century Theodorus biſhop of it, was in the Nicene ſynod; and in the ninth century, this place was taken by the Saracenes[m].

Ver. 6. And there the centurion found a ſhip of Alexandria, &c.] Alexandria was the chief city in Egypt, built by Alexander the great, from whom it took its name; it was ſituated near the ſea, and had a famous haven or port, which R. Benjamin[n] calls הנמל של אלכסנדריאה, the port of Alexandria; from hence ſhips were ſent into ſeveral parts for trade and commerce, and one of theſe Julius found at Myra: the topſail was a diſtinguiſhing ſign of a ſhip of Alexandria, for none might ſpread their top-ſails but ſhips of Alexandria[o]; theſe were not obliged to ſtrike ſail when they came into a port: the Jewiſh writers make frequent mention of ספינה אלכסנדרית, a ſhip of Alexandria[p]; by which they intend a ſhip of a large bulk, which had a ciſtern in it for freſh water for a long voyage; and by this they diſtinguiſh ſhips of bulk from thoſe ſmall ones, that were uſed about their coaſts; a ſhip of Alexandria with them was a ſhip that went from the land of Iſrael to Alexandria; whereas here it ſeems to deſign one that belonged to Alexandria, and went from thence to other parts: and this ſhip was ſailing into Italy; and it was uſual for ſhips to go from Alexandria to Puteoli in Italy, and from thence to Alexandria upon trade and buſineſs [q]: and he put us therein; the centurion removed Paul and his companions, and the reſt of the priſoners, with whatſoever ſoldiers were under his care, out of the ſhip of Adramyttium, into the ſhip of Alexandria; that is, he ordered them to remove out of one into the other.

Ver. 7. And when we had ſailed ſlowly many days, &c.] Becauſe of contrary winds, as in ver. 4. or elſe for want of wind, as ſome think; the Syriac verſion renders it, and becauſe it ſailed heavily; that is the ſhip, being loaden with goods: and ſcarce were come over-againſt Cnidus; or Gnidus, as it is ſometimes called; it was a city and promontory in Doris, in the Cherſoneſe or peninſula of Caria, famous for the marble ſtatue of Venus made by Praxiteles [r]; it was over-againſt the iſland of Crete, and is now called Capo Chio; it was the birth-place of Eudoxus a famous philoſopher, aſtrologer, geometrician, phyſician and lawgiver [s]; it is made mention of in 1 Maccab. xv. 23. Jerom [t] ſays, it was a famous iſland over-againſt Aſia, joining to the province of Caria; ſome think it has its name from the fiſh Gnidus, which is taken about this place, and which is of ſuch an extraordinary nature, that when taken in the hand it ſtings like a nettle; others [u] derive it from ענד, hanad, or Gnad, which in the Phœnician language ſignifies, to join; becauſe as both Pauſanias and [w] Strabo [x] ſay, it was joined by a bridge or cauſeway to the continent: it had two ports in it, as the laſt mentioned writer ſays, but into neither of them did the ſhip put, in which the Apoſtle was; nor do we read of the Goſpel being preached here, or of a church in it until the ſixth century, when mention is made of a biſhop of Gnidus in the acts of the ſynod at Rome and Conſtantinople [y]: the wind not ſuffering us; to go right forward, as the Syriac verſion adds: we ſailed under Crete; or below it, as in ver. 4. This is now called Candy; ſee the note on chap. ii. 11. over-againſt Salmone; now called Capo Salamone: this by Pliny [z], Ptolomy [a], and Mela [b], is called Samonium or Sammonium, and by them ſaid to be a promontory in the iſland of Crete, on the eaſt ſide of it, over-againſt the iſland of Rhodes; Strabo calls it Salmonion, an eaſtern promontory of Crete; and Jerom a maritime city of the iſland of Crete.

Ver. 8. And hardly paſſing it, &c.] That is Salmone, with great difficulty, becauſe of the winds: came unto a place which is called, the fair havens; called by other writers Cale Acte, or the fair ſhore, and is placed by Ptolomy [c] in Eubœa, and by Herodotus [d] in Sicily; but by Stephanus [e], is ſaid to be a city of the Cretians, and which agrees with this account: nigh whereunto was the city of Laſea; there was a city in Crete called by Solinus [f] Liſſon, and by Ptolomy [g] Lyſſus, which he places on the ſouth ſide of the iſland; and by Pliny [h] Laſos, which comes pretty near to this name, but then he places it in the midland part of Crete; who alſo makes mention of an iſland called Laſia over-againſt Troezenium, and another that was one of the Cyclades; the Syriac verſion here reads, Laſia: Jerom [i] ſays, Laſea is a city on the ſhore of the iſland of Crete, near the place which is called the fair havens, as Luke himſelf explains it; for which ſome corruptly read Thalaſſa; as do the Vulgate Latin, and Ethiopic verſions; and the Alexandrian copy Alaſſa: Beza conjectures that it is the ſame with Elæa, which Pliny makes mention of in the above cited place, as a city in Crete.

Ver. 9. Now when much time was ſpent, &c.] In ſailing againſt the wind, or by ſtaying at the fair havens; for ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, where we ſtayed a long time; and the Ethiopic verſion, and there we remained many days: it follows, and when ſailing was now dangerous, becauſe the faſt was now already paſt; the Syriac verſion reads, the faſt of the Jews; this was the day of atonement, which was the grand faſt of the Jews, on which day they afflicted their ſouls, Lev. xxiii. 27. in memory of the worſhipping of the golden calf; on that day they neither eat nor drink, nor do any work, neither do they waſh, nor are they anointed, nor do they bind on their ſhoes, or make uſe of the marriage bed; nor do they read any thing but ſorrowful things, as the lamentations of Jeremiah, until the ſetting of the ſun, and the riſing of the ſtars; and hence this day is called by them יום צום, the day of faſting, and צום הגדול, the great faſt, and the day of the faſt of atonement, and the faſt of the atonement [k]: now this day was on the tenth of the month Tiſri, which anſwers to the latter part of our September, and the former part of October; ſo that it was now Michaelmas time, when winter was coming on, and ſailing began to be dangerous; about this time of the year the Pleiades ſet, which brings on tempeſtuous weather, and unfit for ſailing: Paul admoniſhed them; or gave them ſome advice to continue where they were.

Ver. 10. And ſaid unto them, Sirs, I perceive, &c.] Not only by the tempeſtuous weather which they had met with, and ſtill continued, and which they muſt expect to have, if they continued on their voyage; but by a ſpirit of prophecy, which he was endued with, by which he foreſaw, and ſo foretold, as follows; that this voyage will be with hurt, and with much damage not only of the lading and ſhip, but alſo of our lives; or of our perſons, or bodies, that is, of the health of them; for certain it is that it was revealed to the Apoſtle, that not one life ſhould be loſt; but yet thro' the ſhipwreck, what with the fright of it, and being in the water, much damage muſt acrue to their perſons, as well as the ſhip and all its freight be loſt.

Ver. 11. Nevertheleſs, the centurion believed the maſter and the owner of the ſhip, &c.] Who were either one and the ſame perſon, or if two perſons, the one was the owner, whoſe the ſhip was, and the other, he that was at the helm, and ſteered and directed it; or the one might be the captain, and the other the pilot. The κυβερνητης or governour, as he is here called with the ancients, was he who ſat on an eminence in the ſtern of the ſhip, at the helm, and had the direction of it; he gave the orders which others executed: what qualified him for his poſt, chiefly lay in three things; in the knowledge of the conſtellations, and winds, of the former that he might direct the courſe of the ſhip according to them, and by them foreſee future tempeſts, and of the latter, that he might be acquainted with the ſeveral points, from whence they blew; alſo in the knowledge of ports, and places to put into, and of rocks and ſands, that they might be eſcaped; likewiſe in the knowledge of the uſe of the helm, and ſails [l]; for one part of his buſineſs, as [m] Seneca obſerves, was to give orders after this manner; ſo and ſo move the helm, ſo and ſo let down the ſails, &c. in every ſhip there was a governour, and in larger ones ſometimes there were two; [n] Ælianus ſays, the Carthaginians had always two governours in a ſhip: the other word ναυκληρος, is in the Gloſſary rendered navicularius, which ſignifies the owner of the ſhip, and ſo we render it; tho' perhaps he is the ſame with the proreta, who governed the prow or head of the ſhip, and was the next in dignity to the governour, and a kind of a ſub-governour; and his buſineſs was to obſerve tempeſts, to explore promontories, rocks and ſands, and ſhew them to the governour [o]; and ſo Iſidore [p] ſays, the owner of the ſhip is called Naucleros, becauſe the ſhip is in his lot, cleros ſignifying lot: and as theſe beſt underſtood naval affairs, Julius gave more heed to what they ſaid, and rather believed them, than thoſe things which were ſpoken by Paul; by a ſpirit of prophecy, which he had no notion of; for, tho' he treated him civilly as a man, he had no regard to him as a chriſtian, or as one endued with the Spirit of God, which he knew nothing of.

[k] Vid. Schindler. Lex. Pentaglott. p. 890. & Maimon. Shebitat Aſhur, c. 1. §. 1, 4, 5, 6. & Miſn. Yoma, c. 8. §. 1.

Ver. 12. And becauſe the haven was not commodious to winter in, &c.] Which was called, the fair havens, ver. 8. which name it might have by an Antiphraſis, it being juſt the reverſe; it might be a good ſummer haven, but not be fit for winter: perhaps it might be an open road or bay, and having nothing to ſhelter from the boiſterous waves, was a place very improper for a ſhip to be in, in ſtormy weather; for in open places, as bays and roads, the ſea tumbles in very violently in bad weather: this was a haven fit for fair weather only, and therefore might be ſo called: the more part adviſed to depart thence alſo; the major part of the ſhip's company, were of the ſame opinion with the maſter and owner of it, and adviſed as well as they, to ſail from the fair havens in queſt of a better port; the Syriac verſion reads, the moſt of ours, of the Apoſtle's companions; ſo that they were againſt him, according to that verſion, which is not likely; however, the majority in the ſhip were for ſailing: if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter, which is an haven of Crete, and lieth toward the ſouth-weſt and north-weſt: this place is called in the Syriac verſion Phœnix; and Ptolomy [q] makes mention both of the city and haven of Phœnix, as on the ſouth ſide of the iſland of Crete: and whereas it is here ſaid to lie towards the ſouth-weſt and north-weſt, this may be reconciled to that, as well as to itſelf; for the haven conſidered in general lay towards the ſouth, but having its windings and turnings, with reſpect to them it lay towards both the ſouth-weſt and the north-weſt, and ſo was a very commodious haven to winter in.

Ver. 13. And when the ſouth wind blew ſoftly, &c.] Or moderately, which was a good wind for them: ſuppoſing that they had obtained their purpoſe; that things would ſucceed according to their wiſh, and favour their deſign: looſing thence; from the fair havens; the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions render it, looſing from Aſſos; which could not be Aſſos of Troas mentioned in Acts xx. 13. which was many miles from hence; rather Aſum a town in Crete, of which Pliny [r] makes mention, tho' according to him, it ſeems to be an inland town; wherefore it is beſt to take the word ασσον to be an adverb, and render it thence as we do; or join it with the next word, and render it, they came near, or they ſailed cloſe by Crete; along the ſhore, the wind favouring them, that they were in no danger of being daſhed upon it, it being a ſoft, gentle wind.

Ver. 14. But not long after, &c.] They had not been long at ſea, but there aroſe againſt it; the ſhip, or the iſland of Crete, or both: a tempeſtuous wind, called Euroclydon; in the Greek text it is a Typhonic wind, ſo called, not from the name of a country from whence it blew; rather from Typho the ſame with Python, an heathen deity, who is ſaid to be drowned in the lake Serbonis, or in the river Orontes; about which places this ſort of wind is obſerved to be frequent, and which may take its name from him, being ſuppoſed to be raiſed by him. This wind may very well be thought to be the ſame which is called Typhon, and is by writers [s] repreſented as a very tempeſtuous one, as a ſort of whirlwind or hurricane, a violent ſtorm, tho' without thunder and lightning; and Pliny [t] calls it the chief plague of ſailors, it breaking their ſails, and even their veſſels to pieces; and this may ſtill have its name from Typho, ſince the Egyptians uſed to call every thing that is pernicious and hurtful, by this name; moreover, this wind is alſo called Euroclydon. The Alexandrian copy reads Euracylon, and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion ſeems to have read, rendring it Euro-aquilo, the north-eaſt wind. The Ethiopic verſion renders it, the north wind; but according to Ariſtotle [u], and Pliny [w], the wind Typhon never blew in the northern parts; tho' ſome think that wind is not meant here, ſince the Typhon is a ſudden ſtorm of wind, and ſoon over; whereas this ſtorm of wind was a ſettled and laſting one, it continued many days; and that it is only called Typhonic, becauſe it bore ſome likeneſs to it, being very bluſtering and tempeſtuous: it ſeems by its name to be an eaſterly wind, which blew very violently, plowed the ſea, and lifted up its waves; hence the Arabic verſion renders it, a mover or ſtirrer up of the waves; which beat againſt the ſhip in a violent manner, and expoſed it to great danger.

Ver. 15. And when the ſhip was caught, &c.] By the wind, ſnatched up by it, and forcibly carried away: and could not bear up into the wind; and againſt it, or look it in the face, as the word ſignifies; could not ply to windward, the wind being ſo high and the ſea ſo ſtrong: we let her drive; about the ſea, at pleaſure, it being in vain to attempt to get her forward againſt the wind, or to direct her courſe.

Ver. 16. And running under a certain iſland, &c.] Or below a certain iſland, and hard by; it or under the ſea-ſhore of it, where the ſea might be ſmoother, the wind not being there ſo ſtrong: which is called Clauda: by Ptolomy [x] it is called Claudus, and was near the iſland of Crete, and now called Gozo. The Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions, and ſome copies read Cauda; and there was an iſland near to Crete, which was called Gaudos [y], and is thought to be the place here meant: we had much work to come by the boat; which they had with them to go aſhore in, or to betake themſelves to in caſe of ſhipwreck; and which in this ſtorm was in danger of being daſhed to pieces againſt the ſhip or loſt; and it was with ſome difficulty that they came at it, and took it up into the ſhip.

Ver. 17. Which when they had taken up, &c.] When they had got the boat into the ſhip: they uſed helps; the mariners made uſe of other perſons, called in the aſſiſtance of the ſoldiers, and paſſengers, and priſoners; or for the help of the ſhip they made uſe of cords, chains, and ſuch like things: undergirding the ſhip; with cords and ropes, which they drew under the keel of the ſhip, and ſo bound both ſides of the ſhip, that it might not ſplit and fall to pieces; which may be what is now called frapping, and is done by putting large ropes under the keel, and over the gunwale; and is uſed when a ſhip by labouring hard in the ſea breaks the bolts in her ſides, and this keeps her from parting. Horace [z] refers to this uſe of ropes in tempeſts, when he ſays, Nonne vides ut—ſine funibus vix durare carinæ poſſint imperioſius Æquor? dont you ſee that without ropes the keels can ſcarcely endure the more imperious ſea? Iſidorus [a] makes mention of ſeveral ſorts of ropes made uſe of in ſtorms; ſpiræ, he ſays, are ropes that are uſed in tempeſts, which the mariners after their manner call curcubæ; tormentum, is a long rope in ſhips, according to the ſame writer, which reaches from head to ſtern, by which they are bound faſter together: and fearing leſt they ſhould fall into the quickſands; which were on the African coaſt, here called Syrtes; either from the conflux of ſand and ſlime, and ſuch like things, which made them very dangerous for ſhipping, and being covered with water, could not be ſeen and guarded againſt, and eſpecially in a ſtorm; or from their drawing of veſſels into them, which they retain, ſuck in and ſwallow up; and ſuch the mariners might know were not far off: there were two very remarkable ones on the coaſt of Africa, the one is called the greater Syrtis, the other the leſſer [b]; the greater was more to the ſouth than the leſſer, and alſo more to the eaſt, and the leſſer was to the weſt: of theſe Syrtes, Jerom [c] ſays, they are ſandy places in the great ſea very terrible, and to be feared, becauſe they uſe to draw all into them; they are near the Egyptian ſea; the Lybian ſea which waſhes the African ſhore, is by Seneca called from them the Syrtic ſea: wherefore, they ſtrake ſail; let down their ſails; ſo read ſome manuſcripts in New College Oxford; in the Greek text it is, they let down the veſſel; not the boat they had taken in, of which we read after; nor an anchor, or anchors, which would have been improper in a ſtorm; nor the maſt, it can hardly be thought that ſhould be the firſt thing they ſhould cut down, when they did not caſt out the tackling till the third day; the ſtorm was vehement on the firſt, more vehement on the ſecond, when they lightned the ſhip, and moſt vehement on the third, when they caſt out the tackling; and as Scheffer [d] obſerves, the maſt is never cut down before the loſs of other things; wherefore this is to be underſtood of letting down the ſail-yard, and contracting the ſails; the Syriac verſion renders it, we let down the main-ſail; or the ſail, uſing the Greek word Armenon, which ſignifies a ſail: and ſo were driven; about in the ſea, whereſoever the winds and waves carried them; or very likely the ſhip was driven before the wind under her bare poles.

Ver. 18. And we being exceedingly toſſed with a tempeſt, &c.] Sometimes being lifted up as it were to the heavens, and then preſently ſinking down, as if they were going into the bottom of the ſea; ſuch a condition at ſea is deſcribed to the life by the Pſalmiſt, in Pſal. cvii. 25, 26, 27. the next day they lightned the ſhip; of its burthen, its lading, the goods and merchandize that were in it; as the mariners did in the ſhip in which Jonah was, Jon. i. 5. the Ethiopic verſion renders it, they caſt the goods into the ſea; the Arabic verſion, the merchandize.

Ver. 19. And the third day, &c.] From the time this ſtorm began, and this tempeſtuous weather held: we caſt out with our own hands the tackling of the ſhip; by which ſeems to be meant their naval ſtores and inſtruments, as ſails, ropes, cables, anchors, &c. and yet we afterwards read of their anchors and main-ſail: it may be rendred, the furniture of the ſhip; and yet it cannot deſign the ſhip's proviſions, at leaſt all were not caſt away; for afterwards mention is made of caſting out the wheat into the ſea: many verſions render it, the armament of the ſhip; and the Ethiopic verſion adds, and arms; the ſoldiers arms, and others which belonged to the ſhip, which were brought with them to defend themſelves againſt an enemy: theſe the hiſtorian ſays, we caſt out; the Apoſtle Paul's company, Luke and others; but not without the leave and order of the centurion and governour of the ſhip: the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, they caſt out; which ſeems moſt probable.

Ver. 20. And when neither ſun nor ſtars in many days appeared, &c.] The Syriac verſion adds, nor moon; which is an uſual deſcription of dark cloudy and tempeſtuous ſeaſons; and which was not only uncomfortable to them, becauſe they could not ſee theſe luminaries, and enjoy their beneficial light and influence; but becauſe they had them not to guide and direct them; for the ſun, moon, and ſtars are uſeful to ſailors, to ſteer their courſe by; eſpecially they were to the ancients, before the invention and uſe of the loadſtone; beſides, by theſe they conjectured what weather it would be, as mariners ſtill do; they obſerved the riſing and ſetting of the ſun, whether it ſhone with equal rays or not, and whether it was red and fiery, or pale; and the like obſervations they made upon the moon, both as to its colour and bigneſs; and eſpecially the conſtellations and ſtars were of ſingular uſe unto them; and above all the two bears, the greater and the leſſer; the Greeks obſerved the former, and the Phœnicians the latter; and who are ſaid by Pliny, to have firſt found out the uſe of the conſtellations in navigation; particularly this is aſcribed to the famous philoſopher Thales, who is ſaid to be a Phœnician; and from other conſtellations, as Arcturus, Orion, Hyades, &c. they foreſaw rains, ſtorms, and tempeſts : and now what made the caſe of the Apoſtle and the ſhip's company the more diſtreſſing, was, that it was not only dark and cloudy, but very tempeſtuous, as follows; and no ſmall tempeſt lay on us; and all this continued many days: ſo Virgil [f] repreſents Æneas and his company, in a like condition at ſea, as not able by the heavens to diſtinguiſh day from night, nor to direct their courſe, neither ſun, nor ſtars appearing, and ſo wandered about in the ſea three days without the ſun, and as many nights without a ſtar; and Homer [g] deſcribes Ulyſſes, in a violent ſtorm at ſea, and for the ſpace of nine days toſſed about, when on the tenth day he got to land; and Soſia in Terence [h] is brought in ſaying, that he had been thirty days in a ſhip, expecting death every moment, ſo boiſterous was the ſtorm he was in; and ſo it was in this caſe, the winds blew hard upon them, and the rains fell with great violence, and every thing was diſcouraging and diſtreſſing; inſomuch that, all hope that we ſhould be ſaved was then taken away; neither the maſter and owner of the ſhip, nor the mariners, nor the ſoldiers, nor priſoners, nor the Apoſtle's companions had any hope of being ſaved, but all expected to be loſt. The Apoſtle himſelf knew indeed, that tho' the ſhip would be loſt, every man's life would be ſaved; and yet he could have no hope of this, as to the outward appearance of things, but on account of the revelation which the Lord had made to him, and he believed; otherwiſe, as to all human helps and means, there was no probability of an eſcape.

Ver. 21. But after long abſtinence, &c.] From food; not for want of it, as appears from what follows, ver. 36—38. nor in a religious way, in order to obtain the favour of God; but either for want of appetite, and a nauſeouſneſs and loathing of food, thro' the toſſing of the ſhip, fright at the ſtorm, and fears of death; and chiefly for want of time, being employed for the ſecurity of themſelves and the ſhip. Paul ſtood forth in the midſt of them; that all might hear him: and ſaid, ſirs, ye ſhould have hearkened unto me: it would have been better for them to have taken his advice, and ſtaid at the fair havens, and not have looſed from Crete; or failed from thence: and to have gained this harm and loſs; whereby they would have ſhunned the injuries of the weather, the ſtorm and tempeſt which they had endured, to the prejudice of their health, and the terrifying of their minds, and have prevented the loſs of the goods and merchandize of the ſhip, and its tackling, utenſils, inſtruments, and arms; the former of theſe is expreſſed by harm or injury, and the latter by loſs. The Apoſtle addreſſes them in a very courteous manner, and does not uſe ſharp reproofs, ſevere language, or upbraid and inſult them, only reminds them of the counſel he had given, which had it been taken, would have been to their advantage; and the rather he mentions this, that ſince what he had foretold was in part already come to paſs, they might give the more heed to what he was about to ſay to them.

Ver. 22. And now I exhort you to be of good cheer, &c.] To take heart and courage, and not be caſt down, tho' things had been thus with them, and they were now in a very melancholy plight and condition. For there ſhall be no loſs of any man's life among you, but of the ſhip; the ſhip will be loſt, but not one perſon in it: there will be a ſhipwreck, and ſo every man's life will be in danger, and yet not one will periſh; and therefore there was reaſon to be of good cheer, ſince this was what they could not, and did not expect, all hope of being ſaved was gone: wherefore this, if they could but believe it, muſt be good news to all the company; and in order to engage them to believe it, the Apoſtle adds,

Ver. 23. For there ſtood by me this night the angel of God, &c.] One of the miniſtring ſpirits that ſtand before God, and who was ſent by him to the Apoſtle; and appeared to him, either in a viſion by a dream, or rather when he was awake, and ſtood by him, as he was praying for deliverance from the ſtorm; for it is moſt likely that the Apoſtle ſhould be ſo engaged at ſuch a time as this: whoſe I am, and whom I ſerve; meaning not the angel, but God, whoſe the angel was; and his the Apoſtle was, by electing, redeeming, and calling grace; God the Father had choſen him in his Son unto ſalvation; and Chriſt had redeemed him by his blood; and the holy Spirit had called him by his grace: and he was not only the Lord's in common, as all other ſaints are, but he was his Apoſtle and miniſter, and ſerved him in the miniſtration of the Goſpel of Chriſt, as well as from a principle of grace, obeyed the law of God, and was ſubject to the ordinances of Chriſt; in all which he ſerved with great pleaſure and chearfulneſs, diligence, conſtancy, and faithfulneſs; from right principles, and with right views, being conſtrained by love, and influenced by the conſideration of the relation he ſtood in to God. And all this was not peculiar to the Apoſtle, but common to all the ſaints, excepting that of his being an Apoſtle and miniſter of the Goſpel: and the conſideration of their relation to God has the ſame influence upon them, it had upon him; they are not their own, nor are they the ſervants of men, nor do they belong to ſatan, nor even to the miniſtring angels, but they are the Lord's; not merely by creation, as all men are, but in a way of ſpecial grace: they are Jehovah the Father's, to whom he bears a peculiar love and favour, and whom he has choſen in his Son for his peculiar people; and which is made manifeſt and known by drawing them with loving-kindneſs to himſelf in effectual vocation; by his Goſpel coming in power to them; by the bleſſings of the covenant of grace being beſtowed on them; and by the Spirit of adoption witneſſing to them, that they are the children of God: they are Jehovah the Son's, they are his people made willing in the day of his power; they are his portion aſſigned him by his Father; they are his ſpouſe and bride, whom he has betrothed to himſelf; they are his children, to whom he ſtands in the relation of the everlaſting Father; and they are his ſheep the Father has given him, and he has laid down his life for; all which appears by their having his Spirit, as a ſpirit of regeneration and ſanctification, without which none are openly and manifeſtatively his: and they are Jehovah the Spirit's; they are his regenerated and ſanctified ones; they are his workmanſhip, having his good work of grace begun and carrying on in their ſouls; they are his temples in which he dwells; he has the poſſeſſion of them, and will not leave them, till he has brought them ſafe to glory: and under all this evidence, and eſpecially thro' the teſtimony of the Spirit of God unto them, they call themſelves the Lord's, as the Apoſtle here does, and this engages them to ſerve him. The natural man has no deſire, but an averſion to the ſervice of God; converted men are willing to ſerve him, and delight to do it; they ſerve God in the beſt manner they can, in righteouſneſs and true holineſs, in an acceptable manner, with reverence and godly fear, and heartily and willingly; as appears by the pleaſure they take in being called the ſervants of God, by diſclaiming all other lords, by running all riſques to ſerve the Lord, and by lamenting it, that they ſerve him no better.

Ver. 24. Saying, fear not Paul, &c.] For tho' the Apoſtle knew and believed he ſhould go to Rome, and appear before Cæſar, to whom he had appealed, and where he ſhould bear a teſtimony for Chriſt; and tho' he had previous notice of this ſtorm, and of the loſs and damage which ſhould be ſuſtained, and which he expected; yet the fleſh was weak, and he might be under ſome fears and miſgivings of heart, for theſe ſometimes attend the beſt of men. Thou muſt be brought before Cæſar; as has been declared, and therefore can't be loſt in this ſtorm; it is the will and decree of God, which can't be fruſtrated, it muſt be: and lo, God hath given thee all them that ſail with thee; that is, God had determined to ſave the whole ſhip's company for his ſake, and in anſwer to his prayers, which he had been putting up for them; the Lord had heard him, and granted his requeſt, and would ſave them all on his account: ſo ſometimes God ſaves a nation, a city, a body of men, even of ungodly men, for the ſake of a few that fear his name, who are among them.

Ver. 25. Wherefore, ſirs, be of good cheer, &c.] Which he repeats with more fervency and earneſtneſs, there being ſo much reaſon for it: for I believe God, that it ſhall be even as it was told me: true faith lays hold, and ſettles upon the word and promiſes of God; and the true believer knowing his power and faithfulneſs, is firmly perſuaded, that there ſhall be a performance of what is ſaid by him, with reſpect to matter, manner, and circumſtances. Whatever God has told his people of, or has promiſed unto them, ſhall be performed, whether with reſpect to things temporal; that they ſhall not want any good thing; that all their afflictions ſhall be for their good; that they ſhall be ſupported under them, and at laſt brought out of them: or whether with reſpect to ſpiritual things; whatever he has ſaid concerning himſelf, that he will be their God, will continue to love them, will not leave them, nor forſake them, will guide and protect them, will ſupply all their need, and give them grace here, and glory hereafter; and whatever he has ſaid concerning his Son, that he is their ſaviour and redeemer, that they are juſtified by his righteouſneſs, pardoned thro' his blood, and ſhall be ſaved in him with an everlaſting ſalvation; and whatever he has ſaid concerning his Spirit, that he ſhall enlighten them more and more, carry on his good work in them, and finiſh it, ſhall be their comforter and their guide, ſhall ſtrengthen them in their inward man, and work them up for that ſelf-ſame thing eternal glory: and likewiſe, whatever he has ſaid concerning the proſperity and happineſs of the churches in the latter day; even all thoſe glorious things ſpoken of the city of God; and which relate both to the ſpiritual and perſonal reign of Chriſt. Faith takes all this at his word, and firmly believes it ſhall be as he has ſaid: and it has good grounds and reaſons for acting in this manner; from the veracity, faithfulneſs, and power of God, who has promiſed; and from the nature of the promiſes themſelves, which are unconditional, immutable, all in Chriſt, and yea and amen in him, and not one of them has ever failed: and ſuch a believing frame of ſoul greatly encourages chearfulneſs of ſpirit, and produces it: a believer is chearful himſelf, as he has reaſon to be; he is filled with joy and peace in believing, yea, with a joy unſpeakable, and full of glory; and he makes all about him chearful; he comforts others with the ſame comforts he has been comforted of God; and however, he exhorts, after his own example, to believe, and be of good cheer; ſee 2 Chron. xx. 20.

Ver. 26. Howbeit, we muſt be caſt upon a certain iſland.] This circumſtance is foretold, that when the whole affair ſhould come to paſs, it might be manifeſt, that it was not a caſual thing, a fortuitous event, a buſineſs of chance, but was predetermined by God, made known to the Apoſtle, and predicted by him. This iſland was Melita; and the fulfilment of this part of the prediction is related in ch. xxviii. 1.

Ver. 27. But when the fourteenth night was come, &c.] From their ſetting out from the Fair Havens in Crete, or from the beginning of the ſtorm: as they were driven up and down in Adria; or in the Adriatic ſea, as the Syriac verſion renders it: the Adriatic ſea is now called by the Turks the gulph of Venice, and the ſtreights of Venice, and ſometimes the Venetian ſea [i]; but formerly the Adriatic ſea included more than the Venetian gulph; it took in the Ionian and Sicilian ſeas, and had its name from the city Adria, a colony of the Tuſcans [k]. It is called by Ptolomy [l] Hadria, and reckoned a city of the Picenes. Pliny [m] places it near the river Padus, and calls it Atriæ, a town of the Tuſcans, which had a famous port, from whence the ſea was before called Atriatic, which is now Adriatic. Adria, Juſtin [n] ſays, which is near to the Illyrian ſea, and gave name to the Adriatic ſea, is a Grecian city; and from this place the anceſtors of Adrian, the Roman emperor, originally came; and all the ſea between Illyricum and Italy is called the Adriatic; and from the beginning of it, which is at the city of Venice, unto Garganus, a mountain in Italy, and Dyrrachium, a city of Macedonia, it is 600 miles in length, and its largeſt breadth is 200, and the leaſt 150, and the mouth of it 60. The other part of the ſea, which waſhes Macedonia and Epirus, is called the Ionian ſea. Moreover, this whole ſea is called the ſuperior ſea, with reſpect to the Tyrrhenian, which daſhes the other ſhore of Italy, and is called the inferior [o]. In this ſame ſea, Joſephus [p], the hiſtorian, was ſhipwrecked as he was on a voyage to Rome; his account is this; "I came to Rome, "having gone thro' many dangers by ſea, for our "ſhip being ſunk in the middle of Adria, being in "number about ſix hundred, we ſwam all night; "and about break of day, by the providence of "God, a ſhip of Cyrene appeared to us, in which "I, and ſome others, in all eighty, getting before "the reſt, were received into it, and ſo got ſafe "to Dicearchia, which the Italians call Puteoli;" a place afterwards mentioned, where the Apoſtle alſo arrived. And the ſea itſelf is often, by the poets [q], called Adria, as here, and is repreſented as a very troubleſome ſea; and here Paul, and the ſhip's company, were driven to and fro by the ſtorm, when about midnight the ſhipmen deemed that they drew near to ſome country: about the middle of the night the mariners thought, by ſome obſervations they made, that they were nigh land; or, as it is in the Greek text, that ſome country drew near to them; which well agrees with the language and ſenſe of ſeafaring perſons, to whoſe ſight the land ſeems to draw near them, or depart from them, when they draw near, or depart from that: the Ethiopic verſion is, they thought they ſhould have ſeen a city; they had a notion of ſome city near; and the Arabic verſion, they thought to know in what country, or place they were; and therefore did as follows.

Ver. 28. And ſounded, &c.] Or let down their plummet, or ſounding line; which was a line with a piece of lead at the end of it, which they let down into the water, and by that means found of what depth it was, by which they could judge whether they were near land or no. The ſounding-line, with the ancients, was called by different names; ſometimes Bolis, and this is the name it has here, Βολισαντες, they let down the Bolis: and the Bolis is, by ſome, deſcribed thus; it is a brazen or leaden veſſel, with a chain, which mariners fill with greaſe, and let down into the ſea, to try whether the places are rocky where a ſhip may ſtand, or ſandy where the ſhip is in danger of being loſt: it is alſo called Catapirates, which is thus deſcribed by Iſidore; Catapirates is a line with a piece of lead, by which the depth of the ſea is tried. Herodotus makes mention of it under this name, and obſerves, that when perſons are within a day's voyage of Egypt, if they let down the Catapirates, or ſounding-line, they will bring up clay, even when in eleven fathom deep [r]. According to modern accounts, there are two kinds of lines, occaſionally uſed in ſounding the ſea, the ſounding-line, and the deep ſea-line: the ſounding-line is the thickeſt and ſhorteſt, as not exceeding 20 fathoms in length, and is marked at two, three, and four fathoms with a piece of black leather between the ſtrands, and at five with a piece of white leather: the ſounding-line may be uſed when the ſhip is under ſail, which the deep ſea-line cannot. — The plummet is uſually in form of a nine-pin, and weighs 18 pounds; the end is frequently greaſed, to try whether the ground be ſandy or rocky, &c [s]. The deep-ſea line is uſed in deep water, and both lead and line are larger than the other; at the end of it is a piece of lead, called deep-ſea lead, has a hole at the bottom, in which is put a piece of tallow, to bring up the colour of the ſand at the bottom, to learn the differences of the ground, and know what coaſts they are on. And found it twenty fathoms; or Orgyas; a fathom is a meaſure which contains ſix feet, and is the utmoſt extent of both arms, when ſtretched into a right line: the fathom, it ſeems, differs according to the different ſorts of veſſels; the fathom of a man of war is ſix feet, that of merchant ſhips five feet and a half, and that of fly boats and fiſhing veſſels five feet: if the fathom here uſed was the firſt of theſe, the ſounding was an hundred and twenty feet; the Ethiopic verſion renders it, twenty ſtatues of a man. And when they had gone a little further, they ſounded again, and found it fifteen fathoms; or ninety feet; by which they imagined that they were near the continent, or ſome iſland: in ſome places, as the coaſts of Virginia, for inſtance, by the uſe of the deep-ſea line, it is known how far it is from land; for as many fathoms of water as are found, it is reckoned ſo many leagues from land.

Ver. 29. Then fearing leſt they ſhould have fallen upon rocks, &c.] Or rough places, as ſhelves, rocks, or ſands, as they might well fear, when the water ſhallowed ſo faſt, from 20 to 15 fathoms: they caſt four anchors out of the ſtern; or hinder part of the ſhip; the Ethiopic verſion calls it, the head of the ſhip, and adds, where the governor ſat; that is, at the helm, to ſteer it. Perhaps the reaſon of this verſion is, becauſe it is not uſual in modern navigation, and ſo, when this verſion was made, to caſt out anchors from the ſtern, but from the prow or head of the ſhip; but it ſeems this was done by the ancients. According to Pliny, the Tyrrhenians firſt invented the anchor; tho' Pauſanias aſcribes the invention of it to Midas, the ſon of Gordius: the moſt ancient ones were made of ſtone, as was the anchor of the Argonautes; afterwards they were made of wood, and it is ſaid, that the Japoneſe uſe wooden anchors now; and theſe were not pointed, but had great weights of lead, or baſkets filled with ſtones at the head of them, to ſtop the ſhip with; laſt of all they were made of iron, but with a barb or tooth on one ſide only, not on both: the anchor with two teeth or barbs was found out by Eupalamius; or, as others ſay, by Anacharſis, the Scythian philoſopher: it was uſual to have more anchors than one in every ſhip, of which there was one which exceeded the reſt, both in bigneſs and ſtrength, and was called the ſacred anchor; and which was only uſed in caſe of neceſſity [t]; and is what is now called the ſheet anchor. The modern anchor is a large ſtrong piece of iron, crooked at one end, and formed into two barbs, reſembling a hook, faſtened at the other end by a cable.—— The parts of an anchor are, 1. the ring into which the cable is faſtened; 2. the beam, or ſhank, which is the longeſt part of the anchor; 3. the arm, which is that which runs down into the ground; at the end of which is, 4. the flouke or fluke, by ſome called the palm, being that broad and picked part with its barbs like an arrow-head, which faſtens into the ground; 5. the ſtock, a piece of wood, faſtened to the beam near the ring, ſerving to guide the fluke, ſo that it may fall right and fix in the ground. There are three kinds of anchors commonly uſed, the kedger, the grapnel, and the ſtream anchor [u]; yea, I find that there are four kinds of anchors, the ſheet anchor, beſt bower, ſmall bower, and ſtream anchor: it ſeems the grapnel is chiefly for the long boat: here were four anchors, but very likely all of a ſort, or however not diverſified in the manner the modern ones are. Theſe they caſt out to ſtop the ſhip, and keep it ſteady, and that it might proceed no further, till they could learn whereabout they were: and wiſhed for the day; that by the light of it they might ſee whether they were near land, or in danger of rocks and ſhelves, as they imagined.

Ver. 30. And as the ſhipmen were about to flee out of the ſhip, &c.] To ſave their lives; concluding that it was in the utmoſt danger, and that it would quickly, notwithſtanding the anchors caſt out, break away, and fall upon the rocks, and ſplit to pieces: when they had let down the boat into the ſea; which before they had taken up into the ſhip, ver. 16, 17. and now they let it down, in order to get into it, and make their eſcape: under colour as tho' they would have caſt anchors out of the foreſhip; the foremoſt part of the ſhip, the prow of it: their pretence in attempting to get out of the ſhip, and into the boat, was, that whereas there were anchors caſt out of the ſtern, or hinder part of the ſhip, ſo they would caſt out others, from the fore part of it; and ſtretch them out, as the word ſignifies, or carry them further out into the ſea, for the ſecurity of the ſhip; and to do which, it was neceſſary to uſe the boat.

Ver. 31. Paul ſaid to the centurion, and to the ſoldiers, &c.] He did not direct his ſpeech to the governour and owner of the ſhip, who very likely, being ſenſible of the danger, were in the ſcheme with the mariners, and at the head of them; but to Julius the centurion, and the ſoldiers under him, who having no knowledge of maritime affairs, were not apprized of the danger, nor aware of the deſign of the ſhipmen; and beſides, had now great dependance upon the aſſurance the Apoſtle had given, that no life ſhould be loſt: to theſe he ſaid, except theſe abide in the ſhip ye cannot be ſaved; pointing to the mariners who were about to let down the boat, in order to make their eſcape: the Apoſtle had before declared, that there ſhould be no loſs of any man's life, and yet now affirms, that unleſs the mariners continued in the ſhip, the reſt of the company could not be ſaved: this does not ſhew that the decree concerning the ſalvation of them was a conditional one, and that the condition was, that the mariners ſhould ſtay in the ſhip; but that their ſtay in the ſhip, who had ſkill to guide and direct it, as alſo the company when ſhipwrecked, were a means abſolutely fixed in the decree, and therefore was abſolutely neceſſary: God had determined to ſave the whole ſhip's crew, and that in the ſame way and manner; they were all to be ſhipwrecked; ſome were not to leave the ſhip before hand, and ſave themſelves in the boat, but they were all to be expoſed to equal danger, and then be ſaved; and till that time came, the proper and prudent means were to be made uſe of, who were the ſhipmen, who beſt knew how to manage the ſhip in this extremity: this teaches us that the end and means, in the decrees of God, are not to be ſeparated; nor is any end to be expected without the uſe of means; and means are as peremptorily fixed, and are as abſolutely neceſſary, and muſt as certainly be accompliſhed, as the end. Thus ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation is a certain thing; it is the appointment of God, which is abſolute and unconditional, immutable and unfruſtrable; there is a ſure connexion between the decree of God and ſalvation; it is a ſcheme drawn by Jehovah in the council of peace, who is God only wiſe, ſaw every thing beforehand that would come to paſs, and has power to execute his ſcheme; it is an affair ſecured in the covenant of grace, which is ſure and immoveable; God is faithful who has made it with his ſon; and Chriſt the ſurety and mediator of it, is equal to that part which he has in it; yea, ſalvation is a finiſhed work, full ſatisfaction is made for ſin, and pardon procured, an everlaſting righteouſneſs is brought in, all enemies are conquered and deſtroyed, and Chriſt's people are ſaved from them: and the intereſt which he has in them, ſhews the certainty of their ſalvation; for they are given to him, and are in his hands; they are his portion, his treaſure and his jewels; they are the purchaſe of his blood, and the travail of his ſoul; they are united to him, and are built upon him; they are intereſted in his preparations and prayers, and are in ſome ſenſe ſaved already; and yet there are ſome things which God has fixed as means, and made abſolutely neceſſary, and without which none can be ſaved: as for inſtance, none can be ſaved without regeneration; without this there's no meetneſs for heaven; nor does it appear without it that any have a right unto it; nor can an unregenerate man have any true hope of it; wherefore ſuch as are choſen and redeemed, are regenerated by the Spirit of God: ſo likewiſe without holineſs no man ſhall ſee the Lord; this is fixed in the decree of God, and is neceſſary to the enjoyment of him, and to fellowſhip with angels and glorified ſaints; wherefore the Lord ſanctifies all he ſaves: particularly none without faith in Chriſt will ever be ſaved; nor is this inconſiſtent with ſalvation being by grace, ſeeing it is not conſidered as a cauſe of ſalvation, but is itſelf a gift of grace; it lies in receiving things at the hand of God, it admits of no glorying in men, and gives all the glory of ſalvation to God and Chriſt, and free-grace; and this is neceſſary becauſe God has appointed it, and therefore he beſtows it on all he means to ſave: to which may be added, that without perſeverance in faith and holineſs, there is no ſalvation; wherefore the Lord puts his grace into the hearts of his people to cauſe them to perſevere; he encompaſſes them with his power, upholds them with the right hand of his righteouſneſs, and preſerves them from ſatan, and from a final and total falling away.

Ver. 32. Then the ſoldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, &c.] With which it had been faſtened to the ſides of the ſhip, and by which the mariners were letting it down, in order to get into it, and go off: and let her fall off; from the ſides of the ſhip into the ſea, and ſo prevented the ſhipmen quitting the ſhip; for now they gave more credit to Paul than to them.

Ver. 33. And while the day was coming on, &c.] Between midnight and break of day: Paul beſought them all to take meat; to ſit down and eat a meal together: ſaying, this day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried; or have been waiting for, or expecting; that is, as the Arabic verſion expreſſes it, a ſhipwreck; for fourteen days paſt, ever ſince the ſtorm begun, they had expected nothing but ſhipwreck and death: and continued faſting, having taken nothing; not that they had neither eat nor drank all that while, for without a miracle they could never have lived ſo long without eating ſomething; but the meaning is, they had not eaten any one regular meal all that while, had only catched up a bit now and then, and eat it, and that but very little.

Ver. 34. Wherefore I pray you to take ſome meat, &c.] To ſit down compoſedly, and eat meat chearfully and freely: for this is for your health; the Alexandrian copy reads, for our health; it was for the health of them all, that they might be better able to bear the ſhock and fatigue of the ſhipwreck, and be in better ſpirits, and in a better capacity to help themſelves, and one another: for there ſhall not an hair fall from the head of any of you; a proverbial phraſe, expreſſing the utmoſt ſafety of their lives, and therefore might chearfully eat their food, and reſt themſelves, and be ſatisfied. To dream of ſhaving the hair, portended ſhipwreck to ſailors; nor was it lawful for any to pare his nails, or cut off his hair, but in a ſtorm; to which cuſtom, ſome think, the Apoſtle here alludes [w]; ſee 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 2 Sam. xiv. 11.

Ver. 35. And when he had thus ſpoken he took bread, &c.] A piece of bread, of common bread, into his hands; for this could never be the Euchariſt, or Lord's ſupper, which the Apoſtle now celebrated, as ſome have ſuggeſted, but ſuch ſort of bread that ſea-faring men commonly eat: mention is before made of meat or food, which the Apoſtle intreated them to take, which includes every ſort of ſea-proviſions they had with them; and which with the ancients, were uſually the following: it is certain they uſed to carry bread-corn along with them, either crude, or ground, or baked; the former when they went long voyages, the laſt when ſhorter ones; and it is plain that they had wheat in this ſhip, which after they had eaten they caſt out, ver. 38. and corn ground, or meal, they had uſed to eat moiſtened with water, and ſometimes with oil, and ſometimes with oil and wine; and they had a ſort of food they called maza, which was made of meat and milk; likewiſe they uſed to carry onions and garlick, which the rowers uſually eat, and were thought to be good againſt change of places and water; and they were wont to make a ſort of ſoup of cheeſe, onions and eggs, which the Greeks call muttootos, and the Latins moſetum; and they had alſo bread which was of a red colour, being hard baked and ſcorched in the oven, yea it was biſcoctus, twice baked [x]; as our modern ſea-biſcuit is, and which has its name from hence, and which for long voyages is four times baked, and prepared ſix months before the voyage is entred on; and ſuch ſort of red bread or biſcuit very probably was this, which the Apoſtle now took into his hands, and did with it as follows: And gave thanks to God in the preſence of them all; and for them all, as Chriſt did at ordinary meals, Matt. xiv. 19. and xv. 36. and when he had broken it he began to eat; which was all agreeable to the cuſtom and manner of the Jews, who firſt gave thanks, and then ſaid Amen, at giving of thanks; when he that gave thanks brake and eat firſt: for he that brake the bread might not break it until the Amen was finiſhed by all that anſwered by it, at giving of thanks; and no one might eat any thing until he that brake, firſt taſted and eat [y].

Ver. 36. Then were they all of good cheer, &c.] Encouraged by the Apoſtle's words and example: and they all took ſome meat; and made a comfortable meal, which they had not done for fourteen days paſt.

Ver. 37. And we were in all in the ſhip, &c.] Reckoning the maſter and owner of the ſhip, and the centurion and the ſoldiers, and the Apoſtle and his company, with whatſoever paſſengers there might be: two hundred and threeſcore and ſixteen ſouls; the Alexandrian copy reads, two hundred ſeventy and five; and the Ethiopic verſion, two hundred and ſix. This account of the number is given to ſhow, that the hiſtorian, who was one of them, had an exact knowledge of all in the ſhip; and this being recorded before the account of the ſhipwreck, may ſerve to make the truth of the relation the more to be believed that none of them periſhed, ſince their number was ſo preciſely known; and makes it the more marvellous, that ſuch a number of men ſhould be ſaved, and in a ſhipwreck; and ſhews, that there muſt be a wonderful interpoſition of divine power to bring them all ſafe to land.

Ver. 38. And when they had eaten enough, &c.] Were ſatisfied, having eaten a full meal: they lightened the ſhip; of its burden, that it might the better carry them to the ſhore, and that by the following method: and caſt out the wheat into the ſea; which ſeems to have been part of the ſhip's proviſion; or one part of their lading, which they brought from Egypt, and was carrying to Italy: they had caſt out ſome of the goods of the ſhip before, and alſo the tackling of the ſhip, and now, laſt of all the wheat; for what was eatable they reſerved till laſt, not knowing to what extremity they might be reduced.

Ver. 39. And when it was day they knew not the land, &c.] What place it was, or the name of it: but they diſcovered a certain creek with a ſhore; a gulph or bay, with a ſhore near it; the Ethiopic verſion explains it, an arm of the ſea, where was a port, where they thought they could ſecure themſelves, or get aſhore; into which they were minded, if it were poſſible, to thruſt in the ſhip; whither they had a mind, and conſulted to run the ſhip, if it could be done by any means, believing it was the moſt likely method of ſaving themſelves, and that; for notwithſtanding the aſſurance they had that no man's life ſhould be loſt, they made uſe of all proper means for their ſafety and ſecurity.

Ver. 40. And when they had taken up the anchors, &c.] The four anchors they caſt out of the ſtern, ver. 29. or when they had cut the anchors, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions render it; that is, had cut the cables to which the anchors were faſtened: they committed themſelves unto the ſea; or left them, the anchors, in the ſea; or committed the ſhip to the ſea, and themſelves in it, endavouring to ſteer its courſe to the place they had in view: and looſed the rudder-bands; by which the rudder was faſtened to the ſhip. The rudder, in navigation, is a piece of timber turning on hinges in the ſtern of a ſhip, and which oppoſing ſometimes one ſide to the water, and ſometimes another, turns or directs the veſſel this way or that.——The rudder of a ſhip is a piece of timber hung on the ſtern poſts, by four or five iron hooks, called Pintles, ſerving as it were for the bridle of a ſhip, to turn her about at the pleaſure of the ſteerſman. ——The rudder being perpendicular, and without ſide the ſhip, another piece of timber is fitted into it at right-angles, which comes into the ſhip, by which the rudder is managed and directed: this latter is properly called the helm or tiller, and ſometimes, tho' improperly, the rudder itſelf.——A narrow rudder is beſt for a ſhip's ſailing, provided ſhe can feel it; that is, be guided and turned by it, for a broad rudder will hold much water when the helm is put over to any ſide; yet if a ſhip has a fat quarter, ſo that the water cannot come quick and ſtrong to her rudder, ſhe will require a broad rudder.——The aftmoſt part of the rudder is called the rake of the rudder. This is the account of a rudder with the moderns [z]: with the ancients, the parts of the rudder were theſe, the clavus or helm, by which the rudder was governed; the pole of it; the wings or the two breadths of it, which were as wings, and the handle: ſome ſhips had but one rudder, moſt had two, and ſome three, and ſome four; thoſe that had but one, ſeemed to have it in the middle of the ſtern; and thoſe that had two had them on the ſides, not far from the middle; and there were ſome ſhips which had them not only in the ſtern, but alſo in the prow or head of the ſhip [a]: that the ancients had ſometimes more rudders than one in a ſhip, has been abundantly proved by Bochartus and Scheſſerus; take only an inſtance or two. The Carthaginians as [b] Ælianus reports, decreed two governours to every ſhip, ſaying it was abſurd that it ſhould have δυο πηδαλια, two rudders, and that he who was moſt uſeful to the ſailors, and had the government of the ſhip ſhould be alone, and without ſucceſſor and companion; and ſo Apuleius [c] ſays, the ſhip in which we were carried, was ſhook by various ſtorms and tempeſts, utroque regimine amiſſo, and having loſt both its rudders, ſunk at the precipice. Some of the Indian ſhips have three rudders; that of Philopator's had four rudders; how many this ſhip had, in which the Apoſtle was, cannot be ſaid: but this is certain, that it had more than one; for the words are, and looſed the bands of the rudders; and ſince it is a clear caſe, that the ſhips of the ancients had more rudders than one to each, there is no need to ſuppoſe a figure in the text, and that the plural number i uſed for the ſingular, as Beza thinks: and the band of them, were thoſe by which they were faſtened and they were looſed, as Scheſſerus conjectures, becau when the anchors were caſt out, they faſtened th rudders higher, that they might not be broken b the daſhing of the waves, eſpecially as they were i a ſtorm; but now having taken up the anchors, the looſed theſe bands: and certain it is, that not onl oars but rudders were faſtened with cords or ropes to the ſhip [e]: according to the notion of modern navigation, the rudder-band might be thought to be the rope which is turned round the tiller, and made faſt to the ſhip's ſide, and as the tiller is moved, ſurges round the end of the tiller; and very likely might be made faſt, when the ſhip was at anchor, on one ſide, to keep the ſhip from breaking her ſheer; but now being looſed, and the helm a midſhip, and the main ſail hoiſed, the ſhip ran to the ſhore before the wind. And hoiſed up the main ſail to the wind; which they had before ſtruck or let down, ver. 17. The main ſail is that which is upon the main maſt. The Ethiopic verſion renders it, the great ſail. The great ſail was that which is called Acatius, which is another word than is here uſed: ſo Iſidore [f] ſays Acatius is the greateſt ſail, and is placed in the middle of the ſhip; Epidromos is the next in bigneſs, and is placed at the ſtern; and Dolon is the leaſt ſail, and is fixed at the head; and both the Syriac and Arabic verſions here render it, the little ſail; and which ſailors put up when they are afraid to uſe large ſails, which would carry too much wind; but the word here uſed is Artemo, which the above writer ſays is commended rather for the ſake of directing the ſhip, than for ſwiftneſs. And this ſeems to be the uſe that was now made of it, namely, to guide the ſhip into the creek or bay. And made toward the ſhore; which was in the creek, or to the haven in it.

Ver. 41. And falling into a place where two ſeas met, &c.] An iſthmus, on each ſide of which the ſea ran; and which the inhabitants of Malta, as Beza ſays, ſhew to this day, and call it, la Cala de San Paulo, or the deſcent of ſaint Paul. The meeting of theſe two ſeas might occaſion a great rippling in the ſea like to a large eddy, or counter tide; and here might be a ſand on which they ran the ſhip aground; for this place, where the two ſeas met, as the ſame annotator obſerves, could not be the ſhore itſelf; for otherwiſe, to what purpoſe ſhould they caſt themſelves into the ſea, as they afterwards did, if the head of the ſhip ſtruck upon the ſhore, and ſtuck faſt there; but muſt rather mean a ſhelf of ſand, over-againſt, or near the entrance into the bay, and where the ſhipwreck was. And the fore part ſtuck faſt, and remained unmoveable; ſo that there was no getting her off: but the hinder part was broken by the violence of the waves; that is, the ſtern; by which means there were boards and broken pieces for the company to get aſhore upon.

Ver. 42. And the ſoldiers counſel was to kill the priſoners, &c.] Paul, and the reſt: this they had not only an inclination to, but they declared it, and gave it as their opinion, and what they thought adviſeable to be done directly: leſt any of them ſhould ſwim out and eſcape; and they ſhould be accountable for them: but this was dreadful wickedneſs in them to ſeek to take away the lives of others, when they themſelves were in ſo much danger; and monſtrous ingratitude to the Apoſtle Paul, who had been ſo much concerned for their lives, and careful of them, and had been the means of ſaving them, and for whoſe ſake they were ſaved: the devil muſt have had a great hand in this.

Ver. 43. But the centurion, willing to ſave Paul, &c.] Not only becauſe he was a Roman citizen, but becauſe he perceived he was ſome extraordinary perſon; and chiefly becauſe he was moved thereunto by a ſuperior influence, that ſatan might not have his end; and that the will of God might be fulfilled, that he ſhould go to Rome, and there bear a teſtimony of Chriſt. Kept them from their purpoſe; would not ſuffer them to execute their deſign, reſtrained them from it, and laid his commands upon them to the contrary. And commanded that they which could ſwim, ſhould caſt themſelves firſt into the ſea, and get to land; which ſome reſtrain to the Roman ſoldiers, as if the centurion's ſpeech was only directed to them; though it ſeems rather to have reſpect to the whole company, the mariners, who generally can ſwim, and the ſoldiers, as many of them as could, and the reſt of the priſoners or paſſengers; though it may be, he might chiefly regard the ſoldiers, who were uſually learned to ſwim, that they might the more readily paſs rivers, in their marches, where they could find no bridges, that ſo he might be the ſooner rid of them, and break their purpoſe.

Ver. 44. And the reſt, ſome on boards, &c.] Doors, tables, planks, or any ſuch like things: and ſome on broken pieces of the ſhip; or what came from it, as maſts, beams, &c. and ſo it came to paſs that they eſcaped all ſafe to land; not one was loſt, as Paul had foretold. And ſo it will be with the ſaints after their afflicted ſtate in this life, who are ſafe by being in Chriſt, and by abiding in him, and in the uſe of means; and tho' by reaſon of the many difficulties in the way, thro' the corruptions of their own hearts, the temptations of ſatan, the hidings of God's face, various afflictions, and ſometimes violent perſecutions, they are ſcarcely ſaved, yet at laſt they are certainly ſaved: ſo it comes to paſs that they get ſafe on the ſhores of eternal bliſs and happineſs; becauſe they are ordained unto it, are the care of Chriſt, and the purchaſe of his blood; and are partakers of the bleſſings of grace, and have the Spirit, as an earneſt of the heavenly inheritance: and when landed they are ſafe; ſin will be no more; ſatan will be under their feet; there will be no more afflictions of any kind; and they will be with the Lord, and for ever with him. This voyage of the Apoſtle, and the ſaints with him, was an emblem of the paſſage of the people of God in this world to heaven: their number was but few; who beſides Luke and Ariſtarchus the Macedonian, were with him, is not known, ver. 2. And ſo the number of the children of God, in any one period of time, is but ſmall in compariſon of the reſt of the world: the Apoſtle and his companions had but very indifferent company, as other priſoners, a band of ſoldiers, and the ſailors; Chriſt's church is as a roſe in a field, a lilly among thorns, vexed with the converſation of the wicked, being in a world which lies in wickedneſs; and which may very fitly be compared to the ſea, for the waves of afflictions in it, and the reſtleſs and uneaſy ſpirits of the men of it. Sailing at this time was dangerous, ver. 9. as the ſaints paſſage thro' this world always is, and eſpecially now in theſe laſt and perilous days; partly thro' the aboundings of immorality on the one hand, and partly thro' the ſpread of error and hereſy on the other. A great ſtorm aroſe, ver. 14. and there are many the chriſtian meets with in his voyage to heaven; and well it is for him that Chriſt is an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempeſt, and that he is built on ſuch a foundation which the moſt violent ſtorms can't move him from. There was no ſight of ſun or ſtars for many days, ver. 20. and ſo it is ſometimes with the people of God; the ſun of righteouſneſs is not ſeen by them, clouds interpoſe between him and them; and the ſtars, the miniſters of the Goſpel, are removed from them, and their eyes cannot behold their teachers, which make it a diſtreſſed time with them: yea, all hope of ſalvation was gone, ver. 20. and ſuch at times is the caſe of truly gracious ſouls, their hope, and their ſtrength, they are ready to ſay, are periſhed from the Lord, and they are cut off from before his eyes: there was alſo a long abſtinence from food, ver. 21, 33. which is ſometimes the caſe in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and is owing either to want of food, the word of the Lord being precious, there being a famine of hearing the word; or for want of appetite to it: and laſt of all, there was a deſign formed by the ſoldiers to kill Paul, and the priſoners, but were prevented by the centurion, ver. 42. The ſincere followers of Chriſt are accounted as ſheep for the ſlaughter, and are killed all the day long in the intention of wicked men; who have always a good-will to it, were they not reſtrained thro' the goodneſs of a civil government, and eſpecially by the power and providence of God: however, at laſt, they get ſafe to their port and haven, where the wicked ceaſe from troubling, and where the weary are at reſt.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. AND when they were eſcaped, &c.] From the danger they were expoſed to by ſhipwreck, and were got ſafe to land; this is omitted in the Syriac verſion: then they knew that the iſland was called Melita; an iſland toward the African ſhore, where it is placed both by Pliny[g], and Ptolomy[h]; in which the latter ſays were the city Melita: it lies between Sicily and Tripolis of Barbary, and is now called Malta: it was famous for the knights of Rhodes, which are now called the knights of Malta: it has its name from מלט, to eſcape, it being formerly a refuge to the Phœnicians, eſpecially in ſtormy weather, in their long voyage from Tyre to Gades; and was indeed a place of eſcape to the Apoſtle Paul, and thoſe that were with him. And perhaps it might be ſo called from its being a refuge for pirates; for Cicero[i] ſays, here pirates uſed to winter almoſt every year, and yet did not ſpoil the temple of Juno, as Verres did: tho' ſome ſay it was ſo called from the great abundance of honey found in it; for it was a very pleaſant and fruitful iſland, bringing forth great plenty of wheat, rye, flax, cummin, cotton, figs, wine, roſes, thyme, lavender, and many other ſweet and delightful herbs, from whence bees did gather great plenty of honey. It was, according to Pliny, diſtant from Camerina eighty-four miles, and from Lilybæum a hundred and thirteen; and it is ſaid to be diſtant from the promontory of Sicily an hundred miles, tho' others ſay ſixty; and that it was ſo far from Syracuſe, which is the next place the Apoſtle came to in this voyage, and was from Africa an hundred and ninety miles. On the eaſt ſide, a little from the chief city of it, now called Malta, was a famous temple of Juno, ſpoiled by Verres, as before obſerved; and on the ſouth ſide another of Hercules, the ruins of both which are yet to be ſeen. The compaſs of the iſland is about ſixty miles, the length twenty, and the breadth twelve, and has in it five ports, and about ſixty villages.

Ver. 2. And the barbarous people ſhewed us no little kindneſs, &c.] The inhabitants of this iſland are called Barbarians, not from the country of Barbary, near to which they were; nor ſo much on account of their manners, for tho' heathens, they were a civil and cultivated people, being, as appears from the name of the chief man of the iſland, under the Roman government; but becauſe of their language, ſee 1 Cor. xiv. 11. it being neither Hebrew, Greek, nor Latin; for as the inhabitants were originally a colony of the Phœnicians, they ſpoke their language; and now tho' it is inhabited by ſuch as are called chriſtians, they ſpeak the Saracen or Arabic language, and little different from the old Punic or Phœnician language: however, tho' the inhabitants could not underſtand their language, they underſtood their caſe, and were very civil and humane to them, and ſhewed them extraordinary kindneſs: for they kindled a fire; or ſet fire to a large pile of wood; for a large fire it muſt be to be of ſervice to ſuch a number of people, in ſuch a condition as they were: and received us every one; tho' their number were two hundred threeſcore and ſixteen: becauſe of the preſent rain, and becauſe of the cold; for a violent rain fell on them, as is uſual upon a ſtorm, and much wetted them, ſo that a fire was very neceſſary; and it being winter or near it, it was cold weather; and eſpecially they having been ſo long in a ſtorm, and now ſhipwrecked; and ſome having thrown themſelves into the ſea, and ſwam to the iſland; and others having been obliged to put themſelves on boards and planks, and get aſhore, and were no doubt both wet and cold; ſo that nothing was more needful and more agreeable to them than a large fire.

Ver. 3. And when Paul had gathered a bundle of ſticks, &c.] Had picked up ſome ſticks, and put them in a bundle fit for the fire, as every one was buſy to aſſiſt in this extremity; nor did the Apoſtle think ſuch an action below him, who in all things was a man of great humility and condeſcenſion: and laid them on the fire; to increaſe it: there came a viper out of the heat: a viper is a kind of ſerpent, which brings forth its young living, to the number of twenty, only one in a day, which come forth wrapped up in thin ſkins, which break on the third day, and ſet them at liberty; and ſo is reckoned among viviparous animals, from whence it ſeems to have its name, whereas other ſerpents lay eggs, and hatch them. It is ſaid[k], that this remarkable reptile has the biggeſt and flatteſt head of all the ſerpent kind; its uſual length is about half an ell, and its thickneſs an inch; its ſnout is not unlike that of a hog; it has ſixteen ſmall immoveable teeth in each jaw, beſides two other large, ſharp, hooked, hollow, tranſparent, canine teeth, ſituate at each ſide of the upper jaw, which are thoſe that do the miſchief: theſe are flexible in their articulation, and are ordinarily laid flat along the jaw, the animal never raiſing them but when it would bite. The roots or baſes of theſe teeth, or fangs, are encompaſſed with a veſicle or bladder, containing the quantity of a large drop of a yellow inſipid ſalivous juice.——It has only one row of teeth, whereas all other ſerpents have two; its body is not at all fetid, whereas the inner parts of the bodies of other ſerpents are intolerable.—It creeps very ſlowly, and never leaps like other ſerpents tho' it is nimble enough to bite when provoked.— Its body is of two colours, aſh-coloured or yellow, and the ground ſpeckled with longiſh brown ſpots; the ſcales under its belly are of the colour of well poliſhed ſteel. Its bite is exceeding venomous, and its poiſon the moſt dangerous. Now when this viper here is ſaid to come out of the heat, the meaning is, that it came out from the ſticks, which were laid upon the fire, being forced from thence by the heat of it: and ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, there came out of them (the ſticks) a viper, becauſe of the heat of the fire; it lay quiet among the ſticks, among which, and ſuch like things, this creature often lies; but when the fire began to heat it, it ſprung out: and faſtened on his hand; or wrapped itſelf about his hand: the Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, bit his hand; but that does not ſeem ſo likely, ſince he felt no harm by it; the Ethiopic verſion, hung upon his hand; which agrees with what follows; nor is it inconſiſtent with its wrapping itſelf about his hand, which is the more proper ſignification of the word uſed.

Ver. 4. And when the Barbarians ſaw the venemous beaſt, &c.] The viper is called Therion, a beaſt, it being of the viviparous kind; and hence comes Theriaca, or Venice treacle, the foundation of which compoſition is vipers fleſh; and it is called venemous, becauſe it is of all ſerpents the moſt venemous: this when the country people ſaw hang on his hand, having wrapped itſelf about it, they ſaid among themſelves, no doubt this man is a murderer: they might ſee he was a priſoner by his chain, or might learn it from ſome of the company, and therefore took it for granted he had been guilty of ſome crime; and by the viper's faſtening on him, they concluded it was murder he was guilty of; for the ſame notion might obtain among them, as among the Jews, that a murderer that could not be legally convicted, was ſometimes puniſhed this way. "Says R. Simeon ben Shetach[l], may I never " ſee the conſolation, if I did not ſee one run after " his friend into a deſert place; and I ran after " him, and I ſaw the ſword in his hand, and the " blood dropping, and he that was ſlain panting; " and I ſaid to him, O wicked man, who has ſlain " this? either I or thou; but what ſhall I do? " for thy blood is not delivered into my hand; for " the law ſays, by the mouth of two or three witneſſes he ſhall ſurely die: may he that knows the " thoughts take vengeance on that man that ſlew " his friend; they ſay, they did not remove from " thence, עד שבא נחש, till a ſerpent came, and " bit him, and he died." So the Jews obſerve, that when the execution of capital puniſhments was taken away from them, yet ſuch who deſerved them were puniſhed by God in a way equivalent to them: ſo for inſtance, if a man committed a crime, for which he deſerved to be burnt, either he fell into the fire, or נחש נושכו, a ſerpent bit him[m]; or if he deſerved to be ſtrangled, either he was drowned in a river, or died of a quinzy. There is a kind of an aſp which the Egyptians call Thermuthis, which they reckon ſacred, and worſhip: this they ſay will not hurt good men, but deſtroys the wicked; and if ſo, ſays the hiſtorian, then δίκη, vengeance, or juſtice has honoured this creature, to be ſo ſharp-ſighted as to diſcern the good from the bad; and they ſay, Iſis ſends it to the moſt wicked[n]. Agreeable to which theſe men reaſon, whom though he hath eſcaped the ſea; has not been drowned there, when ſhipwrecked, yet vengeance ſuffereth not to live. The Greek word Dice, rendered vengeance, is the name of a goddeſs among the Heathens, ſaid to be the daughter of Jupiter and Themis[o]. She is repreſented as ſitting by her father Jupiter; and when any one does injury to another, informs him of it[p]. She is painted ſorrowful, and with a contracted forehead, a grave countenance, and a rough aſpect, to ſtrike terror in unrighteous perſons, and give confidence to righteous ones[q], agreeable to her name, which ſignifies juſtice. This deity the Barbarians ſuppoſed purſued Paul; and tho' ſhe let him eſcape the ſea, ſhe'll not ſuffer him to live any longer; for they looked upon the viper's faſtening on him, as to be ſent by her, ſo to be immediate death to him.

Ver. 5. And he ſhook off the beaſt into the fire, &c.] Having held it a while, and as being maſter of it, and as not being afraid of it, tho' it was the ready way to provoke it to faſten on him again: and felt no harm; it having not bit him, nor infected him with its poiſon; and hereby was fulfilled what our Lord promiſed to his diſciples, Mark xvi. 18.

Ver. 6. Howbeit they looked when he ſhould have ſwollen, &c.] With the venemous bite of the viper; ſwelling is one of the ſymptoms following the bite of this creature; and if the bite does not iſſue in death, yet the ſwelling continues inflamed for ſome time. The ſymptoms following the bite of a viper are ſaid to be[r] an acute pain, in the place wounded; ſwelling, firſt red, afterwards livid, ſpreading by degrees; great faintneſs; a quick, low, and ſometimes interrupted pulſe; ſickneſs at the ſtomach; bilious convulſions; vomiting; cold ſweats; ſometimes pains about the navel; and death itſelf, if the ſtrength of the patient, or the ſlightneſs of the bite do not overcome it: if he does overcome it, the ſwelling continues inflamed for ſome time; and the ſymptoms abating, from the wound runs a ſanious liquor, little puſtules are raiſed about it, and the colour of the ſkin is as if the patient were icterical; or had the jaundice: the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions render it, that he ſhould burn, or be burnt; that is inflamed, for the bite of the viper cauſes an inflammation, a hot ſwelling which riſes up in puſtules or bliſters: or fallen down dead ſuddenly; for immediate death is ſometimes the effect of ſuch poiſon. Pliny[s] relates, that the Scythians dip their arrows in the ſanies or corrupt matter of vipers, and in human blood, which by the leaſt touch cauſes immediate death; and Pauſanias[t] reports from a certain Phœnician, that a man fleeing from a viper got up into a tree, where the viper could not reach him, but it blew, or breathed out its poiſon on the tree, and the man immediately died: tho' the force of this creature's poiſon does not always, and in all places, and in all perſons operate alike; ſome die within a few hours, and others live ſome days, ſome to the third day, and ſome to the ſeventh[u]: but after they had looked a great while; upon the Apoſtle, to obſerve whether any inflammation or ſwelling aroſe, or death enſued, as they expected: when they had waited ſome time, perhaps an hour or two, and ſaw no harm come to him; that he was neither inflamed, nor ſwelled, nor dead; that it had no manner of effect upon him, and no evil of puniſhment was inflicted on him hereby, from whence they could conclude that he was guilty of any notorious crime: they changed changed their minds, and ſaid that he was a god: before they took him to be a murderer, and now they even aſcribe deity to him, as was uſual with the Gentiles, when any thing extraordinary was performed by men: ſo the Lyſtrians took Paul for Mercury, and Barnabas for Jupiter, upon the Apoſtle's curing the cripple, Acts xiv. 11, 12. but what god the inhabitants of Melita thought him to be, is not certain; ſome think Hercules, who was worſhipped in this iſland. The inhabitants of this iſland now, believe that the Apoſtle expelled all poiſon and venom out of it when he was there; and 'tis reported, that the children born in this place, fear not any ſnakes, neither are hurt by any thing that is venomous, inſomuch that they will take ſcorpions, and eat them without danger; although in all other parts of the world, thoſe kind of creatures are moſt pernicious, and yet do no manner of hurt to men in this iſland; yea, it is affirmed, that there is a ſort of earth found here, which kills ſerpents: as for the eating of them, the viper itſelf may be eaten; moſt authors agree [w], that there is no part, humour, or excrement, not even the gall itſelf, of a viper, but may be ſwallowed without much harm; accordingly the ancients, and as ſeveral authors aſſure us, the Indians at this day, both of the eaſt and weſt, eat them as we do eels——viper's fleſh either roaſted or boiled, phyſicians unanimouſly preſcribe as an excellent reſtorative, particularly in the elephantiaſis, incurable conſumptions, leproſy, &c.

Ver. 7. In the ſame quarters were poſſeſſions of the chief man of the iſland, &c.] Or the firſt man of the iſland; ſo the governour of Melita uſed to be called, as appears by an inſcription mentioned by Bochart, wherein a Roman knight is called πρῶτος Μελιταίων, the firſt of the Melitians; for this iſland was under the Roman government, and the very name of this chief man ſhows it: it was firſt in the hands of the Africans, when Dido built Carthage, which was eight or nine hundred years before the times of Chriſt: Battus was king of this iſland, from whom it was taken by Hiarbas, king of Libya, or of the Getulians, and who alſo conquered Carthage; and it continued under the power of the Carthaginians, until they were conquered by the Romans; and then it was taken by Titus Sempronius, above two hundred years before Chriſt, in whoſe hands it was when the Apoſtle was here; ſince then it has been taken by the Saracenes, though they held it not, being taken from them by Roger earl of Sicily, in the year 1090; and ſo it remained in the hands of the Sicilians, until the knights of Rhodes were driven out of that iſland by the Turks, in 1522; and then this was given them by the emperor Charles the fifth, ſeven years after, on condition they would oppoſe the Turks, and defend that part of chriſtendom, which they bravely did: in the year 1565, it was beſieged by Pialis Baſſa, but without ſucceſs [x]; and it is ſaid to be ſo well fortified, as that it is impoſſible it ſhould be taken, unleſs through treachery or famine; it is now in the hands of the ſaid knights: but whether this man was governour of the iſland or no, it may be reaſonably thought, that he was the richeſt man in the iſland, and in the greateſt honour and dignity; and had near the ſhore where the ſhip's company landed, many houſes and much land, and farms and vineyards, and the like: whoſe name was Publius; or Poplius, as ſome copies, and the Syriac verſion read. Publius was a name common with the Romans; it was with them a fore name, by which ſuch were called, who were pupilli, or fatherleſs, for it is a contraction of Popilius. There was one of this name who was biſhop of Athens, ſaid to ſucceed Dionyſius the Areopagite there; who is thought by ſome to be the ſame here mentioned; who they ſay was firſt biſhop in his own country, which through miſtake they make to be Miletus, inſtead of Melita; and afterwards biſhop of Athens, where he ſuffered martyrdom: but this is not likely, for even though he might be converted by the Apoſtle, of which we have no account; and alſo became a preacher of the Goſpel, of which there is no proof; it is not probable that he ſhould leave his own country, and go to Athens, and take upon him the care of that church there: but whether he was afterwards converted or no, he was very kind to the Apoſtle and the ſhip's company, as follows: who received us, and lodged us three days courteouſly; this was a very conſiderable inſtance of humanity and hoſpitality, to receive ſo many ſtrangers at once into his houſes, as two hundred threeſcore and ſixteen; and give them food and lodging, for three days together, and that in ſuch a kind, friendly, and chearful manner: and thus as Abraham and Lot, by receiving ſtrangers, entertained angels at unawares, ſo Publius, though ignorant of it, entertained an Apoſtle of Chriſt among thoſe ſtrangers; the benefit of which he afterwards enjoyed, and which was a compenſation for his liberality and beneficence.

Ver. 8. And it came to paſs that the father of Publius, &c.] So that Publius was not an old man, though of ſo much dignity and wealth: the Arabic verſion, contrary to all copies, and other verſions, reads, the ſon of Publius: lay ſick of a fever; or fevers, of different ſorts, a complication of them, which ſometimes is the caſe; unleſs this was an intermitting fever, and the ſeveral fits of it are intended; or rather the plural number is put for the ſingular, to denote the vehemence of it, and which was attended with another diſorder, and might be brought on by it: and of a bloody flux; or dyſentery, a pain of the bowels, as the Syriac verſion renders it; or an ulceration of the bowels, as the Arabic verſion; which occaſioned a diſcharge of blood, ſo that his caſe was very threatning. This diſeaſe, according to modern writers [y], is attended with a fever. The word dyſentery here uſed, properly ſignifies that kind of flux of the belly, characterized by the frequency of ſtools, or dejections, mixed with blood, and accompanied with gripes: the fever, ulcer, &c. which attend it, are not eſſential to the diſeaſe; though many both of the ancients and moderns think the ulcer is——There are three kinds of dyſenteries; the firſt when a laudable blood is evacuated from a mere plethora, or plenitude, without any diſorder of the inteſtines, as in the hæmorhoidal flux; the ſecond when a thin watery blood is evacuated, called the Hepatic flux, though really ariſing from hæmorrhoidal veſſels; the third kind, which is that that is properly called the dyſentery, is, when blood is caſt out, mixed with a purulent matter in the excrements: this is either benign, i. e. without a fever, and not contagious; or malignant, which is attended with a peſtilential fever, and frequently ravages whole cities and provinces, happening moſt commonly in armies; in the laſt ſtage, a ſort of caruncles are frequently ejected along with the purulent matter, which are difficult to be accounted for, unleſs from an excoriation and ulceration of the inteſtines: ſometimes the inteſtines are even gangrened: this ſeems to have been the caſe of the father of Publius, which makes the following cure the more remarkable: to whom Paul entered in; into the room where he was, no doubt with the conſent and leave, if not at the requeſt of Publius; the Ethiopic verſion adds, and he entreated him to put his hand upon him; that is, either Publius aſked this favour of the Apoſtle, for his father, having heard of the affair of the viper, from whence he concluded there was ſomething divine and extraordinary in him; or the father of Publius, aſked this for himſelf: and prayed and laid his hands on him, and healed him; when Paul had entered the room, and found in what a bad condition the ſick man was, he either kneeled down and prayed by him, or ſtood and prayed over him, and for him, that God would reſtore him to his health; and this he did, to let them know that he himſelf was not a god; and that the cure that would now be wrought, would be from God, and not from himſelf, and therefore all the glory ſhould be given to God; and he laid his hands on him, as a ſign or ſymbol, or rite that was uſed in extraordinary caſes, and agreeable to the direction and promiſe of Chriſt, Mark xvi. 18. and upon this a cure followed; both the diſeaſes left him at once, and he was reſtored to health.

Ver. 9. So when this was done, &c.] This miracle was wrought, and the fame of it ſpread over the iſland: others alſo which had diſeaſes in the iſland came; from all parts of it, to the Apoſtle: and were healed; of whatſoever diſeaſes they were afflicted with.

Ver. 10. Who alſo honoured us with many honours, &c.] Not with divine honours, with religious adorations, as if they had been ſo many deities; for theſe they would not have received, nor have recorded them, to the commendation of the inhabitants; but civil honours, expreſſions of reſpect and gratitude; and particularly gifts and preſents, large and valuable, in which ſenſe the phraſe is uſed by Jewiſh writers; ſo upon thoſe words in Judges xiii. 17. What is thy name, that when thy ſayings come to paſs, we may do thee honour? they make this paraphraſe [z], "Manoah ſaid to him (the angel) "tell me thy name, that I may enquire where to "find thee, when thy prophecy is fulfilled, and give "thee, דורן, a gift, ואין וכבדנוך אלא מנחה, for "there is no honour but a preſent, or offering; or "wherever this phraſe is uſed, it ſignifies nothing "elſe but a gift, as it is ſaid, Numb. xxii. 17. For "honouring I will honour thee;" that is, with money and gifts, as Balaam's anſwer in the next verſe ſhows, and ſo the Jewiſh commentators interpret it [a]; ſee the note on 1 Tim. v. 17. And when we departed; from the iſland, which was not till three months from their firſt coming aſhore: they laded us with ſuch things as were neceſſary; that is, for the voyage: they provided a proper ſupply of food for them, which they put into the ſhip, for their uſe in their voyage; by which they expreſſed their gratitude for the favours they received from Paul; for whoſe ſake not only his company, but the whole ſhip's company fared the better: and very likely many of them were converted under the Apoſtle's miniſtry; for it can hardly be thought that the Apoſtle ſhould be on this iſland three months, as he was, and not preach the Goſpel to the inhabitants of it, in which he always met with ſucceſs, more or leſs; and the great reſpect ſhown him at his departure, ſeems to confirm this; though we meet with no account of any church, or churches, or preachers of the word in this place, in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, until the ſixth century, when mention is made of a biſhop of the iſland of Melita [b]; indeed in the fourth century, Optatus Milevitanus is ſaid by ſome through miſtake, to be biſhop of Melita, when he was biſhop of Milevis, a city in Africa upon the continent; and through a like miſtake, this iſland is ſaid to be famous for a council held in it under pope Innocent, againſt Pelagius, in the beginning of the fifth century; when the council was held at the above place Milevis, and not at Melita, from whence it was called the Milevitan council.

Ver. 11. And after three months we departed, &c.] From Melita; here they ſtaid the three winter months, which were unſeaſonable for navigation; but now the ſpring coming on, and the weather agreeable, they left the iſland, and ſailed in a ſhip of Alexandria; ſee the note on ch. xxvii. 6. which had wintered in the iſle; perhaps all the ſaid three months, for the ſame reaſon: whoſe ſign was Caſtor and Pollux; or Dioſcuri, that is, the ſons of Jupiter; for Caſtor and Pollux were his ſons, by Leda: theſe are placed among the conſtellations in the Zodiac, and go by the name of Gemini, or the twins; and theſe were ſuppoſed to have a power of ſaving men in danger at ſea; wherefore ſuch as were about to go to ſea, firſt paid their devoirs, and made vows to them; which they performed when they returned, and were delivered from ſhipwreck; and when they were in danger at ſea, they uſed to pray unto them: the fiery exhalations that ſometimes appear at ſea, they took for them; and when only one appeared, it was looked on as a bad omen; but when both, it was reckoned to portend a proſperous voyage; hence they were conſidered as ſea-deities; and the Ethiopic verſion accordingly renders it here Dioſcoura, and adds, who is the god of the mariners: now the images of theſe two brothers, were ſometimes ſet at the head, or fore-part of the ſhip, as they were in this, from whence the ſhip took its name; as it is very common for the names of ſhips, to be the ſame with the pictures or images that are placed at the head of them: whether the centurion choſe this ſhip becauſe of its ſign, imagining there might be more ſafety in it, he having ſuffered ſhipwreck already; or whether this was the only one in the iſland, that was going for Italy, is not certain, nor very material: the Arabic verſion takes the word rendered Caſtor and Pollux, to be the name of a man, who was the owner of the ſhip; for it reads the words thus, in a ſhip of Alexandria, that belonged to a man of Alexandria, called Dioſcorides.

Ver. 12. And landing at Syracuſe, &c.] A famous city in the iſle of Sicily, now called Saragoſſa: it is placed by Ptolomy [c] on the eaſt ſide of the iſland, in the Adriatic ſea; it was 180 furlongs, or two and twenty miles and a half in circuit, and formerly had a marble haven and tripple wall, and as many towers; the founder of it was Archias, a Corinthian; Pliny ſays [d], that it is never ſo cloudy weather, but the ſun is ſeen in it, at one time or another of the day: Cicero [e] calls it the greateſt, and moſt beautiful of all the cities of Greece; it is ſuch a city, he ſays, that it may be ſaid to conſiſt of four large cities; one part of it is called the iſland, which has two ports to it; another was called Acradina, in which was a large market, beautiful portico's, &c. the third, Tiche, in which was the ancient temple of fortune; and the fourth, which becauſe it was laſt built, was called Neapolis: it is a very ancient city, being built more than ſeven hundred years before the birth of Chriſt; it was a colony of the Corinthians; here reigned two tyrants, whoſe names were Dionyſius; it was attacked by the Carthaginians, but without ſucceſs, being delivered from the ſiege by Pyrrhus king of Epirus [f]; it was again aſſaulted by the Athenians, who were repulſed, and entirely conquered, about the year before Chriſt 413: after that it was taken by Marcellus, the Roman conſul, about the year of the city of Rome 542 [g], after a three years ſiege; during which time it was defended, and preſerved by the means of the famous mathematician Archimedes; who by his invention of warlike machines, baffled all the attempts of the Romans; but was killed by a ſoldier, as he was intent upon his ſtudies, not knowing that the city was taken; and it continued in the hands of the Romans, until it was taken and plundered by the Saracens, in the year of Chriſt 675; and was re-taken by Roger king of Apulia, about the year 1090, and is now under the government of Don Carlos, king of the two Sicilies: we tarried there three days; on what account it is not ſaid, whether on account of merchandize, or for the ſake of the converſation of chriſtians here: it is certain there were churches in Sicily very early; we read of them in the ſecond and third centuries; in the times of Conſtantine, at the beginning of the fourth century, there was a church at Syracuſe, of which Chreſtus was biſhop, to whom the emperor wrote a letter himſelf, which is ſtill extant in Euſebius [h]: in the fifth century, Hilarius, a teacher at Syracuſe, wrote from thence to Auguſtine, concerning the Pelagian hereſy, to whom he gave an anſwer: in the ſixth century, Maximinianus biſhop of this church, had the inſpection of all the churches in Sicily committed to him, by Gregory; who was wonderfully preſerved in a ſhipwreck, as he was returning from Rome; in this ſame age lived John, biſhop of Syracuſe, and Trajanus a preſbyter, and Felix a deacon of the ſame church: in the ſeventh century there was one George biſhop of this place, to whom pope Vitalian wrote a letter; and in the ſame century, a biſhop of this church was in the ſixth council at Conſtantinople [i].

Ver. 13. And from thence we ſet a compaſs, &c.] About the iſle of Sicily, from Syracuſe to Pachinus, the promontory of the iſland: and came to Rhegium; a city in Calabria, called by Ptolomy [k], Regium Julium; it was built, as Solinus [l] ſays, by the Chalcidenſians, and was formerly a city of the Brutians [m]; it is now called Reggio: it is ſaid [n] to have its name from its being broken off from the main continent, for it lies in the ſtreights of Sicily; and formerly Sicily was joined to Italy, but was ſeparated from it by the violence of the ſea at this place: and after one day the ſouth wind blew; they ſtaid one day at Rhegium, and when they departed from thence, they had a ſouth wind, which was favourable to them: whether the Apoſtle preached here, or no, is not certain, ſince his ſtay was ſo ſhort; ſome popiſh writers tell ſome idle ſtories about the Apoſtle's preaching; how that the fiſhes came to the ſhore to hear him; that the graſhoppers were commanded by him to be ſilent, and have never been ſeen in that place ſince; that a ſtone pillar was ſet on fire by the flame of a candle, by which miracle the inhabitants preſent were converted and baptized; and one Stephen that was in company, was made by him their firſt biſhop: but in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, we meet with no account of any church in this place, until the fifth century; when the biſhop of it with others, ſubſcribed a letter of Leo the firſt, ſent into the eaſt; and about the year 440, there was a ſynod of thirteen biſhops convened in this place, on account of a certain ordination; and in the ſeventh century, a biſhop of the church at Rhegium, was preſent in the ſixth council at Conſtantinople; in the eighth, Conſtantine biſhop of Rhegium, was in the Nicene ſynod [o]: and we came the next day to Puteoli; the Syriac verſion adds, a city of Italy; it was formerly called Dicearchia [p], from the ſtrict juſtice uſed in the government of it: it had its name of Puteoli, either a putore, from the rankneſs and ill ſmell of the waters of it, through the ſulphur and allom in them; or a puteis, from the wells about it, the waters of which by Pauſanias, are ſaid [q] to be ſo hot, as in time to melt the leaden pipes, through which they flow, who calls it a town of the Tyrrhenians; by Pliny [r] it is placed in Campania, and ſo Jerom [s] ſays, Puteoli, a city, a colony of Campania, the ſame that is called Dicearchia. Joſephus [t] alſo ſpeaks of it, as in the ſame country; for he ſays, that Herod and Herodias both came to Dicearchia, (or Puteoli,) and found Caius (the emperor) at Baiai, which is a little town in Campania, about five furlongs from Dicearchia; and he alſo in another [u] place ſays, the Italians call Dicearchia, Ποτιολους, Potioli; which is the ſame name word the Apoſtle here uſes, and which is the Latin Puteoli corrupted; it is ſaid to be firſt built by the Samians: frequent mention is made by writers [w], of pulvis puteolanus, the duſt of Puteoli; which being touched by the ſea water, hardens into a ſtone; and was therefore uſed to bank the ſea, break the waves, and repel the force of them: that it was a place by the ſea-ſide, may be learned from the ſea being called after its name, mare Puteolanum [x], the ſea of Puteoli; ſo Apollonius Tyaneus is ſaid [y] to ſail from this place to Rome, whither he came in three days; to this port the ſhips of Alexandria particularly uſed to come, and hither perſons were wont to go to take ſhipping for Alexandria [z]; it is now called by the Italians Pozzuolo, and lies about eight miles from Naples; and according to the following ſtory of the Jews, muſt be an hundred and twenty miles from Rome; who tell us [a], that "Rabban Gamaliel, and R. Eleazar "ben Azariah, and R. Joſhua, and R. Akiba, went "to Rome, and they heard the noiſe of the multi"tude at Rome, from Puteoli, an hundred and "twenty miles:" the ſtory is a fable, deſigned to ſignify the vaſt number of people at Rome, and the noiſe, hurry, and tumult there; but perhaps the diſtance between the two places, may not be far from truth: and as fabulous is the account which R. Benjamin [b] gives of this place Puteoli, when he ſays it was called Surentum, a great city which

Ver. 14. Where we found brethren, &c.] Chriſtians; which is not to be wondered at, ſince it was a port much frequented, and where many came and went, of different countries and nations; particularly there were many Jews here, to whom the Goſpel was firſt preached, and to ſome of them it was the power of God unto ſalvation in many places, and doubtleſs was ſo here: Joſephus [c] ſpeaks of Jews in this place, who were deceived by a falſe Alexander, who pretended to be the ſon of Herod, a prince of their nation. Patrobulus, the ſame with Patrobas in Rom. xvi. 14. who is reckoned one of the ſeventy diſciples, is ſaid to be biſhop of this place; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. though we have no account of its church ſtate until the fifth century, when a biſhop of the church at Puteoli, is ſaid to be in the council held at Epheſus againſt Eutyches, and ſuſtained the place of Leo, pope of Rome: in the ſixth century, a biſhop of this church was in a council held at Rome, under Symmachus: in the ſeventh century, the biſhop of Puteoli was in the ſixth council at Conſtantinople [d]: and were deſired to tarry with them ſeven days; that is, the chriſtians at Puteoli deſired the Apoſtle, and thoſe that were with him, to ſtay a week with them, that they might have the advantage of a day of public worſhip together, and might enjoy much of their chriſtian converſation; and accordingly they did ſtay that time, no doubt by the leave, and with the conſent of Julius the centurion; and which ſhows, that he uſed the Apoſtle with great civility and courteouſneſs, and was very ready to grant him favours; if he was not in this voyage converted by him, which is not unlikely, conſidering the whole of his conduct: and ſo we went toward Rome; after they had ſtaid ſeven days at Puteoli, they ſet forward on their journey to Rome; for from hence they went thither on foot, though they might have gone from hence to Rome by ſea, as Apollonius Tyaneus did; ſee the note on ver. 13. and ſo likewiſe Titus the ſon of Veſpaſian, who went from Rhegium to Puteoli in a merchant ſhip, and from thence to Rome [e]; but it may be the ſhip unladed here, and there was no other going for Rome at that time: Rome was the metropolis of Italy, the ſeat of the empire, and miſtreſs of the whole world; it is ſo well known, as not to need deſcribing: it was built on ſeven hills, and had its name either from Romulus the founder of it; or from the Greek word Ρωμη, which ſignifies ſtrength [f], from whence Romulus is ſuppoſed to have his name; with the Hebrews it has its name from its ſublimity, heighth, and glory, from the word, רום, which ſignifies to be high and exalted; ſome ſay it had its name from Roma, a daughter of Italus, who firſt laid the foundation of it, though Romulus and Remus brought it into the form of a city; it was built ſeven hundred and fifty years and upwards, before the birth of Chriſt. The Jews make it to be of an earlier date; they ſay [g], that at the time Solomon married Pharaoh's daughter, Gabriel deſcended and fixed a reed in the ſea, and brought up clay, and with it was built the great city which is Rome; and in another place [h] it is ſaid, in the day in which Jeroboam ſet up the two calves, one at Dan, and the other at Bethel, was built a certain cottage, which is Italy of Greece, that is Rome; for it is elſewhere obſerved [i], Italy of Greece, this is the great city of Rome; and again [k], on the day in which Jeroboam ſet up the two calves, Remus and Romulus came and built two cottages in Rome.

Ver. 15. And from thence, &c.] That is, from Rome, whither they were going: when the brethren heard of us; when the chriſtians at Rome, heard that the Apoſtle and his friends were landed at Puteoli, and were on their journey to Rome: theſe were the members of the church at Rome; for there was a church-ſtate here before this time. The Apoſtle had before this written a letter to them, called the epiſtle to the Romans, in which he treats them as a church. The papiſts ſay that the Apoſtle Peter was the firſt biſhop of it, and pretend an uninterrupted ſucceſſion from him; though it is queſtionable, whether he ever was at Rome; and if he was, it is not probable that he ſhould take upon him the care of a ſingle church, which was not conſiſtent with his office as an Apoſtle: in the firſt century, the biſhops or paſtors of this church, were as follow; after the martyrdom of Paul and Peter, Euſebius [l] ſays, Linus was the firſt biſhop of it, the ſame that is mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 21. and according to the ſame writer [m], Anencletus ſucceeded him, and then Clement, a fellow-labourer of the Apoſtle Paul's, Phil. iv. 3. who wrote two epiſtles to the Corinthians, which are ſtill extant; though Euſebius [n] not conſiſtent with himſelf, makes Clement in another place to ſucceed Linus; and ſome make Clement even to be before him; and ſome place one Cletus before Anencletus and him: ſuch an uncertainty is there, and ſuch a puzzle attends the firſt account of this uninterrupted ſucceſſion; and which ſeems deſigned in providence, to bring it into contempt: in the ſecond century, Euareſtus ſucceeded Clement; and then followed him Alexander, Sixtus, or Xyſtus, Teleſphorus, Hyginus, Pius, Anicetus, Soter, Eleutherius, and Victor: in the third century, Victor was ſucceeded by Zephyrinus; and after him were Calixtus, Urbanus, Pontianus, Anterus, Fabianus, Cornelius, Lucius, Stephanus, Sixtus, or Xyſtus II. Dionyſius, Felix, Eutychianus, and Gaius: in the fourth century, Marcellinus ſucceeded Gaius; who was followed by Marcellus, Euſebius, Miltiades, Sylveſter, Julius, Liberius, Felix II. Damaſus, and Siricius [o]; and further than this age, it is not worth while to follow them; the man of ſin began to grow apace, and in a century or two afterwards, proclaimed himſelf univerſal biſhop: they came to meet us as far as Appii forum and the three Taverns; theſe were both of them towns that lay in the Appian way to Rome; the former of theſe Horace [p] makes mention of, in the account of his journey from Rome to Brunduſium; firſt he ſays, he came to Aricia, or Rizza, which is about 160 furlongs, or 21 miles from Rome, and from thence to Appii forum: that Appii forum was further from Rome than the three Taverns, appears from what Cicero ſays [q], who dates his letter to Atticus from Appii forum, at four o'clock, and tells him, that he had ſent him another a little before from tres Tabernæ, or the three Taverns; and indeed, Appii forum was one and fifty miles from Rome, and the three Taverns but three and thirty: ſo that the ſenſe muſt be, that ſome of the brethren from Rome, came as far as the three Taverns, and others as far as Appii forum; which as before obſerved, were two towns upon the road: hence the former of theſe was not a ſtatue of Appius, near the city of Rome, as ſome have [r] ſaid; nor a market in the city itſelf, as ſays Jerom [s], or a writer under his name; whoſe words are, Appii forum is the name of a market at Rome, from Appius, formerly a conſul, and from whom the Appian way had its name: but this was a town at ſome diſtance; there were ſeveral towns in Italy of a like appellation; as Julii forum, Cornelii forum, now Imola, Livii forum, now Forli: Pliny [t] makes mention of an Appii forum; and there was a town in Calabria, called Taberna: and as the one was not a mere market-place, ſo the other does not deſign three houſes for publick entertainment; for the words ſhould not be tranſlated three Taverns, nor indeed tranſlated at all; nor are they by Luke, who retains the Latin name, as the name of a place; and here it was that Severus the Roman emperor, was killed by Herculius Maximianus [u]; and this in Conſtantine's time, was the ſeat of a biſhop; for among the biſhops aſſembled on account of Donatus, mention is made of one Felix a tribus tabernis [w], or Felix biſhop of tres Tabernæ, the ſame place we call the three Taverns: whom when Paul ſaw, he thanked God and took courage; that is, when he ſaw the brethren that came to meet him, he gave thanks to God for the ſight of them, which he had ſo much deſired; and he took heart and courage, and went on chearfully, and in high ſpirits towards Rome; in hope of ſeeing the reſt, and believing that God had ſome work for him to do there.

[q] Ad Atticum, l. 2. ep. 11.

Ver. 16. And when we came to Rome, &c.] To the city itſelf: the centurion delivered the priſoners to the captain of the guard; or general of the army; or as ſome think, the governour of the prætorian band of ſoldiers, who attended the emperor as his guards: his name is thought to have been Burrhus Afranius; to him Julius the centurion, delivered all the priſoners he brought from Ceſarea, excepting Paul, to be diſpoſed of by him, in the ſeveral priſons, or goals, to whom it belonged to take care of ſuch perſons: this clauſe is wanting in the Alexandrian copy, and in the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions: but Paul was ſuffered to dwell by himſelf, with a ſoldier that kept him; this was owing, either to the letter which Feſtus ſent to Rome concerning him, and his caſe; by which it appeared, that he was no malefactor, and therefore to be uſed in a different manner from the reſt of the priſoners; or rather to the interceſſion of the centurion, who had all along uſed him in a very civil and courteous manner; who requeſting this favour had it granted, that Paul ſhould not be put into the common priſon with the reſt, but ſhould dwell in an apartment by himſelf; or as the Ethiopic verſion renders it, at his own will; where he himſelf pleaſed, for he dwelt in his own hired houſe, ver. 30. only he was under the care and cuſtody of a ſoldier, who conſtantly attended him, wherever he went; and which could not be otherwiſe, ſeeing he was chained, as in ver. 20. and his chain was put on his right-hand, and faſtened to the left hand of the ſoldier, that had him under his keeping; ſo that wherever he was or went, the ſoldier muſt be likewiſe: hence that paſſage in Seneca [x], "as the ſame chain joins together "the priſoner and the ſoldier, ſo thoſe things which "are unlike go together; fear follows hope."

Ver. 17. And it came to paſs, that after three days, &c.] From his firſt coming to Rome, when he had hired himſelf a houſe, or lodging, and was ſettled in it, and was reſted from the fatigue of his voyage and journey: Paul called the chief of the Jews together; he ſent to the principal men among them; for though the Jews were expelled from Rome in the reign of Claudius, they were now returned, and had their liberty of reſiding there; very likely by means of Poppea, Nero's concubine, who favoured the Jews: but whether they had a ſynagogue, and theſe men were the chief and leading men in it, the doctors, rulers, and officers of it, are things not certain; however, theſe the Apoſtle deſired to come to him where he was, for whether he had the liberty of going about where he would, the ſoldier attending him, is not ſo clear a point: and when they were come together; to his houſe, or lodging: he ſaid unto them, men and brethren; which was the uſual form of addreſs with the Jews; ſee ch. vii. 2. Though I have committed nothing againſt the people and cuſtoms of our fathers; meaning he had ſaid nothing diſreſpectfully of the people of the Jews; nor had done any thing to the prejudice of their temporal, ſpiritual, and eternal good, but juſt the reverſe; nor had he ſaid or done any thing contrary to the laws and cuſtoms enjoined the Jews by Moſes, even thoſe that were of a ceremonial nature; for though he had every where declared that the Gentiles were not obliged to an obedience to them, yet he did not diſſuade the Jews from the uſe of them; and oftentimes complied with them himſelf, things he had been charged with: yet was I delivered priſoner from Jeruſalem into the hands of the Romans; he was firſt ſeized by the Jews in the temple of Jeruſalem, and then fell into the hands of Lyſias, the chief captain; who bound him, and by whom he was ſent to Ceſarea, where he was retained a priſoner both by Felix and Feſtus, Roman governours.

Ver. 18. Who when they had examined me, &c.] About the things laid to his charge, had heard what his accuſers had to object to him, and the defence he made for himſelf: would have let me go; releaſed him from his bonds, and ſet him at liberty to go where he pleaſed: becauſe there was no cauſe of death in me; no crime proved upon him, which was worthy of death; and this was the ſenſe of Lyſias the chief captain, and of Felix and Feſtus the Roman governours, and of king Agrippa.

Ver. 19. But when the Jews ſpake againſt it, &c.] His being cleared and diſmiſſed, and deſired he might be ſent back to Jeruſalem, to be tried and judged there, to which Feſtus ſeemed inclined: I was conſtrained to appeal to Cæſar; to prevent the deſign of the Jews upon him, which was to waylay him and kill him, or by what ways they could, right or wrong, take away his life; and to provide for his own ſafety: not that I had ought to accuſe my nation of; meaning, that he had no ill deſign in this appeal againſt his country, to expoſe them, and bring them under reproach and cenſure, but to vindicate himſelf, defend his own innocence, and preſerve his character and life; ſuggeſting, that what he did, was not of choice, but by conſtraint, and with reluctance; being no friend to heathen tribunals, nor any enemy to the Jewiſh nation.

Ver. 20. For this cauſe therefore have I called for you, &c.] To let them know the true ſtate of his caſe; that though he was a priſoner, it was not for any crime he had done, much leſs any of a capital nature; and that as he was no ſcandal to his country, ſo neither did he intend to raiſe any againſt it, or ſay, or do any thing which might bring it into contempt and danger: as well as to ſee you and ſpeak ſpeak with you; and keep up and maintain, a free and friendly converſation together: becauſe that for the hope of Iſrael I am bound with this chain; which was then upon him, and he pointed to; the true reaſon of which was, becauſe he had preached that the Meſſiah, the tribes of Iſrael were hoping and waiting for, and who is the only ſolid foundation of the hope of eternal life and ſalvation, was already come; and that he had ſuffered and died, and roſe again from the dead, and that Jeſus of Nazareth was he; ſee Jer. xiv. 8. and xvii. 13. And this title well agrees with Jeſus Chriſt, who in the New Teſtament is called our hope, and the hope of glory, 1 Tim. i. 1. Col. i. 27. and he is the hope of every Iſraelite indeed, of every ſenſible ſinner, of every regenerated perſon, whether Jew or Gentile; and ſuch are encouraged to hope in him for grace here, and glory hereafter: and whereas they ſee themſelves loſt and undone, and that there is no ſalvation for them by their own works, and that there is ſalvation in Chriſt, they are directed and encouraged to hope in him for it; becauſe it is a work finiſhed by him, and is compleat in him; it is of free grace and favour beſtowed; it is wrought out for the chief of ſinners; and ſuch as they themſelves are, are invited by himſelf to look to him for it; and the Goſpel declaration is, that whoever believes in him ſhall be ſaved: they ſee themſelves to be ſinners, and that there is no hope of the forgiveneſs of their ſins from an abſolute God, or the abſolute mercy of God out of Chriſt, but that the blood of Chriſt was ſhed for the remiſſion of ſins, and that God for Chriſt's ſake, does forgive ſins; wherefore they hope in him for it; to which they are encouraged by the proclamation of the grace of God, as a forgiving God in Chriſt; by the promiſes of forgiveneſs in the covenant of grace; by the Goſpel declaration of it; by its being entirely of free grace, through the blood of Chriſt; and by the many inſtances of the worſt of ſinners who have been favoured with it: theſe Iſraelites indeed, alſo ſee themſelves unrighteous creatures, and that they cannot be juſtified before God by works of righteouſneſs done by them; but that there is a righteouſneſs wrought out by Chriſt, which is acceptable and well pleaſing to God; is freely beſtowed on men, and is imputed to all ſorts of men, even to the ungodly; wherefore they hope in him for it, and lay hold on this object of hope ſet before them: in a word, they have hope of eternal life on his account, that being the gift of God through him; and it being the will of God, that whoever believes in him ſhould have it; and it being in the power and right of Chriſt to beſtow it; and they having alſo his Spirit as the earneſt and pledge of it; as well as have his righteouſneſs as their title to it, his grace as their meetneſs for it, and have a ſhare both in his interceſſion and in his preparations of it: moreover, the Apoſtle taught that there would be a general reſurrection of the dead, upon which would ſucceed a ſtate of everlaſting happineſs for the righteous; and which was the hope of the tribes of Iſrael in common, eſpecially of every Iſraelite indeed: now theſe things had irritated the carnal Jews againſt him, who could not reſt till they had been the means of bringing him into the condition he now was; nor were they content with this, without having his life.

Ver. 21. And they ſaid unto him, &c.] That is, the chief men of the Jews at Rome, whom Paul had called together, replied; either in a lying and diſſembling way, or as expreſſing matter of fact; which laſt may be allowed: we neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee; which was very much, that the high prieſt and Sanhedrim had not wrote to the principal men of their religion at Rome; giving an account of the Apoſtle, and his caſe unto them, in order to prejudice them againſt him, and to furniſh them with charges and accuſations; which if they could not prevail by them, ſo as to get him condemned by the emperor, yet might be a means of preventing any of their nation giving heed unto him, and embracing his ſentiments and notions concerning Jeſus of Nazareth: neither any of the brethren that came from Jeruſalem; or any part of Judea, to Rome; meaning not the chriſtian Jews, for theſe they would not call brethren; but thoſe who were of the ſame religion as well as nation, whom it was uſual with the Jews to call brethren: ſhewed or ſpake any harm of thee; ſo that it looks as if they did make mention of him, but did not charge him with any thing that was wicked and criminal: this they ſaid, to ſhew that they were not prejudiced againſt him by any perſon or means; and which carried in it a very conſiderable teſtimony of the Apoſtle's innocence.

Ver. 22. But we deſire to hear of thee what thou thinkeſt, &c.] What was his opinion and judgment concerning the Meſſiah, whether he was come or no, and whether Jeſus of Nazareth was he; and concerning other principles relating to him, embraced by the chriſtians; and what he had to ſay for the clearing up, proving and confirming his ſentiments about theſe things: for as concerning this ſect; or hereſy, meaning the chriſtian religion: in ſaying ſo, they reproached it; for the Goſpel, or chriſtian religion, is not an human device, the choice and option of man's free-will, and what he pleaſes himſelf with, as an opinion and invention of his own, or of other men, as hereſy ſignifies; but it is of God, and by revelation of Jeſus Chriſt, and is a doctrine of the higheſt wiſdom: nor does it deny or take away, any fundamental article of true religion; either natural, as known by the Gentiles, or as revealed, with which the Jews were made acquainted, under the former diſpenſation; but eſtabliſhes every ſuch article, as the unity of the divine being; the worſhip of the one only and true God of Iſrael, in a ſpiritual manner; the doctrine of the Meſſiah, his perſon, office, and grace; the reſurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment; and therefore could not be chargeable with hereſy: nor was it ſet up for any worldly gain, or popular applauſe, which are the things that authors and abettors of hereſy have in view; nor was it deſigned to divide and ſeparate perſons from the true church of God, but to bring them to it, and unite them together in it; ſee ch. xxiv. 14. We know that every where it is ſpoken againſt; this they knew, both by letters they received, and by perſons who came from different parts of the world; and which was fact, and was no other than what was foretold concerning Chriſt, that he ſhould be a ſign that ſhould be ſpoken againſt, Luke ii. 34. and which the Apoſtle found true of the Goſpel preached by him, both among Jews and Greeks; it being to the one a ſtumbling-block, and to the other fooliſhneſs, 1 Cor. i. 23. and eſpecially it was contradicted and blaſphemed every where by the Jews; theſe in all places oppoſed themſelves to it, and ſpoke evil of it, and of its preachers and profeſſors: Chriſt the author, ſum, and ſubject of the chriſtian religion, was ſpoken againſt in his perſon; his deity and divine ſonſhip were denied, as they ſtill are; and his offices, as prophet, prieſt, and king; yea, his actions, even his works of mercy to the bodies of men, by healing their diſeaſes, his converſing with ſinners for the good of their ſouls, the ſeveral miracles he wrought, and the whole ſeries of his life and converſation, were blaſphemed and evil ſpoken of: the doctrines of the Goſpel in general, were contradicted, as they now are by many, as abſurd and irrational, and as tending to licentiouſneſs; and in particular, thoſe which reſpect the Father of Chriſt, as being the Father of Chriſt, his everlaſting love to the elect in him, and his diſtinguiſhing grace in the choice of them; and thoſe which relate to Chriſt, as that he is truly God, and the Son of God, and to his ſacrifice, ſatisfaction, and imputed righteouſneſs; and alſo which concern the Spirit of God, as his deity and perſonality, and his operations on the ſouls of men; and ſuch as relate to a future ſtate, the reſurrection of all the dead, and judgment to come: likewiſe the ordinances of the chriſtian religion, baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper, were deſpiſed and ſpoken againſt, and the profeſſors of it treated as fools and wicked men; the reaſons of all this are, becauſe the chriſtian religion and the doctrines of it, are not of men, are contrary to the luſts of men, and particularly to the pride of men; they ſubject them to reproach and perſecution, and gather men out from among them.

Ver. 23. And when they had appointed him a day, &c.] When they ſhould meet together, and when both ſides might be better prepared to enter into a converſation on the ſubject of chriſtianity; and when there might be an opportunity for a more numerous aſſembly to hear: there came many to him into his lodging; the ſame very likely with his own hired houſe, ver. 30. hither a large number came at the time appointed, more than thoſe whom Paul firſt ſent for: to whom he expounded; the ſcriptures, the writings of Moſes, and the prophets; and particularly ſuch parts of them as concerned the Meſſiah; ſo our Lord expounded to his diſciples in all the ſcriptures, the things concerning himſelf, Luke xxiv. 27. And teſtified the kingdom of God; or the kingdom of the Meſſiah, which oftentimes ſignifies the Goſpel, and the Goſpel diſpenſation: he produced full and ſufficient proofs and teſtimonies from prophecies, miracles, and facts, that the kingdom of the Meſſiah was come; which conſiſted not in outward pompous things, in temporal riches and honours, as they expected; but in the miniſtration of the Goſpel, and in the adminiſtration of its ordinances; and in righteouſneſs and holineſs, which give the one a right unto, and the other a meetneſs for, the kingdom of heaven: and of this he teſtified, that it is the kingdom of God, of his preparing and of his giving, and is what he calls his people unto, and makes them meet for; and in which they ſhall reign with him, and enjoy him for ever: and the Apoſtle could teſtify and make it evident, that there was ſuch a kingdom, and ſuch a future glorious ſtate; from the promiſe of God, to which the twelve tribes of Iſrael hoped to come; from the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, which ſpeak of everlaſting life, and of the reſurrection of the dead unto it; from the expectations of the ſaints of the former diſpenſation, who all died in the faith of it; and from the coming of the Meſſiah, his ſufferings and death, and aſcenſion to heaven, whereby he had brought life and immortality to the cleareſt light: perſuading them concerning Jeſus; endeavouring to perſuade them, that Jeſus was the true Meſſiah; that he was truly God, and the Son of God, as well as man; that he was born of a virgin, and wrought miracles, and yielded perfect obedience to the law; that he laid down his life as a ſacrifice for ſin, and to make reconciliation and atonement for it; that he brought in an everlaſting righteouſneſs; that he roſe again from the dead for juſtification; that he was aſcended up to heaven, and was ſet down at the right-hand of God, where he ever lives to make interceſſion, and will come again a ſecond time to judge both quick and dead: theſe are ſome of the things concerning Jeſus, as the words may be rendered, which the Apoſtle endeavoured to perſuade the Jews into a belief of; as alſo the bleſſings of grace which come by him, ſuch as peace and pardon through his blood, reconciliation and atonement by his ſacrifice, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, and compleat ſalvation in him: concerning theſe he perſuaded the Jews, ſetting things in a clear light, uſing ſtrong arguments to convince them, and giving full proof, as the nature of them would admit of; and which is no other than moral ſuaſion, and is of itſelf ineffectual; efficacious perſuaſion is only of God; it is he that opens the heart to attend to theſe things, and gives faith to receive and embrace them: however, it is the duty of Goſpel miniſters to make uſe of arguments, and by them to endeavour to perſuade men of their need of Chriſt, and of ſalvation by him, as the Apoſtle did; ſee 2 Cor. v. 11. Both out of the law of Moſes; not the law of the ten commandments, given on mount Sinai to Moſes, who delivered it to the children of Iſrael, and is oppoſed to the doctrine of grace and truth, which came by Jeſus Chriſt, John i. 17. that accuſes and convinces of ſin, and pronounces guilty, and curſes for it; but does not reveal Jeſus Chriſt as a Saviour from it; no proof can be taken from thence of the things concerning Jeſus; but the five books of Moſes are here meant, in which he wrote of Chriſt; as our Lord himſelf ſays, John v. 46, 47. as he did particularly in Gen. iii. 15. and xlix. 10. and Deut. xviii. 15. alſo the types and ſacrifices recorded in his writings, might be made uſe of in proof of Jeſus, and the things of him: and out of the prophets; ſuch as Pſal. xxii. 15, 16. and xvi. 10. and lxviii. 18. and cx. 1. Iſa. vii. 14. and liii. Dan. ix. 24, 26. Mic. v. 2. Zech. ix. 9. and xiii. 7. with many others: and in this work he continued, from morning till evening; not that we are to ſuppoſe, that he carried on one continued diſcourſe upon theſe ſubjects, without any intermiſſion; but that he was all the day employed, either in expounding the ſcriptures, proving that the kingdom of the Meſſiah was come, and uſing ſtrong and perſuaſory arguments, to ſhow that Jeſus was he; or in anſwering the cavils and objections of the Jews, to what he ſaid.

Ver. 24. And ſome believed the things which were ſpoken, &c.] By him, concerning the kingdom of God and Jeſus Chriſt; even as many as were ordained unto eternal life, and to whom it was given to believe; for faith is the gift of God, and which comes by hearing of the word, when it is attended with a divine power; and then it is not only notionally underſtood, and barely aſſented to as truth, but is cordially believed and embraced, and chearfully profeſſed, and ſteadily held faſt: this was not a mere hiſtorical faith, or a bare aſſent to the truth of the things ſpoken, nor a mere profeſſion of faith in them, but a believing in Chriſt with the heart, the ſum and ſubſtance of them; as they heard theſe things, their underſtandings were enlightened, and they ſaw their need of Chriſt, and the things of Chriſt, which were held forth in the miniſtry of the word; and ſo approved of them, ſavoured, reliſhed, and fed upon them; and until this is the caſe, none can, nor will believe aright: and ſome believed not; notwithſtanding the full proof, and clear evidence produced by the Apoſtle: theſe were not of Chriſt's ſheep, their eyes were blinded, and their hearts were hardened, as was propheſied of them, and therefore they could not believe; they were given up to a judicial blindneſs and hardneſs of heart, and were left under the power of obſtinate and invincible unbelief: their diſbelief of theſe things, aroſe from the prejudices they had conceived about a worldly kingdom; from the ſufferings and death of Jeſus Chriſt, they imagining the Meſſiah would not die, but abide for ever; from the carnal reaſonings of their minds, about divine and ſpiritual things; and from the ignorance that was in them, becauſe of the obduracy of their hearts. The kingdom the Apoſtle teſtified of, was not an Utopian kingdom, nor any of the real kingdoms of this world, but the kingdom of the Meſſiah they were expecting; but that which he deſcribed, being not ſuch an one as they imagined, they believed him not: the things he ſaid concerning Jeſus were not trivial, ſpeculative, and indifferent things; but of the greateſt moment and importance, and of which there was full proof in their own writings; and though ſpoken by Paul, were no other than the word of God; and beſides, were good news, and glad tidings, and yet they believed them not: this difference among them, ſome believing and ſome not believing, was not owing to the power and free-will of man, as if ſome of themſelves would, and did believe, and others would not, but to the diſtinguiſhing grace of God; for faith is not of man, it is the gift of God, it is the fruit of electing grace, and is given in conſequence of it: nor is this any unuſual thing, under the ſame miniſtration of the word, for one to believe, and another not believe: this is a common caſe, and is the uſual ſucceſs the Goſpel meets with; ſo it always has been, and ſo it is, and will be; ſo it was in the times of Noah, he was a preacher of righteouſneſs to the old world, even of the righteouſneſs of faith, many were diſobedient, few believed; and ſo it fared with the evangelical prophet Iſaiah, and with Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Zechariah, and other prophets of the Old Teſtament; and with John the Baptiſt, the forerunner of Chriſt, and with Chriſt himſelf, as well as with our Apoſtle; and this has been the caſe ever ſince his times, now is, and will be, as long as the Goſpel is preached.

Ver. 25. And when they agreed not among themſelves, &c.] One part believing what was ſaid, and the other diſbelieving; and ſuch a diviſion is the uſual effect of the Goſpel miniſtry; ſee Luke xii. 51, 52. Or this may be underſtood of the unbelieving party, who though they agreed in the main that Jeſus was not the Meſſiah, yet might have different ſentiments of the Apoſtle; of the manner of his reaſoning, and the nature of his proofs and arguments; and of ſome things which he delivered, which ſome might aſſent to, and others deny; as the Phariſees and Sadducees in the Sanhedrim at Jeruſalem, diſagreed about the doctrine of the reſurrection: and the rather this may be thought to be the ſenſe, becauſe they not only departed, when very likely thoſe that believed might ſtay longer, but becauſe at their departure, the Apoſtle ſays ſomething very cutting and ſtinging, and which he would not ſay in common of them all, of the believers; and beſides, they are afterwards ſaid to reaſon among themſelves, ver. 29. They departed; from the Apoſtle's lodging to their own houſes, or to ſome other place, where they could call over and debate among themſelves, the things they had heard: after that Paul had ſpoken one word; a very remarkable one, and full to the purpoſe, and which he gave them juſt at parting with them: well ſpake the Holy Ghoſt by Eſaias the prophet unto our fathers; the paſſage referred to, is in Iſa. vi. 9, 10. which the prophet Iſaiah delivered under the influence, and by the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, being moved by him, as all the holy men of God were; and which was very appoſite, not only to the Jewiſh fathers in the times of Iſaiah, but to their poſterity in ſucceeding ages, in the times of Chriſt and his Apoſtles; ſee Matt. xiii. 10, 11, 13, 14. John xii. 37—46. and were exceeding applicable to the preſent unbelieving Jews, who had been diſputing with the Apoſtle, and were now departing from him, in unbelief: and from hence it appears, that ſince it was the Holy Ghoſt that ſpake by Iſaiah the prophet, and he that ſpoke to him and by him, was the Adon, Jehovah, and Lord of hoſts, as is clear from Iſa. vi. 1, 5, 8, 9. it follows, that the Holy Ghoſt is a divine perſon, truly God, and equal with the Father and the Son.

Ver. 26. Saying, go unto this people, and ſay, &c.] A meſſage ſent in wrath and judgment to the people of Iſrael, rejected from being the people of God, a lo ammi being written upon them; and therefore God does not call them his, but this people: and this meſſage was ſent by an evangelical prophet, who foretold in the cleareſt manner, the Meſſiah's incarnation, and birth of a virgin, the work he was to do, the ſufferings he ſhould undergo, and the glory that ſhould follow; and that after he had ſeen in a viſion, the glory of the king Meſſiah, the perfections of deity filling the temple of his human nature, him exalted on a throne, and attended and worſhipped by angels; after he had had ſuch a view of his beauty and excellency, that laid him low in his own ſight, and humbled him under a ſenſe of his own impurity and unworthineſs; and after he had had a comfortable diſcovery and application of pardoning grace; and after he had expreſſed ſuch a readineſs and willingneſs to go on the Lord's errand: which one might have thought would have been of a different nature; and that he would have been ſent, and have been made uſeful, to ſet forth the glories and excellencies of Chriſt's perſon, office, and grace, he had had ſuch a view of; and to preach the comfortable doctrine of pardoning grace to men, which he had juſt now ſuch a gracious experience of; but on the contrary, he is bid to ſay, hearing ye ſhall hear; with bodily ears, the Goſpel preached by the Meſſiah and his Apoſtles: and ſhall not underſtand; ſpiritually and experimentally, what they heard: to have an opportunity of hearing the Goſpel, is a great bleſſing; ſeeing it is good news, glad tidings of good things, a joyful ſound, and the voice of Chriſt himſelf; it is a diſtinguiſhing favour, and what all men at all times have not; when it is attended with a divine energy, the Spirit of God is received through it, regeneration, quickening and ſanctifying grace are by it; faith comes by hearing it, and Chriſt is found under the miniſtration of it; and generally ſpeaking, the underſtanding and knowledge of divine things, are by means of it: men are naturally without the underſtanding of ſpiritual things, and where the Goſpel is not, they remain ſo; the miniſters of the Goſpel, and the word preached by them, are the means of leading men into a ſpiritual underſtanding of things, though only as, and when attended with the Spirit of God, who is a Spirit of wiſdom and revelation, in the knowledge of Chriſt: and a ſpecial mercy it is, when perſons whilſt hearing the word, underſtand what they hear, and can diſtinguiſh truth from error; and approve of the truth, receive the love of it, feel the power, and taſte the ſweetneſs of it; find it and eat it, believe, embrace, and profeſs it, and bring forth fruits worthy of it: but on the contrary, when it is heard and not underſtood, it is an awful diſpenſation; for hence either they content themſelves with bare hearing, and depend upon it for ſalvation; or they deſpiſe and ſpeak evil of what they do not underſtand; and ſo their hearing, inſtead of being a bleſſing, is an aggravation of their condemnation: and ſeeing ye ſhall ſee; miracles wrought: and not perceive; them to be proofs of the things, for which they are wrought: ſo Jarchi expounds thoſe words, “ye ſhall ſee the wonders, or miracles I have “done for you, and ſhall not ſet your hearts to “know me:” from whence it appears, that the Goſpel preached in the cleareſt and moſt powerful manner, and even miracles wrought in confirmation of it, are inſufficient for converſion; and nothing will effect it, but efficacious grace.

Ver. 27. For the heart of this people is waxed groſs, &c.] Or fat; ſtupified with notions of carnal and temporal things, and become hardened againſt, and unſuſceptible of divine and ſpiritual things: and their ears are dull of hearing; the Goſpel, and its joyful ſound; to which they ſtop their ears, as the deaf adder to the voice of the charmer: and their eyes have they cloſed; and wilfully ſhut, againſt all evidence from facts, miracles, prophecies, and preaching: leſt they ſhould ſee with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and underſtand with their heart, and ſhould be converted; that is, ſee the evidence of miracles, take in the truth of doctrine, underſtand the meaning of prophecy, and ſo be turned from darkneſs, ignorance, and unbelief, to light, knowledge, and faith: and I ſhould heal them; or have mercy on them, as the Ethiopic verſion renders it; that is, forgive their ſins: hearing the Goſpel preached, is the ordinary means of underſtanding ſpiritual things; and the underſtanding being enlightened through the miniſtry of the word, by the Spirit of God, whereby the ſinner ſees his loſt ſtate by nature, his impurity and impotency, the danger he is in, and the deſtruction that is imminent on him, and he is liable to, and alſo his need of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; this iſſues in converſion, in the turning of a man from the evil of his ways, to believe in Chriſt, walk on in him, and worthy of him; when he is healed of the diſeaſes of his ſoul, which are many, are natural, and hereditary, mortal and incurable, but by Chriſt the great phyſician; by whoſe ſtripes, wounds, and blood, there is healing, that is, pardon; for healing diſeaſes, and pardoning iniquities, are one and the ſame; ſee Pſal. ciii. 3. and at converſion, when a ſoul is enlightened, and made ſenſible of the evil of ſin, and that there is no cure of this diſeaſe, by any thing that he or any creature can do, or preſcribe for him, but only by the blood of Chriſt; a diſcovery of pardoning grace is made unto him; and he is made whole, and cured of every diſeaſe that attended him; from whence ſpring joy, peace, and comfort to him: but when through hearing the word, the underſtanding is not enlightened, and converſion does not follow upon it, there is no healing of the diſeaſe of ſin, no pardon applied; and conſequently ſuch muſt be in a moſt deplorable and miſerable condition, as all ignorant hearers and deſpiſers of the Goſpel are; ſee the the notes on Matt. xiii. 14, 15.

Ver. 28. Be it known therefore unto you, &c.] Unbelievers and deſpiſers, take this along with you at parting, and don't ſay you were never acquainted with it: that the ſalvation of God is ſent unto the Gentiles; meaning the Goſpel, which is a publication and declaration of that ſalvation, which God contrived from all eternity; made proviſion for, and ſecured in the covenant of grace; which he appointed, called, and ſent Chriſt to effect, in the fulneſs of time; and which he has accompliſhed, by his obedience, ſufferings, and death; even a full, compleat, ſpiritual, and eternal ſalvation, from ſin, ſatan, the world, the curſe of the law, and eternal death; that that Goſpel which proclaims this, and is the power of God unto it, to them that believe, is ſent to the Gentile world, by God himſelf, who has ordered his miniſters to turn to them, upon the rejection of it by the Jews: and that they will hear it; and do underſtand it and obey it, believe it and profeſs it: this the Apoſtle could aſſert upon his own knowledge, who had preached it in many nations of the world; and could teſtify how gladly they heard it, with what pleaſure they received it, how readily they obeyed it, and how chearfully they profeſſed it, and how ſteadily they held it; though the Jews deſpiſed and put it away from them, judging themſelves unworthy of everlaſting life: this the Apoſtle ſays, reproaching them with their folly, ſtupidity, and infidelity; when the Gentiles which knew not God, received the Goſpel and are ſaved.

Ver. 29. And when he had ſaid theſe words, &c.] Cited the prophecy of Iſaiah, and declared the miſſion of the Goſpel to the Gentiles, and their vocation by it; both which, muſt greatly gravel and diſturb the unbelieving part of his audience: the Jews departed; much diſpleaſed and uneaſy: and had great reaſoning among themſelves; not only with them that believed, but with others, that ſeemed to incline towards the Apoſtle, and who eſpouſed and undertook to defend ſome principles of his, againſt the reſt, as the doctrine of the reſurrection; and particularly they might take into conſideration the paſſage in Iſaiah, the Apoſtle had recited to them at parting, and which was ſo appoſite to them; as well as the account he gave them of the preaching of the Goſpel, and the ſucceſs of it among the Gentiles, things which muſt be very grating to them: this whole verſe is wanting in the Alexandrian copy, and in the Syriac verſion.

Ver. 30. And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired houſe, &c.] In a houſe which he hired with his own money; in which his friends Luke, Ariſtarchus, and others, dwelt with him; where he was guarded by a ſoldier: whether at the expiration of theſe two years, he was ſet at liberty, and for ten years afterwards, travelled into Italy, France, and Spain, preaching the Goſpel, as ſome think; or whether he then ſuffered martyrdom is not certain; the latter is moſt probable: and received all that came in unto him; there, as the Syriac verſion reads, that is, into his lodging, as the Ethiopic verſion expreſſes it; which is not to be underſtood of his hoſpitality, for it cannot be thought that he ſhould provide food and lodging for all that came unto him; but that he admitted all that would, to come and hear him, and freely preached the Goſpel to them: it ſhould ſeem by this, as well as by what is ſaid ver. 23. that many of the Jews came into his lodging, and heard him expound, that it was a large houſe he had hired and dwelt in; and ſuch an one Jerom [y] thinks it was, like that he ſuppoſes he would have Philemon provide for him, which he deſires in his epiſtle to him, ver. 22. namely, a houſe in the moſt noted place in the city, for the conveniency of thoſe that came to him; large enough to hold many; free from noiſe and diſturbance; and not ſituated in a ſcandalous neighbourhood, nor near to ſhows and plays; and that the lodging ſhould rather be on the floor, than in an upper room: and ſuch a houſe, with all the conditions that Jerom mentions, the Papiſts pretend to ſhow at Rome to this day; where, as their tradition is, Luke compoſed, or however finiſhed this his hiſtory; which, as the above writer obſerves [z], reaches to the two years of Paul's ſtay at Rome; that is, until the fourth year of Nero; from whence adds he, we learn, that in the ſame city this book was compoſed: and it is certain, that Luke was with him, when the Apoſtle wrote his ſecond epiſtle to Timothy from Rome, and when the time of his martyrdom ſeemed to himſelf to be at hand, 2 Tim. iv. 7, 11.

Ver. 31. Preaching the kingdom of God, &c.] That is, the Goſpel, as in Luke iv. 43. and xvi. 16. he preached up Jeſus as the king Meſſiah, and declared that his kingdom was come, and opened the nature of it; that it conſiſted not in meats and drinks, but in righteouſneſs and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghoſt; which is the kingdom of grace here, and is within a man, in his heart, where grace reigns through righteouſneſs, unto eternal life: and he gave them ſome account of the kingdom of glory, and the way unto it; and ſhowed, that without regeneration and ſanctification, no one could be meet for it; and without the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt, no man could have a right unto it, or be poſſeſſed of it: and teaching thoſe things which concern the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; his perſon, as God and man; his office as mediator, being prophet, prieſt, and king; his incarnation and birth; his life and miracles; his doctrine and obedience, ſufferings and death; his reſurrection, aſcenſion, ſeſſion at God's right-hand; his interceſſion, and ſecond coming to judgment; with all the truths of the Goſpel, in which he has a concern; as redemption, peace, reconciliation, and pardon, by his blood and ſacrifice, and juſtification by his righteouſneſs, and ſalvation and eternal life through him. Theſe things had been the ſubject of the Apoſtle's miniſtry, throughout the whole of it: he began at Damaſcus with preaching Jeſus as the Son of God, and the true Meſſiah; and he ends at Rome, with teaching the things concerning him: at his firſt ſetting out in the work of the Lord, he determined to make known none but Chriſt, and him crucified; and in this reſolution he continued through the whole courſe of his life, and abode by it to the end: and this he did with all confidence; with all freedom and liberty in his ſoul, though he was bound in his body with a chain; with all plainneſs, openneſs, and faithfulneſs; and with all courage and boldneſs, though in the midſt of adverſaries: no man forbidding him; not the Roman emperor, nor the Roman ſenate, nor any other magiſtrate; nor could the Jews hinder him, nor was his mouth to be ſtopped by any; nor could the open door of the Goſpel be ſhut, or its courſe be impeded; for though the Apoſtle was bound, the word of God was not, but ran and was glorified; and was made known, and even owned in Cæſar's palace; ſome ſay Nero's cup-bearer, and Poppæa his concubine, were converted by him: and he not only continued preaching the Goſpel during the two years of his impriſonment at Rome, but alſo wrote ſeveral epiſtles to churches, and particular perſons; as the epiſtles to the Galatians, Epheſians, Philippians, Coloſſians, and the Hebrews, and to Philemon, and the ſecond epiſtle to Timothy: ſome copies add here, Amen; and at the cloſe of the Alexandrian copy, ſtand theſe words, the Acts of the holy Apoſtles; and at the Syriac verſion theſe, the end of the Acts of the bleſſed Apoſtles, that is, of their hiſtories.

AN

EXPOSITION, &c.

The Epiſtle of PAUL the Apoſtle to the ROMANS.

THOUGH this Epiſtle is in order placed the firſt of the Epiſtles, yet it was not firſt written; there were ſeveral Epiſtles written before it, as the two Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians, the two to the Corinthians, the firſt Epiſtle to Timothy, and that to Titus: the reaſon why this Epiſtle ſtands firſt, is either the excellency of it, of which Chryſoſtom had ſo great an eſteem, that he cauſed it to be read over to him twice a week; or elſe the dignity of the place, where the perſons lived to whom it is written, being Rome, the imperial city: ſo the books of the prophets are not placed in the ſame order in which they were written; Hoſea propheſied as early as Iſaiah, if not earlier, and before Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and yet ſtands after them. This Epiſtle was written from Corinth, as the ſubſcription of it teſtifies; and which may be confirmed from the Apoſtle's commendation of Phœbe, by whom he ſent it, who was of Cenchrea, a place near Corinth; by his calling Eraſtus, the chamberlain of the city, who abode at Corinth, 2 Tim. iv. 20. and Gaius his hoſt, who was a Corinthian, Rom. xvi. 23. 1 Cor. i. 14. tho' at what time it was written from hence, is not ſo evident: ſome think it was written in the time of his three months travel thro' Greece, Acts xx. 2, 3. a little before the death of the emperor Claudius, in the year of Chriſt 55. others, that it was written by him in the ſhort ſtay he made at Corinth, when he came thither, as is ſuppoſed, from Philippi, in his way to Troas, where ſome of his company went before, and had been there five days before him; and this is placed in the ſecond year of Nero, and in the year of Chriſt 56. however, it was not written by him during his long ſtay at Corinth, when he was firſt there, but afterwards, even after he had preached from Jeruſalem, and round about unto Illyricum; and when he was about to go to Jeruſalem, with the contributions of the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, to the poor ſaints there, ch. xv. 19, 25, 26. The perſons to whom this Epiſtle was ſent were Roman ſaints, both Jews and Gentiles, inhabiting the city of Rome; of which city and church ſee the notes on Acts xxviii. 14, 15. by whom the Goſpel was firſt preached at Rome, and who were the means of forming the church there, is not very evident. Irenæus, an ancient writer ſays [a], that Peter and Paul preached the Goſpel at Rome, and founded the church; and Gaius, an eccleſiaſtical man, who lived in the times of Zephyrinus, biſhop of Rome, aſſerts the ſame; and Dionyſius, biſhop of the Corinthians, calls the Romans the plantation of Peter and Paul [b]: whether Peter was ever at Rome is not a clear point with many; and certain it is, that the Apoſtle Paul had not been at Rome when he wrote this Epiſtle, at leaſt it ſeems very probable he had not, by ſeveral expreſſions in ch. i. 10—15. and yet here was a church to which he writes, and had been a conſiderable time; for their faith was ſpoken of throughout the world, ver. 8. and when the Apoſtle was on the road to this city, the brethren in it met him, Acts xxviii. 5. The chief deſign of this Epiſtle is to ſet in a clear light the doctrine of juſtification; ſhewing againſt the Gentiles, that it is not by the light of nature, and works done in obedience to that, and againſt the Jews, that it was not by the law of Moſes, and the deeds of that; which he clearly evinces, by obſerving the ſinful and wretched eſtate both of Jews and Gentiles; but that it is by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, imputed thro' the grace of God, and received by faith; the effects of which are peace and joy in the ſoul, and holineſs in the life and converſation: he gives an account of the juſtified ones, as that they are not without ſin, which he illuſtrates by his own experience and caſe; and yet are poſſeſſed of various privileges, as freedom from condemnation, the bleſſing of adoption, and a right to the heavenly inheritance: he treats in it concerning predeſtination, the calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews; and exhorts to the various duties incumbent on the ſaints, with reſpect to one another, and to the world, to duties of a moral and civil nature, and the uſe of things indifferent; and cloſes it with the ſalutations of divers perſons.

CHAP. I.

THIS chapter contains the inſcription of the Epiſtle, and ſalutation, the preface to it, and the grand propoſition of juſtification by faith, ſo much enlarged on afterwards; and that this could not be by the law of nature, and the works of it among the Gentiles, is demonſtrated by a detail of their horrible wickedneſs, impiety, and unrighteouſneſs. In the inſcription an account is given of the author of the Epiſtle, who is deſcribed in ver. 1. by his name Paul; by his relation to Chriſt, a ſervant of his; and by his office an Apoſtle, whoſe buſineſs and concern were with the Goſpel, to which he was ſeparated. This Goſpel is commended from the author of it, who is God himſelf; and from the antiquity of it, ver. 2. being as ancient as the writings of the prophets; and from the ſubject of it, being the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; who is deſcribed by his relation to God, his Son, by his dominion over the ſaints, their Lord, by both his natures, human and divine; his human nature, as being of the ſeed of David, his divine nature, being the Son of God, ver. 4. which is declared by the power he is poſſeſſed of, by the Spirit of holineſs that is in him, by his reſurrection from the dead, and by the Apoſtles receiving from him grace to fit them for their office, and by the office itſelf; the end of which was to make ſome among all nations obedient to him, ver. 5. among whom were the ſaints at Rome, who were called by him, and after his name, ver. 6. which introduces the account of the perſons to whom this Epiſtle is written, who are deſcribed, ver. 7. by the place of their abode, Rome; by their intereſt in the love of God; and by the effect, fruit, and evidence of it, their effectual vocation; and then follows the Apoſtle's uſual ſalutation, as in all his Epiſtles, in which he wiſhes grace and peace for them, from God the Father, and from Chriſt. The preface begins ver. 8. in which are a thankſgiving to God, thro' Chriſt, for all the ſaints at Rome, particularly on account of their faith, for which they were every where ſo famous; an appeal to God, ver. 9. for the truth of his inceſſant prayers for them, and particularly, ver. 10. that this was a requeſt he made, that if it was the will of God he might have a ſpeedy and proſperous journey to them; an expreſſion of ſtrong affection to them, and of his great deſire to ſee them, ver. 11. his end in which was partly for their ſakes, to communicate ſpiritual things to them for their eſtabliſhment, and partly for his own comfort, and the increaſe of the mutual faith of both, ver. 12. alſo a vindication of himſelf, ver. 13. ſhewing, that it was not any fault of his, or any neglect of them by him, that he had not been with them as yet, but ſome things hindered him, in the execution of his purpoſe to come to them; to which he was moved, partly by the hope of having fruit among them, as among others, and partly thro' the obligation that lay upon him by virtue of his office, to preach the Goſpel to all ſorts of men, ver. 14. he expreſſes his willingneſs and readineſs to preach the Goſpel to them at Rome, as ſoon as an opportunity would offer, ver. 15. which was his work and office, what he delighted in, was cloſely attached to, and by no means aſhamed of, ver. 16. partly becauſe of the nature of it, it was the Goſpel, good news and true; and partly becauſe of the author and ſubject of it, Chriſt; as alſo becauſe of the efficacy of it in the ſalvation of Jews and Gentiles; and likewiſe becauſe of a principal doctrine revealed in it, ver. 17. the doctrine of juſtification by faith, in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, confirmed and illuſtrated by a paſſage out of Hab. ii. 4. and which he particularly mentions, becauſe he intended to dwell upon it in this Epiſtle: and in order to ſhew that the Gentiles could not be juſtified in the ſight of God by their obedience to the law, and the light of nature, he obſerves, that they were the objects of the wrath of God, ver. 18. and that very juſtly, becauſe they ſinned knowingly; they had ſome knowledge of the truth, but they would not profeſs it: and that they had ſuch knowledge of it, he proves from the author of it, God, who ſhewed it to them, ver. 19. and from the means of it, by which they muſt, and did arrive to ſome degree of it, namely, the works of creation, ver. 20. The Apoſtle goes on to expoſe the ingratitude of them, the vanity of their minds, the pride and folly of their hearts, ver. 21, 22. the groſs idolatry they were guilty of, ver. 23. for which idolatry they were given up to their own hearts luſts, to commit the fouleſt and moſt ſcandalous iniquities, even to commit ſodomitical practices, and unnatural luſts, both men and women, ver. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28. And ſo far were they from having a righteouſneſs to juſtify them before God, that they were filled with all unrighteouſneſs; and a large liſt of the vileſt ſins, being committed by them, is given; and a catalogue of the worſt of ſinners, as among them, ver. 29, 30, 31, 32. All which are aggravated by their knowledge of the will of God, thro' the light of nature, that theſe things were contrary to it, and were deſerving of death; and yet they both did them, and were delighted with thoſe that committed them alſo: the inference which he leaves to be deduced from hence, and which may eaſily be deduced, is, that therefore there can be no juſtification of ſuch perſons in the ſight of God by their own works.

Ver. 1. Paul a ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] The name of the author of this Epiſtle is Paul, who formerly was called Saul. Some think his name was changed upon his own converſion; others, upon the converſion of the Roman deputy Sergius Paulus, Acts xiii. 7, 9. others, that he was ſo called from the littleneſs of his ſtature; but rather it ſhould ſeem that he had two names, which was uſual with the Jews; one by which they went among the Gentiles, and another by which they were called in their own land; ſee more of this on Acts xiii. 9. A ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt; not a ſervant of ſin, nor of ſatan, nor of man, nor of Moſes and his law, nor of the traditions of the elders, but of Jeſus Chriſt; and not by creation only, but by redemption, and by powerful efficacious grace in converſion; which is no ways contrary to true liberty; nor a diſgraceful, but a moſt honourable character; and which chiefly regards him as a miniſter of the Goſpel: called to be an Apoſtle; an Apoſtle was one that was immediately ſent by Chriſt, and had his authority and doctrine directly from him, and had a power of working miracles from him, in confirmation of the truth of his miſſion, authority, and doctrine; all which were to be found in the author of this Epiſtle, who did not thruſt himſelf into this office, or take this honour to himſelf, of which he always judged himſelf unworthy, but was called to it according to the will, and by the grace of God: ſeparated unto the Goſpel of God. This may regard either God's eternal purpoſe concerning him, his pre-ordination of him from eternity to be a preacher of the Goſpel, to which he was ſeparated from his mother's womb, Gal. i. 15. or the ſeparation of him to that work made by the order of the Spirit of God, Acts xiii. 2. The phraſe uſed is either in alluſion to the prieſts and Levites, who were ſeparated from their brethren the children of Iſrael, to their ſacred employments; or rather to the Apoſtle's having been, פרוש, a Phariſee, which ſignifies one ſeparated, as he was now; only with this difference, before he was ſeparated to the law, but now to the Goſpel, to preach and defend it, which he did with all faithfulneſs and integrity; the excellency of which Goſpel is ſignified by its being called the Goſpel of God: he is the author of it; his grace is the ſubject of it; and he it is who commits it to men, qualifies them for the preaching of it, and ſucceeds them in it.

Ver. 2. Which he had promiſed afore, &c.] The Goſpel is here farther commended from the antiquity of it: it was no novel doctrine, an upſtart notion, but what God had conceived in his own breaſt from eternity. This myſtery was hid in him from the beginning of the world, and was ordained before the world was; in time God was pleaſed to make it known to the ſons of men; he promiſed it, he ſpoke of it, and declared it by his prophets, Iſaiah and others, afore the Apoſtle Paul was called forth to be a preacher of it; which promiſe, or promiſes of it lie in the holy ſcriptures; the books of the Old Teſtament, ſo called from the author, matter, and uſefulneſs of them. The Apoſtle ſpeaks in the language of his nation, for the Jews frequently call the bible, writings, holy ones; for, ſay they, כל כתובים קדש, all the ſcriptures are holy[c], and ſtile them, כתבי הקדש, ſcriptures of holineſs, or holy ſcriptures[d].

Ver. 3. Concerning his Son Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, &c.] Theſe words are in connection with the Goſpel of God, ver. 1. and expreſs the ſubject-matter of it, the Son of God, Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; for Chriſt, as the Son of God, the ſaviour of ſinners, the only mediator between God and men, who is Lord both of the dead and living, is the ſum and ſubſtance of the Goſpel: he is here deſcribed by his relation to God, his Son, of the ſame nature with him, equal to him, and diſtinct from him; by his uſual names Jeſus Chriſt, the one ſignifying a ſaviour, the other anointed, and both, that he was anointed of God to be the ſaviour of his people; and by his dominion over the ſaints our Lord, not merely by creation, but by redemption and grace, and happy is the perſon that can claim intereſt in him, as is here done; and by the diſtinction of natures in him: which was made of the ſeed of David according to the fleſh: this reſpects Chriſt in his human nature, who was made fleſh, and of a woman; and ſhews his exiſtence before his incarnation, and the immediate power and hand of God in it; and which was done, not by tranſmutation of him into fleſh, but by an aſſumption of human nature into union with his divine perſon: he is ſaid to be made of the ſeed of David: this points out the family from whence he ſprung; deſigns the poſterity of David, particularly Mary; has regard to the promiſe made to David, which God fulfilled; and ſhews the royal deſcent of Chriſt; 'tis added, according to the fleſh; that is, according to his human nature; which phraſe does not denote the corruption, but the truth of that nature; and ſuppoſes, that he had another nature, otherwiſe there would have been no need of this limiting and reſtrictive clauſe.

Ver. 4. And declared to be the Son of God, &c.] Not made, as he is ſaid to be before, when his incarnation is ſpoken of; nor did he begin to be the Son of God, when he was made of the ſeed of David; but he, the Son of God, who exiſted, as ſuch, from everlaſting, was manifeſted in the fleſh, or human nature: and this his divine Sonſhip, and proper deity, are declared and made evident, with, or by his power; which has appeared in the creation of all things out of nothing; in upholding all things in their beings; in the government of the world, and works of providence; in the miracles he wrought; in his performing the great work of redemption; in the ſucceſs of his Goſpel, to the converſion of ſinners; and in the preſervation of his churches and people: here it ſeems chiefly to regard the power of Chriſt in raiſing the dead, ſince it follows, and which is to be connected with this clauſe, by the reſurrection from the dead; and deſigns either the reſurrection of others, as of Lazarus, and ſome other perſons, in his life-time, and of ſome at his reſurrection, and of all at the laſt day; or the reſurrection of his own body, which dying he had power to raiſe up again, and did; and which declared him to be, or clearly made it appear that he was the Son of God, a divine perſon, truly and properly God: and this was done according to the ſpirit of holineſs; which may be underſtood of the holy Spirit, the third perſon in the Trinity, who is holy in himſelf, and the author of holineſs in the ſaints; and who is the declarer of Chriſt's Sonſhip, partly by bearing a teſtimony to it in the word, and in the hearts of believers, and chiefly by being concerned in the reſurrection of the body of Chriſt from the dead; or elſe by the Spirit of holineſs may be meant the divine nature of Chriſt, which, as it is holy, ſo by it Chriſt offered himſelf to God, and by it was quickened, or made alive, when he had been put to death in the fleſh; and which muſt be a clear and ſtrong proof of his being truly the Son of God.

Ver. 5. By whom we have received grace and apoſtleſhip, &c.] That is, either by the holy Spirit, from whom all grace and gifts come, qualifying for the diſcharge of any office; or by the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who is full of grace and truth, has received gifts for, and gives them to men to fit them for whatſoever ſervice he is pleaſed to call them to. By grace and apoſtleſhip may be meant, either one and the ſame thing, the favour and honour of being the Apoſtles of Chriſt; or different things, and the one in order to the other. Grace may deſign ſpecial ſaving grace in vocation, juſtification, pardon, and adoption, and ſanctification, which was received in common with other ſaints, and is abſolutely neceſſary to an Apoſtle, and to any ordinary miniſter of the word; or the doctrine of grace, which they received from Chriſt, and diſpenſed to others; or rather the gifts of grace, and the various meaſures thereof, which they received from their aſcended Lord and king, by which they were furniſhed for Apoſtleſhip, that is, the work and office of Apoſtles; to which they were called by Chriſt, and from whom they received a commiſſion to execute it. The Apoſtle takes in others beſides himſelf, and ſays, we have received; partly for the ſake of modeſty, and partly to keep up his equal title with others to this office; and ſince this is had in a way of receiving, which ſuppoſes giving, and excludes boaſting, it obliges to make uſe of all grace and gifts to the glory of Chriſt, by whom they are received. The end for which they received ſuch an office and grace to fit them for it, was, for obedience to the faith; that men might be brought by the miniſtry of the word to obey the faith, Chriſt the object of faith; to ſubmit to his righteouſneſs, and the way of ſalvation by him, and to be ſubject to his ordinances; or to obey the doctrine of faith, which is not barely to hear it, and notionally receive it, but to embrace it heartily by faith, and retain it, in oppoſition to a diſbelief and contempt of it; and which is the end and deſign of the Goſpel-miniſtration to bring perſons to. Moreover, by obedience to the faith, or obedience of faith, as it may be rendered, may be meant the grace of faith, attended with evangelical obedience; for obedience, rightly performed, is only that which is by faith, and ſprings from it. Now grace and apoſtleſhip were received, in order to be exerciſed among all nations; not in Judea only, to which the firſt commiſſion of apoſtleſhip was limited, but in all the nations of the world, as the commiſſion renewed by Chriſt after his reſurrection ordered; and that ſome among all nations of the earth might, by the power of divine grace accompanying the word, be brought to faith and obedience: and all this, the qualifications for the office, the due exerciſe of it in all the world, and the ſucceſs that attended it were for his name; for the honour and glory of Chriſt, in whoſe name they went, and which they bore and carried among the Gentiles, out of whom he was pleaſed to take a people for his name, Acts xv. 14.

Ver. 6. Among whom are ye alſo, &c.] The Romans, tho' they were the chief, were among the nations of the world to whom the Apoſtles were ſent; and ſince Paul was called to be an Apoſtle, and had as others grace and apoſtleſhip, and particularly the apoſtleſhip of the uncircumciſion, or was ordained a teacher of the Gentiles, more eſpecially he was an Apoſtle to them, and as ſuch was to be regarded by them. This ſeems to point out what they were originally; they were among all nations which lay in darkneſs; and were without Chriſt and hope, and God in the world; but now, the called of Jeſus Chriſt. The calling here ſpoken of is not to an office, or a mere external one by the miniſtry of the word, but an internal ſpecial call by the grace of God; and which is irreſiſtible, efficacious and unchangeable, and is an high, holy and heavenly one; by it perſons are called out of darkneſs into light, out of bondage into liberty, out of the world, from the company of the men of it, and the ſinful pleaſures thereof, to fellowſhip with Chriſt and his ſaints, and off of a dependance on themſelves and their own righteouſneſs, to the grace and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and to eternal glory. The perſons ſo called are the elect of God, who are ſecured in Chriſt, and redeemed by him, and who has a concern with the Father and Spirit in the vocation of them: hence they are ſtiled, the called of Jeſus Chriſt; they are called by him, and after his name; he has an intereſt them; as they were before his choſen and redeemed ones, they are now his called ones; as Jacob and Iſrael of old were named of God, מקראי, my called, Iſ. xlviii. 12. ſo theſe were named Chriſt's called ones; and who by calling came to be partakers of him and of his grace.

Ver. 7. To all that be in Rome, &c.] Theſe words contain both the inſcription of the epiſtle, and the Apoſtle's uſual ſalutation, as in all his epiſtles. The inſcription of it is not to the Roman emperor, nor to the Roman ſenate, nor to all the inhabitants in Rome; but to all the ſaints there, whether rich or poor, bond or free, male or female, Jew or Gentile, without any diſtinction, being all one in Chriſt Jeſus: and theſe are deſcribed as, beloved of God; not for any lovelineſs there was in them, nor becauſe of any love in them to God, nor on account of their obedience and righteouſneſs; but thro' the free favour and ſovereign will and pleaſure of God, who loved them before he called them, even from eternity, and will love them to eternity; which love of his is the ſource and ſpring of all the bleſſings of grace, and among the reſt of effectual vocation: hence this character is ſet before the following one, called to be ſaints; not born ſo, nor become ſo thro' their own power, but were ſo by calling-grace, as a fruit of everlaſting love; men are firſt beloved of the Lord, and then called to be his ſaints. The ſalutation follows; the things wiſhed for in it are, grace to you, and peace: by grace is not meant miniſterial gifts, which are not common to all the ſaints; nor the Goſpel, which was at Rome already; nor the love and favour of God, which theſe perſons were ſharers in, as appears from their above characters; nor the principle of grace, which was now formed there in their effectual calling; but an increaſe of grace, as to its degrees, acts and exerciſe; every grace is imperfect in this reſpect, and thoſe who have the moſt ſtand in need of more; there is ſuch a thing as growing in grace, which is very deſirable, and may be expected from God, who is able to make all grace to abound, and has promiſed to give more: by peace is meant, peace with God through Chriſt; peace in their own conſciences, and with one another; all manner of proſperity inward and outward here, and eternal happineſs hereafter. The perſons from whom theſe are deſired are, God our father and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt: God the father of Chriſt is ſpoken of as our father, which is by adoption; partly to engage fear and reverence of him at his throne; and partly to encourage freedom and boldneſs there, and an expectation of receiving every bleſſing of grace from him: the Lord Jeſus Chriſt is mentioned, as being the perſon thro' whom, and for whoſe ſake, all the bleſſings of grace and peace are communicated to us; and being put upon a level with the Father in theſe petitions, ſhews him to be equal with him, and ſo truly and properly God. Grace may be thought to be particularly wiſhed for from the Father, tho' not excluſive of Chriſt, ſince he is the God of all grace, who has treaſured up a fulneſs of it in his ſon. And peace may be conſidered as deſired to be had from Chriſt, tho' not excluſive of the Father; ſince the covenant of peace was made with him, the chaſtiſement of peace was laid on him, and he has made peace by the blood of his croſs, and is the giver of it to his people.

Ver. 8. Firſt, I thank my God, thro' Jeſus Chriſt for you all, &c.] After the inſcription and ſalutation, follows a thankſgiving, which begins the epiſtle: it is uſual with the Apoſtle in all his epiſtles to make requeſts for the churches, with thankſgivings for mercies; his view in it was, to glorify God, to teſtify his affection to the ſaints, and to ſhew that all they had muſt be referred to the grace of God. The object of thankſgiving is God; not merely as a creator and preſerver, but as a father, the father of Chriſt, and our father in Chriſt; as the one God, and our God, Father Son and Spirit. The Apoſtle ſtiles him, my God; which diſtinguiſhes him from all others, points out his particular intereſt in him, expreſſes his knowledge of him and faith in him, and demonſtrates that what he did now, he did in faith. The perſon thro' whom thanks are given is, Jeſus Chriſt. There's no coming to God but thro' Chriſt, nor is any ſacrifice either of prayer or praiſe acceptable without him, and ſince all we have come thro' him, 'tis but reaſonable that thanks for them ſhould be returned by and thro' him; the perſons for whom this thankſgiving is made, were all the Romans, all the ſaints at Rome, the members of the church there of whatſoever rank and degree, and in whatſoever ſtate and condition; the thing for which the Apoſtle was thankful for particularly, was, not that their city was miſtreſs of the whole world, and their fame for power, wealth and grandeur was ſpread abroad far and near; but ſays he, that your faith is ſpoken of throughout the whole world; which ſhews that faith is a grace of great account: God has put an honour upon it, by making it the receiver of all his gifts, and that gives glory to God, and without it nothing is acceptable to him; it anſwers many excellent uſes and purpoſes in experience; it is that by which ſaints live upon Chriſt in this world, and look to the glories of another. This alſo ſhews that the ſaints at Rome did not hide their faith in their breaſts, but declared it to others; a publick profeſſion both of the grace and doctrine of faith is to be made, and conſtantly held; both are to be ſhewn forth to others, by deeds as well as words; which greatly redounds to the honour of ſuch churches, cauſes joy in other churches, and in all the miniſters of the Goſpel, and is the occaſion of many thankſgivings to God.

Ver. 9. For God is my witneſs, whom I ſerve, &c.] Theſe words are an appeal to God, and carry in them the nature and form of an oath; the reaſon of the Apoſtle's uſing it was, becauſe he was perſonally unknown to the Romans, and they to him, and ſo might doubt of his affectionate regard unto them; and therefore for the confirmation thereof he uſes it: this was a caſe which was only known to God and himſelf, and hence he appeals to him for the truth of it. The object of his oath or appeal, or by which he ſpeaks is not himſelf, or any thing that belong'd to him, nor any creature in heaven or in earth, but God; who in a ſolemn oath is only to be appealed to and ſwore by: he deſcribes him as the God whom he ſerved, to diſtinguiſh him from all falſe Gods, and to ſhew that he that takes an oath, ſhould be one that fears and ſerves the Lord: what he ſerved him in was not the law, but the Goſpel of his Son; Jeſus Chriſt, who is the author, miniſter, and ſubject matter of it; he ſerved him in it, by preaching, ſpreading and defending it. This is a ſervice, and a very laborious one, and makes for the honour and glory of God. The manner in which he ſerved him was, as he ſays, with my ſpirit; either with the Spirit of God, which was given to him; or in a ſpiritual manner, in oppoſition to the carnal worſhip of the Jews; internally, in oppoſition to bodily exerciſe only, and voluntarily, with his whole heart, ſoul, and ſpirit. The matter or ſubſtance of his appeal or oath was, that without ceaſing I make mention of you always in my prayers: whence may be obſerved, that prayer to God ought to be conſtant; and that we ſhould be concerned for others as well as for ourſelves; all the ſaints ſhould ſhare therein.

Ver. 10. Making requeſt, if by any means now at length, &c.] A principal thing which he inceſſantly and importunately requeſted, at the throne of grace was, that he might have an opportunity of coming to them; that God in his providence would open a way for him; and that he might have a ſafe and comfortable journey in a very little time; all which he ſubmits to the will of God, as a good man ought to do; and which he thus expreſſes, I might have a proſperous journey by the will of God, to come unto you; ſee James iv. 13, 14, 15.

Ver. 11. For I long to ſee you, &c.] Not the city of Rome, which was one of Auſtin's three wiſhes to have ſeen in its glory; nor the emperor of it, nor the ſenate in it, nor its populous inhabitants, fine buildings, riches and grandeur; but the poor ſaints there, which were the excellent men of the earth, of the whole Roman empire, and in whom was his delight: his deſire to ſee them was not to gratify his curioſity, nor to ſpend his time in idle chat with them, nor with a view to enrich himſelf by them; but ſays he, that I may impart ſome ſpiritual gift; not any extraordinary gift of the Spirit; but ſpiritual light, knowledge, peace and comfort, thro' the exerciſe of his miniſterial gift: whence it may be obſerved, that that which qualifies men for the preaching of the word to the profit of others, is a gift, a gift by grace; a ſpiritual one, which comes from the Spirit of God, and may be; and is to be imparted to others in the free uſe and exerciſe of it; and that, to the end that ſaints may be eſtabliſhed; for ſuch who are called by grace, need eſtabliſhing. They are indeed, in a ſafe ſtate and condition; they are incircled in the arms of everlaſting love, they are fixed in the hands of Chriſt, ſecured in an everlaſting covenant, eſtabliſhed on the rock of ages, and ſettled in a ſtate from whence they can never fall; yet notwithſtanding this, they are ſometimes very unſtable in their hearts, in their frames, in the exerciſe of grace, and the diſcharge of duty, and in profeſſing and adhering to the doctrines of the Goſpel; wherefore they need eſtabliſhing, as to a more firm perſuaſion of intereſt in the love of God, and in the covenant of grace, as to a more ſtable exerciſe of grace in Chriſt, and as to a more conſtant diſcharge of duty, and ſteady profeſſion of adherence to the truths of the Goſpel; to all which the miniſtration of the word has a tendency, with a divine bleſſing.

Ver. 12. That is, that I may be comforted together with you, &c.] This is a further explanation of his view, in being deſirous of coming to them, and preaching the Goſpel among them; for what makes for eſtabliſhment, makes for comfort; and what makes for comfort, makes for eſtabliſhment; and when ſouls are eſtabliſhed, miniſters are comforted as well as they; and whilſt miniſters are imparting their ſpiritual gifts for the uſe of others, they themſelves are ſometimes comforted of God in their work, and particularly when they find there's an agreement between their doctrine, and the experience of the ſaints: by the mutual faith both of you and me. The grace of faith is the ſame in all the ſaints, and ſo is the doctrine of it, as diſpenſed by Chriſt's faithful miniſters, and experimentally received and embraced by his people; the conſideration of which has a very great influence on the comfort and eſtabliſhment of each other; nor are any ſo perfect but they may receive benefit from others, even though inferior to them.

Ver. 13. Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, &c.] The Apoſtle calls them brethren, becauſe cauſe many of them were Jews, his brethren and kinſmen according to the fleſh, and all of them were his brethren in a ſpiritual relation; and this he does to expreſs his affection to them, and engage their attention and credit to him, and particularly to this matter which he now acquaints them with, being unwilling they ſhould be ignorant of it; that oftentimes I purpoſed to come unto you: it was not a ſudden ſtart of mind, or a deſire that lately aroſe up in him, but a ſettled reſolution and determination, and which he had often made: but was let hitherto; either by God, who had work for him to do in other places; or by ſatan, who ſometimes by divine permiſſion has had ſuch power and influence; ſee 1 Theſſ. ii. 18. or thro' the urgent neceſſities of other churches, which required his ſtay with them longer than he intended: his end in taking up at ſeveral times ſuch a reſolution of coming to them was, ſays he, that I might have ſome fruit among you alſo, even as among other Gentiles: by fruit he means, not any reward of his labour, either temporal or eternal; but the converſion of ſinners, the edification of ſaints, and the fruitfulneſs of believers in grace and works. The Apoſtle ſeems to allude to the caſting of ſeed into the earth: Chriſt's miniſters are huſbandmen, who ſow the ſeed of the word, which lies ſome time under the clods; wherefore patience is neceſſary to wait its ſpringing up, firſt in the blade, and then in the ear, then in the full corn in the ear, when it brings forth fruit; all which depend on the bleſſing of God: and when he adds, as among other Gentiles, his deſign is not ſo much to let them know that they were as other Gentiles, upon a level with them, had no pre-eminence as citizens of Rome, over other ſaints, being all one in Chriſt Jeſus; as to obſerve to them his ſucceſs in other places, where he had been preaching the Goſpel of the grace of God.

Ver. 14. I am a debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians, &c.] The meaning is, that he was obliged by the call he had from God, the injunction that was laid upon him by him, and the gifts with which he was qualified, to preach the Goſpel to all ſorts of men; who are here diſtinguiſhed into Greeks and Barbarians: ſometimes by Greeks are meant, the Gentiles in general, in oppoſition to the Jews; ſee ver. 16. but here they deſign only a part of the Gentiles, the inhabitants of Greece, in oppoſition to all the world beſides; for the Greeks uſed to call all others that were not of themſelves Barbarians[e]: or elſe by Greeks are meant the more cultivated nations of the world, and by Barbarians, the ruder and more uncivil parts of it; to which agrees the next diviſion of mankind, both to the wiſe, and to the unwiſe. The Goſpel was to be preached to the wiſe; ſuch who thought themſelves to be ſo, and were ſo with reſpect to human wiſdom and knowledge; tho' it ſhould be deſpiſed by them, as it was, and tho' few of them were called by it, ſome were, and ſtill are, tho' not many; and ſuch wiſdom there is in the Goſpel, as the wiſeſt of men may learn by it, will be entertaining to them, is far beyond their contempt, and what will ſerve to exerciſe their talents and abilities, to ſearch into the knowledge of, and rightly to underſtand: and it muſt be preached to the unwiſe; for ſuch God has choſen to confound the wiſe; theſe he calls by his grace, and reveals his Goſpel to, whilſt he hides it from the wiſe and prudent; and there is that in the Goſpel which is plain and eaſy to the weakeſt mind, enlightened by the Spirit of God.

Ver. 15. So, as much as in me is, I am ready, &c.] This explains what he was a debtor to one and another for, namely, to preach the Goſpel; expreſſes the readineſs of his mind to that work, whatever difficulties lay in his way; and declares what a willing mind he had to preach it alſo to the Romans, as elſewhere: to you that are at Rome alſo; the metropolis of the Roman empire, a very publick place, the ſeat of ſatan, and where was the heat of perſecution.

Ver. 16. For I am not aſhamed of the Goſpel of Chriſt, &c.] The reaſon why he was ſo ready and willing to preach it, even where he ran the greateſt riſque of his character and life, was, becauſe it was the Goſpel of Chriſt he preached, and he was not aſhamed of it. This ſuppoſes that ſome were, tho' the Apoſtle was not, aſhamed of the Goſpel; as all ſuch are who hide and conceal it; who have abilities to preach it, and do not; or who preach, but not the Goſpel; or who preach the Goſpel only in part; who own that in private, they will not preach in publick, and uſe ambiguous words, of doubtful ſignification, to cover themſelves; who blend the Goſpel with their own inventions, ſeek to pleaſe men, and live upon popular applauſe, regard their own intereſt, and not Chriſt's, and can't bear the reproach of his Goſpel. It expreſſes, that the Apoſtle was not aſhamed of it; that is, to preach it, which he did fully and faithfully, plainly and conſiſtently, openly and publickly, and boldly, in the face of all oppoſition: and it deſigns more than is expreſſed, as that he had the utmoſt value for it, and eſteemed it his higheſt honour that he was employed in preaching it: his reaſons for this were, becauſe it was the Goſpel of Chriſt; which Chriſt himſelf preached, which he had learnt by revelation from him, and of which he was the ſum and ſubſtance: and becauſe it is the power of God; not eſſentially, but declaratively; as the power of God is ſeen in making men miniſters of it, in the doctrines held forth in it, in the manner in which it was ſpread in the world, in the oppoſition it met with, in the continuance and increaſe of it notwithſtanding the power and cunning of men, and in the ſhortneſs of time, in which ſo much good was done by it in the ſeveral parts of the world: it is the power of God organically or inſtrumentally; as it is a means made uſe of by God in quickning dead ſinners, enlightning blind eyes, unſtopping deaf ears, ſoftning hard hearts, and making of enemies friends; to which add, the manner in which all this is done, ſuddenly, ſecretly, effectually, and by love, and not force: the extent of this power is, unto ſalvation; the Goſpel is a declaration and revelation of ſalvation by Chriſt, and is a means of directing and encouraging ſouls to lay hold upon it. The perſons to whom it is ſo, are in general, every one that believeth: this does not ſuppoſe that faith gives the Goſpel its virtue and efficacy; but is only deſcriptive of the perſons to whom the Goſpel attended with the power and grace of God, is eventually efficacious: and particularly it was ſo, to the Jew firſt; who as they had formerly the advantage of the Gentiles, much every way, thro' the peculiar priviledges which were conferred on them; ſo the Goſpel was firſt preached to them by Chriſt and his diſciples; and even when it was ordered to be carried into the Gentile world, it was to begin with them, and became effectual for the ſalvation of many of them: and alſo to the Greek; to the Gentile; for after the Jews had rejected it, as many being called by it as Jehovah thought fit, at that time, it was preached to the Gentiles with great ſucceſs; which was the myſtery hid from ages and generations paſt, but now made manifeſt.

Ver. 17. For therein is the righteouſneſs of God revealed, &c.] By the righteouſneſs of God, is not meant the eſſential righteouſneſs of God, the rectitude of his nature, his righteouſneſs in fulfilling his promiſes, and his punitive juſtice, which tho' revealed in the Goſpel, yet not peculiar to it; nor the righteouſneſs by which Chriſt himſelf is righteous, either as God, or as mediator; but that righteouſneſs which he wrought out by obeying the precepts, and bearing the penalty of the law in the room of his people, and by which they are juſtified in the ſight of God: and this is called the righteouſneſs of God, in oppoſition to the righteouſneſs of men; and becauſe it juſtifies men in the ſight of God; and becauſe of the concern which Jehovah, Father, Son, and Spirit have in it. Jehovah the Father ſent his Son to work it out, and being wrought out, he approves and accepts of it, and imputes it to his elect: Jehovah the Son is the author of it by his obedience and death; and Jehovah the Spirit diſcovers it to ſinners, works faith in them to lay hold upon it, and pronounces the ſentence of juſtification by it in their conſciences. Now this is ſaid to be revealed in the Goſpel, that is, it is taught in the Goſpel; that is the word of righteouſneſs, the miniſtration of it; it is manifeſted in and by the Goſpel. This righteouſneſs is not known by the light of nature, nor by the law of Moſes; it was hid under the ſhadows of the ceremonial law, and is brought to light only by the Goſpel; it is hid from every natural man, even from the moſt wiſe and prudent, and from God's elect themſelves before converſion, and is only made known to believers, to whom it is revealed: from faith to faith; that is, as ſay ſome, from the faith of God to the faith of men; from the faith of preachers to the faith of hearers; from the faith of the Old, to the faith of the New Teſtament ſaints; or rather from one degree of faith to another; for faith, as it grows and increaſes, has clearer ſights of this righteouſneſs, as held forth in the Goſpel. For the proof of this, a paſſage of ſcripture is cited, as it is written, Hab. ii. 4. the juſt ſhall live by faith; a juſt, or righteous man is, not every one who thinks himſelf, or is thought by others to be ſo; nor are any ſo by their obedience to the law of works; but he is one that is made righteous by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him, which is before ſaid to be revealed in the Goſpel. The life which this man lives, and ſhall live, does not deſign a natural or corporal life, and a continuance of that, for ſuch die a natural death, as other men; nor an eternal life, for tho' they ſhall ſo live, yet not by faith; but a ſpiritual life, a life of juſtification on Chriſt, of holineſs from him, of communion with him, and of peace and joy; which ſpiritual life ſhall be continued, and never be loſt. The manner in which the juſt lives, is by faith. In the prophet Habakuk, the words are, the juſt ſhall live, באמונתו, by his faith; which the Septuagint render, by my faith; and the Apoſtle only reads, by faith, omitting the affix, as well known, and eaſy to be ſupplied: for faith when given by God, and exerciſed by the believer, is his own, and by it he lives; not upon it, but by it upon Chriſt the object of it; from whom, in a way of believing, he derives his ſpiritual life, and all the comforts of it.

Ver. 18. For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven, &c.] The Apoſtle having hinted at the doctrine of juſtification by faith in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and which he deſigned more largely to inſiſt upon in this Epiſtle, and to prove that there can be no juſtification of a ſinner in the ſight of God by the deeds of the law; in order to ſet this matter in a clear light, from hence, to the end of the chapter, and in the following ones, repreſents the ſad eſtate and condition of the Gentiles with the law of nature, and of the Jews with the law of Moſes; by which it moſt clearly appears, that neither of them could be juſtified by their obedience to the reſpective laws under which they were, but that they both ſtood in need of the righteouſneſs of God. By the wrath of God is meant the diſplicency and indignation of God at ſin and ſinners; his punitive juſtice, and awful vengeance; the judgments which he executes in this world; and that everlaſting diſpleaſure of his, and wrath to come in another world, which all thro' ſin are deſerving of, ſome are appointed to, God's elect are delivered from, thro' Chriſt's ſuſtaining it, in their room and ſtead, and which comes and abides on all impenitent and unbelieving perſons. This is ſaid to be revealed, where? not in the Goſpel, in which the righteouſneſs of God is revealed; unleſs the Goſpel be taken for the books of the four Evangeliſts, or for the Goſpel-diſpenſation, or for that part of the miniſtry of a Goſpel-preacher, which repreſents the wrath of God as the deſert of ſin, the dreadfulneſs of it, and the way to eſcape it; for the Goſpel, ſtrictly taken, is grace, good news, glad tidings, and not wrath and damnation; tho' indeed in Chriſt's ſufferings for the ſins of his people, which the Goſpel gives us an account of, there is a great diſplay of the wrath of God, and of his indignation againſt ſin: but this wrath of God is revealed in the law, it is known by the light of nature, and to be perceived in the law of Moſes, and may be obſerved in the Scriptures, where are many inſtances and examples of divine wrath and diſpleaſure; as in the puniſhment of the old world, the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, turning Lot's wife into a pillar of ſalt, the plagues of Egypt, and the ſeveral inſtances mentioned in this chapter. This wrath is ſaid to be God's wrath from heaven, by the awful blackneſs which covers the heavens, the ſtorms and tempeſts raiſed in them, and by pouring down water or fire in a ſurprizing manner, on the inhabitants of the world; or from heaven, that is openly, manifeſtly, in the ſight of all; or from God who is in heaven, and not from ſecond cauſes; and more eſpecially it will be revealed from heaven, when Chriſt ſhall deſcend from thence at the day of judgment: the ſubject matter or object of it, againſt, or upon which it is revealed are, all ungodlineſs, and unrighteouſneſs of men; that is, all ungodly and unrighteous men; or all men who are guilty of ungodlineſs, the breach of the firſt table of the law, which reſpects the worſhip of God, and of unrighteouſneſs, the breach of the ſecond table of the law, which regards our neighbours good: and theſe perſons are further deſcribed as ſuch, who hold the truth in unrighteouſneſs; meaning either ſuch who know the Goſpel, which is the truth, and don't profeſs it openly, but hold and impriſon it in their minds, which is a great piece of unrighteouſneſs; or if they do profeſs it, don't live up to it in their lives: or rather the Gentile philoſophers are deſigned, who are ſpoken of in the following verſe; who had ſome knowledge of the truth of the divine being, and his perfections, and of the difference between moral good and evil; but did not like to retain it themſelves, nor communicate all they knew to others, nor did they live according to that knowledge which they had.

Ver. 19. Becauſe that which may be known of God, &c.] There are ſome things which could not be known of God by the light of nature; as a Trinity of perſons in the Godhead; the knowledge of God in Chriſt as mediator; the God-man and mediator Jeſus Chriſt; his incarnation, ſufferings, death, and reſurrection; the will of God to ſave ſinners by a crucified Jeſus; the ſeveral peculiar doctrines of the Goſpel, particularly the reſurrection of the dead, and the manner of worſhipping of God with acceptance: but then there are ſome things which may be known of God, without a revelation. Adam had a perfect knowledge of him; and his ſons, tho' fallen, even the very heathens have ſome notion of him, as that there is a God; and by the light of nature it might be known that there is but one God, who is glorious, full of majeſty, and poſſeſſed of all perfections, as that he is all powerful, wiſe, good, and righteous: and this is manifeſt in them, or in them; by the light that is given them: it is light by which that which may be known of God is manifeſt; and this is the light of nature which every man has that comes into the world; and this is internal, it is in him, in his mind and conſcience, and is communicated to him by God, and that by infuſion or inſpiration; ſee Job xxxii. 8. for God hath ſhewed it unto them; what may be known of him by that light; and which is aſſiſted and may be improved by a conſideration of the works of creation and providence.

Ver. 20. For the inviſible things of him, &c.] Not the angels, the inviſible inhabitants of heaven; nor the unſeen glories of another world; nor the decrees of God; nor the perſons in the Godhead; but the perfections of God, or his properties, as the Arabic verſion reads it; and which are explained by his eternal power and Godhead: theſe, from the creation of the world are clearly ſeen; this is no new diſcovery, but what men have had, and might by the light of nature, have enjoyed ever ſince the world was created; theſe being underſtood, in an intellectual way, by the diſcurſive faculty of the underſtanding, by the things that are made; the various works of creation; all which proclaim the being: unity and perfections of God their creator, ſo that they are without excuſe; the very heathens who have only the light of nature, and are deſtitute of a revelation, have no colour or pretext for their idolatrous practices, and vitious lives; nor have they, nor will they have any thing to object to God's righteous judgment againſt them, or why they ſhould not be condemned.

Ver. 21. Becauſe that when they knew God, &c.] Tho' they had ſuch a knowledge of the being and perfections of God, yet they glorified him not as God. They neither thought nor ſpoke honourably of him; nor did they aſcribe thoſe perfections to him, which belong'd to him; they did not adhere to him as the one and only God, nor honour him as the creator of all things out of nothing, and as the ſole governour of the univerſe; they did not glorify him by the internal exerciſe, of fear of him, love to him, or truſt in him, nor by any external worſhip ſuitable to his nature, and their own notions of him. Seneca is an inſtance of this, of whom Auſtin[f] ſays, "that he worſhipped what he "found fault with, did what he reproved, and "adored that which he blamed." Neither were thankful; neither for the knowledge of things they had, which they aſcribed to themſelves; nor for their mercies, which they imputed to ſecond cauſes: but became vain in their imaginations; the vanity of their minds was the ſpring and ſource of their evil conduct; which may deſign the wickedneſs of their hearts, and the imaginations thereof, which were evil, and that continually; the pride of their natures, the carnality and weakneſs of their reaſonings, and the whole ſyſtem of their vain philoſophy; and hence they ran into polytheiſm, or the worſhipping of many gods: and their fooliſh heart was darkened; where they thought their great wiſdom lay: darkneſs is natural to the hearts and underſtandings of all men, which is increaſed by perſonal iniquity; ſatan is concerned in improving it, and God ſometimes gives up the hearts of perſons to judicial blindneſs, which was the caſe of theſe men.

Ver. 22. Profeſſing themſelves to be wiſe, &c.] The learned men among the Gentiles firſt called themſelves Σοφοι, Sophi, wiſe men; and afterwards to cover their wretched pride and vanity, Φιλοσοφοι, Philoſophers, lovers of wiſdom; but notwithſtanding all their arrogance, their large pretenſions to wiſdom, and boaſt of it, they became fools; they appeared to be ſo; they ſhewed themſelves to be ſuch in thoſe very things they prided themſelves with the knowledge of: as, for inſtance, Socrates after he had aſſerted the unity of God, and is ſaid to die a martyr for that truth; yet one of the laſt actions of his life was ſacrificing a cock to Æſculapius, at leaſt he deſired his friend Crito to do it.

Ver. 23. And changed the glory of the incorruptible God, &c.] God is incorruptible and immortal in his nature, and ſo is oppoſed to all corruptible creatures and things: he has a glory which is eſſential to him, and a manifeſtative one in the creatures, and which is relative, and of right belongs to him: his abſolute eſſential glory cannot be changed, cannot be taken away from him, nor given to another; but his relative glory may be ſaid to be changed, when another is worſhipped in his ſtead, and called by his name. So Philo the Jew[g] ſpeaks of "ſome "who leaving the true God, make to themſelves "falſe ones, and impoſe the name of the increated "and incorruptible upon created and corruptible "beings." Into an image made like to corruptible man; which was worſhipped in different forms by the ſeveral nations of the world: and to birds; as the dove by the Samaritans, the hawk, the Ibis, and others by the Egyptians: and four-footed beaſts; as the ox, and other creatures: and creeping things; ſuch as beetles, ſerpents, and others, by the ſame.

Ver. 24. Wherefore God alſo gave them up to uncleanneſs, &c.] Not by putting any into them, but by leaving them to the pollution of their nature; by withdrawing his providential reſtraints from them, and by giving them up to judicial hardneſs: thro' the luſts of their own hearts. The heart of man is the ſource of all wickedneſs; the luſts that dwell there are many, and theſe tend to uncleanneſs of one ſort or another: by it here is meant particularly bodily uncleanneſs, ſince 'tis ſaid they were given up to diſhonour their own bodies between themſelves; either alone, or with others; ſo that as they changed the glory of God, and diſhonoured him, he left them to diſhonour themſelves by doing thoſe things which were reproachful and ſcandalous to human nature.

Ver. 25. Who changed the truth of God into a lye, &c.] Not the truth of the Goſpel, which they were unacquainted with; but that which might be known of God as true, and was known of them by the light of nature; or the true God himſelf, whom they changed into a lye; by aſcribing to falſe deities, which were lying vanities, thoſe things which were known of God; and by worſhipping them inſtead of him: for they worſhipped and ſerved the creature more than the creator; or above him, or againſt him, in oppoſition to him, or beſides him, others along with him; or neglecting him, and not worſhipping him at all; which is aggravated in that what they worſhipped was a creature, either of their own, or of God's making, and whom they neglected was the creator of them: who is bleſſed for ever, Amen; is bleſſed in himſelf, and the fountain of all bleſſedneſs to his creatures; which is ſo glaring a truth, that every one ought to ſay and ſet his Amen to it.

[g] De Vita Moſis, l. 3. p. 678, 679.

Ver. 26. For this cauſe God gave them up unto vile affections, &c.] Becauſe of their idolatrous practices, God left them to very diſhonourable actions, ſodomitical ones, both among the men and women: for even the women did change the natural uſe into that which is againſt nature; either by proſtituting themſelves to, and complying with the ſodomitical embraces of men, in a way that is againſt nature [h]; or by making uſe of ſuch ways and methods with themſelves, or other women, to gratify their luſts, which were never deſigned by nature for ſuch an uſe: of theſe vicious women, and their practices, Seneca [i] ſpeaks, when he ſays, libidine vero nec maribus quidem cedunt, pati natæ; Dii illas Deæque, male perdant; adeo perverſum commentæ genus impudicitiæ, viros ineunt: alſo Clemens Alexandrinus [k], has reſpect to ſuch, ſaying, γυναικες ανδριζουσαι παρα φυσιν, γαμȣ μεν αι τε ϗ γαμȣσαι γυναικες: and ſuch there were among the Jews, whom they call נשים המסוללות זו בזו [l], and whom the prieſts were forbidden to marry.

Ver. 27. And likewiſe alſo the men leaving the natural uſe of the women, &c.] The very ſin of Sodomy is here deſigned, ſo called from Sodom, the place where we firſt hear of it, Gen. xix. 14. the men of which place, becauſe they burned in their luſt one towards another, as theſe Gentiles are ſaid to do, God rained upon them fire and brimſtone from heaven: an exceeding great ſin this is, contrary to nature, diſhonourable to human nature, and ſcandalous to a people and nation among whom it prevails, as it did very much in the Gentile world, and among their greateſt philoſophers; even thoſe that were moſt noted for moral virtue are charged with it, as Socrates, Plato, Zeno, and others [m]: it is a ſin which generally prevails where idolatry and infidelity do, as among the Pagans of old, and among the Papiſts and Mahometans now; and never was it ſo rife in this nation as ſince the ſchemes of deiſm and infidelity have found ſuch a reception among us. Thus God, becauſe men diſhonour him with their evil principles and practices, leaves them to reproach their own nature, and diſhonour their own bodies: men with men working that which is unſeemly; and of which nothing like it is to be obſerved in the brutal world: receiving in themſelves the recompence of their error, which was meet: God puniſhes ſin with ſin; for, as the Jews ſay [n], as "one commandment draws on another, ſo one "tranſgreſſion draws on another; for the re"ward of the commandment is the commandment, "ושכר עבירה עבירה, and the reward of tranſgreſ"ſion is tranſgreſſion."

Ver. 28. And even as they did not like, &c.] This accounts for the juſtneſs of the divine procedure in leaving them to commit ſuch ſcandalous iniquities; that ſince they had ſome knowledge of God by the light of nature, and yet did not care to retain God in their knowledge; or to own and acknowledge him as God, to worſhip and glorify him as ſuch; but took every method to eraſe this knowledge out of their minds, and keep it from others: God gave them over to a reprobate mind; a vain empty mind, worthleſs, good-for-nothing, devoid of all true knowledge and judgment; uncapable of approving what is truly good, or of diſapproving that which is evil; a mind that has loſt all conſcience of things, and is diſapproved of by God, and all good men: to do thoſe things which are not convenient; which are neither agreeable to the light of nature, nor convenient to, or becoming the honour of human nature; things which the brutes themſelves, who are deſtitute of reaſon, do not do.

Ver. 29. Being filled with all unrighteouſneſs, &c.] From hence, to the end of the chapter, follows a large and black liſt and catalogue of the ſad characters of the Gentiles, and of the beſt men they had among them; for the Apoſtle is all along ſpeaking, not of the common people, but of their wiſe profeſſors, and moral inſtructors; than which there never was a wickeder ſett of men that ever lived upon the face of the earth; who under the guiſe of morality were guilty of the greateſt pride, and covetouſneſs, and of the moſt filthy debaucheries imaginable; they were filled with all unrighteouſneſs. This word includes in it all manner of ſin and wickedneſs in general; fitly expreſſes the condition of fallen men, deſtitute of a righteouſneſs; deſigns every violation of the law reſpecting our neighbour; and is oppoſed to that vain conceit of righteouſneſs, which theſe men had: particular branches of it follow; as, fornication; which ſometimes includes adultery and all unchaſtity; ſimple fornication was not reckoned a ſin among the Gentiles: wickedneſs; or miſchief, which intends not ſo much the internal wickedneſs of the heart, as that particular vice, by which a man is inclined and ſtudies to do hurt to others, as ſatan does: covetouſneſs; this may intend every inſatiable luſt, and particularly the ſin which goes by this name, and is the root of all evil, and was a reigning ſin among the Gentiles. Seneca the famous moraliſt was notoriouſly guilty of this vice, being one of the greateſt uſurers that ever lived: maliciouſneſs; the word denotes either the iniquity of nature in which men are conceived and born; or that deſire of revenge in men, for which ſome are very notorious: envy; at the ſuperiour knowledge and learning, wealth and riches, happineſs and outward proſperity of others: murder; which ſometimes aroſe from envy, wherefore they are put together. There's an elegant paranomaſia in the Greek text: debate; ſtrife about words more than things, and more for vain glory and a deſire of victory, than for truth: deceit; thro' their empty notions of philoſophy; hence philoſophy and vain deceit go together, Col. ii. 8. making large pretences to morality, when they were the vileſt of creatures: malignity; moroſeneſs; having no courteouſneſs nor affability in them, guilty of very ill manners; as particularly they were who were of the ſect of the Cynicks. Now they are ſaid to be filled with and full of, theſe things; not filled by God, but by ſatan and themſelves; and it denotes the aboundings of wickedneſs in them, and which was unſatiable. The Apoſtle goes on to deſcribe them, as whiſperers; who made miſchief among friends, by privately ſuggeſting, and ſecretly inſinuating things into the minds of one to the prejudice of another.

Ver. 30. Backbiters, &c.] Who more publickly defamed the characters of their neighbours, and hurt their good name, credit and reputation, tho' behind their backs: haters of God; ſome read it, hated of God; as all workers of iniquity are; but rather this expreſſes their ſin, that they were deniers of the being and providence of God, and ſhewed themſelves to be enemies to him by their evil works: deſpiteful; both by opprobrious words, and injurious actions: proud; of their natural knowledge, learning, eloquence and vain philoſophy: boaſters; of their parts, abilities, wiſdom and works; all which they attributed to themſelves, and to the ſharpneſs of their wit, their ſagacity and induſtry: inventers of evil things; of evil ſchemes of morality and philoſophy, and of evil practices, as well as principles: diſobedient to parents; which was acting contrary to the light of nature.

Ver. 31. Without underſtanding, &c.] Of God, of his nature and worſhip, of things divine and even moral, being given up to a reprobate mind: covenant-breakers; had no regard to private or publick contracts: without natural affection; to their parents, children, relations and friends: implacable; when once offended there was no reconciling of them: unmerciful; had no pity and compaſſion to perſons in diſtreſs.

Ver. 32. Who knowing the judgment of God, &c.] Either of the law of God, the law and light of nature, by which they might in ſome meaſure know the difference between good and evil, and what was right and wrong; or the judiciary ſentence of God againſt ſin: that they which commit ſuch things are worthy of death; at leaſt of corporal death: not only do the ſame, but have pleaſure in thoſe that do them; all which greatly aggravated their wickedneſs, ſince they ſinned againſt light and knowledge, with approbation and good liking of their own ſins, and took pleaſure in the ſins of others. The Jews have a ſaying [p], "that no man is ſuſpected of a thing but he has done it; and if he has not done the whole of it, he has done part of it, and if he has not done part of it, he has thought in his heart to do it; and if he has not thought in his heart to do it, ראה אחרים שעשו ושמח, he has ſeen others do it and has rejoiced." And if ſuch a man is a wicked man, how much more wicked are ſuch who commit ſin themſelves, and delight in the ſins of others: now from this whole account we ſee the inſufficiency of the light of nature to guide perſons in the way of ſalvation; what need there was of a divine revelation; and how impoſſible it is that ſuch men ſhould ever be juſtified before God, by any works of ſeeming righteouſneſs done by them; which the Apoſtle had in view, in giving this account of the depraved nature and conduct of the Gentiles, and of thoſe among them who profeſſed to be, and were the wiſeſt and moſt knowing of them.

CHAP. II.

THIS chapter contains, in general, a vindication of the juſtice and equity of the divine procedure againſt men, ſuch as are deſcribed in the preceding chapter; and a refutation of the ſeveral pleas that might be made by the Gentiles, who had not the law, and by the Jews who had it; and concludes with expoſing the wickedneſs of the latter, and with ſhewing who they are that are properly Jews, and circumciſed perſons in the account of God. It begins in ver. 1. with an inference deduced from what had been ſaid in the latter part of the foregoing chapter; concluding that ſuch, be they who they will, Jews or Gentiles, are inexcuſable, who do the things they condemn others for: but tho' the judgment of ſuch perſons is wrong, the Apoſtle obſerves, ver. 2. that the judgment of God, in the condemnation of them, is right, of which he, and others, were fully aſſured; and which judgment is commended, by the rule of it, being according to truth; by the objects of it criminals, who are left without excuſe, and by the inevitableneſs of it, ver. 3. being ſuch as cannot poſſibly be eſcaped: and though ſome men might hope to eſcape it, becauſe not immediately puniſhed, but loaded with the bleſſings of providence, and peculiar benefits of divine goodneſs; yet this was to be aſcribed to the forbearance of God for the preſent; and that if theſe favours were deſpiſed, and they had not a good effect upon them to bring to repentance, but inſtead thereof were more and more hardened under them, as their guilt would be increaſed, ſo wrath would be ſecretly laying up for them, which will be revealed in the day of judgment, v. 4, 5. at which time juſtice will be done to every man as his works will be found to be, ver. 6. then follows a deſcription of the ſeveral ſorts of perſons that will be judged, and of the different things that will be their portion; as that eternal life will be given to good men, ver. 7. and the wrath of God poured down on bad men, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, ver. 8, 9. The happineſs of good men is repeated again, and explained, and promiſed to the Jew firſt, and then to the Gentile, ver. 10. and a reaſon given of this juſt and equal diſtribution, taken from the nature of God, who is no reſpecter of perſons, ver. 11. an inſtance of which is produced in both Jews and Gentiles, that ſin; the one periſhing with, the other without the law, ver. 12. ſince it is not bare having and hearing the law, but acting up to it, which only can juſtify before God, ver. 13. upon which the Apoſtle proceeds to refute the plea that might be made by the Gentiles, in favour of themſelves, why they ſhould not be condemned, taken from their not having the written law; for tho' they had not the law written on tables of ſtone, as the Jews had, yet they had, as he obſerves, the law of nature written on their hearts, againſt which they ſinned: this he proves by the effects of it, diſcernible in many of them by their outward lives and converſations, in conformity to the law; and by the inward teſtimony of their conſciences, approving of good deeds, and reproaching for bad ones, ver. 14, 15. which two verſes being put into a parentheſis, ver. 16. is connected with ver. 13. and points at the time when the doers of the law ſhall be juſtified, even at the day of judgment: which judgment is deſcribed by the author of it, God; by the ſubject of it, the ſecrets of mens hearts; by the perſon employed in the divine procedure, Jeſus Chriſt; and by the evidence and certainty of it, the Goſpel preached by the Apoſtle: and then follow a deſcription of the Jews, an account of their profeſſion of religion, and an ironical conceſſion of the ſeveral characters they aſſumed to themſelves: they are deſcribed by their name, a Jew; by their religion, which lay in truſting in the law of Moſes, and in boaſting of their intereſt in God, as the God of Iſrael, ver. 17. by their knowledge of the will of God, and approbation of the excellent things of his law, ver. 18. and by the characters they took to themſelves, ver. 19, 20. from which the Apoſtle takes an occaſion to expoſe the wickedneſs of ſome of their principal men, even their teachers, ver. 21, 22. by whoſe wicked lives and converſations God was diſhonoured, and his name blaſphemed among the Gentiles, ver. 23, 24. hence it appears, that their name, profeſſion, and character, would not juſtify them before God; wherefore the Apoſtle goes on, to remove their plea taken from circumciſion, ſhewing, that could be of no uſe to them, but became void thro' their breach of the law, ver. 25. and that, on the other hand, an uncircumciſed Gentile, by keeping the law from right principles, and to a right end, appeared to be the true circumciſion, ver. 26. wherefore the circumciſed Jew that broke the law, ſtood condemned by the uncircumciſed Gentile that fulfilled it; ſo far was circumciſion from being any part of his juſtification, or a plea in favour of it, ver. 27. Then the Apoſtle concludes the chapter, by giving a definition of a real Jew, and of true circumciſion; which he does firſt negatively, that it is not any thing external that makes him a Jew, or any thing in the fleſh that is right circumciſion; but ſecondly, poſitively, that it is an inward work of grace that denominates a man a Jew, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, or an Iſraelite indeed; and that it is the circumciſion of the heart, which is wrought by the Spirit of God, that is true and genuine: and ſuch a Jew, and ſuch a circumciſion, are approved of by God, and commended by him, when the other have only praiſe of men, ver. 28, 29. and therefore, however ſuch perſons may be juſtified before men, they cannot be juſtified in the ſight of God; which is the drift and deſign of the Apoſtle in the whole.

[p] T. Bab. Moed Katon, fol. 18. 2.

Ver. 1. Therefore thou art inexcuſable, O man, &c.] Some think from the connexion of theſe words with the preceding chapter, that the Gentiles are here meant; and particularly thoſe among them who ſeemed to be virtuous, and took upon them to be the reprovers of others, and yet did the ſame things themſelves, as Socrates, Cato, Seneca, and others; and therefore muſt be inexcuſable, becauſe they knew better, and would be thought to have been ſo; wherefore ſuch could never be juſtified before God by their works, but might be juſtly condemned by him, nor ſhall they eſcape his righteous judgment. Others think the Jews are meant, who deſpiſed and condemned the Gentiles, and thought themſelves to be righteous perſons, and juſtified in the ſight of God; and who tho' they were ſecretly guilty of many abominable iniquities, yet were very ſevere upon the ſins of others, and therefore inexcuſable: others think that magiſtrates are deſigned, whether among Jews or Gentiles who reprove and puniſh ſin in others, and therefore muſt be ſuppoſed to know the law, and the nature of ſin, and ſo are inexcuſable and ſelf-condemned when they do the ſame things; wherefore tho' they may paſs with impunity among men, they ſhall not eſcape the judgment of God. Rather the words reſpect every man, of whatſoever nation, office, or place; and may be particularly applied to hypocrites, and ſeem deſigned to correct cenſoriouſneſs, and haſty judging, and to throw confuſion on ſuch who value themſelves on being the cenſurers and reprovers of others: whoſoever thou art that judgeſt; whether a Jew or a Gentile, a publick magiſtrate or a private perſon: for wherein thou judgeſt another; that is, in what caſe or inſtance; the Complutenſian edition, and the Arabic verſion read, in or with what judgment thou judgeſt another; as in Matt. vii. 2. ſee the note there, thou condemneſt thyſelf; by judging them: for thou that judgeſt doſt the ſame things; art guilty of the ſame things condemned in others, and therefore muſt be ſelf-condemned.

Ver. 2. But we are ſure that the judgment of God, &c.] By the judgment of God, is not meant what is exerciſed on and towards men in this life, but what will follow after death; which is called judgment to come, is repreſented as certain, will be univerſal as to perſons and things, and is here called the judgment of God, in oppoſition to the judgment of men; and becauſe it will be carried on by God only, who is omniſcient and omnipotent, and will be definitive: this is and will be, according to truth, againſt them which commit ſuch things; in oppoſition to all hypocriſy and unrighteouſneſs: and it may deſign the law and light of nature by which the Gentiles, the law of Moſes by which the Jews, and the Goſpel of Chriſt by which all that have enjoyed the Goſpel-revelation, will be judged; or the truth of their own conſciences in them all: now we may be ſure of this judgment, and of its being according to truth from reaſon, from ſcripture, and from the being and perfections of God.

Ver. 3. And thinkeſt thou this, O man, that judgeſt them which do ſuch things and doeſt the ſame, &c.] Some men may be ſo vain as to imagine, that tho' they do the ſame things which they condemn in others, they ſhall eſcape the judgment of God; but ſuch will find themſelves moſt ſadly miſtaken; there's no avoiding the general judgment; all men muſt come to it; there will be no eluding it thro' craftineſs and deceit, thro' bribery and corruption; there will be no eſcaping condign puniſhment, thro' might in the criminal, or thro' the judge's ignorance of his crimes, or want of ability and power to puniſh.

Ver. 4. Or deſpiſeſt thou the riches of his goodneſs, &c.] The Apoſtle anticipates an objection againſt what he had ſaid, taken from the proſperity of theſe perſons; who might conclude from thence, that they were not ſo wicked as he had repreſented them; and that they ſhould eſcape the judgment of God, otherwiſe they would have been puniſhed by God in this life, and not have proſpered as they did; which objection is removed by obſerving that it was not their innocence, but the riches of divine goodneſs, and long-ſuffering, and forbearance, which were the cauſes of their proſperity: by the riches of God's goodneſs, are not meant the riches of his ſpecial, ſpiritual and eternal goodneſs, which his own people are only partakers of; but the general riches of his temporal and providential goodneſs, which the men of the world have commonly the greateſt ſhare of; they have it in great plenty, which is ſignified by riches: and by his long-ſuffering and forbearance, are deſigned not his forbearance of his choſen ones, and his long-ſuffering to them, which iſſue in their ſalvation; but his forbearance of ſinners, and long-ſuffering towards them, in not as yet pouring down his wrath and diſpleaſure on them: all which are deſpiſed by them; the riches of his goodneſs, when he is not glorified for his providential mercies, and in them, and when theſe are abuſed to the luſts of men. The forbearance of God is deſpiſed, when men on account of it harden themſelves in ſin; and his long-ſuffering, when they deny his concern in providence, or a future judgment, and promiſe themſelves impunity. Moreover, the Apoſtle obviates the above objection, by aſſerting that God's end in his goodneſs, forbearance and long-ſuffering, was not to teſtify to their innocence, as they imagined, but to lead them to repentance, of which they were ignorant; not knowing that the goodneſs of God leadeth thee to repentance. This is to be underſtood not of a ſpiritual and evangelical repentance, which is a free-grace gift, and which none but the Spirit of God can lead, or bring perſons to; but of a natural and legal repentance, which lies in an external ſorrow for ſin, and in an outward ceſſation from it, and reformation of life and manners, which the goodneſs of God to the Jews ſhould have led them to; who had a large ſhare of the good things of life, a land flowing with milk and honey, and many outward privileges which other nations had not, as the giving of the law, the covenant and promiſes, the word and ordinances; and repentance here chiefly deſigns, as it may reſpect the Gentiles, a change of mind and practice in them relating to idolatry and ſuperſtition. Now the providential goodneſs of God has a tendency to lead perſons to repentance on this account; but of this end of divine goodneſs the Gentiles were ignorant; nor was this end anſwered thereby; which ſhews the wretched depravity of human nature; ſee Acts xiv. 15, 16, 17.

Ver. 5. But after thy hardneſs and impenitent heart, &c.] The Apoſtle goes on to ſhew, that ſuch perſons who promiſe themſelves impunity on the ſcore of proſperity, ſhall not always go unobſerved and unpuniſhed; for there is a day of wrath and righteous judgment haſtening on, and will take place after they have filled up the meaſure of their iniquity. There is a natural hardneſs of the heart in every ſon and daughter of Adam; and there is an acquired habitual hardneſs, which is increaſed by ſinning; and a judicial one, which God, for ſin, ſometimes gives perſons up unto. An impenitent heart, is not only an heart which does not repent, but ſuch an one as cannot repent, being harder than the nether milſtone. Now men, by ſuch hardneſs and impenitence, treaſure up unto themſelves wrath; they are the authors of their own deſtruction; by which is meant the wrath of God, in oppoſition to the riches of his goodneſs, deſpiſed by them; and is in reſerve for wicked men; and is laid up againſt, and will be brought forth in the day of wrath; which the ſcriptures call the evil day; the day fixed by God, when he will call men to an account for their ſins, and ſtir up all his wrath againſt them: and revelation; that is, the day of revelation, when Chriſt ſhall be revealed from heaven in flames of fire, the ſins of men ſhall be revealed, and the wrath of God againſt them: and the righteous judgment of God; ſo ſome copies read; that is, the day of the righteous judgment; ſo the Arabic verſion reads, and of the appearance of God, and of his righteous judgment; for the judgment will be at the appearance of Chriſt, who is God, and at his kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 1. The Alexandrian copy reads, and of the retribution of the righteous judgment of God; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion ſeems to have read, rendering the words, if ſo, or ſeeing thy retribution may come upon thee, and if the judgment of God may befal thee; for when the judgment of God ſhall come, as there will be a revelation of mens ſins, and of the wrath of God againſt them, there will be a juſt retribution according to their works. Or the revelation of the righteous judgment of God; that is, when the judgment of God, which is now hid, ſhall appear; and which is ſaid to be righteous, becauſe it will be carried on in a righteous manner, and proceed upon, and be executed according to the ſtricteſt rules of juſtice and equity.

Ver. 6. Who will render to every man according to his deeds.] God will be the judge, who is righteous, holy, juſt, and true; every man in particular will be judged; as the judgment will be general to all, it will be ſpecial to every one, and will proceed according to their works; for God will render to wicked men according to the demerit of their ſins, the juſt recompence of reward, eternal damnation; and to good men eternal life, not according to the merit of their good works, which have none in them, but according to the nature of them; ſuch who believe in Chriſt, and perform good works from a principle of grace, ſhall receive the reward of the inheritance, which is a reward of grace, and not of debt. In other words, God will render to evil men according to the true deſert of their evil deeds; and of his own free grace will render to good men, whom he has made ſo by his grace, what is ſuitable and agreeable to thoſe good works, which, by the aſſiſtance of his grace, they have been enabled to perform.

Ver. 7. To them who by patient continuance in well doing, &c.] Theſe words are deſcriptive of one ſort of perſons, to whom God will render according to their works; and muſt be underſtood not of the Gentiles, the beſt and moſt moralized among them; for they ſought after worldly things, after human wiſdom, and popular applauſe, and not after God, his honour and glory, nor after immortality, which is only brought to light by the Goſpel; nor of the phariſaical Jews, who ſought for righteouſneſs by the works of the law, and honour and glory from men, and not from God; nor of any unregenerate perſons, but only of ſuch who have the true principles of grace implanted in them, whether Jews or Gentiles: now the things which theſe men ſeek after are glory; not the glory of this world, nor any from the men of it; but the glory of God and Chriſt; to be glorious within and without, by the grace and righteouſneſs of Chriſt here, and to enjoy eternal glory with him hereafter. Honour; not that which Adam had in innocence, and did not abide in; but that which is, and abides with Chriſt, and which all the ſaints have, and ſhall have. Immortality; not the immortality of the ſoul, which is common to all; but the incorruption of the body, or the glorious reſurrection of it to everlaſting life at the great day, or the incorruptible crown, and never-fading inheritance of the ſaints in light. The manner in which theſe things are ſought is, by patient continuance in well doing; by doing good works, and by doing theſe good works well, from a principle of faith and love, and with a view to the glory of God; and by patiently enduring reproaches and ſufferings for well doing, and by perſevering therein: not that theſe things are to be had, or are expected by the ſaints to be had for the ſake of patience and well doing; yet they may be ſought for, and looked unto, as an encouragement to well doing, and continuance therein; and tho' not for, yet in well doing there is a reward. Theſe words do not expreſs that for the ſake of which glory is had; but only deſcribe the perſons who ſeek, and the manner in which they ſeek for it, to whom God will render eternal life, which he of his rich grace promiſed them before the world was, and of his free favour has put into the hands of Chriſt for them, and which, as a pure gift of grace, he beſtows on them thro' him.

Ver. 8. But unto them that are contentious, &c.] This is a deſcription of the other ſort of perſons to whom God will render according to their deeds, who are of the contention; who contend for victory, and not truth; ſtrive about words to no profit; are quarrelſome, and ſow diſcord among men, and in churches: and do not obey the truth; neither attend to the light of nature, and to that which may be known of God by it; nor regard and ſubmit to the Goſpel-revelation; and ſo deſign both the Gentiles, which knew not God, and Jews, and others, who obey not the Goſpel: but obey unrighteouſneſs; are ſervants of ſin: to theſe God renders indignation and wrath; wrathful or fiery indignation, the hotteſt of his fury.

Ver. 9. Tribulation and anguiſh, &c.] Theſe, with the foregoing words, are expreſſive of the ſecond death, the torments of hell, the worm that never dies, and the fire that is not quenched: which will fall upon every ſoul of man that doth evil; whoſe courſe of life and converſation is evil: for the ſoul that ſins ſhall die; unleſs ſatisfaction is made for his ſins by the blood of Chriſt: of the Jew firſt, and alſo of the Gentile; no regard being had to what nation they belong.

Ver. 10. But glory, honour, and peace, &c.] Which are ſo many words for the everlaſting happineſs of the ſaints; which is a crown of glory that fadeth not away; an honour exceeding that of the greateſt potentates upon earth, ſince ſuch that enjoy it, will be kings and prieſts, and ſit with Chriſt on his throne to all eternity; and is a peace that paſſes all underſtanding: all which will be render'd to every man that doth good, to the Jew firſt, and alſo to the Gentile; which none without Chriſt, and his grace, and by the ſtrength of nature, does, or can do; not that good works are cauſes of ſalvation, but are teſtimonies of faith, and fruits of grace, with which ſalvation is connected, whether they be found in Jews or Gentiles; for neither grace nor ſalvation are peculiar to any nation, or ſett of people.

Ver. 11. For there is no reſpect of perſons with God.] It won't come into conſideration at the day of judgment, of what nation men are; or from what parents they are deſcended; nor of what age and ſex perſons be; nor in what ſtate and condition they have lived in this world; nor will it be aſked to what ſect they have belonged, and by what denomination they have been called; or whether they have conformed to ſuch and ſuch externals and rituals in religion; but only whether they are righteous men or ſinners; and accordingly as they appear under theſe characters, judgment will proceed. Some object from hence, tho' without any reaſon, to the doctrine of particular election of certain perſons to everlaſting ſalvation. This paſſage reſpects matters of ſtrict juſtice, and is a forenſic expreſſion relating to courts of judicature, where perſons preſiding are to have no regard to the faces of men, but do that which is ſtrictly juſt between man and man; and does not reſpect matters of grace and free favour, ſuch as giving alms, forgiving debts, &c. A judge, as ſuch, is to regard no man's perſon, but to proceed in matters before him, according to the rules of law and juſtice; ſhould he do otherwiſe, he would be chargeable with being a reſpecter of perſons; but then he may beſtow alms on what objects he pleaſes, and forgive one man who is perſonally indebted to him, and not another, without any ſuch imputation. This applied to the caſe in hand, abundantly clears it; for tho' God, as a judge, reſpects no man's perſon; yet in matters of grace he diſtinguiſhes one perſon from another, as it is plain he does by the bounties of his providence. Beſides, God is not bound to any perſon by any laws, but acts as a ſovereign; he is not moved by any thing in the creature; as his choice is not confined to perſons of any particular nation, family, ſex, or condition, ſo neither does it proceed upon any thing, or a foreſight of any thing in them, or done by them; and as there is no worthineſs in them that are choſen, and ſaved above others, ſo no injury is done to the reſt: add to all this, that thoſe that are ſaved by virtue of electing grace, are ſaved in a way of righteouſneſs agreeable to the holy law, and ſtrict juſtice of God; ſo that no complaint can be made againſt the diſtinguiſhing methods of grace, upon the foot of ſtrict juſtice.

Ver. 12. For as many as have ſinned without law, &c.] This is an inſtance of the ſtrict juſtice of God, and proves him to be no reſpecter of perſons; for the Gentiles who were without law, the written law of Moſes, not without the law of nature in their breaſts, nor without ſome civil laws and ſtatutes of their own; inaſmuch as they ſinned againſt the God of nature, and the law and light of nature, they ſhall alſo periſh without law: not that their condemnation and perdition will be illegal, or not in due courſe of law; but it will not proceed upon, or according to the law of Moſes, they never had; and much leſs for not believing in Chriſt, of whom they never heard; but their perdition will be for their ſins committed without the law of Moſes, againſt the law of nature: their not having the written law of Moſes will be no plea in their favour, or be a reaſon why they ſhould not be condemned; their perſons will not be regarded as with or without the law, but their ſins committed by them, to which facts their conſciences will bear witneſs: and, ſo on the other hand, as many as have ſinned in the law; who have been in and under the law of Moſes, and have ſinned againſt it, meaning the Jews: ſhall be judged by the law; and condemned by it, as they were in this world, and will be hereafter: their having this law will be no bar againſt their condemnation, but rather an aggravation of it; their hearing of it will be no plea in their favour; nor their doing of it neither, unleſs they could have done it to perfection; for perfect obedience it requires, as a juſtifying righteouſneſs, otherwiſe it curſes, condemns, and adjudges to death.

Ver. 13. For not the hearers of the law are juſt before God, &c.] The Apoſtle here ſhews, that the Jews were juſtly condemned, notwithſtanding their having and hearing of the law; ſince hearing without doing it, will never denominate perſons righteous in the ſight of God; however, it might recommend them in the ſight of men: regard ſeems to be had either to the firſt delivery of the law by Moſes to the people of Iſrael, when he read it to them, and they hearkened to it, and promiſed obedience; or rather to the reading and hearing it every ſabbath-day; and may include a ſpeculative knowledge of it, without a practical obedience to it; and which therefore muſt fall greatly ſhort of entitling them to a juſtifying righteouſneſs; ſince not theſe, but the doers of the law ſhall be juſtified: by whom are meant, not ſuch who merely, literally and externally fulfil the law, as they imagine; for the law is ſpiritual, and regards the inward as well as the outward man, and requires internal holineſs, as well as external obedience; and the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of juſtification before God, who ſees the heart, and not before men, who judge according to outward appearance: nor are ſuch deſigned who are imperfect doers of the law; for the law requires a perfect obedience, and what is not perfect, is not properly righteouſneſs; nor does it, nor can it conſider an imperfect righteouſneſs as a perfect one; for it accuſes of, pronounces guilty, curſes, and condemns for every tranſgreſſion of it. But ſuch only can be intended, who are doers of it ſpiritually, internally, as well as externally, and that perfectly. Adam in his ſtate of innocence was a perfect doer of the law; he ſinning and all his poſterity in him, none of them are righteous, but all paſs under a ſentence of condemnation. The beſt of men, even believers in Chriſt, are not without ſin in themſelves; and when any of the ſaints are ſaid to be perfect, it muſt be underſtood in a comparative ſenſe, or as they are conſidered in Chriſt. There never was but one ſince Adam, and that is Chriſt, who has fulfilled, or could perfectly fulfil the law; the thing is impoſſible and impracticable for fallen man: hence theſe words muſt be underſtood, either hypothetically, thus, not the hearers of the law, but if there were any perfect doers of it, they would be juſtified before God; or elſe of ſuch perſons who are conſidered in Chriſt, by whom the whole perfect righteouſneſs of the law is fulfilled in them, and who may be reckoned as perfect doers of it in him, their ſubſtitute, ſurety, and repreſentative.

Ver. 14. For when the Gentiles which have not the law, &c.] The objection of the Gentiles againſt their condemnation, taken from their being without the law, is here obviated. The Apoſtle owns that they had not the law, that is, the written law of Moſes, and yet intimates that they had, and muſt have a law, againſt which they ſinned, and ſo deſerved puniſhment, and which they in part obeyed; for theſe men do by nature the things contained in the law. The matter and ſubſtance of the moral law of Moſes, agrees with the law and light of nature; and the Gentiles in ſome meaſure, and in ſome ſort did theſe things, by nature; not that men by the mere ſtrength of nature, without the grace of God, can fulfil the law, or do any thing that is acceptable to God; and indeed, what theſe men did was merely natural and carnal, and ſo unacceptable to God. Some underſtand this of nature aſſiſted by grace, in converted Gentiles, whether before or after the coming of Chriſt; others expound the phraſe, by nature, freely, willingly, in oppoſition to the ſervile ſpirit of the Jews, in their obedience to the law; tho' it rather ſeems to deſign the dictates of natural reaſon, by which they acted: and ſo theſe having not the law, the written law, are a law to themſelves; which they have by nature and uſe, and which natural reaſon dictates to them. So Plato diſtinguiſhes the law, "into written and unwritten [q]: "the written law is that which was uſed in commonwealths; and that κατα εθη γινομενος, which was "according to cuſtom or nature, was called unwritten, "ſuch as not to go to market naked, nor to be "clothed with womens clothes; which things were "not forbidden by any law, but theſe were not "done becauſe forbidden by the unwritten law;" which he calls unwritten, becauſe not written on tables, or with ink; otherwiſe it was written in their minds, and which by nature and uſe they were accuſtomed to.

Ver. 15. Which ſhew the work of the law written in their hearts, &c.] Tho' the Gentiles had not the law in form, written on tables, or in a book, yet they had the work, the matter, the ſum and ſubſtance of it in their minds; as appears by the practices of many of them, in their external converſation. The moral law in its purity and perfection, was written on the heart of Adam in his firſt creation; was ſadly obliterated by his ſin and fall; upon ſeveral accounts, and to anſwer various purpoſes, a ſyſtem of laws was written on tables of ſtone for the uſe of the Iſraelites; and in regeneration the law is reinſcribed on the hearts of God's people; and even among the Gentiles, and in their hearts, there are ſome remains of the old law and light of nature, which as by their outward conduct appears, ſo by the inward motions of their minds, their conſcience alſo bearing witneſs; for as the Jews ſay [r]; נשמתו של אדם מעידה בו, the ſoul of a man witneſſes in him; for, or againſt him: and their thoughts the mean while accuſing or elſe excuſing one another; and this the heathens themſelves acknowledge, when they [s] ſpeak of "ταμειον δικαστηριον και "κριτηριον της συνειδησεως, the conclave, tribunal and "judgment of conſcience; and which they call δικαστην "δικαιοτατον, the moſt righteous judge; whoſe judg"ment reaſon receives, and gives its ſuffrage to, "whether worthy of approbation or reproof; when "it reads in the memory as if written on a table "the things that are done, and then beholding the "law as an exemplar, prononounces itſelf either "worthy of honour or diſhonour."

Ver. 16. In the day when God ſhall judge, &c.] Theſe words are to be read in connexion with ver. 13. and expreſs the time when both Jews and Gentiles will be judged, called a day, both becauſe of the clearneſs and evidence of the judgment that will be made, and becauſe a certain time is fixed, tho' not known, which will ſurely come; alſo the matter of the judgment, which will be, the ſecrets of men; whether good or bad, which are only known to God and themſelves, and which may have been done ignorantly by them; for God ſhall bring every work into judgment with every ſecret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil, Eccl. xii. 14. which is ſo interpreted by the Jews [t], "when R. Jochanan "came to that ſcripture, he wept; for God ſhall "bring every work into judgment with every ſecret "thing;" upon which the Gloſs ſays, yea, for thoſe things which are hidden from him, which he has committed thro' ignorance, will he bring him into judgment; every thing, even the leaſt thing in a literal ſenſe, but not for ſuch ſilly trifling things they mention in the ſame place; doubtleſs the Holy Ghoſt means the ſecrets of mens hearts and actions, and the hidden things of darkneſs which are contrary to the holy law of God. The perſon by whom this awful judgment will be carried on is, Jeſus Chriſt; to whom all judgment is committed, who is ordained judge of quick and dead, and is every way fit for that office, being God as well as man, and ſo both omniſcient and omnipotent: and this the Apoſtle ſays will be, according to my Goſpel; his meaning is not that the Goſpel will be the rule of judgment, becauſe he is ſpeaking of the judgment of the Gentiles, as well as of the Jews, who never heard of the Goſpel; but that what he had ſaid concerning a day of judgment, of Chriſt's being the judge, and of God's judging by him the ſecrets of men, were as true and as certain as the Goſpel which he preached was; and was conformable, or agreeable to it, as the Arabic verſion reads it, and might be learned and proved from it. This he calls, my Goſpel; not becauſe the author or ſubject of it; but becauſe it was committed to his truſt, and was preached by him; and in oppoſition to, and to diſtinguiſh it from the Goſpel of the falſe Apoſtles. Euſebius ſays[u], that the Apoſtle Paul had uſed to call the Goſpel according to Luke his Goſpel, and that it is ſaid, that whenever he makes mention of his Goſpel, he deſigns that.

Ver. 17. Behold, thou art called a Jew, &c.] From hence to the end of the chapter, the Jews are particularly addreſſed; their ſeveral privileges and characters are commemorated, which by an ironical conceſſion are allowed them; ſeveral charges are brought againſt them, even againſt their principal men; and the plea in favour of them, from their circumciſion, is conſidered; and the Apoſtle's view in the whole, is to ſhew that they could not be juſtified before God by their obedience to the law of Moſes: behold; take notice, obſerve it, this will be granted: thou art called a Jew; thou art one by name, by nation, and by religion; but no name, nor outward religion, nor a mere profeſſion, will juſtify before God: and reſteſt in the law; which may be underſtood of their having the law and the knowledge of it, what is to be done and avoided eaſily, without any fatigue and labour; of their pleaſing and applauding themſelves with the bare having and hearing of it; of their truſt and confidence in it; and of their inactivity and ſecurity in it, as perſons aſleep; and ſo of their coming ſhort of the knowledge of the Goſpel, and of Chriſt the end of the law for righteouſneſs, their whole confidence being placed in that: ſo the Targumiſt in Jer. viii. 8. paraphraſes the words, "we are wiſe, "and in the law of the Lord, אנחנא רחיצין, do "we truſt:" and makeſt thy boaſt of God. There is a right boaſting of God in oppoſition to boaſting in the creature, when men aſcribe all the bleſſings of nature and grace to the Lord alone, and praiſe him for all their enjoyments temporal and ſpiritual; and when they truſt in, and glory, and make their boaſt of Chriſt as the Lord their righteouſneſs, in whom alone they are, and can be juſtified. But the boaſting here ſpoken of, was ſuch that was not right; theſe men boaſted of their bare external knowledge of the one God, when the Gentiles around them were ignorant of him; of their being the covenant people of God, when others were aliens and ſtrangers; and of their having the word and worſhip of the true God, which other nations were unacquainted with; and on theſe external things they depended, which was their fault.

Ver. 18. And knoweſt his will, &c.] Not the ſecret will or purpoſe of God; nor his revealed will in the Goſpel, for of this they were ignorant; but his delared will in the law, ſhewing what is to be done, and what is not to be done: to know which in expreſs terms was a privilege, that other people had not; but then the bare knowledge of this will be of no avail; for perſons may know their Lord's will, as the Jews did, and not do it, and ſo be worthy to be beaten with many ſtripes: and approveſt the things that are more excellent; or trieſt the things that differ; from one another, and from the will and law of God; or as the Syriac, diſcerneſt וליתא, things that are convenient; agreeable, which are fit and ought to be done: and having tried and diſcerned them, they approved of them in their judgment as the things more excellent; but then they did not put theſe excellent things in practice which they approved of; and the knowledge and approbation they had of theſe things, aroſe from their being inſtructed out of the law, and not the Goſpel; for the excellent things of the Goſpel, they had no diſcerning, knowledge and approbation of; ſee Phil. i. 10.

Ver. 19. And art confident that thou thyſelf, &c.] Being vainly puffed up in their fleſhly minds, they were ſtrongly perſuaded that they were very fit perſons to be a guide to the blind: all men are by nature blind, as to the knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things: the meaner ſort of the people among the Jews ſeem to be intended here; or elſe the ignorant Gentiles, whom the Jews were very fond of making proſelytes to their religion and laws; but miſerable guides were they, whether to their own people, or others; blind guides of the blind. Goſpel miniſters beſt deſerve this title: a light of them that are in darkneſs; ſo Chriſt, John the Baptiſt, the diſciples of Chriſt, and all Goſpel miniſters are; but theſe men, who arrogated ſuch characters to themſelves, were dim lights, and dark lanthorns. The Apoſtle ſeems to have reſpect to thoſe very high and exalted characters the Jews give of their doctors, as when they call one, בוצינא דנהורא, the lamp of light[w]; another, בוצינא קדישא, the holy lamp[x]; and a third, נר ישראל, the lamp of Iſrael[y]; with many others of the ſame kind; ſee the notes on Matt. v. 14. and John v. 35.

Ver. 20. An inſtructor of the fooliſh, &c.] All men in a ſtate of unregeneracy are fooliſh, and need inſtruction; here the common people among the Jews, who knew not the law, are meant; it was very uſual to call any one of their doctors and maſters, מורה, an inſtructor: it follows, a teacher of babes; either in age or in underſtanding; ſuch who taught either of them, were called, by the Jews, מלמדי תינוקות, teachers of babes. Thus they paraphraſe the text in Dan. xii. 3. "they that be wiſe, "ſhall ſhine as the brightneſs of the firmament. This "is the judge who judges the judgment of truth "truly, and the collectors of alms: and they that "turn many to righteouſneſs as the ſtars for ever and "ever; theſe are, מלמדי תנוקות, the teachers of "babes[z]." Tho' theſe are ſaid[a] to be inferior to the wiſe men, or doctors: which haſt the form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law: they had not a true knowledge of the law; only a draught and ſcheme, the outward form of the law, and a mere ſhadow and appearance of the knowledge of the truth of it. From hence the Apoſtle would have it concluded, that tho' the Jews had the law, and in ſome ſenſe knew it, yet inaſmuch as they did not perform it, they could not be juſtified by it; and that even their teachers, their greateſt maſters and doctors, were very deficient, as appears from what follows; and ſince they could not be juſtified by it, who taught others the knowledge of it, the hearers of it could not expect juſtification from it.

Ver. 21. Thou therefore which teacheſt another, teacheſt thou not thyſelf? &c.] Several charges are here brought againſt the Jews, even againſt their teachers; for tho' they are put by way of queſtion, they are to be conſidered as ſo many aſſertions and matters of fact: thus, though they taught others, they did not teach themſelves; they were blind leaders of the blind; they were ignorant of the law, of the ſpirituality of it; they were deſirous to be teachers of the law, underſtanding neither what they ſaid, nor whereof they affirmed: they were ignorant of the righteouſneſs of God, of whom they boaſted; and of the more excellent things of Moſes, and the prophets, they pretended to explain; and of the Meſſiah, of whom their prophecies ſo much ſpoke: and beſides, what they did underſtand and teach, they did not practiſe themſelves; than which nothing is more ſhameful, or more betrays ſtupidity and ignorance; for as they themſelves [b] ſay, "he "that teaches men, בדבר שהוא לא יעשה, that "which he himſelf does not do, is like a blind man "who has a lamp in his hand, and enlightens "others, but he himſelf walks in darkneſs." And ſuch teachers they own were among them. "Beau-"tiful, ſay they [c], are the words which come out "of the mouths of them that do them: Ben Aſſai "was a beautiful preacher, but did not well ob-"ſerve;" i. e. to do what he ſaid. Thou that preacheſt a man ſhould not ſteal, doſt thou ſteal? ſome underſtand this figuratively, of ſtealing, or taking away the true ſenſe of the law, and putting a falſe one upon it; of which theſe men were notoriouſly guilty: but rather, it is to be underſtood literally, not only of the inward deſires and motions of their minds after this ſin, and of their conſenting to, and conniving at theft and robbery, but of their doing it themſelves; who, under pretence of long prayers, devoured widows houſes; plunder'd and robb'd them of their ſubſtance: no wonder that theſe men preferr'd Barabbas, a thief and a robber, to Jeſus Chriſt.

Ver. 22. Thou that ſayeſt a man ſhould not commit adultery, &c.] Adultery here is to be taken not figuratively for adulterating the word of God, and mixing it with their own inventions; but literally for the ſin of adultery, and that not in heart only, but in act: doſt thou commit adultery? an iniquity which greatly prevailed among the Jews at this time of day; hence Chriſt calls them an adulterous generation; and that to ſuch a degree, that by the advice of their great Rabbi, R. Jochanan ben Zaccai, they left off the trial of the ſuſpected woman, caſes of this nature being ſo very numerous: and this ſin prevailed not only among the common people, but among their principal doctors; as may be learnt from their own writings, and from that conviction of this iniquity which the Scribes and Phariſees were brought under by Chriſt, when the woman, taken in adultery, was had before him by them, John viii. 9. Thou that abhorreſt idols, doſt thou commit ſacriledge? for tho' at this time they abhorr'd idolatry, to which their fore-fathers were ſo much inclined, and ſo often fell into, yet they were guilty of ſacriledge; by violating the worſhip of God, and polluting it with their own inventions; by pillaging or with-holding, or not offering the ſacrifices they ought; and by plundering the temple, and converting the ſacred things of it to their own uſe.

Ver. 23. Thou that makeſt thy boaſt of the law, &c.] Of their having it, which other nations had not; of their knowledge of it, which many of their own people were without, or had but a ſmall ſhare of; and of their keeping of it even to perfection: through breaking of the law diſhonoureſt thou God? ſin ſometimes is expreſſed by a word which ſignifies a fall; ſometimes by another which ſignifies miſſing of the mark, or ſtraying from it; ſometimes by another, which ſignifies a contrariety to the law of God; and here, by one which ſignifies a paſſing over it, and the bounds which it has ſet, as the rule of man's obedience; and hereby God, the lawgiver, is diſhonoured: for as God is glorified by good works, when rightly performed, he is diſhonoured by evil ones; for his authority, as a lawgiver is trampled upon and deſpiſed. Now perſons guilty of ſuch iniquities as here mentioned, could not be juſtified before God, or accepted by him on account of any works of righteouſneſs done by them.

Ver. 24. For the name of God is blaſphemed, &c.] The being and perfections of God, ſuch as his holineſs, omniſcience, and omnipotence, are denied or evil ſpoken of; and alſo the law of God, and the forms of worſhip inſtituted by him: among the Gentiles through you; through their iniquities, who when they obſerve them, conclude that the God of Iſrael is not omniſcient, or he would know, and take notice of theſe things; and that he is not holy, or he could not bear them; nor omnipotent, or he would revenge them: as it is written; the paſſage or paſſages referred to are not mentioned, but are perhaps Iſ. lii. 5. Ezek. xxxvi. 20, 23. In the former of theſe texts the words are, they that rule over them make them to howl, ſaith the Lord; and my name continually every day is blaſphemed; which are ſpoken of the rulers of the people, either of their eccleſiaſtical or political rulers, or both; and ſo Aben Ezra interprets them of, גדולי ישראל, the great men of Iſrael; and here by the Apoſtle are applied to their doctors and wiſe men: and in the latter are theſe words, thus ſaith the Lord God, I do not this for your ſakes, O houſe of Iſrael, but for my holy name's ſake, which ye have prophaned among the Heathen; that is, by their unbecoming walk and converſation, and eſpecially by the diſagreeable conduct of their principal men: and the Jews own the ſame things, and complain of them in much the ſame language the Apoſtle here does, ſaying, "they diſgrace the law before the people of the earth, (the common people, or elſe the Gentiles) how? a wiſe man ſits and expounds in the congregation, ſaying, thou ſhalt not lend upon uſury, and he lends upon uſury; he ſays, thou ſhalt not commit a robbery, and he commits a robbery; he ſays, לא תגנוב, thou ſhalt not ſteal, and he ſteals: ſays R. Berechiah, it happened to one man that his cloak was ſtolen from him, and he went before the judge about it, and he found it ſpread upon his bed or couch: and, ſays the ſame Rabbi, it happened to a certain man that his pot was ſtolen from him, and he went before the judge about it, and he found it upon his hearth: hence it is ſaid, as they were increaſed they ſinned againſt me, therefore will I change their glory into ſhame, Hoſ. iv. 7 [d]."

Ver. 25. For circumciſion verily profiteth, &c.] The plea from circumciſion in favour of the Jews, and their acceptance with God, and juſtification before him, is here, and in the following verſes, conſidered. The Apoſtle allows that circumciſion was profitable; which muſt be underſtood whilſt it was in force, before the abrogation of it, for ſince, it is not profitable but pernicious; and then it was only profitable, in caſe the law was kept: if thou keepeſt the law; that is, perfectly; for circumciſion obliged perſons to keep the whole law. Now the circumciſed Jews did not keep it in ſuch ſenſe; wherefore circumciſion was of no uſe to them, but, on the contrary, was an hand-writing againſt them. But if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumciſion is made made uncircumciſion; that is, it is not accounted circumciſion; it is of no avail; ſuch a man was all one as an uncircumciſed Gentile, and appeared to be uncircumciſed in a ſpiritual ſenſe: the Apoſtle perhaps alludes to a practice among ſome of the Jews, to bring on and draw over the foreſkin, after they had been circumciſed; ſee the note on 1 Cor. vii. 18.

Ver. 26. Therefore if the uncircumciſion keep, &c.] Theſe words are ſpoken hypothetically; if any ſuch perſons could be found among the Gentiles who keep the whole law of God; and can only be abſolutely underſtood of ſuch, who from a principle of grace act in obedience to the law, as in the hands of Chriſt, and who look to Chriſt as the fulfilling end of it, for righteouſneſs; in whom they keep the righteouſneſs of the law perfectly: ſhall not his uncircumciſion be counted for circumciſion? by this queſtion 'tis ſuggeſted, that an uncircumciſed Gentile, who keeps the law as in the hands of Chriſt, and under the influences of his Spirit and grace, and keeps it in Chriſt, is reckoned a circumciſed perſon in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and muſt be preferable to a circumciſed Jew that breaks it.

Ver. 27. And ſhall not uncircumciſion which is by nature, &c.] That is, the Gentiles, who are by nature uncircumciſed; for as circumciſion was by the command of God, and performed by the art of men, uncircumciſion is by nature, and what men naturally have. Now if it, ſuch perſons, fulfil the law in Chriſt, they will judge thee, the circumciſion; and condemn, as Noah condemned the old world, and the men of Niniveh, and the queen of the ſouth will condemn the men of that generation, in which Chriſt lived. Who by the letter and circumciſion tranſgreſs the law; that is, either by the law, which is the letter, and by circumciſion, or by circumciſion which is in the letter, ver. 29. ſin being increaſed by the prohibitions of the moral law, and the rituals of the ceremonial law, and the more ſo by a dependance upon an obedience to either of them, or both, for juſtification.

Ver. 28. For he is not a Jew which is one outwardly, &c.] The Apoſtle removes the plea in favour of the Jews, taken from their name and privilege, by diſtinguiſhing between a Jew and a Jew, and between circumciſion and circumciſion: he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; by mere name, nature, nation, religion, and profeſſion: neither is that circumciſion which is outward in the fleſh; which takes away the fleſh of the fore-ſkin, but not the carnality of the heart; leaves a mark upon the fleſh, but no impreſſion on the mind. This is nothing, is not the true, ſolid, ſubſtantial, ſpiritual circumciſion, which only avails in the ſight of God.

Ver. 29. But he is a Jew which is one inwardly, &c.] Who has an internal work of grace upon his ſoul; who has not only an outward name, but an inward nature; not the law of God in the hand, but in the heart; not an external righteouſneſs only, but internal holineſs; and who is not a mere outward court worſhipper, but a worſhipper of God in ſpirit and in truth. The Jews have a [e] ſaying themſelves, "that whoſoever denies idolatry, "נקרא יהודי, is called a Jew:" ſo that, according to them, this is a name that is not confined to themſelves, but belongs to all ſuch who truly fear and worſhip God; and they ſay, in the ſame place, that Pharoah's daughter was called יהודית, a Jeweſs, becauſe ſhe denied idolatry, and went down to waſh herſelf from the idols of her father's houſe. And elſewhere [f], "that faith does not depend upon circumciſion, but upon the heart: he that believes "not as he ſhould, circumciſion does not make "him a Jew; and he that believes as he ought, "he indeed is a Jew, tho' he is not circumciſed." And circumciſion is that of the heart; which God requires, and he himſelf promiſes to give, Deut. x. 16. and xxx. 6. Jer. iv. 4. upon which laſt paſſage, a very noted Jew [g] has this obſervation, זאת היא מילת הלב, this is the circumciſion of the heart; the very phraſe the Apoſtle here uſes: circumciſion of the fleſh was typical of this, which lies in a godly ſorrow for ſin, in a putting off the body of the ſins of the fleſh, and in renouncing a man's own righteouſneſs in the buſineſs of juſtification. The ancient Jews had ſome notion of this typical uſe of circumciſion. So Philo the Jew ſays [h], that circumciſion taught, ηδονων και παθων παντων εκτομην, the cutting off of all pleaſures and affections: and elſewhere he ſays [i], it is a ſymbol of two things particularly; the one is the cutting off of pleaſures, as before; and the other is the removal of arrogancy, that grievous diſeaſe of the ſoul: and in another place [k] he calls purity, or chaſtity, περιτομης περιτομην, the circumciſion of circumciſion. Now this our Apoſtle ſays is in the ſpirit; meaning either the ſpirit or ſoul of man, which is the ſeat and ſubject of it; or the Spirit of God, who is the author of it: the Ethiopic verſion reads it, by the Holy Ghoſt: and not in the letter; or by the letter of the law; but the Holy Ghoſt produces this ſpiritual work inſtrumentally, by the preaching of the Goſpel. To which the Apoſtle adds, whoſe praiſe is not of men, but of God; referring not to circumciſion immediately ſpoken of before, but to the Jew who is one inwardly; and alludes to the name Judah, from whence the Jews are called, which comes from the word ידה, which ſignifies to praiſe; and intimates here, that ſuch perſons muſt not expect praiſe from men, who are only taken with outward things, but from God, who ſearches and knows the heart.

CHAP. III.

IN this chapter are an anſwer to ſeveral objections which follow one upon another, relating to what the Apoſtle had ſaid concerning the equality of the Gentiles with the Jews; and various proofs out of the pſalms and prophets, ſhewing the general depravity and corruption of mankind, of the Jews as well as of the Gentiles; and the concluſion from all this, that there is no juſtification by the works of the law, but by the righteouſneſs of God received by faith, of which a large and clear account is given. The firſt objection is in ver. 1. and is taken from the unprofitableneſs of being a Jew and a circumciſed perſon, if that is true which is aſſerted in the preceding chapter; to which an anſwer is given, ver. 2. ſhewing that tho' many things might be inſtanced in, in which the Jew had the advantage of the Gentile in external things; this might be mentioned as one for all, and taken as a ſufficient anſwer, that the Jews had the oracles or word of God committed to their truſt, by which they became came acquainted with the will of God. The Apoſtle foreſeeing that another objection would ariſe upon this; what ſignifies their having the oracles of God, when theſe are not believed by them? prevents it by obſerving, ver. 3. that tho' ſome did not believe, ſome did, and as for the unbelief of others, the truth and faithfulneſs of God in his word, were not made void by it; for however falſe and deceitful men are, God is always true to his word, ver. 4. and which is confirmed by a paſſage of ſcripture, cited out of Pſal. li. 4. from hence ariſes another objection, that if the righteouſneſs of God is commended and illuſtrated by the unrighteouſneſs of man, then it would be unjuſt in God to take vengeance on men for their ſins, ver. 5. which is removed with abhorrence, and anſwered by obſerving, that if there was any truth in it, the world could not be judged by God, as it certainly will, ver. 6. but ſtill the objection is continued and ſtrengthened, ver. 7. that if God is glorified thro' the ſins of men, not only men ought not to be puniſhed for them, but they ſhould not be reckoned ſinners, or as doers of evil things, but of good things, and be indulged in them; to which is replied, that this was the common calumny caſt upon the doctrine of the Apoſtle, and perſons of ſuch principles and practices are deſerving of damnation, ver. 8. Having removed theſe objections, the Apoſtle re-aſſumes his former aſſertion, and ſupports it, that a carnal circumciſed Jew, is no better than a carnal uncircumciſed Gentile; it being already ſufficiently made to appear, that they are both under the power and guilt of ſin; and as a further evidence of it, he produces ſeveral paſſages out of the book of Pſalms, and out of the propheſies of Iſaiah, which fully expreſs the ſad corruption of human nature, and eſpecially of the Jews; and this account begins in ver. 10. and ends in ver. 18. and which account he ſuggeſts, ver. 19. carries in it ſuch a full conviction of the truth of what he had ſaid, that all men are under ſin, that no one would be able to open his mouth in his own defence, but all muſt acknowledge themſelves guilty before God: and then he proceeds to the concluſion he meant to draw from all this, that there is no juſtification of any before God by the deeds of the law; giving this as a reaſon for it, becauſe the law diſcovered ſin, but not a juſtifying righteouſneſs, ver. 20. that is revealed in another way, by the Goſpel, and not the law, tho' both law and prophets bear a teſtimony to it, ver. 21. which righteouſneſs is deſcribed by the author of it God; by the means thro' which it comes to the uſe and comfort of men, the faith of Chriſt; and by the ſubjects of it, them that believe; in the juſtification of which there is no difference, ver. 22. of which a reaſon is given, ver. 23. taken from the general ſtate of men, as ſinners, and bereaved of the image of God: the ſeveral cauſes, ways, means, and end of the juſtification of ſuch perſons are ſuggeſted; the moving cauſe is the free-grace of God, the meritorious or procuring cauſe the redemption that is in Chriſt, ver. 24. and his propitiatory ſacrifice, ver. 25. which is owing to the eternal purpoſe of God, whoſe end in it was to declare his purity, holineſs and juſtice; which end is repeated and enlarged on, in ver. 26. upon which the Apoſtle aſks, ver. 27. what's become of boaſting in the creature? and anſwers himſelf by ſaying, it was excluded, not by the doctrine of works, but by the doctrine of faith, and particularly the doctrine of juſtification by faith in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; wherefore the concluſion ſtands firm and juſt, from the premiſes, that juſtification is by faith without the works of the law, ver. 28. and it is further confirmed, that Jews and Gentiles with reſpect to their ſtate and condition Godward, are on a level; he is the God of the one, as well as of the other, ver. 29. and this appears by his juſtifying both in one and the ſame way, thro' faith in the righteouſneſs of his ſon, ver. 30. and the chapter is concluded by obviating an objection that might be made, that thro' this doctrine of juſtification by faith, the law is made void, and is of no uſe, ver. 31. to which the Apoſtle anſwers, that this is ſo far from being fact, that the law is eſtabliſhed by it.

Ver. 1. What advantage then hath the Jew? &c.] If he is not properly a Jew, who is born of Jewiſh parents, and brought up in the cuſtoms, rites, and religion of the Jewiſh nation, but any one of whatſoever nation, that is born again of water, and of the Spirit; where's the ſuperior excellency of the Jew to the Gentile? A man may as well be born and brought up a Heathen as a Jew; the one has no more advantages than the other by his birth and education: it may be rendered, what hath the Jew more? or what has he ſuperfluous or abundant? the phraſe anſwers to the Hebrew מה יתרון לאדם, in Eccl. i. 3. which is rendered, what profit hath a man? and in Eccl. vi. 8. מה יותר לחכם, what hath a wiſe man more, &c. and in ver. 11. מה יתר לאדם, what is a man better? the firſt of theſe paſſages the Septuagint render by τις περισσεια, what abundance? and the laſt by τι περισσον, what more, or ſuperfluous, or abundant? the phraſe uſed by the Apoſtle here: or what profit is there of circumciſion? ſince that which is outward in the fleſh profits not unleſs the law is kept, otherwiſe circumciſion is no circumciſion; and if an uncircumciſed Gentile keeps the law, he is a better man than a circumciſed Jew; yea, he judges and condemns him; for the only true circumciſion is internal, ſpiritual, and in the heart. To this the Apoſtle anſwers in the following verſe.

Ver. 2. Much every way, &c.] The circumciſed Jew has greatly the advantage of the uncircumciſed Gentile מכול פנים, in all reſpects, על כל צד, on every ſide, as the Rabbins ſpeak; phraſes to which this in the text anſwers: chiefly; more eſpecially, particularly, and in the firſt place; becauſe that unto them were committed the oracles of God; by which are meant the law of Moſes, and the writings of the prophets, the inſtitutions of the ceremonial law, and the propheſies of the Meſſiah and the Goſpel-church ſtate; and in a word, all the books of the Old Teſtament, and whatſoever is contained in them; which are called ſo, becauſe they are of divine inſpiration, contain the mind and will of God, and are infallible and authoritative: and it was the priviledge and profit of the Jews that they were entruſted with them, when other nations were not, and ſo had the advantage of them; they had them for their own uſe; for hereby they had a more clear and diſtinct knowledge of God, than the Gentiles could have by the light of nature; and beſides, became acquainted with the doctrines of a Trinity of perſons in the Godhead, of the ſonſhip and deity of the Meſſiah, of the ſacrifice, ſatisfaction, and righteouſneſs of the redeemer, and of ſalvation by him; and alſo with the manner of worſhipping of God according to his will; all which the Gentiles were ignorant of. Moreover, they had the honour of being the keepers of theſe ſacred books, theſe divine oracles, and of tranſmitting them to poſterity, for the uſe of others.

Ver. 3. For what if ſome did not believe? &c.] 'Tis ſuggeſted, that tho' the Jews enjoyed ſuch a priviledge, ſome of them did not believe; which is an aggravation of their ſin, that they ſhould have ſuch means of light, knowledge, and faith, ſuch clear and full evidences of things, and yet be incredulous: tho' it ſhould be obſerved that this was the caſe only of ſome, not of all; and muſt be underſtood, not of their diſbelief of the ſcriptures being the word of God, for theſe were always received as ſuch by them all, and were conſtantly read, heard and attended to; but either of their diſobedience to the commands of God required in the law, or of their diſregard to the promiſes of God, and prophecies of the Meſſiah, and of their diſbelief in the Meſſiah himſelf when he came; but now this was no objection to the advantage they had of the Gentiles, ſince this was not owing to want of evidence in the word of God, but to the darkneſs and unbelief of their minds: and, ſhall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? no, their unbelief could not, and did not make void the veracity and faithfulneſs of God in his promiſes concerning the Meſſiah, recorded in the oracles of God, which they had committed to them; for notwithſtanding this, God raiſed up the Meſſiah from among them, which is another advantage the Jews had of the Gentiles; inaſmuch as of them, as concerning the fleſh, Chriſt came, who is God over all, bleſſed for evermore, Rom. ix. 5. and he ſent him to them, to the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael, as a prophet and miniſter; he ſent his Goſpel to them firſt, and called out by it from among them, his elect, nor did he take it from them, until he had done this; and he took it away only, until the fulneſs of the Gentiles is brought in; and then the Goſpel ſhall come to them again with power, and all Iſrael ſhall be ſaved.

Ver. 4. God forbid, yea, let God be true, but every man a liar, &c.] Let no ſuch thing ever enter into the minds of any, that the truth of God can be, or will be made of none effect by the want of faith in man; let it be always aſſerted and abode by, that God is true, faithful to his word, conſtant in his promiſes, and will always fulfil his purpoſes; tho' every man is a liar, vain, fallacious, and inconſtant; referring to Pſ. cxvi. 11. as it is written, Pſ. li. 4. that thou mighteſt be juſtified in thy ſayings, and mighteſt overcome when thou art judged. This is a proof that God is true, and ſtands to his word, tho' men are fallacious, inconſtant, and wicked. God made a promiſe to David, that of the fruit of his body he would ſet upon his throne; that the Meſſiah ſhould ſpring from him; that he would of his ſeed raiſe up unto Iſrael a ſaviour. Now David ſinned greatly in the caſe of Bathſheba; but his ſin did not make of no effect the truth and faithfulneſs of God: tho' David ſhewed himſelf to be a weak, ſinful man, yet God appeared true and faithful to every word of promiſe which he had ſworn in truth to him; and therefore when he was brought to a ſenſe of his evil, and at the ſame time to obſerve the invariable truth and faithfulneſs of God, ſaid, I acknowledge my tranſgreſſion, &c. againſt thee, thee only have I ſinned and done this evil in thy ſight; which confeſſion of ſin I make, that thou mighteſt be juſtified in thy ſayings; or when thou ſpeakeſt, which is all one; that is, that thou mighteſt appear to be juſt, and faithful, and true in all thy promiſes, in every word that is gone out of thy mouth, which ſhall not be recalled and made void, on account of my ſins; for tho' I have ſinned, thou abideſt faithful; and this alſo I declare with ſhame to myſelf, and with adoring views of thine unchangeable truth and goodneſs: that thou mighteſt overcome; that is, put to ſilence all ſuch cavils and charges, as if the faith of God could be made void by the unfaithfulneſs of men: when thou art judged; when men will be ſo bold and daring to arraign thy truth and faithfulneſs, and contend with thee about them. This now is brought as a full proof, and is a full proof of this truth, that God is always true to his word, tho' men fail in theirs, and fall into ſin. God kept his word with David concerning the ſtability of his kingdom, his ſucceſſor, and the Meſſiah that ſhould ſpring from him, tho' he acted a bad part againſt God. There is ſome little difference between theſe words as they ſtand in the Hebrew text of Pſ. li. 4. and as they are cited and rendered by the Apoſtle, in the laſt clauſe of them: in the former it is, that thou mighteſt be clear; in the latter, that thou mighteſt overcome. Now to vindicate the Apoſtle's verſion, let it be obſerved, that the Hebrew word זכה, ſignifies to overcome, as well as to be clear; of which inſtances may be given out of the Jewiſh writings. Says [l] Rabba, concerning an argument uſed by R. Chanina, in a controverſy with other Rabbins, by this R. Chanina ben Antigonus, זכנהו, hath overcome them: and in another place [m], whoſoever, דזכי, overcomes a king, they caſt him into an empty ditch; where the gloſs upon it is, נוצח, he that overcomes a king by words, that is, by diſputing with him, which is a diſgrace to a king. So the word is uſed in the Syriac language in John xvi. 33. Luke xi. 22. Rom. xii. 21. Heb. xi. 33. 1 John ii. 13, 14. and iv. 4. and v. 4. Moreover, the ſenſe is the ſame, be it rendered either way; for as a man, when he overcomes his adverſary, and carries his point againſt him, is clear of his charges and cavils, ſo God, when he overcomes in judgment, is clear of the imputations of wicked men. Another difference in the citation is, that what in the pſalm is rendered when thou judgeſt, is by the Apoſtle, when thou art judged: the word, which is uſed by the Pſalmiſt, בשפטך, may be rendered either way; either when thou judgeſt, as a word of the ſame form is rendered, when thou ſpeakeſt, in the ſame verſe; or when any one judges of thee, or when thou art judged; a like inſtance is in Pſ. xlvi. 2. and ſo it is rendered by the Septuagint, and followed by the Apoſtle; tho' the word he uſes may be conſidered in the middle voice, and may have an active ſignification in it; and the phraſe, εν τω κρινεσθαι σε, may be rendered, when thou judgeſt, and then both agree.

Ver. 5. But if our unrighteouſneſs commend the righteouſneſs of God, &c.] Hence it appears, that the unrighteouſneſs of men commends the righteouſneſs, or faithfulneſs of God; and yet all unrighteouſneſs is ſin; the wrath of God is revealed againſt it; and would exclude from heaven, were it not for pardon through the blood of Chriſt; and beſides, the one is contrary to the other, and of itſelf, of its own nature, cannot influence and affect the other: wherefore this can only be underſtood of the manifeſtation and illuſtration of the righteouſneſs of God by it; which is diſcovered and commended, in puniſhing the unrighteouſneſs of men; in ſetting forth Chriſt to be a propitiation for ſin; and in fulfilling his promiſes, notwithſtanding the failings of his people, of which the caſe of David is a pregnant proof; juſt as the love of God is illuſtrated and commended, by the conſideration of the ſins of men, for whom Chriſt died, and his grace and mercy in the converſion of them: but if this be true, what ſhall we ſay? ſhall we allow the following queſtion to be put? this anſwers to, מאי איכא למימר, what is there to ſay, or to be ſaid; a way of ſpeaking, often uſed by the Talmudiſts[n]: is God unrighteous, who taketh vengeance? if the premiſes are true, this is a juſt conſequence of them; whereas God does take vengeance on men for their unrighteouſneſs, both here and hereafter, it muſt be a piece of unrighteouſneſs in him ſo to do; ſince that for which he takes vengeance on them, commends his own righteouſneſs; but that you may know as well by what follows, that this is not an inference of his own, but another's, he adds, I ſpeak as a man; כלשון בני אדם, according to the language of the children of men, a phraſe often uſed by the Jewiſh doctors[o]. The Apoſtle did not ſpeak the ſentiments of his own mind, he perſonated another man, and ſpoke in the language of an adverſary.

Ver. 6. God forbid, for then how ſhall God judge the world?] חלילה, far be it; ſuch a notion is deteſtable and abominable, nor can it be fairly deduced from what is aſſerted; for 'tis the unrighteouſneſs of his own people, on whom he takes no vengeance perſonally, and not the unrighteouſneſs of others, on whom he does take vengeance, which commends his righteouſneſs; and ſuppoſing it was that of others, God cannot be unrighteous in performing his threatenings, in a way of righteouſneſs: moreover, unrighteouſneſs is ſin, and does not of itſelf, but by accident, illuſtrate the righteouſneſs of God; wherefore God is not unjuſt, in puniſhing it; for how ſhould God judge the world? whereas nothing is more certain, than that he will do it, and that this will be done in righteouſneſs; which could not be, was he unrighteous in taking vengeance; which will be one conſiderable part of that righteous judgment.

Ver. 7. For if the truth of God, &c.] The truth of God, is the ſame with the righteouſneſs of God, ver. 5. and means his faithfulneſs; of which it is hypothetically ſaid, it hath more abounded; or has been more illuſtrated, through my lie to his glory: nothing is more oppoſite to truth, than a lie; a lie can never of itſelf be of any advantage to truth, or to the God of truth; nothing is more contrary to the nature of God, and more abominable to him; a lie is of the devil, and puniſhable with eternal death; wherefore it may ſeem ſtrange, that the truth of God ſhould abound through it to his glory: now let it be obſerved, that the Apoſtle is not ſpeaking of himſelf, nor of his lie of unbelief, in his ſtate of unregeneracy; but in the perſon of a ſinful man, for every man is a liar, as he ſays, I ſpeak as a man; perſonating a wicked man, who from what was before ſaid, might collect this as the ſenſe of it, that the truth of God is illuſtrated by the lies of men: and ſo much may be owned as the Apoſtle's ſenſe, that the truth of God is commended, illuſtrated, and made to abound, when 'tis aſſerted, that he is true and faithful, and every man is a liar, fallacious, and deceitful; let God be true, and every man a liar: moreover, the truth of God may be allowed to abound through the lies of men, in a comparative ſenſe, the one being ſet againſt the other; and ſo as contraries do, illuſtrate each other: this may be aſſented to, as that ſometimes a lie has been overuled by God, for the accompliſhing of his purpoſes and promiſes, in which his truth and faithfulneſs have been diſplayed, as in the caſes of Jacob and the Egyptian midwives; but then this does not ariſe from its nature and tendency, but from the overuling wiſdom and providence of God, and therefore not to be excuſed hereby from ſin; and conſequently the inference from it is not juſt, that therefore no man can, or ought to be judged as a ſinner; ſince his ſin turns to ſuch account, as to make for the glory of God, which is intimated in the queſtion: why yet am I alſo judged as a ſinner? if this be the caſe, I ought not to be reckoned a ſinner, or to be treated as ſuch here, or judged and condemned as one hereafter; which is a moſt wicked, as well as weak conſequence; for though God is true and faithful to his promiſes, notwithſtanding the ſins of his people, which are as a foil, to ſet off the luſtre of his truth the more, yet their ſins are nevertheleſs ſins, and are taken notice of by him as ſuch, and they are corrected for them; and however God may overule in a providential way, the ſins of others for his glory, this is no excuſe for their ſins, nor will it be an exemption of them from puniſhment. This is the ſenſe of the paſſage; unleſs by the truth of God ſhould be meant, the Goſpel, the word of truth, which is of God; and which through the Apoſtle's lie, as the Jews might call his miniſtration of it, abounded to the glory of God; being ſpread far and near, and made uſeful for the converſion of ſinners, for turning men from darkneſs to light, and from the power of ſatan unto God; and for the planting of churches in the Gentile world, as well as in Judea; which much conduced to the honour of God, and the intereſt of true religion: and then the meaning of the laſt clauſe is, why yet am I alſo judged as a ſinner? why am I accounted and condemned as an heretick? as an apoſtate from the faith? as he was by the Jews, and who are uſed to call hereticks ſinners: ſo the ſinner in Eccl. vii. 26. is thus interpreted[p], אלו המינים, theſe are the hereticks; and elſewhere it[q] is obſerved, that concerning the hereticks it is ſaid, Prov. x. 7. the name of the wicked ſhall rot; and I very much ſuſpect this to be the ſenſe of the word in John ix. 24. we know that this man is a ſinner; an heretick, a man of bad principles; and in ver. 31. now we know that God heareth not ſinners, men of corrupt minds; ſince this character ſtands oppoſed to a worſhipper of the God of Iſrael.

Ver. 8. And not rather, as we be ſlanderouſly reported, &c.] Theſe are the Apoſtle's own words, in anſwer to the objector he perſonated; and it is as if he ſhould ſay, why don't you go on? why do you ſtop here? and not rather ſay, as we are evil ſpoken of, and our doctrine is blaſphemed: and as ſome affirm; ignorantly and audaciouſly enough: that we ſay; and teach: let us do evil that good may come; a ſlander caſt upon the Apoſtle's doctrine of unconditional election, free juſtification, and of God's overuling the ſins of men for good; and is the ſame which is caſt on ours now, and is no ſmall proof of the likeneſs and ſameneſs of doctrines: whoſe damnation is juſt; whoſe judgment would have been right, and their cenſure of our doctrines juſt, had it been true that we held ſuch a principle, taught ſuch a doctrine, or encouraged ſuch a practice: or their condemnation is juſt, for aſperſing our principles and practices in ſo vile a manner; and all ſuch perſons are deſerving of damnation, who teach ſuch things, or practiſe after this ſort.

Ver. 9. What then? are we better than they? &c.] The Apoſtle returns to what he was treating of in the beginning of the chapter, and ſuggeſts, that though the Jew has the advantage of the Gentile, with reſpect to ſome external privileges, yet not with regard to their ſtate and condition Godward, and as in his ſight; are we Jews better than they Gentiles? no, in no wiſe; upon no conſideration whatever, neither as men, nor as Jews; which is directly oppoſite to a notion that people have of themſelves: "in mankind they ſay [r], there are "high degrees, one higher than another, and the "Iſraelites, למעלה מכל מין אדם, are above all "mankind; they are the head, and the nations of "the world are the tail, and are like to a ſerpent, "for they come from the filth of the old ſerpent." Again, they ſay [s], "worthy are the Iſraelites, for "the holy bleſſed God hath given to them holy "ſouls, from an holy place, above all the reſt of "the people, that they may do the commandments, "and delight in the law." And elſewhere [t] it is obſerved on thoſe words, Gen. i. 24. the living creature, or the ſoul of the living creature, by R. Aba; "theſe are the Iſraelites, for they are the children of "the holy bleſſed God, and their holy ſouls come "from him; the ſouls of the reſt of the people, from "what place are they? ſays R. Eleazar, from the "ſide of the left-hand, which is defiled; for they "have polluted ſouls, and therefore they are all de"filed, and defile whoever comes nigh them:" but they are no better, eſpecially with regard to their eſtate by nature: for we have before proved; in the preceding chapters, by full inſtances to a demonſtration; and if that can't be thought ſufficient, he goes on to give more proof in the following verſes: that both Jews and Gentiles are under ſin; under the power and guilt of ſin, and a ſentence of condemnation for it; which is equally true of the Jews, who were no better than the Gentiles, for being Abraham's ſeed, for being circumciſed, for having the ceremonial law, and other outward privileges; for they were equally born in ſin, and by practice ſinners, as the Gentiles: and this is true of God's elect in all nations, who are no better by nature, by birth, than others; as deſerving of the wrath of God as the reſt; no better in their tempers and diſpoſitions, or in the endowments of their minds, or outward circumſtances of life; nor better qualified to receive and improve the grace of God beſtowed on them, than others.

Ver. 10. As it is written, there is none righteous, no, not one.] The ſeveral paſſages cited here, and in ſome following verſes, are taken out of the Pſalms and Iſaiah; and are brought to prove, not only that the Jews are no better than the Gentiles, being equally corrupt and depraved as they; but alſo to ſhew the corrupt ſtate and condition of mankind in general: and the words are not always literally expreſſed, but the ſenſe is attended to, as in this paſſage; for in the original text of Pſal. xiv. 1. it is, there is none that doth good; from whence the Apoſtle rightly infers, there's none righteous; for he that does not do good, is not righteous; and therefore if there's none on earth that does good and does not ſin, there's none righteous upon earth, no, not one ſingle perſon. The Jews allegorizing that paſſage in Gen. xix. 31. there's not a man in the earth to come into us, remark [u] on it thus, "אין איש צדיק בארץ, there's not a righteous man "in the earth; and there's not a man that rules "over his imagination." There's none righteous as Adam was, in a ſtate of innocence; for all have ſinned, and are filled with unrighteouſneſs, and are enemies to righteouſneſs; none are righteous by their obedience to the law of works; nor are there any righteous in the ſight of God, upon the foot of their own righteouſneſs, however they may appear in their own eyes, and in the ſight of others; nor are any inherently righteous, for there's none without ſin, ſanctification is imperfect; nor is it either in whole or in part, a ſaint's juſtifying righteouſneſs; indeed there's none righteous, no, not one, but thoſe who are juſtified by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them.

Ver. 11. There's none that underſtandeth, &c.] This is rightly concluded, from what the Pſalmiſt ſays, Pſal. xiv. 2. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, on all the children of men, Jews and Gentiles, to ſee if there were any that did underſtand; and it appears, upon this ſurvey of them, there was not one underſtanding perſon among them: man thinks himſelf a very wiſe and underſtanding creature, though he's born a very ignorant one: true indeed, he has not loſt by ſin, the natural faculty of the underſtanding, ſo as to become like the horſe and mule, which are without any; and it muſt be allowed, that natural men have ſome underſtanding of things natural, civil, and moral; though there's none that underſtands even theſe, as Adam did: but then they have no underſtanding of things ſpiritual; no ſpiritual knowledge of God; no true ſenſe of themſelves, their ſin and miſery; nor do they truly know the way of ſalvation by Chriſt; nor have they any experience of the work of the Spirit of God upon their ſouls; nor any experimental knowledge of the doctrines of the Goſpel: no man can underſtand theſe of himſelf, by the mere ſtrength of reaſon, and light of nature; nor can even a ſpiritual man fully underſtand them in this life: in conſequence of this account and character of men it follows, that there is none that ſeeketh after God; that worſhips him in ſpirit and in truth, or prays to him with the Spirit, and with the underſtanding; who ſeek him chiefly, and in the firſt place, with their whole hearts, earneſtly, diligently, and conſtantly; who ſeek him in Chriſt, and under the aſſiſtance of the Spirit; who ſeek after the knowledge of God in Chriſt, communion with him through the mediator, or his honour and glory.

Ver. 12. They are all gone out of the way, &c.] In Pſal. xiv. 3. 'tis ſaid, they are all gone aſide; as perſons in debt: man had a conſiderable ſtock of righteouſneſs, holineſs, knowledge, &c. but he has run through all, has contracted large and numerous debts, has been obliged to hide himſelf, has been uſed as a bankrupt, and turned out of houſe and home: Chriſt indeed has undertook to pay, and he has paid all the debts of his people; and has put them into a better ſtate, than ever Adam was in: in Pſal. liii. 3. 'tis rendered, every one of them is gone back; that is, from God; from his commands, and from their former ſtate and condition: here the phraſe is rendered by the Apoſtle, they are all gone out of the way; that is, out of the way of God and his precepts, out of the way of holineſs and righteouſneſs, of light and life; into their own ways, the ways of ſin, ſatan, and the world, of darkneſs, and of death: ſo Aben Ezra explains it, out of the right way; Kimchi and Ben Melech paraphraſe it, out of the good way: and ſo they are together become unprofitable; the word, נאלחו, in Pſal. xiv. 3. and liii. 3. is tranſlated, they are become filthy; which R. Aben Ezra interprets by, נשחתו, they are corrupt; and R. Solomon Jarchi by, נשפכו לקלקול, they are turned to corruption; the metaphor is taken from ſtinking fleſh, which is tainted and corrupted, and ſo good for nothing, hence here rendered unprofitable; for ſo man being corrupted by ſin, is of no uſe, ſervice, and advantage to God, to men, or to themſelves; but on the contrary, nauſeous to God, and to all that are good, and hurtful to themſelves and others: for there's none that does good, no, not one; and therefore muſt be unprofitable. There's none that can do good in a ſpiritual manner, without the grace of God, ſtrength from Chriſt, and the aſſiſtance of the Spirit; and there is not even a ſpiritual man, that can do good perfectly, and without ſin.

Ver. 13. Their throat is an open ſepulchre, &c.] The ſeveral vices of the inſtruments of ſpeech, are here, and in the following verſe expoſed: the throat is ſaid to be an open ſepulchre, as in Pſal. v. 9. ſo called, for its voracity and unſatiableneſs; both as an inſtrument of ſpeech, for the words of the wicked are devouring ones; and as an inſtrument of ſwallowing, and ſo may denote the ſinner's eager deſire after ſin, the delight and pleaſure he takes in it, the abundance of it he takes in, and his inſatiable greedineſs for it; likewiſe for its filthy ſtench, the communication of evil men being corrupt; and becauſe, as by an open grave, perſons may fall unawares to their hurt, ſo the evil communications of wicked men, as they corrupt good manners, are dangerous and hurtful: R. Aben Ezra explains it by, אסון מיד, immediate deſtruction, or ſudden death: with their tongues they have uſed deceit; which may deſign the ſin of flattery, for the words in Pſal. v. 9. the place referred to are, they flatter with their tongue; either God or men, themſelves or others, their princes or their neighbour; for there are flatterers in things ſacred and civil, there are ſelf-flatterers, court-flatterers, and flattering preachers, and all abominable and miſchievous; or the phraſe may deſign the ſin of lying, either politically, officiouſly, perniciouſly, and religiouſly; and in this latter way, either with reſpect to doctrine or practice: the poiſon of aſps is under their lips; or as in Pſal. cxl. 3. adders poiſon is under their lips. The aſp is but a ſmall creature, and ſo is the tongue, James iii. 5. but there's a world of miſchief in it, ſignified by poiſon; which as that, is latent and ſecret, is under it; and as that ſtupifies and kills inſenſibly, ſo an evil tongue does, and that in a deadly and incurable manner: oftentimes the Jews ſpeak of the evil imagination, or corruption of nature entering into perſons, and operating in them, כארס בכעוס, as poiſon in an angry ſerpent [w].

Ver. 14. Whoſe mouth is full of curſing and bitterneſs.] Theſe words are taken from Pſal. x. 7. by curſing is meant, curſing of God, which is ſometimes internal with the heart, and ſometimes external with the mouth, as here; and of all good men, though without cauſe, and to no purpoſe with reſpect to the perſons they curſe, ſince God has bleſſed them, and they are bleſſed, and greatly to their own detriment, for in the iſſue, their curſes will be turned againſt themſelves. There is alſo a curſing of ſuperiors, as parents, maſters, magiſtrates, kings, and governours; which is a ſore evil, and attended with bad conſequences; likewiſe of themſelves, and their fellow creatures: and the mouth being full of it, denotes the frequency of the ſin; ſcarce any thing elſe comes out of it but curſing; which diſcovers the ſad corruption of the heart; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth ſpeaketh. By bitterneſs is meant, either ſin in general, which is an evil and bitter thing, in its nature and effects; or ſinful words, ſuch as oaths, curſes, imprecations, all wrathful and deceitful words.

Ver. 15. Their feet are ſwift to ſhed blood.] The ſins of the heart and mouth are before deſcribed, and now the ſins of action are taken notice of; for the feet are the inſtruments of motion and action: and when theſe are ſaid to be ſwift to ſhed blood, it denotes the readineſs and eagerneſs of men, to murder innocent creatures; which ſhows the dreadful malice and hatred that is in them. The words are cited from Iſa. lix. 7. and ſeem to point at the times of Menaſſeh, who ſhed ſo much innocent blood, as to fill Jeruſalem with it from one end to the other.

Ver. 16. Deſtruction and miſery are in their ways.] This paſſage alſo is to be found in Iſa. lix. 7. and may be underſtood either actively thus; all the ways they take, and methods they purſue are, to make their fellow-creatures miſerable, to ruin and deſtroy them; or paſſively, that by their ſinful ways and vicious courſe of life, they themſelves are brought to deſtruction and miſery: the way they are walking in is, the broad way, that leadeth to deſtruction; the end of it, what it iſſues in, is eternal death, the deſtruction of the body and ſoul in hell, which will be attended with endleſs and inexpreſſible miſery.

Ver. 17. And the way of peace have they not known.] This is a citation from Iſa. lix. 8. and expreſſes the ignorance of mankind, with regard to true peace, and the way unto it: men are naturally ignorant of the way of peace with God; of the firſt ſtep which God took towards it; of the council and covenant of peace, in which the ſcheme of it was drawn, and the method fixed; of Chriſt the peace-maker, and of the way in which he has made it; and of the Goſpel, which reveals and publiſhes it. They are ignorant of the true way of enjoying peace of conſcience; they have no true peace of mind, their conſciences are often tortured; and though they may have a ſtupid and ſecure peace, yet nothing that is true, real, and ſolid; for they are without the Spirit, whoſe fruit is peace; and without faith in Chriſt, by which true peace only is enjoyed; nor are they ſpiritually minded, which is life and peace; nor have they any knowledge of the way to have it; they are ready to think it muſt be had by doing ſomething of their own, and not that it is to be had only in Chriſt, in his blood and righteouſneſs. They are ignorant of the paths of wiſdom, which are peace; peace is enjoyed in them, they lead unto it, and iſſue in it: they know not the way to eternal peace; they imagine ſomething done by the creature, is the way; and are ignorant that Chriſt is the only way of ſalvation, the true way to eternal life, everlaſting peace and happineſs: yea, they know not the way of peace among men, and one another; nor will they do that which is juſt and right, in order to ſupport and maintain it, but are unjuſt, deceitful, and quarrelſome; they don't ſtudy peace, but rather contention, which they like and approve of. The Jews talk [x] much of their good nature, affability, and condeſcenſion, and of their doing this and that, and the other thing, מפני דרכי שלום, becauſe of the ways of peace.

Ver. 18. There is no fear of God before their eyes.] The place referred to, is Pſal. xxxvi. 1. by the fear of God, is not meant a fear of God's wrath, of hell and damnation; nor a fearful diſtruſt of his preſence, power, providence, and grace; much leſs an hypocritical fear; but a reverential affection for God, and which is peculiar to the children of God, which ſprings from a ſenſe of divine goodneſs, is attended with holineſs of heart and life, is conſiſtent with faith, even full aſſurance of it, and with ſpiritual joy in its higheſt degree; it ſtands oppoſed to pride and haughtineſs, and is a bleſſing of the covenant of grace: now this is not to be found in unregenerate men, for this ſprings from grace, and not nature, and is only implanted in the heart in converſion; it appears from the whole life and converſation of unconverted men, that the fear of God is not in their hearts, nor before their eyes.

Ver. 19. Now we know that what things ſoever the law ſaith, &c.] By the law is meant, not the law of nature, nor the civil law of nations, nor the ceremonial law of the Jews, nor barely the five books of Moſes, nor the book of Pſalms, of the prophets, or the writings of the whole Old Teſtament; but the moral law, as it appears in the whole word of God, which every man is bound to obſerve, of which all are tranſgreſſors, by which is the knowledge of ſin, which no man can be juſtified by, and which Chriſt was made under, and came to fulfil. This law is repreſented as a perſon ſpeaking, and ſaying many things, ſome of which are here mentioned; ſo, אמרה תורה, the law ſays ſo and ſo, is an uſual phraſe with Jewiſh writers[y]. The perſons it ſpeaks to, are them that are under the law; the Jews were in a peculiar ſenſe under it, as it was given to them by Moſes; all mankind are under it, as to the matter of it; they are under obligation to obedience to it, and through diſobedience, come under its ſentence of condemnation. The elect of God themſelves were, and are in ſome ſenſe under it; not indeed as a covenant of works, or as in the hands of Moſes, nor as a yoke of bondage; nor are they obliged to ſeek for juſtification by it, and are entirely delivered from the curſe and condemnation of it by Chriſt. They were under it, and that as a covenant of works, as in Adam the federal head, and repreſentative of all mankind; and came under its ſentence of condemnation and death, for his ſin, and their own actual tranſgreſſions; which is conſiſtent with the everlaſting love of God to them in Chriſt, the covenant of grace made with them in him, as their head and ſurety, and their juſtification by him: and they are now under it, as in the hands of Chriſt; and look upon themſelves as obliged, by the love of Chriſt, to yield a chearful obedience to it: here it means ſuch as are tranſgreſſors of the law, and ſo under obligation to puniſhment, without any regard to Jew or Gentile, or any diſtinction God has made in his own breaſt: and the things it ſays to ſuch are, it charges them with ſin, and convicts them of it, both of its pollution and guilt: ſo that every mouth may be ſtopped; and have nothing to ſay of the purity of their nature, which appears to be ſo ſadly ſtained; nor of their works of righteouſneſs, which are ſo few, and ſo very imperfect. The law makes ſuch a repreſentation of things to them, that their mouths are ſtopped from glorying in themſelves, and in their works, which are far from being adequate to the demands of the law; and from complaining againſt the righteous judgment of God, ſhould he proceed againſt them in the moſt rigorous manner: and all the world may become guilty before God; Jews and Gentiles; all the individuals of mankind are guilty before God, and will be found to be ſo, ſooner or later: ſome read it, ſubject to God, and underſtand it of a ſubjection to his grace, being brought to ſee their need of it, and of ſalvation by it; but this is not the caſe of all the world, rather ὑπόδικος, ſignifies a ſubjection to that juſtice, vengeance, and wrath of God, to which all men are liable in their own perſons; ſince they are all found guilty by the law, and will appear to be ſo, and therefore can never be juſtified by their obedience to it; which is what the Apoſtle is aiming at in all he here ſays, as appears from what follows; all which we know to be true, and are fully aſſured of, who know the nature and ſpirituality of the law, and to whom it has come with light and power.

Ver. 20. Therefore by the deeds of the law, &c.] Hence it moſt clearly appears, that there can be no juſtification before God by the law, ſince it ſtops the mouths of men, and pronounces them guilty: by the deeds of the law are meant, works done in obedience to it, as performed by ſinful men, which are very imperfect; not as performed by Adam in innocence, or by Chriſt in our nature, whoſe works were perfect; but as performed by ſinful men, and of themſelves, and not as performed in and by Chriſt for them, who is the fulfilling end of the law for righteouſneſs to all believers: now by ſuch works as theſe, whether wrought before or after converſion, with or without the ſtrength and grace of Chriſt, there ſhall no fleſh be juſtified in his ſight; that is, no one perſon: fleſh deſigns men, and men as corrupt and carnal, in oppoſition to God, who is a ſpirit pure and holy; and may have reſpect to the vain opinion of Jews and Gentiles, who were vainly puffed up in their fleſhly mind; the one on account of their wiſdom and learning, the other on account of their righteouſneſs; and includes all the individuals of human nature: the word juſtified, does not ſignify being made righteous by the infuſion of a righteouſneſs, for the infuſion of a righteouſneſs, or holineſs, is ſanctification, which is a work of the Spirit of God, is internal, and imperfect, and ſo not juſtifying; but it is a forenſic word, or law-term, and ſtands oppoſed to a being condemned; and ſignifies to be acquitted, diſcharged, and made righteous in a law ſenſe, which can never be done by an imperfect obedience to the law: men may be juſtified hereby in their own ſight, and in the ſight of others, but not in his ſight; in the ſight of God, who is omniſcient, and ſees not as man ſeeth; who is pure, holy, and righteous, and whoſe judgment is according to truth: this is ſaid in direct contradiction to the Jews[z], who ſay, "a man is "not juſtified for ever, but by the words of the "law:" but in his ſight none can be juſtified, but by the perfect obedience and righteouſneſs of Chriſt. The reaſon for it is, for by the law is the knowledge of ſin; it diſcovers to a man, by the light of the Spirit of God, and as under his influence, and attended with his power, the ſins both of his heart and life; and ſo he is convinced by it as a tranſgreſſor, and finds himſelf guilty, and liable to condemnation and death; wherefore he can never hope for, and expect juſtification by it. The Jews aſcribe ſuch an uſe as this to the law, which they ſuppoſe it performs in a very gentle manner; "he "that riſes in the night, ſay they[a], and ſtudies in "the law, אורייתא קא מודעא ליה חוביה, the "law makes known to him his ſin, but not in "a way of judgment, but as a mother makes " known to her ſon in tender language:" but this is generally done in a rougher way, for the law works wrath.

Ver. 21. But now the righteouſneſs of God, &c.] The Apoſtle having proved that all men are unrighteous, and that no man can be juſtified in the ſight of God by his obedience, either to the law of nature or of Moſes, proceeds to give an account of that righteouſneſs, which does juſtify before God; and ſo returns to his former ſubject, ch. i. 17. concerning the righteouſneſs of God, the revelation of which he makes to be peculiar to the Goſpel, as he does here; ſince he ſays, that it without the law is manifeſted: meaning, either that this righteouſneſs is without the law, and the deeds of it, as performed by ſinful men; or that the manifeſtation of it, is without the law, either of nature or of Moſes; for the law diſcovers ſin, but not a righteouſneſs which juſtifies from ſin; it ſhows what righteouſneſs is, but does not direct the ſinner where there is one to be had, that will make him righteous in the ſight of God; this is made known without the law, and only in the Goſpel: being witneſſed by the law and the prophets; a teſtimony is born to the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt, both by the law, particularly in the five books of Moſes; which teſtify of Chriſt, of his obedience, ſufferings, and death, by which he brought in life and righteouſneſs; ſee Gen. iii. 15. compared with Dan. ix. 24. and Gen. xv. 6. with Rom. iv. 9, 10, 22, 23, 24, 25. and Gen. xxii. 18. with Gal. iii. 8, 9, 14. and Deut. xxx. 11—14. with Rom. x. 5—10. And the prophets; Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, and others; ſee Iſa. xlii. 21. and xlv. 24, 25. and xlvi. 12, 13. and li. 5, 6, 8. and liii. 11. Jer. xxiii. 6. Dan. ix. 24.

Ver. 22. Even the righteouſneſs of God which is by faith of Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] A further account is given of this righteouſneſs; why it is called the righteouſneſs of God, and in what ſenſe revealed and manifeſted, ſee the note on Rom. i. 17. Here it is ſaid to be by faith of Jeſus Chriſt; not by that faith which Chriſt himſelf had as man, but by that faith, of which he is the author and object: the Alexandrian copy reads, by faith in Chriſt Jeſus; and not by that as the cauſe of juſtification; for faith is neither the efficient, nor the moving, nor meritorious cauſe of it; no, nor the inſtrumental cauſe of it on the part of God or Chriſt: nor is faith the matter of a juſtifying righteouſneſs; for faith is a part of ſanctification, is itſelf imperfect, is a man's own, as it is implanted in him, and exerciſed by him; is here and elſewhere diſtinguiſhed from righteouſneſs; ſomething elſe, and not that, as the obedience and blood of Chriſt, are ſaid to be, what men are made righteous and juſtified by: but faith is a means of apprehending and receiving righteouſneſs; it views the excellency of Chriſt's righteouſneſs; it owns the ſufficiency of it; the ſoul by it renounces its own righteouſneſs, ſubmits to Chriſt's, rejoices in it, and gives him the glory of it: now this is by, or through faith, unto all, and upon all; not all men, for all have not faith, nor are all juſtified and ſaved: but all that believe; which muſt be underſtood, not of believing any thing, nor of any ſort of believing; but of ſuch, who truly and with the heart believe in Chriſt for ſalvation; and who are here oppoſed to the wiſe philoſophers among the Gentiles, and to all ſelf-righteous perſons among the Jews. Though this character does not deſign any cauſe or condition of juſtification, but is only deſcriptive of the perſons, who are declaratively intereſted in a juſtifying righteouſneſs, which is ſaid to be unto, and upon them; that is, it is appointed, provided, and wrought out for them, and is directed and applied unto them, and put upon them as a garment, and that upon all of them: for there is no difference; of nation, age, or ſex, or of ſtate and condition; no reſpect is had to perſons or works; nor is there any difference with reſpect to weak or ſtrong believers; the righteouſneſs is equally applied to one as to another, and one is as much juſtified by it in the ſight of God as another.

Ver. 23. For all have ſinned, &c.] This is the general character of all mankind; all have ſinned in Adam, are guilty by his ſin, polluted with it, and condemned for it; all are ſinners in themſelves, and by their own actual tranſgreſſions; this is the caſe of the whole world, and of all the men in it; not only of the Gentiles, but of the Jews, and the more righteous among them: hence there is no difference in the ſtate and condition of men by nature; nor is there any reaſon from and in themſelves, why God ſaves one and not another; nor any room to deſpair of the grace and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, on account of perſons being in their own view, the worſt of ſinners: and hence it is, that they are all come ſhort of the glory of God; either of glorifying of God; man was made for this purpoſe, and was capable of it, though now through ſin incapable; and 'tis only by the grace of God, that he is enabled to do it: or of glorying before him; ſin has made him infamous, and is his ſhame; by it he has forfeited all external favours, and has nothing of his own to glory in; his moral righteouſneſs is no foundation for boaſting, eſpecially before God: or of having glory from God; the moſt pure and perfect creature, does not of itſelf deſerve any glory and praiſe from God; good men in a way of grace, will have praiſe of God; but ſinners can never expect any on their own account: or of the glorious grace of God, as ſanctifying and pardoning grace, and particularly the grace of a juſtifying righteouſneſs; man has no righteouſneſs, nor can he work out one; nor will his own avail, he wants a better than that: or of eternal glory; which may be called the glory of God, becauſe it is of his preparing, what he calls perſons to by his grace, and which of his own free-grace he beſtows upon them; and will chiefly lie in the enjoyment of him; now this is repreſented ſometimes as a prize, which is run for, and preſſed after; but men through ſinning, come ſhort of it, and muſt of themſelves do ſo for ever: or rather of the image of God in man, who is called the image and glory of God, 1 Cor. xi. 7. which conſiſted externally, in government over the creatures; internally, in righteouſneſs and holineſs, in wiſdom and knowledge, in the biaſs of his mind to that which is good, and in power to perform it; of all which he is come ſhort, or deprived by ſinning.

Ver. 24. Being juſtified freely by his grace, &c.] The matter of juſtification is before expreſſed, and the perſons that ſhare in this bleſſing are deſcribed; here the ſeveral cauſes of it are mentioned. The moving cauſe of it, is the free grace of God; for by the grace of God here, is not meant the Goſpel, or what ſome men call the terms of the Goſpel, and the conſtitution of it; nor the grace of God infuſed into the heart; but the free love and favour of God, as it is in his heart; which is wonderfully diſplayed, in the buſineſs of a ſinner's juſtification before him: it appears, in his reſolving upon the juſtification of his choſen ones in Chriſt; in fixing on the method of doing it; in ſetting forth and pre-ordaining Chriſt to be the ranſom; in calling Chriſt to engage herein; in Chriſt's engaging as a ſurety for his people, and in the Father's ſending him to bring in everlaſting righteouſneſs; in Chriſt's coming to do it, and in the gracious manner in which he wrought it out; in the Father's gracious acceptation, imputation, and donation of it; in the free gift of the grace of faith, to apprehend and receive it; and in the perſons that partake of it, who are of themſelves ſinners and ungodly. The meritorious cauſe of juſtification is, the redemption that is in Jeſus Chriſt: redemption ſuppoſes a former ſtate of captivity to ſin, ſatan, and the law, in which God's elect were by nature, and is a deliverance from it; it is of a ſpiritual nature, chiefly reſpects the ſoul, and is plenteous, compleat, and eternal: this is in and by Chriſt; he was called unto it, was ſent to effect it, had a right unto it, as being the near kinſman; and was every way fit for it, being both God and man; and has by his ſufferings and death, obtained it: now as all the bleſſings of grace come through redemption by Chriſt, ſo does this of juſtification, and after this manner; Chriſt, as a redeemer, had the ſins of his people laid on him, and they were bore by him, and took away; the ſentence of the law's condemnation was executed on him, as ſtanding in their law-place and ſtead; and ſatisfaction was made by him for all offences committed by them, which was neceſſary, that God might appear to be juſt, in juſtifying all them that believe: nor is this any objection or contradiction to the free-grace of God, in a ſinner's juſtification; ſince it was grace in God to provide, ſend, and part with his Son as a Redeemer, and to work out righteouſneſs; it was grace in Chriſt, to come and give himſelf a ſacrifice, and obtain ſalvation and righteouſneſs, not for angels, but for men, and for ſome of them, and not all; and whatever this righteouſneſs, ſalvation, and redemption coſt Chriſt, they are all free to men.

Ver. 25. Whom God hath ſet forth to be a propitiation, &c.] Redemption by Chriſt is here further explained, by his being a propitiation; which word may deſign either Chriſt the propitiator, the author of peace and reconciliation; or the propitiatory ſacrifice, by which he is ſo; and both in alluſion to the mercy-ſeat, which was a type of him as ſuch. The Apoſtle here uſes the ſame word, which the Septuagint often render, כפרת, the mercy-ſeat by; and Philo the Jew calls it by the ſame name, and ſays it was a ſymbol, της ἱλεω τȣ θεȣ δυναμεως, of the propitious power of God[b]. Chriſt is the propitiation to God for ſin; which muſt be underſtood of his making ſatisfaction to divine juſtice, for the ſins of his people; theſe were imputed to him, and being found on him, the law and juſtice of God, made demands on him for them; which he anſwered to ſatisfaction, by his obedience and ſacrifice; and which as it could not be done by any other, nor in any other way, is expreſſed by reconciliation, and atonement: whence God may be ſaid to be pacified, or made propitious; not but that he always loved his people, and never hated them; nor is there, nor can there be any change in God, from hatred to love, any more than from love to hatred; Chriſt has not by his ſacrifice and death, procured the love and favour of God, but has removed the obſtructions which lay in the way, of love's appearing and breaking forth; there was a law broken, and juſtice provoked, which were to be attended to, and Chriſt by his ſacrifice has ſatisfied both; ſo that neither the wrath of God, nor any of the effects of it, can fall upon the perſons Chriſt is the propitiation for, even according to juſtice itſelf; ſo that it is not love, but juſtice that is made propitious: for this is all owing to the grace and goodneſs of God, who hath ſet him forth, for this intent, in his eternal purpoſes and decrees; in the promiſes of the Old Teſtament, in the types, ſhadows, and ſacrifices of the old law; by the exhibition of him in our nature, and in the miniſtration of the Goſpel; and this is ſaid to be through faith in his blood. The blood of Chriſt is that, by which Chriſt is the propitiation; for without the ſhedding of that blood, there's no redemption, no peace, no reconciliation, or remiſſion of ſin; and faith in his blood, is the means by which perſons become partakers of the benefits of his propitiation; ſuch as peace, pardon, atonement, juſtification, and adoption: and the end of Chriſt's being ſet forth as a propitiation, on the part of God's people is, for the remiſſion of ſins that are paſt, through the forbearance of God: by ſins that are paſt, are meant, not ſins before baptiſm, nor the ſins of a man's life only, but the ſins of Old Teſtament ſaints, who lived before the incarnation of Chriſt, and the oblation of his ſacrifice; and though this is not to be reſtrained to them only, for Chriſt's blood was ſhed for the remiſſion of all his people's ſins, paſt, preſent, and to come; yet the ſins of the ſaints before the coming of Chriſt, ſeem to be particularly deſigned; which ſhews the inſufficiency of legal ſacrifices, ſets forth the efficacy of Chriſt's blood and ſacrifice, demonſtrates him to be a perfect Saviour, and gives us reaſon under the preſent diſpenſation, to hope for pardon, ſince reconciliation is compleatly made: remiſſion of ſin, does not deſign that weakneſs which ſin has brought upon, and left in human nature, whereby it is ſo enfeebled, that it cannot help itſelf, and therefore Chriſt was ſet forth, and ſent forth, to be a propitiation; but rather God's paſſing by, or overlooking ſin, and not puniſhing for it, under the former diſpenſation; or elſe the forgiveneſs of it now, and redemption from it by the blood of Chriſt, through the forbearance of God; in deferring the execution of juſtice, till he ſent his Son, and in expecting the ſatisfaction of his Son; which ſhews the grace and goodneſs of God to his people, and the truſt and confidence he put in his Son: the other end on the part of God, in ſetting forth Chriſt to be a propitiation, was to declare his righteouſneſs; meaning either the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which was before hid, but now manifeſted; or rather the righteouſneſs of God the Father, his faithfulneſs in his promiſes relating to Chriſt, his grace and goodneſs in the miſſion of his Son, the holineſs and purity of his nature, and his vindictive juſtice, in avenging ſin in his own Son, as the ſurety of his people: the execution of this was threatened from the beginning; the types and ſacrifices of the old law prefigured it; the propheſies of the Old Teſtament expreſs it; and the ſufferings and death of Chriſt openly declare it, ſince God ſpared not his own Son, but ſheathed the ſword of juſtice in him.

Ver. 26. To declare, I ſay, at this time, his righteouſneſs, &c.] This end is further explained, it being to declare the righteouſneſs of God at this time, under the Goſpel diſpenſation; in which there was ſuch a diſplay of the grace, mercy, and goodneſs of God; that he might be juſt; that is, appear to be ſo: God is naturally and eſſentially juſt in himſelf; and he is evidentially ſo in all his works, particularly in redemption by Chriſt; and when and while he is the juſtifier of him that believeth in Jeſus: Jeſus the Saviour, is the object of faith, as he is the Lord our righteouſneſs; the believer in Jeſus is a real, and not a nominal one; God is the juſtifier of ſuch in a declarative way, and God only, tho' not to the excluſion of the Son and Spirit; and which ſentence of juſtification is pronounced by him on the foot of a perfect righteouſneſs, which neither law nor juſtice can find fault with, but entirely approve of; and ſo he appears juſt and righteous, even tho' he juſtifies the ſinner and the ungodly.

Ver. 27. Where is boaſting then? &c.] There's no room nor reaſon for it, either in Jews or Gentiles: not in the Jews, who were very apt to boaſt of their being Abraham's ſeed; of their circumciſion; of their being Iſraelites; of their having and keeping the law; of God being their God; and of their knowledge of him: nor in the Gentiles, who were ready to boaſt of their philoſophy, wiſdom, and learning; of their ſelf-ſufficiency, free-will, and of the things they had in their own power. It is excluded; it is ſhut out of doors; the key is turned upon it; it is not allowed of; it is entirely exploded: by what law? of works? nay; for that eſtabliſhes boaſting when men ſeek life, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation by the works of it, and fancy they ſhall be able to attain them this way: but by the law of faith; not by a law requiring faith; nor as if the Goſpel was a law, a new law, a remedial law, a law of milder terms; but the word law here anſwers to the Hebrew word תורה, which ſignifies any doctrine or inſtruction, and oftentimes the doctrine of the Goſpel, as in Iſ. ii. 3. and xlii. 4. and here particularly the doctrine of a ſinner's juſtification by faith in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; according to which doctrine the moſt unlikely perſons are juſtified, even ungodly perſons, the worſt and vileſt of ſinners; and that without any conſideration of works, by faith only, which is freely given them; and by faith in Chriſt's righteouſneſs only: ſo that there is not the leaſt room for boaſting in the creature, but all their boaſting is in Chriſt, who is made unto them righteouſneſs, and by whom they are juſtified.

Ver. 28. Therefore we conclude, &c.] This is the concluſion from the premiſes, the ſum total of the whole account: that a man is juſtified by faith without the deeds of the law. The ſubject of juſtification is man, not in oppoſition to angels; nor does it deſign the Jew againſt the Gentile, though ſome have ſo thought; but the Apoſtle names neither Jew nor Gentile, but man, to ſhew that Chriſt's righteouſneſs is unto all, and every man, that believes, be he who he will; and is to be underſtood indefinitively, that every man that is juſtified is juſtified by faith. The means is by faith, not habitually or actually conſidered; that is, either as an habit and principle infuſed into us, or as an act performed by us; but either organically, as it is a means of receiving Chriſt's righteouſneſs; or objectively, as it denotes Chriſt the object of it: and all this is done without works, of any ſort; not by a faith which is without works, for ſuch a faith is dead, and of no avail; but by faith without works joined to it, in the affair of juſtification; or by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed by God the Father, without any conſideration of them, and received by faith, and relied upon by the believer, without any regard unto them.

Ver. 29. Is he the God of the Jews only? &c.] The Jews made their boaſt of him as ſuch, and would not allow the Gentiles any intereſt in him: but is he not alſo of the Gentiles? yes, of the Gentiles alſo: God is the God both of Jews and Gentiles; not only as the creator, preſerver, and governour of them, or as he has a right to demand worſhip and ſervice of them, but as he is their covenant God; not by virtue of the covenant of circumciſion, or by the Sinai covenant, but by the covenant of grace; as appears by his loving them in Chriſt, chuſing them in him, putting them into his hands, providing bleſſings of grace for them in him, and ſending his Son to redeem them; by calling them by his grace; by their ſanctification, adoption, pardon, and juſtification; by taking out of them a people for his name with whom he dwells, and of whom he takes care, and will never leave nor forſake: all which may lead us to obſerve the diſtinguiſhing grace of God, the happineſs of our ſtate and condition, and what encouragement we have for faith and hope in God.

Ver. 30. Seeing it is one God, &c.] God is one in nature and eſſence, tho' there are three perſons in the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; whence it appears, that he that is the God of the Jews, is alſo the God of the Gentiles, or there would be more gods than one; and that theſe are juſtified in one and ſame manner, or God muſt be divided; for God, as he is one in nature, ſo he is one in will, in his promiſes, and in the methods of his grace: which ſhall juſtify the circumciſion by faith, and uncircumciſion thro' faith. The objects of juſtification are the circumciſion, the circumciſed Jews, and the uncircumciſion, the uncircumciſed Gentiles; the circumciſion of the one does not forward, and the uncircumciſion of the other does not hinder, nor neither of them effect the grace of juſtification: the juſtifier of them is one and the ſame, who is God; and the matter of their juſtification is the ſame, which is the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and the manner of it, or the means of their comfortable apprehenſion of it, is the ſame; for thoſe phraſes, by faith, and thro' faith, mean one and the ſame thing; ſee Phil. iii. 9.

Ver. 31. Do we then make void the law through faith? &c.] Which queſtion is anſwered by way of deteſtation, God forbid! and by aſſerting the contrary, yea, we eſtabliſh the law. The law is not made void, neither by the grace nor doctrine of faith: not by the grace of faith; for that faith is not right which is not attended with works of righteouſneſs; and thoſe works are not right which don't flow from faith. Such a connexion there is between faith and works; and ſo much do the one depend upon the other. Moreover, none but believers are capable of performing good works aright, and they do them, and they ought to do them: beſides, faith, as a grace, looks to Chriſt, as the end of the law for righteouſneſs, and therefore don't make it void. Nor is it made void by the doctrine of faith, and by the particular doctrine of a ſinner's juſtification by faith in Chriſt's righteouſneſs, which is here more eſpecially intended; for tho' it is made void by it, as to any uſe of it for juſtification by the deeds thereof; yet its uſe in other reſpects is not ſet aſide, ſuch as to inform us of the mind and will of God, to diſcover and convince of ſin, to ſhew believers their deformity and imperfection, to render Chriſt and his righteouſneſs more valuable, and to be a rule of walk and converſation to them; and it ſtill remains a curſing and condemning law to Chriſtleſs ſinners, though juſtified ones are delivered from it as ſuch: yea, the law is ſo far from being made void, that it is eſtabliſhed by this doctrine; for by it the perpetuity of it is aſſerted, the ſpirituality of it is acknowledged, the perfect righteouſneſs of it is ſecured: according to this doctrine all its demands are anſwered; whatever it requires it has, ſuch as holineſs of nature, perfect obedience to its precepts, and its full penalty born: it is placed in the beſt hands, where it will ever remain; and a regard to it is enforced under the beſt influence, by the beſt of motives, and from the beſt of principles. It is indeed aboliſhed as a covenant of works, and in this ſenſe is made void to believers; and it is done away as to the form of adminiſtration of it by Moſes; and it is deſtroyed as a yoke of bondage; and the people of God are free from the malediction of it, and condemnation by it, and ſo from its terror; yet it remains unalterable and unchangeable in the hands of Chriſt; the matter of it is always the ſame, and ever obligatory on believers, who, tho' they are freed from the curſe of it, are not exempted from obedience to it: wherefore the law is not made void, ſo as to be deſtroyed and aboliſhed in every ſenſe, or to be rendered idle, inactive, uſeleſs, and inſignificant; but, on the contrary, is made to ſtand, is placed on a ſure baſis and firm foundation, as the words uſed ſignify.

CHAP. IV.

THE Apoſtle having, in the preceding chapters, proved that there is no juſtification before God by the works of the law, partly from the depraved ſtate and condition that all men are in by nature, both Jews and Gentiles; and partly from the nature of the law itſelf, which diſcovers ſin, arraigns men for it, and convicts of it, and pronounces guilty before God for it; as alſo by ſhewing, that it is by another righteouſneſs, which he deſcribes, that men are juſtified in the ſight of God; proceeds in this to confirm the ſame by an example; and that which he pitches upon, is the moſt appoſite and pertinent he could have thought of, namely, that of Abraham, the father of the Jews, ver. 1. for in whatſoever way he was juſtified, his ſons ſurely could not imagine but it muſt be the right way, nor ſhould they ſeek another: now that Abraham was not juſtified by works, he proves, ver. 2. from an abſurdity following upon it, that he would have juſt reaſon to glory; whereas no man ought to glory before God, but only in the Lord: and by a paſſage of ſcripture, ver. 3. to which he appeals, he makes it clearly appear that he was juſtified by faith, for that ſays, his faith was counted for righteouſneſs. This caſe of accounting any thing to another for righteouſneſs, is illuſtrated by two ſorts of perſons, who have different things accounted to them, and in a different manner; to the worker, the reward is reckoned of debt, and not of grace, ver. 4. but to the believer that works not, his faith, as Abraham's was, is counted for righteouſneſs; whence it follows, that not the worker is juſtified by his works, but the believer by the righteouſneſs of faith; and this is confirmed by a teſtimony of David in Pſ. xxxii. 1, 2. by which the Apoſtle proves the imputation of righteouſneſs without works, in which the happineſs of men conſiſts, ver. 6, 7, 8. and ſhews, that this happineſs does not belong to circumciſed perſons only, but to the uncircumciſed alſo; and therefore is not by circumciſion, but by faith, ver. 9. and which he proves by obſerving the time when faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteouſneſs; not when he was circumciſed, but before, ver. 10. the uſe of which circumciſion to him was to aſſure him, that he ſhould be the father of uncircumciſed Gentiles that believed, to whom righteouſneſs ſhould be imputed, as to him when he was uncircumciſed, ver. 11. who are deſcribed by their imitation of his faith, which he had, and exerciſed before his circumciſion, ver. 12. And this leads on to a freſh argument, proving juſtification to be by faith, and not by the works of the law, ſince the promiſe made to Abraham, and his ſeed, was not thro' the law, but the righteouſneſs of faith; and conſequently both his, and their juſtification, were not by the one, but by the other, ver. 13. or, if otherwiſe, both the faithfulneſs of God, and the faith of his people, would be void, and the promiſe of grace of no effect, ver. 14. And this is ſtill further argued from the effect of the law working wrath, which if juſtification was by it, it would never do, ver. 15. The wiſdom and goodneſs of God in giving faith, and not works a concern in juſtification are obſerved, ver. 16. whereby it appears to be of free-grace, faith only being a recipient, and what gives all the glory to God; and alſo the promiſe of eternal life thro' juſtification by free-grace becomes ſure to all the ſpiritual ſeed; who are diſtributed into two ſorts, the believing Jews under the legal diſpenſation, and the believing Gentiles under the Goſpel-diſpenſation; of both which Abraham was father; which is confirmed by a teſtimony out of Gen. xvii. 4, 5. whoſe faith is deſcribed by the object of it, the omnipotent God that quickens the dead, and calls things that are not, as tho' they were, ver. 17. and by the nature of it, ver. 18. believing in hope againſt hope, reſting on the promiſe of God; and by the ſtrength of it, being not at all weakened by conſidering either his own caſe, or that of his wife's, ver. 19. and was ſo far from being ſtaggered thro' unbelief at theſe things, that it was ſtrong in exerciſe, thereby glorifying God, the object of it, ver. 20. nay, it roſe up to a plerophory, a full aſſurance, ver. 21. being built upon the power of a promiſing God; hence, as before obſerved, his faith was reckoned to him for righteouſneſs, ver. 22. And now in the ſame way that he was juſtified, all his children, his ſpiritual ſeed, are juſtified, whether they be Jews or Gentiles; for what is ſaid concerning the imputation of the righteouſneſs of faith to him, does not concern him only, ver. 23. but all true believers alſo; whoſe faith is deſcribed by the object of it, him that raiſed up Chriſt from the dead, that is, God the Father, ver. 24. who is ſuppoſed hereby to have been dead, and is repreſented as the Lord and Saviour of his people; and of whom a further account is given, ver. 25. as being delivered into the hands of men, of juſtice, and of death, for the ſins of his people, which he took upon him, and bore, and made ſatisfaction for, and as being raiſed again for their juſtification; ſo that this is a benefit owing not to the works of men, but to what Chriſt has done and ſuffered in the room and ſtead of his people; which is what the Apoſtle meant to bring this point unto; the bleſſed effects and conſequences of which he relates in the next chapter.

Ver. 1. What ſhall we ſay then, &c.] The Apoſtle having proved that there is no juſtification by the works of the law; to make this appear more clear and evident to the Jews, he inſtances in the greateſt perſon of their nation, and for whom they had the greateſt value and eſteem, Abraham; who was not only a righteous and good man, but the head of the Jewiſh nation; and, as the Syriac verſion here ſtiles him, רישא דאבהתא, the head, or chief of the fathers; and ſo the Alexandrian copy, our fore-father; and was the firſt of the circumciſion, and is deſcribed here by his relation to the Jews, our father; that is, as pertaining to the fleſh; or according to carnal deſcent, or natural generation and relation; for in a ſpiritual ſenſe, or with reſpect to faith and grace, he was the father of others, even of all that believe, whether Jews or Gentiles: now the queſtion put concerning him is, what he, as pertaining to the fleſh, hath found? for the phraſe, as pertaining to the fleſh, may be connected with the word found; and to find any thing is by ſeeking to obtain, and enjoy it: and the ſenſe of the whole is, did he find out the way of life, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation by the mere dint of carnal reaſon? and did he obtain theſe things by his own ſtrength? or were theſe acquired by his circumciſion in the fleſh, or by any other fleſhly privilege he enjoyed? or was he juſtified before God by any ſervices and performances of his, of whatſoever kind? There is indeed no expreſs anſwer returned; but it is evident from what follows, that the meaning of the Apoſtle is, that it ſhould be underſtood in the negative.

Ver. 2. For if Abraham were juſtified by works, &c.] That Abraham was not, and could not be juſtified by works, is clear from hence, that if this was his caſe, he hath whereof to glory; which will be allowed him before men, on account of his pious life and converſation: but not before God; who ſaw all the iniquity of his heart, and was privy to all his failings and infirmities: beſides, glorying before God in a man's own works, is contrary to the ſcheme and method of God's grace; is excluded by the doctrine of faith; nor is there any place for glorying before God but in Chriſt, and his righteouſneſs: if therefore Abraham had not that of which he could glory before God, he could not be juſtified by works in his ſight: but does not the Apoſtle James ſay that he was juſtified by works? to this it may be replied, that the two Apoſtles, Paul and James, are not ſpeaking of the ſame thing: Paul ſpeaks of juſtification before God, James of juſtification before men; Paul ſpeaks of the juſtification of the perſon, James of the juſtification of a man's cauſe, as the truth of his faith, or the uprightneſs of his conduct; Paul ſpeaks of works, as the cauſes of juſtification, James of them as the effects and evidences of faith; Paul had to do with ſelf-juſtitiaries, who truſted in their own works for juſtification, James with Gnoſticks, who ſlighted and neglected the performance of them. Theſe things conſidered, they will be found to agree.

Ver. 3. For what ſaith the ſcripture? &c.] This anſwers to מאי דכתיב, what is that which is written[c]? or what does the ſcripture ſay? which is a way of ſpeaking uſed by the Jews, when any thing is propoſed, which ſeems contrary to ſcripture, as here juſtification by works does. A teſtimony from ſcripture is here produced, proving that Abraham was juſtified by faith, and not by works: the place referr'd to is Gen. xv. 6. Abraham believed God; the object of his faith and truſt were not his riches, nor his righteouſneſs, but Jehovah, the Son of God, the ſecond perſon in the Trinity, ſtiled in ver. 1. the Word of the Lord, the eſſential Word of God, and called his ſhield, and exceeding great reward; characters which are very applicable to Chriſt: and this faith of his in the Lord was not a mere aſſent to the promiſe of God, but a fiducial act of faith in him; and was not merely concerned with temporal, but with ſpiritual things, and particularly about Chriſt the promiſed ſeed: and it was counted to him for righteouſneſs; the meaning of which is not, that Abraham imputed righteouſneſs to God, or celebrated his righteouſneſs and faithfulneſs, as ſome; or that the world reckoned Abraham a righteous perſon, as others; but that God reckoned him righteous, or imputed it to him for righteouſneſs: and the queſtion is, what the it is which was counted to him for righteouſneſs? and that this is to be underſtood, על האמנה, concerning faith, as R. Solomon Jarchi ſays, is out of queſtion; for this is expreſsly ſaid by the Apoſtle, ver. 9. The only one is, whether it means the grace of faith by which he believed; or the object of faith on which he believed, and with which his faith was converſant: not the former, for that is not righteouſneſs, nor accounted ſo; but is diſtinguiſhed from it, and is that by which a perſon receives and lays hold on righteouſneſs; beſides, whatever may be alledged in favour of the imputation of Abraham's faith to himſelf for righteouſneſs, it can never be thought to be imputed to others on that account; whereas the very ſelf-ſame it is imputed to others alſo; ſee ver. 24. it remains then that it was the promiſed ſeed, the Meſſiah, and his righteouſneſs, which Abraham, by faith, looked unto, and believed in, that was made unto him righteouſneſs by imputation. Now ſince ſo great and good a man as Abraham, was not juſtified by works, but by faith in the righteouſneſs of the Meſſiah, it follows, that none of his ſons, nor any other perſon whatever, ought to ſeek for, or expect to be juſtified in any other way.

Ver. 4. Now to him that worketh, &c.] The Apoſtle illuſtrates the former caſe by two ſorts of perſons in this and the next verſe, who have different things accounted to them, and in a different manner. The one is repreſented as working, the other not. By the worker is meant, not one that works from, and upon principles of grace. The regenerate man is diſpoſed to work for God; the man that has the Spirit of God is capable of working; he that has the grace of Chriſt, and ſtrength from him, can work well; he that believes in Chriſt, works in a right way; he that loves Chriſt, works freely, and from a right principle; and he that has Chriſt's glory in view, works to a right end: but the worker here, is one that works upon nature's principles, and with ſelfiſh views; one that works in the ſtrength of nature, truſting to, and glorying in what he does; ſeeking righteouſneſs by his work, and working for eternal life and ſalvation. Now let it be ſuppoſed, that ſuch a worker not only thinks he does, but if it could be, really does all the works of the law, yields a perfect obedience to it; what is the reward that is, and will be reckoned to him? There's no reward due to the creature's work, tho' ever ſo perfect, ariſing from any deſert or dignity in itſelf: there may be a reward by promiſe and compact; God may promiſe a reward to encourage to obedience, as he does in the law, which is not eternal life; for that is the free gift of God, and is only brought to light in the Goſpel; and tho' heaven is called a reward, yet not of man's obedience, but Chriſt's; but admitting heaven itſelf to be the reward promiſed to the worker, in what manner muſt that be reckoned to him? not of grace; for grace and works can never agree together; for if the reward is reckoned for the man's works, then it is not of grace, otherwiſe work is no more work; and if it is of grace, then not for his works, otherwiſe grace is no more grace; it remains therefore, that if it is reckoned for his works, it muſt be of debt; it muſt be his due, as wages are to an hireling. Now this was not Abraham's caſe, which muſt have been, had he been juſtified by works; he had a reward reckoned to him, and accounted his, which was God himſelf, I am thy ſhield, and exceeding great reward; which muſt be reckoned to him, not of debt, but of grace; wherefore it follows, that he was juſtified, not by works, but by the grace of God imputed to him; that which his faith believed in for righteouſneſs. The diſtinction of a reward of grace, and of debt, was known to the Jews; the one they call'd פרם, the other שכר: the former[d] they ſay is הגמול, a benefit, which is freely of grace beſtowed on an undeſerving perſon, or one he is not obliged to; the other is what is given, בדין, of debt, in ſtrict juſtice.

Ver. 5. But to him that worketh not, &c.] Not that the believer does not work at all, but not from ſuch principles, and with ſuch views as the other; he does not work in order to obtain life and ſalvation; he does not ſeek for juſtification by his doings: but believeth on him that juſtifieth the ungodly; or that ungodly one: particular reference is had to Abraham, who in his ſtate of unregeneracy was an ungodly perſon; as all God's elect are in a ſtate of nature, and are ſuch when God juſtifies them, being without a righteouſneſs of their own; wherefore he imputes the righteouſneſs of another, even that of his own Son unto them: and tho' he juſtifies the ungodly, he does not juſtify their ungodlineſs, but them from it; nor will he, nor does he leave them to live and die in it: now to him that worketh not, that is perfect righteouſneſs; or has no opportunity of working at all; or what he does, he does not do, that he might be juſtified by it; but exerciſes faith on God as juſtifying perſons, who, like himſelf, are ſinners, ungodly and deſtitute of a righteouſneſs: his faith is counted for righteouſneſs; not the act, but the object of it; which was Abraham's caſe, and therefore was not juſtified by works. The Vulgate Latin verſion here adds, according to the purpoſe of the grace of God.

Ver. 6. Even as David alſo deſcribeth the bleſſedneſs of the man, &c.] The Apoſtle having inſtanced in Abraham, the father of the Jewiſh nation, cites ſome paſſages from David, king of Iſrael, a perſon of great note and eſteem among the Jews, in favour of the doctrine he is eſtabliſhing; who in a very proper and lively manner deſcribes the happineſs of ſuch perſons: unto whom God imputeth righteouſneſs without works. This righteouſneſs cannot be the righteouſneſs of the law, or man's obedience to it; for that is a righteouſneſs with works, is a man's own, and not imputed; and indeed is not a righteouſneſs in the ſight of God: nor does man's bleſſedneſs lie in, or come by it; no man is, or can be juſtified by it, nor ſaved by it, or attain to heaven and eternal happineſs by the means of it; but the righteouſneſs here ſpoken of is the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, called the righteouſneſs of God; and is better than that of angels or men; is compleat and perfect; by which the law is honoured, and juſtice is ſatisfied. This is freely beſtowed, and graciouſly imputed by God. Juſt in the ſame way his righteouſneſs becomes ours, as Adam's ſin did, which is by imputation; or in the ſame way that our ſins became Chriſt's, his righteouſneſs becomes ours; and as we have no righteouſneſs of our own when God juſtifies us, this muſt be done by the righteouſneſs of another; and that can be done no other way by the righteouſneſs of another, than by imputing it to us: and which is done without works; not without the works of Chriſt, of which this righteouſneſs conſiſts; but without the works of the creature, or any conſideration of them, which are utterly excluded from juſtification; for if theſe came into account, it would not be of grace, and boaſting would not be removed. Now ſuch who have this righteouſneſs thus imputed to them, are happy perſons; they are juſtified from all ſin, and freed from all condemnation; their perſons and ſervices are acceptable to God; it will be always well with them; they are heirs of glory, and ſhall enjoy it.

Ver. 7. Saying, bleſſed are they, &c.] Theſe words are cited from Pſ. xxxii. 1. and contain the proof of the happineſs of juſtified perſons. In this citation the ſingular number is changed into the plural, to take in all ſorts of men, Jews and Gentiles, and very agreeable to the ſenſe of the original; for the word אשרי, may be rendered, bleſſed are they, or, O the bleſſedneſſes; that is, of every one of them, whoſe iniquities are forgiven, and whoſe ſins are covered: ſuch whom God juſtifies by imputing the righteouſneſs of his Son to them, he removes their iniquities from them, which is meant by their being forgiven, and that as far as the eaſt is from the weſt; he caſts them behind his back, and into the depths of the ſea, ſo that they ſhall never be found more: ſuch whom he clothes with the robe of righteouſneſs, and garments of ſalvation, their ſins are covered; from the eye of divine juſtice, and ſhall never be ſeen more, or be brought againſt them to their condemnation, and therefore muſt be happy perſons. The[e] Jews tell us, that "on the day of atonement ſatan comes "to accuſe Iſrael, and he particularizes their ſins, "and the holy bleſſed God he particularizes their "good works, and takes a pair of balances and "puts their ſins againſt their good works, and "weighs the one againſt the other; and when the "two ſcales of the balances are alike, ſatan goes "to bring in other ſins to over-weigh; what does "the holy bleſſed God do? he takes the ſins out of "the ſcale and hides them, תחת פורפירי שלו, "under his purple garment; and when ſatan comes "and finds no iniquity there, as it is ſaid, the "iniquity of Iſrael ſhall be ſought for, and there ſhall "be none; and when ſatan ſees this, he ſays before "him, Lord of the world, thou haſt taken away the "iniquity of thy people, thou haſt covered all their "ſin, Selah." The purple garment they explain by מלבוש של רחמים שלו, his garment of mercy; which is true of the mercy of God covering the ſins of his people, thro' the purple blood of his Son; which is the purple covering of Chriſt, Cant. iii. 10. under which the ſaints go ſafe to glory, and by which blood their crimſon and ſcarlet ſins are blotted out, ſo as never to be ſeen more.

Ver. 8. Bleſſed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute ſin.] As he does not to thoſe whom he juſtifies in Chriſt, and by his righteouſneſs; for the ſins of ſuch he has imputed to his Son, as their ſurety; and he has bore them, took them away, having made full ſatisfaction for them; ſo that theſe perſons will never be charged with them: they now appear before the throne without fault, and are blameleſs and irreproveable in the ſight of God, and therefore muſt be eternally happy; for he will never think of their ſins any more to their hurt; he'll remember them no more; he will never reckon them to them, but acquit them from them, juſtify and accept them; wherefore they muſt be ſecure from wrath and condemnation, enjoy much peace and comfort now, and be happy hereafter.

[e] Caphtor, fol. 59. 1, 2.

Ver. 9. Cometh this bleſſedneſs then upon the circumciſion only? &c.] That is, upon the circumciſed Jews; are they the only perſons that partake of this happineſs? the word only is rightly ſupplied, and is in the Claromontane exemplar uſed by Beza, and in the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions: or upon the uncircumciſion alſo? upon the uncircumciſed Gentiles; do not they likewiſe ſhare in this bleſſedneſs? for we ſay, that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteouſneſs. The deſign of theſe words with the following, is to prove that the bleſſing of juſtification belongs to Gentiles as well as Jews, and that it is by faith, and not by circumciſion; which is done by obſerving the ſtate and condition Abraham was in when juſtified.

Ver. 10. How was it then reckoned? &c.] The Arabic verſion adds, and when; and the Ethiopic verſion reads it, when was Abraham juſtified? expreſſing the ſenſe, not the words of the original text, with which agree the following queſtions: when he was in circumciſion, or in uncircumciſion? that is, was he juſtified, or his faith reckoned to him for righteouſneſs, when he was a circumciſed, or an uncircumciſed perſon? not in circumciſion; or when he was circumciſed; for when it was ſaid of him, that he believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteouſneſs, he was then uncircumciſed, and remained ſo many years after: for this was before the birth of Iſhmael, and Iſhmael was thirteen years of age when he and his father Abraham were circumciſed; ſo that it muſt be fourteen years, or thereabout, before his circumciſion, that this declaration of his being a juſtified perſon was made; wherefore the Apoſtle rightly adds, but in uncircumciſion; or whilſt an uncircumciſed perſon: hence it clearly appears that circumciſion could not be the cauſe of his juſtification, ſince it followed it; and if Abraham when uncircumciſed was a juſtified perſon, as it is certain he was, why may not uncircumciſed Gentiles be juſtified alſo? and eſpecially when 'tis obſerved, that the covenant made with Abraham when uncircumciſed, included the Gentiles; ſee Gen. xii. 3. and xvii. 4, 5, 6.

Ver. 11. And he received the ſign of circumciſion, &c.] Or the ſign circumciſion, as the Syriac verſion reads it, and ſo the Alexandrian copy, and two of Stephens's; that is, Abraham received at the hands of God, the commandment of circumciſion, which was a ſign or token of the covenant; not of grace, but of that peculiar covenant God made with Abraham and his natural ſeed, concerning their enjoyment of the land of Canaan; and which was a diſtinctive ſign or badge, which diſtinguiſhed the poſterity of Abraham from other people, and was alſo a typical one; not of baptiſm, for circumciſion was peculiar to Abraham's natural ſeed, whereas baptiſm is not, but was adminiſtred to Gentiles as well as Jews; circumciſion was confined to males only, not ſo baptiſm; circumciſion bears no likeneſs to, nor any reſemblance with baptiſm, whereas there is always ſome likeneſs and agreement between the type and the antitype; beſides, if this had been the caſe, circumciſion would have ceaſed when baptiſm took place, whereas it is certain it did not, but continued in full force with the reſt of the ceremonies until the death of Chriſt; and it is as certain, that baptiſm was adminiſtred and continued to be adminiſtred three or four years before that time; which fully demonſtrates the falſhood of that aſſertion, that baptiſm ſucceeds or comes in the room of circumciſion; whereas baptiſm was in full force before circumciſion was out of date: but circumciſion was a typical ſign of Chriſt, as all the ceremonies of the law were, and of the ſhedding of his blood, to cleanſe from all ſin, original and actual, and alſo of the circumciſion of the heart. And was moreover, a ſeal of the righteouſneſs of faith; or which ſign was a ſeal; and ſo it ſignifies the ſame as before; σημεια ȣτω λεγȣσι τας σφραγιδας, ſigns, ſo they call ſeals, ſays Harpocratian [f], and to be ſigned, he ſays, is uſed, inſtead of being ſealed: or it may be expreſſive of ſomething elſe, as that circumciſion was a ſeal, not for ſecrecy, but for certainty; it being a confirmation, not merely of the ſincerity of Abraham's faith, but of his juſtifying righteouſneſs, which was not his faith, but that which his faith looked to; and, which he had, both faith and righteouſneſs, yet being uncircumciſed; whence it follows, that he was not juſtified by his circumciſion, but by a righteouſneſs which he had before he was circumciſed, or otherwiſe his circumciſion could not have been a ſeal of it: tho' this clauſe, which he had, yet being uncircumciſed, may be rendered, which ſhould be in the uncircumciſion, that is, in the uncircumciſed Gentiles; and the ſenſe be, that circumciſion was a ſeal to Abraham, and gave aſſurance to him that he ſhould be the father of many nations in a ſpiritual ſenſe; and that the righteouſneſs of faith which he had, ſhould alſo come upon, and be imputed to the uncircumciſed Gentiles; and accordingly it may be obſerved, that this ſeal was continued in full force on his natural ſeed, until this promiſe began to take place, and then it was aboliſhed: this ſeal was broken off when the middle wall of partition, was broken down, and the word of righteouſneſs and faith, or the Goſpel preaching juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, was ordered to be publiſhed to the Gentile world. It may be enquired whether circumciſion being called a ſeal, will prove that baptiſm is a ſeal of the covenant? I anſwer, that circumciſion was only a ſeal to Abraham of a peculiar covenant made with him, and of a particular promiſe made to him, and was it to be admitted a ſeal of the covenant of grace, it will not prove baptiſm to be ſuch; ſince, as has been obſerved, baptiſm does not ſucceed it in place, in time, and uſe; and could this be allowed that it ſucceeds it, and is a ſeal of the righteouſneſs of faith, as that was, it can only be a ſeal to them that have both faith and righteouſneſs, and not to them that have neither; it would only at moſt be a ſeal to believers. But alas, not Ordinances, but other things more valuable than they, are the ſeals of the covenant, and of believers; the blood of Chriſt is the ſeal, and the only ſeal of the covenant of grace, by which its promiſes and bleſſings are ratified and confirmed; and the holy Spirit is the only earneſt, pledge, ſeal, and ſealer of the ſaints, until the day of redemption. The Apoſtle uſes the word ſeal concerning circumciſion, it being a word his countrymen made uſe of when they ſpoke of it, thus paraphraſing on Cant. iii. 8. they ſay [g], "every one of them was ſealed, חתימת מילה, "with the ſeal of circumciſion upon their fleſh, as "Abraham was ſealed in his fleſh:" that he might be the father of all them that believe, tho' they be not circumciſed; that is, his circumciſion was a ſeal unto him that he ſhould be ſo, which explains and confirms the ſenſe of the former clauſe; not a father of the uncircumciſed Gentiles by natural generation, for ſo he was only the father of the Jews, but of them as they were believers; and not ſo called becauſe he was the author of their faith, but becauſe they have the ſame ſort of faith he had: that righteouſneſs might be imputed to them alſo; not Abraham's faith and righteouſneſs, nor their own, but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt received by faith, which is unto all, and upon all them that believe, without any difference of Jew or Gentile. Now when the Apoſtle ſtiles Abraham the father of all believers, even of uncircumciſed ones, he ſays, no other than what the Jews frequently own. Says one[h] of them, ſpeaking of the Iſhmaelites; "they are the ſeed of "Abraham, who was, ראש המאמינים, the head of "them that believe;" and ſays[i] another, "Hagar "might bring the firſt-fruits, and read, as it is ſaid "to Abraham, a father of many nations have I "made thee; for he is, אב כל העולם כולו, the "father of the whole world, who enter under the "wings of the Shekinah;" and ſays the ſame writer elſewhere[k], having mentioned the above paſſage, "they ſaid in times paſt, thou waſt the father of "the Syrians, but now thou art, the father of the "whole world; wherefore every ſtranger may ſay "this, as thou haſt ſworn to our fathers; for Abra-"ham was, the father of the whole world; ſeeing, "למד אמונה, he has taught the true faith." The Apoſtle reaſons on what they themſelves allow, to prove that the bleſſedneſs of juſtification comes not only upon the Jews, but upon the Gentiles alſo.

[g] Targum in Cant. 3, 8.

Ver. 12. And the father of circumciſion, &c.] So the Jews call Abraham, ראש הנימולים[l], the head of thoſe that are circumciſed; and, ראש למולים[m], the head to them that are circumciſed; but the Apoſtle here ſays, he is a father, to them who are not of the circumciſion only; not to the Jews only, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and not to all of them, ſince ſome were of Iſrael, who were not Iſrael, not Iſraelites indeed, or true believers; but to ſuch alſo who walk in the ſteps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had, being yet uncircumciſed; that is, who have the ſame faith he had; imitate and follow him in the exerciſe of faith; walk by faith, as he did when he was uncircumciſed, as they are; and ſo the Jews ſay[n], that "Abraham is the father of all, "באים אחריו באמונתו, that go after him in his "faith."

Ver. 13. For the promiſe that he ſhould be heir of the world, &c.] This promiſe is thought by ſome, to refer to that of his being the father of many nations; by whom the Gentiles are particularly meant, who are ſometimes called, the world, and the whole world; or the elect of God, the believing part of the world, whether among Jews or Gentiles, who ſometimes go by the name of the world in ſcripture: but to this it may be objected, that the promiſe here ſpoken of is made to Abraham's ſeed, as well as to himſelf; by which is meant not the Meſſiah, who is indeed heir of the world, and all things in it, but all believers, whether Jews or Gentiles; as appears from ver. 16. and therefore cannot be both heirs and inheritance too. Others think the land of Canaan is deſigned, and by a ſynechdoche, a part of the world is put for the whole world; but that land is never ſo called, and beſides the promiſe of it belong'd to thoſe of the law, and to them only, contrary to what the Apoſtle argues, ver. 14, 16. Others therefore conſider Canaan as a type of heaven, which Abraham and his ſpiritual ſeed are heirs of by promiſe. But rather, by the world here, is meant, both this world and that which is to come; Abraham and all believers are the heirs of this world, and of all things in it; all things are theirs, and among the reſt, the world, Chriſt being theirs, and they being Chriſt's; he is heir of all things, and they are joint-heirs with him; and how little ſoever they may enjoy of it now, the time is coming, when they, by virtue of their right, ſhall inherit the earth; ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 9, 11. and now they have as much of it as is neceſſary, and with a bleſſing, and which the Jews call their world. It is a ſaying in their Talmud[o], עולמך תראה בחייך, thou ſhalt ſee thy world in thy life time; which the Gloſs explains, thou ſhalt find, or enjoy all thy neceſſities, or what is needful for thee; and of Abraham they ſay[p], that "he was the foundation of the world, and that for "his ſake the world was created;" and introduce God ſaying of him thus[q], "as I am the only one "in my world, ſo he is the only one, בעולמו, in "his world." And as he and all the ſaints are heirs of this world, ſo of the world to come, the future ſalvation, the inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, never-fading, and reſerved in the heavens; for they are heirs of God himſelf, and ſhall inherit all things; now this large and comprehenſive promiſe, which takes in the things of time and eternity, was not to Abraham, or to his ſeed thro' the law; not thro' the law of circumciſion, or on the ſcore of their obedience to that, for this promiſe was made before that was enjoined; ſee Gen. xii. 2, 3. nor thro' the law of Moſes, which was not as yet given; nor thro' the law of nature, nor by any righteouſneſs of the law; but thro' the righteouſneſs of faith; by virtue of which they have, all things that pertain to life and godlineſs; and have the promiſe of the life that now is, and of that which is to come; enjoy with a bleſſing what they now have, and have a right and title to the heavenly glory.

Ver. 14. For if they which are of the law be heirs, &c.] That is, if the Jews who are under the law, and are ſeeking for righteouſneſs and life by the works of it, ſhould, on the account of their obedience to it, be heirs of the grace of life and of glory, faith is made void; for if the right to the inheritance is by the works of the law, there is no room for faith; that can be of no uſe or ſervice; and the promiſe made of none effect: if ſalvation is by works, it is to no purpoſe for God to promiſe, or men to believe; for the thing promiſed depends not upon God's promiſe, but upon man's obedience to the law; and if that is not perfectly obſerved, as it cannot poſſibly be, then the promiſe of God ſtands for nothing, and is in courſe made void. The Apoſtle here argues from the abſurdities which follow upon the doctrine of juſtification by works, as he does from the different effects of the law, in the following verſe.

Ver. 15. Becauſe the law worketh wrath, &c.] Not the wrath of man, tho' that is ſometimes ſtirred up thro' the prohibitions of the law, to which the carnal mind of man is enmity, but the wrath of God: the law is ſo far from juſtifying ſinners, that it curſes and condemns them; and when it comes into the heart and is let into the conſcience of a ſinner, it fills with terrible apprehenſions of the wrath of God, and a fearful looking for of his judgment and fiery indignation: for where no law is, there is no tranſgreſſion; שאינו לא מצוה ולא עבירה[r]; a ſort of of a proverbial expreſſion: had the law of Moſes not been given, there was the law of nature which ſin is a tranſgreſſion of; but the law of Moſes was added for the better diſcovery and detection of ſin, which would not have been ſo manifeſt without it, and which may be the Apoſtle's ſenſe; that where there is no law, there is no knowledge of any tranſgreſſion; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion reads the words, if the law had not come, there would have been none who would have known ſin; but the law is come, and there is a law by which is the knowledge of ſin, and therefore no man can be juſtified by it; ſince that convinces him of ſin, and fills him with a ſenſe of divine wrath on account of it.

Ver. 16. Therefore it is of faith that it might be by grace, &c.] Meaning either the promiſe of being heir of the world, or the inheritance itſelf, or adoption which gives heirſhip, or remiſſion of ſin, or the bleſſing of juſtification, either and all of theſe are of faith; not as the cauſe or condition of them, but as the means of God's fixing and appointing to be the recipient of all and each of them: which is done, that it might be by grace; appear to be of the free-grace and favour of God, as each of theſe bleſſings are: foraſmuch as every bleſſing is received by faith, tis manifeſt it muſt be by grace; ſince faith itſelf is a gift of God's grace, and lies purely in receiving favours at the hand of God, to whom it gives all the glory of them: and this is done with a further view, to the end the promiſe might be ſure to all the ſeed. The promiſe of the above bleſſings, particularly of the inheritance which is made in the covenant of grace, ordered in all things and ſure, and which could not be diſanulled by the law that came after it; this being by faith and of grace, and not of works, nor at all depending upon them, becomes ſure to all believers, to all Abraham's ſpiritual ſeed: not to that only which is of the law; to the Jews, who are ſaid to be of the law, in diſtinction to the Gentiles who were without it; and deſigns ſuch of them as were believers in Chriſt, and to whom the Goſpel was the power of God unto ſalvation; to theſe the promiſe was, and was ſure, and not to them only: but to that alſo which is of the faith of Abraham; to the Gentiles, who tho' they are not by natural deſcent from Abraham, yet are of the ſame faith with him, and ſo are his ſeed in a ſpiritual ſenſe: who is the father of us all; whether Jews or Gentiles, who are Chriſt's, and ſo Abraham's ſpiritual ſeed, and heirs of eternal life, according to the free promiſe of grace.

Ver. 17. As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations, &c.] The paſſage referred to, is in Gen. xvii. 4, 5. which proves him to be a father not of the Jews only, ſince they cannot be called many nations, but of the Gentiles alſo; and which muſt be underſtood in a ſpiritual ſenſe, for Abraham was the father of them, before him whom he believed, even God; that is, he was ſo, either in the ſight of God, who ſees not as man ſees; in his account, he was the father of many nations, long before he really in fact was; or over againſt or like unto him, as the word may ſignify: as God was the father of many nations, ſo was Abraham, tho' not in ſuch a ſenſe as he is; and as God is the father of us all that believe, ſo was Abraham; there is ſome little likeneſs and reſemblance in this between them, tho' not ſameneſs. The object of his faith is deſcribed as he, who quickneth the dead; meaning either the dead body of Abraham and Sarah's womb; or Iſaac, who was given up for dead; or the Gentiles who were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; or rather the dead bodies of men at the laſt day, a work which none but the almighty God can effect; the conſideration of which is ſufficient to engage faith in the promiſes of God, and a dependance on him for the fulfilment of them: and who ſtands further deſcribed as he, who calleth thoſe things which be not, as tho' they were; ſo he called Abraham the father of many nations, when he was not in fact, as if he really was; and the Gentiles his ſeed and offſpring, before they were; and when he comes effectually to call them by his grace, they are repreſented as things which are not, whom he called, to bring to nought things that are: they were not his people, nor his children, and he called them ſo, and by his grace made them ſo, and made them appear to be ſo; for as in creation ſo in regeneration, God calls and brings that into being which before was not: and the phraſe ſeems to be an alluſion to the creation of all things out of nothing; and it is a Rabbinical one, for ſo the Jews ſpeaking of the creation ſay [s], "קורא אל אין, he calls to that which is not, and " it is excluded; (i. e. all things are excluded out of " it, as a chicken out of an egg,) and to that " which is, and it is eſtabliſhed, and to the world, " and it is ſtretched out."

Ver. 18. Who againſt hope believed in hope, &c.] Abraham believed the promiſe of God, that he might become the father of many nations, being aſſiſted by a ſupernatural aid: in hope; of the fulfilment of it by the grace and power of God: againſt hope; againſt all viſible, rational grounds of hope; Sarah's womb and his own body being dead, but inaſmuch as God had ſaid it, he believed: according to that which is ſpoken, ſo ſhall thy ſeed be; his faith reſted upon the word of God; which ſhewed the nature of it, and that it was of the right kind.

Ver. 19. And being not weak in faith, &c.] Abraham was not weak in the exerciſe of his faith, on the promiſe of God; nor was his faith weakened about the accompliſhment of it, neither by the length of time after the promiſe was made, nor by the ſeeming inſuperable difficulties of nature which attended it; for he conſidered not his own body now dead. The Alexandrian copy reads without the negative, he conſidered his own body now dead, and ſo the Syriac verſion; which makes his faith the greater, that tho' he did conſider his caſe, yet his faith was not weakened: the phraſe, his body now dead, is an Euphemiſm of the membrum virile, which by the Jews when unfit for generation, is called, אבר מת, membrum emortuum [t]: when he was about an hundred years old; not being quite an hundred years of age, wanting a year or thereabout: neither yet the deadneſs of Sarah's womb; how unfit ſhe was to conceive and bear children: now tho' he might conſider theſe things in his mind, yet they did not dwell upon his mind, nor he upon them; at leaſt he did not conſider them, ſo as to diſtruſt the divine promiſe.

Ver. 20. He ſtaggered not at the promiſe of God, &c.] There is no reaſon to ſtagger at, or heſitate about any of the promiſes of God, ſince they are made by him that cannot lie; his faithfulneſs is engaged to perform them; with him all things are poſſible; every promiſe is in Chriſt, yea and amen, and never did any fail; and yet ſo it is, that ſome of God's children, thro' unbelief, do ſtagger at the promiſes of God; thinking either that they are too great for them, or demur upon them thro' difficulties which attend them: but ſo did not Abraham, he was ſtrong in faith; nothing moved him, no difficulties diſcouraged him, he made no demurr upon the promiſe, nor had the leaſt heſitation in his mind about the accompliſhment of it; but was fully aſſured that ſo it would be, as God had ſaid; and thus he was giving glory to God; aſcribing to him the glory of his veracity, faithfulneſs, power, grace, and goodneſs, as all ſuch who are ſtrong in faith do; ſuch perſons bring the moſt glory to God, and are the moſt comfortable in their own ſouls. This phraſe לאתתקפא במהימנותא, to be ſtrong or ſtrengthened, or ſtrengthen themſelves in faith; is to be met with in Jewiſh writings[u], and is particularly uſed of the Patriarchs, Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob; all the tribes of Iſrael are not ſaid to be, חזקים באמונתם, ſtrong in their faith; only the tribe of Levi, when Moſes ſtood in the gate and ſaid, who is on the Lord's ſide, let him come unto me; whoever is חזק באמונתו, ſtrong in his faith[w]; and there were none in all Iſrael but the tribe of Levi, who were ſtrong in their faith.

[t] T. Bab. Yebamot, fol. 55. 2. & Gloſſ. in ib. Sanhedrin, fol. 55. 1. & Gloſſ. in ib. Shebuot, fol. 18. 1.

Ver. 21. And being fully perſuaded, &c.] He had not only faith, a ſtrong faith, but full aſſurance of faith: that what he (God) had promiſed; tho' it was ſo long ago, and there were ſo many difficulties in the way; he was able, being the Lord God Almighty, to perform; ſo his faith reſted upon the power of God, with whom nothing is impoſſible.

Ver. 22. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteouſneſs.] Not becauſe his faith was ſtrong, and he had a full aſſurance of it, but becauſe it was right, reſting on the promiſe of God, and relying upon his power and faithfulneſs to perform it; for tho' the righteouſneſs of faith is not imputed to any ſort of believers, not to mere nominal ones, yet to all ſuch as have true faith, tho' it may be but weak; for faith as to nature, kind and object, tho' not as to degree, is the ſame in all true believers, and the ſame righteouſneſs is imputed to one as to another.

Ver. 23. Now it was not written for his ſake alone, &c.] This was not left on the ſacred records, Gen. xv. 6. that it was imputed to him; purely on his account, merely for his ſake, as an encomium of his faith, and an honourable teſtimony to it, and for the encouragement of it; tho' this was doing him a very great honour, and was one deſign of it.

Ver. 24. But for us alſo, to whom it ſhall be imputed, &c.] What was written in the books of the Old Teſtament, was not written merely on account of them who are the ſubjects thereof, but for the uſe, learning, inſtruction and profit of ſaints under the New Teſtament diſpenſation; and particularly this concerning the imputation of Abraham's faith for righteouſneſs, or of the imputation of the righteouſneſs of faith unto him for juſtification; which was not Abraham's faith, but that righteouſneſs which his faith looked to, and laid hold on: ſee ver. 12. for Abraham's faith itſelf, could never be reckoned for righteouſneſs to another, nor indeed was it to himſelf; but ſuch as believe as Abraham did, they have the ſame righteouſneſs imputed to them as he had; and truly of the ſame kind is the faith of Abraham, who believed in God that quickneth the dead, and that of ours: if, or ſeeing we believe on him that raiſed up Jeſus our Lord from the dead; which is deſcriptive of the faith of New Teſtament believers, and of the object of it; ſee chap. x. 9, 10. and which object of faith is further deſcribed in the following verſe.

Ver. 25. Who was delivered for our offences, &c.] Chriſt was delivered into the hands of men, and into the hands of juſtice, and unto death; and he was delivered by men, by Judas, to the chief-prieſts, and by them to Pilate, and by Pilate to the Jews and Roman ſoldiers to be put to death; and he was alſo delivered up by his Father into the hands of juſtice and death, according to his determinate counſel and fore-knowledge; but not without his own free conſent, who voluntarily laid down his life, and gave himſelf a ranſom for his people: he was delivered to death, not for any offences of his own, for he committed none; nor for the offences of angels, for theſe were not ſpared; nor for the offences of all men, ſince all will not be ſaved; but for the offences of all God's elect: he was delivered for theſe, as the cauſes of his death, and as the end for which he died; namely, to make reconciliation, atonement, and ſatisfaction for them; which ſhews the love of the Father in delivering him up, and the grace and condeſcenſion of the Son in being willing to be delivered up on ſuch an account: the nature and end of Chriſt's death may be learnt from hence, that he died not merely as a martyr, or as an example; nor only for the good, but in the room and ſtead of his people: we may alſo learn from hence the nature of ſin, the ſtrictneſs of juſtice, the obligations we lie under to Chriſt, and how many favours and bleſſings we may expect from God thro' him: who alſo was raiſed again for our juſtification; he was raiſed again from the dead by his Father, to whom this is often aſcribed; and by himſelf, by his own power, which proves him to be the mighty God; and this was done not only that he might live an immortal and glorious life in our nature, having finiſhed the work he undertook and came about, but for our juſtification. He died in the room and ſtead of his people, and by dying made ſatisfaction for their ſins; he roſe again as their head and repreſentative, and was legally diſcharged, acquitted, and juſtified, and they in him. Chriſt's reſurrection did not procure the juſtification of his people, that was done by his obedience and death; but was for the teſtification of it, that it might fully appear that ſin was atoned for, and an everlaſting righteouſneſs was brought in; and for the application of it, or that Chriſt might live and ſee his righteouſneſs imputed, and applied to all thoſe for whom he had wrought it out.

C H A P. V.

THE Apoſtle having clearly ſtated, and fully proved the doctrine of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of faith, proceeds to obſerve the comfortable fruits and effects of this great bleſſing, known and enjoyed by the believer; as alſo the ſource and ſpring of it, the love of God, which appears in the death of Chriſt, in the room and ſtead of his people, which is the foundation on which it ſtands; and likewiſe gives an illuſtration of this benefit, by comparing the two heads, Adam and Chriſt together. The firſt fruit and effect of juſtification, as a benefit perceived and enjoyed by faith, is peace with God thro' Chriſt, ver. 1. The next is acceſs thro' the mediator to the throne of grace, where juſtified ones ſtand with a holy boldneſs and confidence, and the third is a chearful hope of eternal glory, ver. 2. yea, ſuch not only have joy in the hope of what is to come, but glory even in preſent afflictions; which prevents an objection that might be made to the above mentioned fruits and effects of juſtification, taken from the tribulations which ſaints are exerciſed with: and what occaſions glorying even in theſe, is the ſanctified uſe, or happy produce of afflictions, theſe being the means of exerciſing and encreaſing patience; by means of which a larger experience of divine things is gained; and thro' that, hope is confirmed, and all influenced by a plenteous diſcovery of the love of God to the ſoul, by the Spirit, ver. 4, 5. an inſtance of which love is given, ver. 6. in Chriſt's dying for men; which love is enhanced by the character and condition of the perſons for whom Chriſt died, being ungodly, and without ſtrength; and by the time of it, being due time: then follows a further illuſtration of this love, by comparing it with what inſtances of love are to be found among men, ver. 7. by which it appears to be unparallel'd; ſince ſcarcely for a righteous man, peradventure for a good man, one would die, yet no man dies for the ungodly, as Chrſt did: hence as his, ſo his Father's love is highly commended, by giving him up to death for perſons while in ſuch a ſtate and condition, and under ſuch a character, ver. 8. and juſtification now ſpringing from this love, and being founded on the death of Chriſt, hence follow a ſecurity from wrath to come, ver. 9. a certainty of ſalvation, ver. 10. which is ſtrongly argued from the different characters thoſe Chriſt died for bear, before and after reconciliation, and from the death, to the life of Chriſt, ver. 10. and alſo a rejoicing and glorying in God thro' Chriſt, full expiation being made by his blood for ſin, and this received by faith, ver. 11. and then the Apoſtle proceeds to compare the two heads, Adam and Chriſt, together; the deſign of which is to ſhow the largeneſs and freeneſs of the love and grace of God; how righteouſneſs for juſtification comes by Chriſt; and how the perſons, before deſcribed as ſinners and ungodly, came to be in ſuch a condition; and that is thro' the ſin of the firſt man, in whom they all were, and in whom they all ſinned and died, ver. 12. wherefore there muſt be a law before the law of Moſes, or there could have been no ſin, ver. 13. but that ſin was in being, and was reckoned and imputed to the poſterity of Adam, is clear from this ſingle inſtance, death's power even over infants, from the times of Adam to Moſes, ver. 14. who therefore muſt be a publick head, repreſenting all his poſterity; ſo that they were involved in the guilt of his ſin, which brought death upon them; and in this he was a type of Chriſt, as is aſſerted in the ſame verſe; that ſo as Adam was but one, and by one ſin of his conveyed death to all his ſeed; ſo Chriſt, the mediator, is but one, and by his one obedience conveyes righteouſneſs and life to all his ſeed: and yet in ſome things there is a diſſimilitude; ſin and death, thro' the firſt man, are conveyed in a natural way to his offſpring, but righteouſneſs and life from Chriſt in a way of grace, ver. 15. It was one offence of Adam's, which brought condemnation and death upon all his poſterity; but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is not only a juſtification of his ſeed from that one offence, but from all others, ver. 16. the one is unto death, the other unto life; and greater is the efficacy in the one to quicken, than in the other to kill, ver. 17. where a repetition is made of what is ſaid in ver. 15. with an explanation, and the ſimilitude between the two heads, is clearly expreſſed, ver. 18. where condemnation on account of the ſin of Adam, and juſtification thro' the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, are oppoſed to each other; and both as extending to the whole of their ſeveral reſpective offspring, condemnation thro' Adam's offence to all his natural ſeed, and juſtification of life thro' Chriſt's righteouſneſs to all his ſpiritual ſeed; which is ſtill more fully and clearly expreſſed in ver. 19. where the way and manner in which the one become ſinners, and the other righteous, is plainly directed to; that it is, by the imputation of Adam's diſobedience to the one, and by the imputation of Chriſt's righteouſneſs to the other: in ver. 20. an objection is obviated, which might be formed thus; if juſtification is by the grace of God, and through the obedience and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, then the law is of no uſe; what purpoſe does that ſerve? what occaſion was there for its entrance? The Apoſtle replies, that tho' juſtification is not by it, yet a good end is anſwered by its entrance; for hereby ſin is more known to be what it is, both original and actual; and the grace of God appears more abundant in juſtification from it, and in the pardon of it; and this grace is further illuſtrated in ver. 21. by comparing ſin and grace together, and the different effects of their empire over the ſons of men; the one reigning unto death, the other reigning thro' righteouſneſs to eternal life by Chriſt.

[u] Zohar in Gen. fol. 83. 4.

[w] Tzeror Hammor, fol. 87. 4.

Ver. 1. Therefore being juſtified by faith, &c.] Not that faith is at the firſt of our juſtification; for that is a ſentence which paſſed in the mind of God from all eternity, and which paſſed on Chriſt, and on all the elect conſidered in him, when he roſe from the dead; ſee ch. iv. 25. nor is it the chief, or has it the chief place in juſtification; it is not the efficient cauſe of it, it is God that juſtifies, and not faith; it is not the moving cauſe of it, that is the free grace of God; it is not the matter of it, that is the righteouſneſs of Chriſt: we are not juſtified by faith, either as God's work in us, for, as ſuch, it is a part of ſanctification; nor as our work or act, as exerciſed by us, for then we ſhould be juſtified by works, by ſomething of our own, and have whereof to glory; but we are juſtified by faith objectively and relatively, as that relates to the object Chriſt, and his righteouſneſs; or as it is a means of our knowledge, and perception of our juſtification by Chriſt's righteouſneſs, and of our enjoying the comfort of it; and ſo we come to have peace with God thro' our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. The Apoſtle having ſet the doctrine of juſtification in a clear light, and fully proved that it is not by the works of men, but by the righteouſneſs of God; and having mentioned the ſeveral cauſes of it, proceeds to conſider its effects, among which, peace with God, ſtands in the firſt place; and is ſo called, to diſtinguiſh it from peace with men, which perſons, though juſtified by faith in Chriſt's righteouſneſs, may not have; but are ſure, having a ſenſe of this, to find peace with God, even with him againſt whom they have ſinned, whoſe law they have tranſgreſſed, and whoſe juſtice they have affronted; reconciliation for ſin being made, and a juſtifying righteouſneſs brought in, and this imputed and applied to them, they have that peace of God, that tranquillity and ſerenity of mind, the ſame with peace with God here, which paſſes all underſtanding; and is better experienced than expreſſed: and this is all thro' our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; it ſprings from his atoning ſacrifice, and precious blood, by which he has made peace; and is communicated thro' the imputation of his righteouſneſs, and the application of his blood; and is only felt and enjoyed in a way of believing, by looking to him as the Lord our righteouſneſs.

Ver. 2. By whom alſo we have acceſs by faith, &c.] The acceſs here ſpoken of is not to the bleſſing of juſtification; for tho' that is a grace which we have acceſs to by Chriſt, and come at the knowledge of by faith, and enjoy the comfort of thro' it; and is a grace in which perſons ſtand, and from which they ſhall never fall, and lays a ſolid foundation for rejoicing in hope of eternal glory; yet this ſenſe would make the Apoſtle guilty of a great tautology; and beſides, he's not ſpeaking of that bleſſing itſelf, but of its effects; and here of one diſtinct from peace with God, before mentioned, as the word alſo manifeſtly ſhews: nor does it deſign any other bleſſing of grace, as pardon, adoption, ſanctification, &c. and an acceſs thereunto; not unto the free grace, favour, and good-will of God, the ſource of all bleſſings; but to the throne of grace, which may be called that grace, becauſe of its name, for God, as the God of all grace, ſits upon it; it is an high favour to be admitted to it; 'tis grace perſons come thither for, and which they may expect to find there: and in, or at which we ſtand; which denotes boldneſs, courage, and intrepidity, and a freedom from a ſervile fear and baſhful ſpirit, and a continued conſtant attendance at it; all which is conſiſtent with reverence, humility, and ſubmiſſion to the will of God. Now acceſs to the throne of grace, and ſtanding at that, are by Chriſt. There's no acceſs to God in our own name and righteouſneſs, and upon the foot of our own works. Chriſt is the only way of acceſs to God, and acceptance with him; he is the mediator between God and us; he introduces into his Father's preſence, gives audience at his throne, and renders both perſons and ſervices acceptable unto him: and this acceſs is alſo by faith; and that both in God the Father, as our covenant God and Father; in faith of intereſt in his love and favour; believing his power and faithfulneſs, his fulneſs and ſufficiency, and that he is a God hearing and anſwering prayer: and alſo in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; in his perſon for acceptance; in his righteouſneſs for juſtification; in his blood for pardon; and in his fulneſs for every ſupply: and ſuch as have acceſs to the throne of grace by faith in Chriſt, being comfortably perſuaded of their juſtification before God, thro' his righteouſneſs imputed to them, can and do rejoice in hope of the glory of God; which is another effect of juſtification by faith: by the glory of God, is not meant the eſſential glory of God; nor that which we ought to ſeek in all that we are concerned, and which we are to aſcribe unto him on the account of his perfections and works; but that everlaſting glory and happineſs which he has prepared for his people, has promiſed to them, and has called them to by Chriſt, and will beſtow upon them; of which he has given them a good hope thro' grace; and in the hope and believing views of which they can, and do rejoice, even amidſt a variety of afflictions and tribulations in this world. The Vulgate Latin verſion reads, in hope of the glory of the children of God; eternal glory being proper to them.

Ver. 3. And not only ſo but we glory in tribulations alſo, &c.] The tribulations of the ſaints are many and various, thro' the hatred of the world, the temptations of ſatan, their own corruptions; and are the will of their heavenly Father; what Chriſt has foretold, and they expect; and here particularly deſign ſuch as are for Chriſt's ſake, which being ſupported under, and carried through, they glory in: not that theſe are deſirable in themſelves, and to the fleſh; but they glory in them as they are for Chriſt's ſake, and in a good cauſe; as they are trials of grace, and of uſe for the exerciſe of it; and as they are in the exerciſe of grace, amidſt theſe tribulations, and are comforted under them, and are helped to have regard to the heavenly glory. The ground of which glorying is, that theſe afflictions are the means of promoting patience, experience, and hope: knowing this, that tribulation worketh patience; patience is a grace, of which God is the author; it is one of the fruits of the Spirit; the word of God is the means of its being firſt implanted; and afflictions are the means of promoting it, when they are ſanctified; otherwiſe they produce impatience, murmurings, and repinings; there's great need of patience under them; and, by divine grace, they are the matter and occaſion of exerciſing, and ſo of increaſing it.

Ver. 4. And patience experience, &c.] As tribulations tend to exerciſe and increaſe patience, ſo patience being exerciſed and increaſed, enlarges the ſaints ſtock and fund of experience; of the love and grace of God communicated to them at ſuch ſeaſons; of his faithfulneſs in fulfilling his promiſes; of his power in ſupporting them; and of their own frailty and weakneſs; and ſo are taught humility, thankfulneſs, and reſignation to the will of God: and experience hope; hope is a gift of God's grace, and is implanted in regeneration, but abounds, increaſes, and becomes more ſtrong and lively by experience of the love, grace, mercy, power, and faithfulneſs of God.

Ver. 5. And hope maketh not aſhamed, &c.] As a vain hope does, things not anſwering to expectation, it deceives, and is loſt; but the grace of hope is of ſuch a nature, as that it never fails, deceives, or diſappoints: it neither makes aſhamed, nor have perſons that have it any reaſon to be aſhamed of it; neither of the grace itſelf, which is a good one; nor of the ground and foundation of it, the perſon and righteouſneſs of Chriſt; nor of the object of it, eternal glory; becauſe the love of God is ſhed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghoſt, which is given unto us. By the love of God is meant, not that love by which we love God, for hope does not depend upon, nor is it ſupported by our love and obedience to God; but the love of God to us, of which ſome inſtances are given in the following verſes: this is ſaid to be ſhed abroad in our hearts; which denotes the plenty and abundance of it, and the full and comfortable ſenſation which believers have of it: by the holy Spirit; who leads into, and makes application of it: and is given to us; for that purpoſe, as the applier of all grace, the comforter, and the earneſt of heaven. Now the love which the Spirit ſheds abroad in the heart, is the ſource and ſpring, both of juſtification itſelf, which is owing to the free grace of God, and of all the effects of it, as peace with God, acceſs to the throne of grace, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, the uſefulneſs of afflictions, and the ſtability of hope, and is here alledged as the reaſon of all.

Ver. 6. For when we were yet without ſtrength, &c.] The Apoſtle having mentioned the love of God, proceeds to give an inſtance, and which is a full proof and demonſtration of it, which is, that in due time Chriſt died for the ungodly. That Chriſt died is certain; the death of Chriſt was foretold in prophecy, typified by the ſacrifices of ſlain beaſts, was ſpoken of by himſelf, both before and ſince his death; his enemies have never denied it; and this was the ſum of the miniſtry of the Apoſtles, and is the great article of faith: and that the death of Chriſt is a ſingular inſtance of the love of God, is evident by conſidering the perſon that died, the Son of God in human nature, his own, his only-begotten Son, his beloved Son; the concern which God had in it, by willing, ordering, and appointing it, awaking the ſword of juſtice againſt him, not ſparing him, but delivering him up for us all; alſo the nature, kind, and manner of his death, and particularly the perſons for whom he died, here deſcribed: he died for the ungodly; not for himſelf, he had no ſins of his own to die for, nor did he want any happineſs to procure; nor for angels, but for men; and theſe not holy, juſt, and good men, but ungodly; and not as a mere martyr, or only by way of example to them, and ſo for their good; but, as the Syriac verſion reads it, חלף רשיעא, in the room, or ſtead of the ungodly, as their ſurety to make ſatisfaction for their ſins. The Jews have a notion of the Meſſiah's being a ſubſtitute, and ſtanding in the place and ſtead of ſinners; and, they ſay [x], "that Aaron filled up the "place of the firſt Adam, and was brought near "in the room of him;" which is true of Chriſt, the antitype of Aaron. On thoſe words, I will give a man for thee, Iſ. xliii. 4. the doctors [y] ſay, "don't "read Adam but Edom; for when God removes the "decree (or puniſhment) from a particular man, "he provides for the attribute of juſtice in the room "of the man that ſinned, איש אחר בא מאדום, "another man that comes from Edom;" referring, as I think, to Iſ. lxiii. 1. And this their character of ungodly ſhews, that not goodneſs in man, but love in God, was the moving cauſe of Chriſt's dying for them; and that the end of his dying was to atone for their ungodlineſs: and to illuſtrate the love of God the more towards them in this inſtance, they are ſaid to be without ſtrength at that time; being ſo enfeebled by ſin, that they were not capable of fulfilling the law, of atoning for the tranſgreſſions of it, of redeeming themſelves from ſlavery, of beginning and carrying on a work of holineſs in their hearts, nor indeed of doing one good thing. Add to all this, that Chriſt died for theſe perſons in due time; in the moſt fit, proper, and convenient ſeaſon to illuſtrate the love and grace of God; when man appeared both weak and wicked; when the weakneſs of the legal diſpenſation had been ſufficiently evinced, and the wickedneſs of man, both among Jews and Gentiles, was at a very great height: or rather by due time is meant the fulneſs of time; the time appointed in council by God, agreed to by Chriſt, and fixed in prophecy; before the departure of the ſceptre from Judah, the deſtruction of the ſecond temple, and at the cloſe of Daniel's weeks.

Ver. 7. For ſcarcely for a righteous man will one die, &c.] The deſign of this, and the following verſe, is to ſhow that Chriſt's dying for ungodly perſons is an inſtance of kindneſs that is matchleſs and unparallel'd. By a righteous man, is not meant a truly gracious, holy man; nor one that is made righteous by the obedience of Chriſt; but one that is ſo in his own eyes, and in the eſteem of others, being outwardly moral and righteous before men; who keeps to the letter of the law, and does, as he imagines, what that externally requires: ſuch were the Phariſees among the Jews, who, though they were had in much outward eſteem and veneration among the people, yet were rather feared than loved; and it would have been a difficult thing to have found a perſon that would chearfully venture, and lay down his life for any of that complexion and caſt: yet peradventure for a good man ſome would even dare to die. By a good man, is not meant a man made ſo by the grace of God, and who is indeed truly and properly the only good man; but a liberal and beneficent man, who was very bountiful in his charitable diſtributions to the poor, and very liberal in contributing towards the charge of ſacrifices, repairs of the temple, &c. and did more this way than what the law obliged to. Now for ſuch a man perhaps there might be ſome found ſo daring and hardy, as to venture and lay down their lives, when there was any danger of his, or any neceſſity for ſo doing; ſo great an intereſt ſuch men had in the affections of the people. And ſo the Jews [z] diſtinguiſh between צדיק, a righteous man, and חסיד, a good man. They ſay [a], "there is a righteous man that is good, and there "is a righteous man that is not good; but he that "is good for heaven, and the creatures, i. e. for "God and men, this is, צדיק טוב, a righteous "good man; but he that is good to God, and evil "to men, this is, צדיק שאינו טוב, a righteous "man that is not good." The whole body of the people of the Jews were divided into three ſorts: take a ſhort ſentence out of ther Talmud [b], not to ſupport the juſtneſs of the characters, but for the ſake of this threefold diviſion of the people: "three "things are ſaid concerning the paring of the nails, "צדיק, a righteous man buries them, חסיד, a good "man burns them, רשע, a wicked man caſts them "away." Now to this diviſion of the people the Apoſtle alludes; and there is in the words a beautiful gradation, ſcarcely for one of the צדיקים, righteous men, who does juſt what he is obliged to do by the law, and no more, will any die; perhaps it may be, that for one of, חסדים, the good men, who are very liberal to the poor, and towards defraying all the expences of the temple ſervice, in which they exceed the ſtrict demands of the law, ſome may be found willing to die; but who'll die for the רשעים, the wicked and ungodly, the profligate and abandoned part of the people? not one; but Chriſt died for the ungodly: wherefore if inſtances could be produced of mens dying either for righteous men, or good men, theſe would not come up to the inſtance of Chriſt's dying for men, who were neither righteous nor good.

Ver. 8. But God commendeth his love towards us, &c.] That is, he hath manifeſted it, which was before hid in his heart; he has given clear evidence of it, a full proof and demonſtration of it; he has ſo confirmed it by this inſtance, that there's no room nor reaſon to doubt of it; he has illuſtrated and ſet it off with the greater luſtre by this circumſtance of it, in that while we were yet ſinners Chriſt died for us. God's elect were ſinners in Adam, in whom they were naturally and federally, as all mankind were; hence polluted and guilty; and ſo they are in their own perſons whilſt unregenerate: they are dead in ſin, and live in it, commit it, are ſlaves unto it, and are under the power and dominion of it; and many of them are the chief and vileſt of ſinners; and ſuch they were conſidered when Chriſt died for them: but are not God's people ſinners after converſion? yes; but ſin has not the dominion over them; their life is not a courſe of ſinning, as before; and beſides, they are openly juſtified and pardoned, as well as renewed, and ſanctified, and live in newneſs of life; ſo that their characters now are taken, not from their worſe, but better part. And that before converſion is particularly mentioned here, to illuſtrate the love of God to them, notwithſtanding this their character and condition; and to ſhew that the love of God to them was very early; it anteceded their converſion; it was before the death of Chriſt for them; yea, it was from everlaſting: and alſo to expreſs the freeneſs of it, and to make it appear, that it did not ariſe from any lovelineſs in them; or from any love in them to him; nor from any works of righteouſneſs done by them, but from his own ſovereign will and pleaſure.

Ver. 9. Much more then being now juſtified by his blood, &c.] The Apoſtle here argues from juſtification by Chriſt to ſalvation by him, there being a certain and inſeparable connexion between theſe two; whoever is juſtified ſhall be ſaved; and ſpeaks of juſtification as being now by his blood. Juſtification in God's mind from eternity proceeded upon the ſuretyſhip, engagements of Chriſt to be performed in time; the Old Teſtament ſaints were juſtified of God with a view to the blood of the Lamb which was to be ſhed; this blood was now ſhed, and an application of juſtification by it was now made to the perſons ſpoken of; which is the reaſon of this way of ſpeaking. The blood of Chriſt intends his death, as appears from the context, and ſhews it to be a violent death; death by the effuſion of blood. There is an emphaſis upon it, his blood; not the blood of bulls and goats, nor of a mere innocent creature, but of Chriſt the Son of God; which is therefore efficacious to all the purpoſes for which is was ſhed, and particularly juſtification. This being aſcribed to it, ſhews the concern Chriſt had in it, his blood is here put for the whole matter of juſtification, the ſhedding of that being the finiſhing part of it; and that our juſtification before God proceeds upon the foot of a ſatisfaction made to the law and juſtice of God: hence ſuch as are intereſted in it, ſhall be ſaved from wrath thro' him; not from wrath, as a corruption in their own hearts, which oftentimes breaks forth; nor as appearing among the people of God one towards another, which is ſometimes very bitter; or as in their avowed enemies, the effects of which they often feel; nor from the wrath of devils, which is as the roaring of a lion; but from the wrath of God, from a ſenſe and apprehenſion of it in their own conſciences, which the law works; from which juſtification by the blood of Chriſt frees them; tho' under firſt awakenings they feel it, and ſometimes under afflictive diſpenſations of providence, are ready to fear it; and alſo from the infliction of vindictive wrath or puniſhment for ſin; for tho' they are as deſerving of it as others, yet as they are not appointed to it, ſo they are intirely delivered from it, thro' Chriſt's ſuſtaining it in their room and ſtead; wherefore they are ſecure from it both in this life, and in the world to come.

Ver. 10. For if when we were enemies, &c.] For the further illuſtration of the love of God expreſſed to ſinners, by the death of his Son, the ſtate and condition God's elect were in when Chriſt died for them is taken notice of; they were enemies; to God, to his being, perfections, purpoſes, and providences; to Chriſt, to his perſon, offices, grace, and righteouſneſs; to the Spirit, the things of the Spirit, and his divine operations and influences; to the people of God, and to the Goſpel and ordinances of Chriſt; which enmity is deeply rooted in their minds, is cauſeleſs, and undeſerved, and is implacable, and irreconcileable without the power and grace of God; which grace of God is wonderfully diſplayed in the reconciliation of ſuch perſons, by the death of his Son. Reconciliation implies a former ſtate of friendſhip, a breach of that friendſhip, and a making of it up again; which no ways contradicts the everlaſting and unchangeable love of God to his people; for this is not a reconciliation of God to them, but of them to God: we were reconciled to God; not God to us; and this reconciliation is for their ſins, an atonement for them, rather than of their perſons; which being done, their perſons are reconciled, not to the love, grace, and mercy of God, or to his affections, in which they always had a ſhare, but to the juſtice of God, injured and offended by their ſins; and ſo both juſtice and holineſs on one ſide, and love, grace, and mercy on the other, are reconciled together, in the buſineſs of their ſalvation; which is brought about by the ſufferings and death of Chriſt: this expreſſes the wonderful love of God, ſince this reconciliation ariſes purely from himſelf; the ſcheme of it is of his own contriving; he, whoſe juſtice was affronted, and whoſe law was broken, took the firſt ſtep towards it, and conducted the whole affair; and which was effected at the expence of the blood and life of his own Son, and that for perſons who were enemies to them both. In conſequence of this, another reconciliation of them is made by the Spirit of God in regeneration, of which notice is taken in this paſſage: much more being reconciled; to God, as a ſovereign God, in his decrees, in his providences, and in the method of ſalvation by his Son; to Chriſt, to the way of ſalvation by him, ſo as to ſubmit both to his righteouſneſs for juſtification, and to the ſceptre of his kingdom, to be ruled and governed by it; to the Spirit, ſo as to be led by him, to walk after him, and to depend upon him for the carrying on, and finiſhing the good work of grace begun in them; to the people of God, ſo as to love them, and delight in their company; and to the Goſpel and ordinances, ſo as highly to value them, long after them, and take pleaſure in them. Now from both theſe reconciliations is inferr'd the ſure and certain ſalvation of perſons ſo reconciled: we ſhall be ſaved by his life; by the life of Chriſt, and which deſigns not ſo much his life as God; or his living in the hearts of his people by faith; tho' neither of them are to be excluded; but his life, as man, and that not either his private or publick life, as man here on earth, tho' this has an influence upon, and a concern in the buſineſs of ſalvation; but more eſpecially here is meant the interceding life of Chriſt in heaven, where he lives, and ever lives to make interceſſion for his people, and to ſee the ſalvation he has obtained by his death applied unto them, and they put into the poſſeſſion of it.

Ver. 11. And not only ſo, but we alſo joy in God, &c.] Something ſeems here to be underſtood, and which is to be ſupplied thus; not only we are ſaved by his life, and from wrath thro' him; not only are we reconciled to God by his Son, and Spirit; not only Chriſt has died for us while ſinners and ungodly; not only do we glory in tribulations, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God: but we alſo joy in God; himſelf, as our covenant God and Father in Chriſt, as the God of all grace, peace, and ſalvation; variation; in his perfections, as engaged on our ſide, and as glorified in our ſalvation; in the purpoſes of God, and his covenant-tranſactions with his Son, as they are made known in the everlaſting Goſpel; in all his providential diſpenſations, which are mercy and truth; and in our being of him in Chriſt, and Chriſt's being made unto us wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption; in all the bleſſings of grace we receive from him, the glory of which is his due; and in his ſight and preſence, and in the enjoyment of him. The means by which ſaints come at this joying and glorying in God, is thro' our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; not the light of nature, nor the law of Moſes, nor any works of righteouſneſs done by men, nor thro' angels or ſaints, but Chriſt, and him only; for 'tis only in and thro' him that God is their covenant God and Father; by him only have they the agreeable view of his glorious perfections; in him only all his purpoſes and promiſes have their fulfilment; 'tis by his hands, and thro' his blood, that all the bleſſings of grace are conveyed to them; their acceſs to God is only by him; and by him they give the praiſe and glory of every mercy to him. And the ground of this joy is the expiation of ſin by Chriſt, by whom we have now received the atonement; atonement is not made, but received by us; which denotes the application of the atoning blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt to the conſcience, the Spirit's witneſs of intereſt in it, and the office of faith, as a recipient of it: 'tis not faith, nor any thing elſe of the creature's, that makes the atonement, only Chriſt; but faith receives it from him, and by him; which, as it is the ground of preſent joying in God, ſo it is the foundation of hope of future glory: the word now refers to the Goſpel-diſpenſation. The poor Jews are at the utmoſt loſs about atonement: ſometimes they tell [c] us it is by confeſſion, repentance, and good works; ſometimes by beneficence and hoſpitality [d]; ſometimes they ſay their captivity is their atonement [e]; and, at other times, that death expiates all their ſins [f]. Bleſſed be God for the atoning ſacrifice of Chriſt!

Ver. 12. Wherefore as by one man ſin entred into the world, &c.] The deſign of theſe words and of the following, is to ſhew how men came to be in the condition before deſcribed, as ungodly, ſinners and enemies; and to expreſs the love of Chriſt in the redemption of them; and the largeneſs of God's grace to all ſorts of men: the connexion of them is with the foregoing verſe, by which it appears that the ſaints have not only an expiation of ſin by the blood of Chriſt, but a perfect righteouſneſs, by which they are juſtified in the ſight of God; and the manner how they came at it, or this becomes theirs, together with the neceſſity of their having ſuch an one, are here declared: by the one man is meant Adam the firſt man, and parent of mankind, who is mentioned by name in ver. 14. ſin which came by him deſigns a ſingle ſin, and not many, even the firſt ſin of Adam, which goes by different names, as ſin here, tranſgreſſion, ver. 14. the offence or fall, ver. 15, 17, 18. diſobedience, ver. 19. and whatever was the firſt ſtep or motive to it, which led to it, whether pride, unbelief or concupiſcence, it was finiſhed by eating the forbidden fruit; and is called ſin emphatically, becauſe it contained all ſin in it, was attended with aggravating circumſtances, and followed with diſmal conſequences. Hence may be learnt the origin of moral evil among men, which comes not from God, but man; of this it is ſaid, that it entered into the world; not the world above, there ſin entered by the devil; but the world below, and it firſt entered into paradiſe, and then paſſed thro' the whole world; it entered into men by the ſnares of ſatan, and by him it enters into all the inhabitants of the world; into all men that deſcend from him by ordinary generation, and that ſo powerfully that there is no ſtopping of it. It has entered by him, not by imitation, for it has entered into ſuch as never ſinned after the ſimilitude of his tranſgreſſion, infants or otherwiſe, death could not have entred into them, and into ſuch who never heard of it, as the heathens; beſides, ſin entered as death did, which was not by imitation but imputation, for all men are reckoned dead in Adam, being accounted ſinners in him; add to this, that in the ſame way Chriſt's righteouſneſs comes upon us, which is by imputation, Adams ſin enters into us, or becomes ours; upon which death follows, and death by ſin; that is, death has entred into the world of men by ſin, by the firſt ſin of the firſt man; not only a corporal death, but a ſpiritual or moral one, man in conſequence of this, becoming dead in ſin, deprived of righteouſneſs, and averſe, and impotent to all that is good; and alſo an eternal death, to which he is liable; for the wages of ſin is death, even eternal death: all mankind are in a law-ſenſe dead; the ſentence of condemnation and death immediately paſſed on Adam as ſoon as he had ſinned, and upon all his poſterity; and ſo death paſſed upon all men; the reaſon of which was, for that, or becauſe in him all have ſinned: all men were naturally and ſeminally in him; as he was the common parent of mankind, he had all human nature in him, and was alſo the covenant-head, and repreſentative of all his poſterity; ſo that they were in him both naturally and federally, and ſo ſinned in him; and fell with him by his firſt tranſgreſſion into condemnation and death. The ancient Jews and ſome of the modern ones, have ſaid many things agreeable to the Apoſtle's doctrine of original ſin; they own the imputation of the guilt of Adam's ſin to his poſterity to condemnation and death; "thro' the ſin of the firſt man, ſay they [g], אתה מת, "thou art dead; for he brought death into the "world:" nothing is more frequently ſaid by them than that Adam and Eve thro' the evil counſel of the ſerpent, גרימו מותא לון ולכל עלמא, were the cauſe of death to themſelves and to all the world [h]; and that thro' their eating of the fruit of the tree, אתחייבו מותא כל דיירי ארעא, all the inhabitants of the earth became guilty of death [i]: and that this was not merely a corporal death, they gather from the doubling of the word in the threatning, in dying thou ſhalt die; "this doubled death, ſay they [k], "without doubt is the puniſhment of the body by "itſelf, ולנפש בפני עצמה, and alſo of the ſoul by "itſelf." They ſpeak of ſome righteous perſons who died, not for any ſin of their own, but purely on the account of Adam's ſin; as Benjamin the ſon of Jacob, Amram the father of Moſes, and Jeſſe the father of David, and Chileab the ſon of David [l], to theſe may be added Joſhua the ſon of Nun, and Zelophehad and Levi: the corruption and pollution of human nature thro' the ſin of Adam is clearly expreſſed by them; "when Adam ſinned, ſay "they [m], he drew upon him a defiled power, "וסאיב ליה ולכל בני עלמא, and defiled himſelf "and all the people of the world." Again [n], "this "vitioſity which comes from the ſin and infection "of our firſt parents, has invaded both faculties "of the rational ſoul, the underſtanding by which "we apprehend, and the will by which we deſire." This corruption of nature they call יצר הרע, the evil imagination, which they ſay [o], is planted in a man's heart at the time of his birth; and others ſay [p], that it is in him before he is born: hence Philo the Jew ſays [q], that συμφυες το αμαρτανειν εστι, to ſin is connatural, to every man that is born, even tho' a good man; and talks [r] of συγγεγενημενον κακον, evil that is born with us, and of [s] συγγενεις κηρες, ſpots that are of neceſſity born with every mortal man. And ſo his countrymen [t] often ſpeak of it as natural and inſeparable to men; yea they repreſent Adam as the root and head of mankind, in whom the whole world and all human nature ſinned: deſcanting on thoſe words, as one that lieth upon the top of a maſt; "this ſay they [u], is the firſt man who was "ראש לכל בני אדם, an head to all the children "of men; for by means of wine death was inflicted "on him, and he was the cauſe of bringing the "ſorrows of death into the world." And in another place ſpeaking of Adam, they ſay [w], that "he "was עיקר בריאה של עולם, the root of the crea- "tion, or of the men of the world; and death was "inflicted upon him and on his ſeed, becauſe he "ſinned one ſin in eating of the tree." And it is obſerved, "that הא הידיעה, the He demonſtra- "tive is not prefixed in ſcripture to proper names, "which yet is to the word Adam; the reaſon is, "ſay they [x], becauſe in Adam all his poſterity are "pointed at, and the whole human ſpecies de- "ſigned." Again, they obſerve [y], that "the end "of man is to die, of which this is the reaſon, "becauſe מין האדם, mankind has ſinned; that "is, the nature of which he is compoſed, or "in other words, Adam and Eve have ſin- "ned." Once more [z], "when he (Adam) ſinned, "כל העולם כלו חטא, all the whole world ſinned, "and his ſin we bear;" and [a] that "the whole con- "gregation of Iſrael have need of atonement for the "ſin of the firſt Adam, for he was חשוב ככל העדה, "reckoned as the whole congregation;" which exactly tallies with the Apoſtle's aſſertion in this text.

Ver. 13. For until the law, ſin was in the world, &c.] This is a proof of ſin's having entred into the world, by one man's tranſgreſſion of the poſitive law of God, which forbid him the eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil; ſince it was in the world before the law of Moſes was given: the ſin of Adam and the guilt of that were in the world before, and came upon all men to condemnation; the general corruption of nature appeared before; and actual ſins, and tranſgreſſions of all ſorts were committed before; as by the immediate poſterity of Adam, by the men of the old world, by the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, by the patriarchs and their poſterity, by the Egyptians, Canaanites, and others. They were all guilty of ſin, corrupted by it, and under the dominion of it, except ſuch as were releaſed from it by the grace of God: now when ſin is ſaid to be until this time, the meaning is not that it exiſted and continued until the law of Moſes took place and then ceaſed; for that law did not, and could not take away ſin, it rather increaſed it, at leaſt it became more known by it; but that it was in being before it, and had influence and power over the ſons of men, ſo as to ſubject them to death: but ſin is not imputed when there is no law. This looks like an objection, that if there was no law before Moſes's time, then there was no ſin, nor could any action of man be known or accounted by them as ſinful, or be imputed to them to condemnation; or rather it is a conceſſion, allowing that where there is no law, ſin is not imputed; but there was a law before that law of Moſes, which law was tranſgreſſed, and the ſin or tranſgreſſion of it was imputed to men to condemnation and death, as appears from what follows.

Ver. 14. Nevertheleſs death reigned from Adam to Moſes, &c.] Tho' the law of Moſes was not yet given, death exerted itſelf, and extended its dominion over all the ſons and daughters of Adam, during the interval between Adam and Moſes; which clearly ſhews that ſin was in the world, and that there muſt be a law in being, which that was a tranſgreſſion of: death is repreſented as a king, as ſin and ſatan ſometimes are; and indeed, death reigns by ſin, and ſatan both by ſin and death; their empires riſe, ſtand, and fall together. So Bildad calls death the king of terrors, Job xiv. 18. and a very formidable and powerful king he is; his dominion is very large, his power uncontroulable, and the dread of him very great, eſpecially to Chriſtleſs ſinners. The Jews ſay [b], that at the reſurrection the world will be renewed, and will not be as at the firſt, when דשליט מותא בעלמא, death reigned in the world; referring to the ſame period of time the Apoſtle here does. The ſubjects of his government were not only adult perſons, who had been guilty of many actual tranſgreſſions, but he reigned even over them that had not ſinned after the ſimilitude of Adam's tranſgreſſion. This does not exclude the dominion of death over ſuch who had ſinned after the likeneſs of Adam, but rather confirms its power over them; nor does it intend adult Gentiles, who did not ſin in the ſame manner, nor againſt the ſame law, as Adam did; but it deſigns infants, not yet guilty of actual ſin; and therefore ſince death reigns over them, who only holds and exerciſes his dominion by virtue of ſin, it follows, that they muſt have original ſin in them; the guilt of Adam's tranſgreſſion muſt be imputed to them, and the corruption of nature, from him, derived unto them, or it could not reign over them. A child of a year old the Jewiſh doctors [c] ſay, has not taſted the taſte of ſin, that is, has not committed actual ſin; and obſerve [d], that young children die on account of the ſins of their parents: but the true reaſon of their dying is here ſuggeſted by the Apoſtle; which is, the tranſgreſſion of Adam: who is the figure of him that was to come; meaning, either his poſterity that were to come out of his loins, whoſe figure, type, and repreſentative he was; or rather Chriſt, who is ſometimes called, ο ερχομενος, he that was to come; and the Arabic verſion reads the words thus, who was a type of Adam that was expected; that is, of Chriſt the ſecond Adam, that was expected to come, according to the promiſe and prophecy: of him the firſt Adam was a type, in his human nature, in the formation and quality of it; as the firſt Adam was made by God of the virgin earth, the ſecond Adam was born of a virgin; as the firſt, ſo the ſecond Adam was pure, holy, upright, and wiſe; in his office, as Lord of the world, head of the woman, prieſt in his houſe, and prophet to his poſterity; in his marriage with Eve, a figure of the church; but in nothing more clearly than in his being a covenant-head to all his offspring: and this is what the Apoſtle chiefly deſigns, ſince he runs the parallel between them on this account in the following verſes; ſhewing, that as the one conveyed ſin and death to all his ſeed, ſo the other communicates righteouſneſs and life to all that belong to him. So the Jews ſay[e], that by Adam is intimated the righteous branch, the Meſſiah; and that סוד אדם הוא סוד משיח, the ſecret of Adam is the ſecret of the Meſſiah.

Ver. 15. But not as the offence, ſo alſo is the free gift, &c.] By the offence, or fall, as the word ſignifies, is meant the firſt ſin of Adam; by which he offended God, and fell from that eſtate in which he was created, and all his poſterity with him; and by the free gift is meant, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which juſtifies from that, and all other offences: now, though there is a great likeneſs between Adam and Chriſt; both are men, the firſt Adam is called the one man, and ſo is the ſecond Adam Jeſus Chriſt; partly for the ſake of the compariſon between him and the firſt, and alſo to expreſs the truth of his human nature; and becauſe the Redeemer ought to be a man, though not a mere man; both are ſole authors of what they convey to their reſpective offſpring, Adam of ſin, Chriſt of righteouſneſs; both convey ſingle things, Adam only one ſin, not more, for when he had committed one ſin, he broke the covenant made with him and his poſterity, and ſo ceaſed in after acts to be a repreſentative of them; Chriſt conveys his righteouſneſs, or obedience to the law, without any additional works of righteouſneſs of ours to compleat it; and both convey what they do, to all their reſpective offſpring: yet there is a diſſimilitude between them, as to the manner of conveyance and the effects thereof; the offence or ſin of Adam, is conveyed in a natural way, or by natural generation, to all who deſcend from him in that manner; the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is conveyed in a way of grace, to his ſpiritual ſeed: hence it is called, not only the free gift, but the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man Jeſus Chriſt; becauſe of the grace of the Father, in fixing and ſettling the method of juſtification, by the righteouſneſs of his Son; in ſending him to work out one, that would be ſatiſfying to law and juſtice; and in his gracious acceptation of it, on the behalf of his people, and the imputation of it to them; and becauſe of the grace of the Son in becoming man, in being made under the law, yea, made ſin and a curſe, in order to bring in an everlaſting righteouſneſs; and becauſe of the grace of the Spirit, in revealing and applying it, and working faith to receive it; for as the righteouſneſs itſelf is a free-grace gift, beſtowed upon unworthy perſons, ſo is faith likewiſe, by which it is laid hold on and embraced: and as there is a diſagreement in the manner of conveying theſe things, ſo likewiſe in the effects they have upon the perſons, to whom they are conveyed; and the Apoſtle argues from the influence and effect the one has, to the far greater and better influence and effect the other has: for if through the offence of one many be dead; as all Adam's poſterity are, not only ſubject to a corporal death, but involved in a moral or ſpiritual, and liable to an eternal one, through the imputation of guilt, and the derivation of a corrupt nature from him: then much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man Jeſus Chriſt, hath abounded unto many; that is, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, in which the grace of God is ſo illuſtrious, is much more effectual, to the giving of life to all his ſeed and offspring; not barely ſuch a life as Adam had in innocence, and which he loſt by the offence, but a ſpiritual and an eternal one; which ſhews the exuberance of this grace, which ſecures and adjudges to a better life than what was loſt by the fall.

Ver. 16. And not as it was by one that ſinned, ſo is the gift, &c.] The Apoſtle goes on with the diſſimilitude between the effects of Adam's ſin, and Chriſt's righteouſneſs: for the judgment was by one to condemnation; by judgment is meant, not the judgment of God, or the judiciary ſentence pronounced by God on Adam and his poſterity for ſin; but the guilt of the one man's ſin, which is imputed to all men to condemnation, on account of which the ſentence of condemnation paſſed on all men; the law tranſgreſſed, became a miniſtration of condemnation to them: but the free gift is of many offences unto juſtification; the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which ſtands oppoſed to the guilt of Adam's ſin, being imputed to all his offſpring, is to the juſtification of them; and that not only from the guilt of that particular offence, but from many other offences, even all their actual ſins and tranſgreſſions, of every ſort; which is another inſtance of the exuberance, or abounding of the grace of God, in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, not only over the ſin of the one man, but alſo over the ſins of many, even all the elect of God; for the laſt clauſe may be alſo thus rendered, the free gift is of the offences of many, unto juſtification.

Ver. 17. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one, &c.] It may be rendered, by one offence death reigned by one; for it was the ſingle ſin of Adam, the firſt ſin that was committed by him, which gave death its reigning power over the ſons of men: "Adam, ſay[f] the Jewiſh doctors, tranſ-"greſſed, על פקודא חד דאורייתא, one command-"ment of the law, and was the cauſe of death to "himſelf, and to all the world." Theſe words are a repetition, with a further explanation, of ver. 15. there 'tis ſaid, through the offence of one many be dead; here by one man's offence, or by one offence, death reigned by one; in which death is repreſented as a mighty monarch, a powerful king; and deſigns not only corporal death, which has mounted the throne by ſin, and is ſupported in its dominion by an ordinance of heaven; but alſo a moral or ſpiritual death, which has ſeized on all mankind, and reigns in every power and faculty of the ſoul of man; and likewiſe an eternal one, which will have power over all thoſe, who have no part in the firſt reſurrection: in ver. 15. the grace of God, and the gift by grace, are ſaid to abound unto many; here they are ſaid to receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteouſneſs: by abundance of grace is deſigned, either ſomething diſtinct from the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt; ſuch as the abundant grace and mercy of God, in regeneration and converſion; the various graces of the Spirit then implanted; the many things then wrought in the heart; the large diſcoveries of pardoning grace, and the abundance of the love of God ſhed abroad in the ſoul by the Spirit: or rather the ſame with the gift of righteouſneſs, becauſe of the large diſplay of the grace of God in it; by which righteouſneſs is meant, not righteouſneſs or holineſs infuſed into us; but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which is a free-grace gift, and is enjoyed in a way of receiving; which denotes the act of faith, and ſuppoſes giving; and hence there is no room for boaſting, but great reaſon for thankfulneſs: now ſuch perſons who have received this abundant grace and free gift, ſhall reign in life by one, Jeſus Chriſt; in corporal life, they are not now ſubject to death as a penal evil, as other perſons are, and though they die this death, they'll triumph over it in the reſurrection morn, they'll riſe again to everlaſting life; they reign now in ſpiritual life over ſin, ſatan, and the world; and they'll reign in eternal life, they'll ſit on thrones, wear crowns, and poſſeſs a kingdom of glory for ever and ever; and all by and through one Jeſus Chriſt, and not on account of any works, or merits of theirs.

[f] Zohar in Num fol. 52. 1. Vid. Caphtor, fol. 102. 1.

Ver. 18. Therefore as by the offence of one, &c.] Or by one offence, as before, the guilt of which is imputed to, and judgment came upon all men to condemnation; which word is uſed in a law ſenſe, and intends condemnation to eternal death, as appears from the antitheſis in the text; for if juſtification of life, means an adjudging to eternal life, as it certainly does, the judgment or guilt, which is unto condemnation, muſt deſign a condemnation to eternal death, the juſt wages of ſin: and this ſentence of condemnation comes upon all men, all the ſons of Adam without exception, even upon the elect of God themſelves; though it is not executed upon them, but on their ſurety, whereby they are delivered from it: even ſo by the righteouſneſs of one, the free gift came upon all men to juſtification of life; the righteouſneſs of Chriſt being freely imputed without works, as it is to all the men that belong to the ſecond Adam, to all his ſeed and offspring, is their juſtification of life, or what adjudges and entitles them to eternal life. The ſentence of juſtification was conceived in the mind of God from eternity, when his elect were ordained unto eternal life, on the foot of his Son's righteouſneſs; this paſſed on Chriſt at his reſurrection from the dead, and on all his people as conſidered in him, when they in conſequence of it, were quickened together with him; and this paſſes upon the conſcience of a ſinner at believing, when he may, as he ſhould, reckon himſelf alive unto God, and is what gives him a right and title to everlaſting life and glory.

Ver. 19. For as by one man's diſobedience many were made ſinners, &c.] Agreeable to this the Jews ſay [g], that "for the ſin of the firſt man, all "that are born of him, הויין רשעים, become "wicked." This is the ſum of what is ſaid in the foregoing verſes, that as by Adam's ſin all his poſterity are made ſinners, and ſo are brought under a ſentence of condemnation; in like manner by the obedience of Chriſt, all his ſeed are made righteous, and come under a ſentence of juſtification of life: the perſons made ſinners are ſaid to be many, in oppoſition to the one man, by whoſe diſobedience they became ſo, and becauſe there is an exception of one, even Jeſus Chriſt; and mean all the natural deſcendants of Adam, who are many, and are ſo called, to anſwer to the ſubjects of juſtification in the next clauſe: what they are made ſinners by, is the diſobedience of one man, Adam; and by the firſt and ſingle diſobedience of his, in eating the fruit of the forbidden tree, by which they were made ſinners: the meaning of which is not, that they became ſufferers for it, or ſubject to death on the account of it; the word uſed will not bear ſuch a ſenſe, but ſignifies men guilty of ſin, and ſometimes the worſt and chief of ſinners; beſides, the Apoſtle had expreſſed that before; add to this, that the ſons of Adam could not be ſufferers for his ſin, or ſubject to death on account of it, if they were not made ſinners by it, or involved in the guilt of it: and though the poſterity of Adam are habitually ſinnets, that is, derive corrupt nature from Adam, yet this is not meant here; but that they are become guilty, through the imputation of his ſin to them; for it is by the diſobedience of another they are made ſinners, which muſt be by the imputation of that diſobedience to them; he ſinned, and they ſinned in him, when they had as yet no actual exiſtence; which could be no other way, than by imputation, as he was reckoned and accounted their head and repreſentative, and they reckoned and accounted in him, and ſo have ſinned in him. This is alſo evident, from the ſentence of condemnation and death paſſing upon all men for it; and even upon thoſe, who had not actually ſinned; to which may be added, that Adam's poſterity are made ſinners through his diſobedience, in the ſame way as Chriſt's ſeed are made righteous by his obedience, which is by the imputation of it to them: ſo by the obedience of one ſhall many be made righteous; not by their own obedience; nor by their own obedience and Chriſt's together; but by his ſole and ſingle obedience to the law of God: and the perſons made righteous by it, are not all the poſterity of Adam, and yet not a few of them; but many, even all the elect of God, and ſeed of Chriſt; theſe are all made righteous in the ſight of God, are juſtified from all their ſins, and entitled to eternal life and happineſs.

Ver. 20. Moreover, the law entered, that the offence might abound, &c.] By the law is meant, not the law of nature, much leſs the law of ſin; rather the ceremonial law, which came in over and above the moral law; it entered but for a time; by which ſin abounded, and appeared very ſinful; and through it the grace of God much more abounded, in the ſacrifice of Chriſt prefigured by it: but the moral law, as it came by Moſes, is here intended; which entered with great pomp and ſolemnity on mount Sinai; and intervened, or came between Adam's ſin and Chriſt's ſacrifice; and alſo came in beſides, or over and above the promiſe of life by Chriſt; and may moreover be ſaid to enter into the conſcience of a ſinner, with the power and energy of the Spirit of God: and the end of its entrance is, that the offence might abound; meaning either the ſin of Adam, he had been ſpeaking of under that name, that that itſelf, and the imputation of it to his poſterity, and alſo the pollution of human nature by it, together with all the aggravating circumſtances of it, might appear more manifeſt; or ſin in general, any and all actual tranſgreſſions, which abound through the law's diſcovering the evil nature of them, and ſo taking away all excuſe, or pretext of ignorance; by prohibiting them, whereby the corrupt nature of man becomes more eager after them; and by accuſing, threatning, terrifying, and condemning, on account of them: one view of the Apoſtle in this, doubtleſs, is to ſhew, that there can be no juſtification by the law: but where ſin abounded, grace did much more abound; ſin has abounded in human nature, in all the individuals of it; and grace has ſuperabounded in the ſame nature, being aſſumed by the Son of God, and united to him, who has appeared in it full of grace and truth: ſin has abounded in all the powers and faculties of the ſoul, in the underſtanding, will, and affections, of an unregenerate man; but in regeneration, the grace of God much more abounds, in the ſame powers and faculties, enlightening the underſtanding, ſubduing the will, and influencing the affections with love to divine things: ſin abounded in the Gentile world, before the preaching of the Goſpel in it; but afterwards grace did ſuperabound, in the converſion of multitudes in it from idols, to ſerve the living God; and where ſin has abounded in particular perſons to a very great height, grace has exceeded it, as in Manaſſeh, Mary Magdalene, Saul, and others.

[g] Tzeror Hammor, fol. 97. 1.

Ver. 21. That as ſin hath reigned unto death, &c.] This is another end of the law's entrance, or rather an illuſtration of the grace of God, by comparing the reigns of ſin and grace together: ſin has ſuch a power over man in a ſtate of nature, as amounts to a dominion; it has not only an enticing, enſnaring power, to draw into a compliance with it, and an obſtructive power to hinder that which is good, and an operative one of that which is evil, and a captivating, enſlaving one to the ſame; but it has a kingly, governing, and commanding power: its dominion is univerſal as to men, and with reſpect both to the members of the body, and faculties of the ſoul; it is ſupported by laws, which are its luſts; and has its voluntary ſubjects, to whom it gives wages; its reign is very cruel and tyrannical; it is unto death corporal, moral, or ſpiritual, and eternal. The ancient Jews, often repreſent ſin in the ſame light; they frequently ſpeak [h] of, יצר הרע שולט, the corruption of nature reigning over men; and ſay [i], that he is מלך, a king over the ſeveral members of the body, which anſwer to him at the word of command. The old and fooliſh king in Eccl. iv. 13. is commonly interpreted by them of ſin; which they ſay [k] is called a king, becauſe he rules in the world, over the children of men, and becauſe all hearken to him: it is a petition much uſed by them [l], "let not the evil "imagination or corruption of nature, rule over "me:" and on the other hand, they repreſent grace, or a principle of goodneſs as a king, reigning over the corruption of nature; thus interpreting theſe words, my ſon fear thou the Lord and the king, they aſk [m], "who is the king? the king, ſay "they, המלך יצר טוב, is the good imagination, or "principle of goodneſs, who reigns over the evil "imagination, which is called a king." And in another place [n], they ſay of a good man, that he, המליך יצר טוב, cauſed the good imagination to reign over the evil one; with which in ſome meaſure agrees what follows: even ſo might grace reign thro' righteouſneſs unto eternal life, by Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; by grace is meant, either grace as it is in the heart of God; which reigns or bears ſway in man's ſalvation in all the parts of it, through righteouſneſs; conſiſtent with the juſtice of God, in a way in which that is glorified, through the redemption of Chriſt: it reigns unto eternal life; grace has promiſed, prepared it, and makes meet for it, and will introduce into it, and freely give it: it reigns by Jeſus Chriſt; grace reigns by him, righteouſneſs, or juſtice is glorified by him, and eternal life is in him, through him, and by him: or grace, as it is in the hearts of converted perſons, is meant where it reigns, has the dominion, is the governing principle, and that in a way of righteouſneſs and true holineſs; and will reign until it is perfected in glory, or is crowned with eternal life; all which are by Jeſus Chriſt, namely grace, righteouſneſs, and life.

CHAP. VI.

THE Apoſtle having finiſhed his deſign concerning the doctrine of juſtification, refutes the charge brought againſt it as a licentious doctrine, and prevents any ill uſe that might be made of it by men of evil minds, and preſſes juſtified perſons by the ſtrongeſt arguments, and with the beſt of motives, to holineſs of life and converſation: he ſaw, that whereas he had affirmed in the preceding chapter, that ſin being made to abound by the law, in the condemnation of ſinners, the grace of God the more abounded in their juſtification and pardon; that ſome would riſe up and object, that this doctrine countenances mens continuance in ſin, and opens a door to all manner of iniquity; and that others would abuſe this doctrine, and encourage themſelves in a vicious courſe of life, upon this miſtaken notion, that the grace of God would be the more illuſtrious by it; all which is ſuggeſted in ver. 1. to which an anſwer is returned in ver. 2. with an abhorrence of every thing of this kind; and by an argument, ſhewing the abſurdity and inconſiſtency of it, ſeeing perſons dead to ſin, as juſtified ones are, cannot live in it: and that they are dead to ſin, and under obligation to live unto righteouſneſs, he argues from their baptiſm into Chriſt's death, which repreſents their being dead with Chriſt, and buried with him, ver. 3, 4. and likewiſe the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, and theirs by him, whereby they are both fitted and obliged to walk in newneſs of life; ſince they are, and ſhould be like him, as in his death, ſo in his reſurrection from the dead; and the rather, as they are implanted in him, as the branches in the vine, ver. 4, 5. and eſpecially as it was the great end of his death, that by the crucifixion of ſin with him, it might ſo be deſtroyed, that his people ſhould be no more ſervants to it, ver. 6. this being proved, that juſtified ones are dead to ſin, the Apoſtle argues upon it, that ſuch are freed from ſin, ver. 7. and therefore ought not, and cannot live in it; for this muſt be given into as an article of faith, that ſuch as are dead with Chriſt live, and ſhall live, a life of communion with him, ver. 8. which is inconſiſtent with living in ſin: he further argues from the reſurrection of Chriſt, which was not to die more, ver. 9. and ſuggeſts, that in like manner thoſe who have been dead and buried, and riſen with him, which their baptiſm ſignifies, ſhould not live in ſin, which is no other than dying again; and to ſtrengthen this, directs to the ends of Chriſt's death and reſurrection, ver. 10. the end of the one being unto ſin, to finiſh, make an end of that, and be the death of it, and the end of the other, being living unto God; wherefore in like manner, ſuch who profeſs to be Chriſt's, to be juſtified by his righteouſneſs, to be baptized into his death, and to be riſen with him, ſhould account themſelves dead unto ſin, and ſo not live in it, and alive to God through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and ſo live to his honour and glory, ver. 11. and having thus anſwered the objection, and removed the calumny, and ſet this matter in a clear light, the Apoſtle proceeds to dehort from ſinning, and to exhort to holineſs of life, ver. 12, 13. in which he compares ſin to a tyrant, the luſts of it to the laws of ſuch an one, and which therefore ſhould not be obeyed; and the rather, as the wages of them are death, and have made the body already mortal; wherefore the members of it ſhould not be employed in ſuch ſervice, but in the ſervice of God: and whereas it might be objected, that ſin is too ſtrong and prevalent, and has got the maſtery, and will keep its power, the Apoſtle declares it as a promiſe of grace, that ſin ſhall not have the dominion, ver. 14. giving this as a reaſon, becauſe ſuch as are juſtified and ſanctified, are not under the law, as a covenant of works, but under the covenant of grace, of which this promiſe is a part; and in order to prevent an ill uſe of this doctrine, and remove an objection that might be made, that if not under the law, men are under no reſtraints, but may go on in ſin without controul, he anſwers it with his uſual deteſtation, ver. 15. and argues the folly and abſurdity of living in ſin upon ſuch an account, becauſe it would make them ſervants of ſin unto death, ver. 16. and ſo they were before converſion, but now were otherwiſe, for which they had reaſon to be thankful, ver. 17. ſince through the grace of God, they had yielded an hearty obedience to the Goſpel; wherefore to obey ſin, would be to return to their former ſtate of bondage; whereas being freed from the power and dominion of ſin, they were now the ſervants of righteouſneſs, and ought to act becoming ſuch a character, ver. 18. wherefore it was but acting the part of reaſonable men, it was but their reaſonable ſervice, to yield themſelves ſervants, not to ſin and uncleanneſs, but to righteouſneſs and holineſs, ver. 19. in order to engage to which, the Apoſtle puts them in mind of their former ſtate; how that when they were in ſubjection to ſin, they had nothing to do with the exerciſe of righteouſneſs, ver. 20. and therefore as there was an alteration made in them, they ought to be juſt the reverſe in their conduct and converſation; for he appeals to them, that they had no pleaſure nor profit in their former courſe of life; which had brought upon them ſhame and confuſion, and muſt have ended in death, had it not been for the grace of God, ver. 21. but now as they were delivered from the ſlavery and dominion of ſin, they were under a better maſter, were ſervants to God; and the fruit of their ſervice was holineſs, and the iſſue of all would be everlaſting life, ver. 22. which is illuſtrated by the contrary, ver. 23. the wages due from the ſervice of ſin, and which only could be expected from it, being death; whereas grace and holineſs, the gift of God, iſſue in eternal life by Chriſt Jeſus; in whoſe hands it is, and through whom it comes, and is enjoyed.

Ver. 1. What ſhall we ſay then? &c.] The Apoſtle here obviates an objection he ſaw would be made againſt the doctrine he had advanced, concerning the aboundings of the grace of God in ſuch perſons and places, where ſin had abounded; which if true, might ſome perſons ſay, then it will be moſt fit and proper to continue in a ſinful courſe of life, to give up ourſelves to all manner of iniquity, ſince this is the way to make the grace of God abound yet more and more: now ſays the Apoſtle, what ſhall we ſay to this? how ſhall we anſwer ſuch an objection? ſhall we join with the objectors, and ſay as they do? and ſhall we continue in ſin that grace may abound? that is, ſhall we perſiſt in a vicious way of living with this view, that the grace of God may be magnified hereby? is it right to commit ſin on ſuch an account? or is this a fair inference, a juſt conſequence, drawn from the doctrine of grace? To be ſure it was not, the objection is without any ground and foundation; ſin is not per ſe, the cauſe of the glorifying God's grace, but per accidens: ſin of itſelf is the cauſe of wrath, and not of grace; but God has been pleaſed to take an occaſion of magnifying his grace, in the forgiveneſs of ſin; for it is not by the commiſſion of ſin, but by the pardon of it, that the grace of God is glorified, or made to abound. Moreover, grace in converſion is glorified, by putting a ſtop to the reign of ſin, and not by increaſing its power, which would be done by continuing in it; grace teaches men not to live in ſin, but to abſtain from it; add to this, that it is owing to the want of grace, and not to the aboundings of it, that men at any time abuſe, or make an ill uſe of the doctrines of grace: wherefore the Apoſtle's anſwer is,

Ver. 2. God forbid, &c.] By which he expreſſes his abhorrence of ſuch a practice, and that this was a conſequence which did not follow from the premiſes, and was far enough from his thoughts, and which he had in the greateſt deteſtation: and he further argues againſt it by aſking, how ſhall we that are dead to ſin, live any longer therein? There is a death for ſin, a death in ſin, and a death to ſin; the latter is here mentioned, and perſons may be ſaid to be dead to ſin, both as juſtified and ſanctified: juſtified perſons are dead to ſin, inaſmuch as that is not imputed to them to condemnation and death; they are diſcharged from it; it can't hurt them, or exert its damning power over them; it is crucified, aboliſhed, and made an end of by Chriſt: ſanctified perſons are dead to ſin; ſin is not made their buſineſs, it is not their courſe of life; it is no longer a pleaſure to them, but is loathſome and abominable; it is looked upon, not as a friend, but an enemy; it does not reign, it has not the dominion over them; it is ſubdued in them, and its power weakened; and as to the members of the fleſh, and deeds of the body, 'tis mortified: to live in ſin, is to live after the dictates of corrupt nature; and perſons may be ſaid to live in it, when they give up themſelves to it, are bent upon it; when ſin is their life, they delight in it, make it their work and buſineſs, and the whole courſe of their life is ſinful: now thoſe who are dead to ſin, can't thus live in it, though ſin may live in them; they may fall into ſin, and lie in it ſome time, yet they can't live in it: living in ſin, is not only unbecoming the grace of God revealed in the Goſpel, but is contrary to it; it is deteſtable to gracious minds, yea, it ſeems impoſſible they ſhould live in it; which is ſuggeſted by this queſtion, how ſhall we? &c. The thing is impracticable; for, for a gracious ſoul to live in ſin, would be to die again, to become dead in ſin, which can't be; he that lives and believes in Chriſt ſhall never die, ſpiritually or eternally.

Ver. 3. Know ye not that ſo many of us as, &c.] You muſt know this, you can't be ignorant of it, that whoever were baptized into Jeſus Chriſt, were baptized into his death; and therefore muſt be dead to ſin, and conſequently ought not to live, nor can they live in ſin. This does not ſuppoſe, that ſome of this church were baptized perſons, and others not; but that ſome might be baptized in water, who were not baptized into Chriſt: there's a difference between being baptized in water in the name of Chriſt, and being baptized into Chriſt, which believers in their baptiſm are; by which is meant, not a being brought by it into union with Chriſt, which is either ſecretly from eternity, or openly at converſion, and both before the baptiſm of true believers; nor a being brought by it into the myſtical body of Chriſt the church, for this alſo is before it; but rather it deſigns a being baptized, or a being brought by baptiſm into more communion with Chriſt, into a participation of his grace and benefits; or into the doctrine of Chriſt, and a more diſtinct knowledge of it; the power of which they feel upon their hearts, and ſo have really believed in Chriſt, heartily love him, and make a ſincere profeſſion of him; though rather the true meaning of the phraſe baptized into Chriſt, I take to be, is to be baptized purely for the ſake of Chriſt, in imitation of him, who has ſet us an example, and becauſe baptiſm is an ordinance of his; it is to ſubmit to it with a view to his glory, to teſtify our affection for him, and ſubjection to him, without laying any ſtreſs or dependance on it for ſalvation: ſuch who are thus baptized, are baptized into his death; they not only reſemble Chriſt in his ſufferings and death, by being immerſed in water, but they declare their faith in the death of Chriſt, and alſo ſhare in the benefits of his death; ſuch as peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and atonement: now this proves, that ſuch perſons are dead to ſin, who are ſo baptized; for by the death of Chriſt, into which they are baptized, they are juſtified from ſin; by the death of Chriſt, their old man is crucified, and the body of ſin deſtroyed; beſides, believers in baptiſm, profeſs themſelves to be dead to ſin and the world, and their baptiſm is an obligation upon them to live unto righteouſneſs.

Ver. 4. Therefore we are buried with him by baptiſm into death, &c.] The nature and end of baptiſm are here expreſſed: the nature of it, 'tis a burial; and when the Apoſtle ſo calls it, he manifeſtly refers to the ancient and only way of adminiſtring this ordinance by immerſion; when a perſon is covered, and as it were buried in water, as a corpſe is when laid in the earth, and covered with it: and it is a burial with Chriſt; 'tis a repreſentation of the burial of Chriſt, and of our burial with him as our head and repreſentative, and that into death; meaning either the death of Chriſt as before, that is, ſo as to partake of the benefits of his death; or the death of ſin, of which baptiſm is alſo a token; for believers whilſt under water, are as perſons buried, and ſo dead; which ſignifies not only their being dead with Chriſt, and their communion with him in his death, but alſo their being dead to ſin by the grace of Chriſt, and therefore ought not to live in it; for the Apoſtle is ſtill purſuing his argument, and is ſhewing, from the nature, uſe, and end of baptiſm, that believers are dead to ſin, and therefore cannot, and ought not, to live in it; as more fully appears from the end of baptiſm next mentioned: that like as Chriſt was raiſed up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even ſo we alſo ſhould walk in newneſs of life; for the end of baptiſm, is not only to repreſent the death and burial, but alſo the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, which is here ſaid to be by the glory of the Father: ſome read the words, unto the glory of the Father; meaning either, that the Father might be glorified hereby; or that Chriſt being raiſed from the dead, might enjoy glory with the Father, as he does in human nature; but rather the phraſe expreſſes the means by which, and not the end, to which Chriſt was raiſed from the dead: and by the glory of the Father is meant, the glorious power of the Father, which was eminently diſplayed in raiſing Chriſt from the dead; and as baptiſm is deſigned to repreſent the reſurrection of Chriſt, which is done by raiſing the perſon out of the water, ſo likewiſe to repreſent our reſurrection from the death of ſin, to a life of grace: whence it muſt be greatly incumbent on baptized believers, who are raiſed from the graves of ſin by the power of Chriſt, to walk in newneſs of life; for ſince they are become new creatures, and have new hearts, and new ſpirits given them, new principles of light, life, grace, and holineſs implanted in them, and have entered into a new profeſſion of religion, of which baptiſm is the badge and ſymbol, they ought to live a new life and converſation.

Ver. 5. For if we have been planted together, &c.] This is not to be underſtood of an implantation of Jews and Gentiles together in one body; nor of an implantation of believers together in a church ſtate; but of an implantation of Chriſt and his people together; which is openly done at converſion, in conſequence of a ſecret union with him before; when they are tranſplanted from a ſtate of nature, and are engrafted into Chriſt; have the graces of the Spirit of God implanted in them, and grow up under the dews of grace, and ſhinings of the ſun of righteouſneſs upon them, and bring forth much fruit: now as theſe perſons, by virtue of their ſecret union with Chriſt from eternity, as their head and repreſentative, with whom they were crucified, in whom they died repreſentatively, ſhare in his death, enjoy the benefits of it, and feel its efficacy, and through it become dead to the law, ſin, and the world, which is meant by the likeneſs of his death; ſo theſe ſame perſons ſhall be alſo planted in the likeneſs of his reſurrection; that is, they ſhall ſhare in the benefits, and feel and enjoy the effects of it; not only their bodies will be raiſed at the laſt day, as their ſouls are now regenerated by virtue of it, and in reſemblance to it; but they are, and ſhall be ſo influenced by his Spirit and grace, which has raiſed them from death to life, that they ſhall walk in newneſs of life; of which baptiſm is a lively repreſentation, and to which it is a conſtant obligation.

Ver. 6. Knowing this that our old man is crucified with him, &c.] By the old man is meant, the corruption of nature; called a man, becauſe natural to men; it lives and dwells in them; it has ſpread itſelf over the whole man; it rules and governs in men; and conſiſts of various parts and members, as a man does: its called old, becauſe it is the poiſon of the old ſerpent, with which man was infected by him from the beginning; it is derived from the firſt man that ever was; it is as old as the man is, in whom it is; and is likewiſe called ſo, with reſpect to its duration and continuance; and in oppoſition to, and contradiſtinction from, the new man, or principle of grace: its called ours, becauſe connatural to us; it is in our nature, it cleaves to us, and abides in us. This name the Apoſtle took from his countrymen the Jews, who were wont to call the vitioſity of nature hereby; ſo R. Aba on that paſſage, the firſt-born ſaid to the younger, our father is old, Gen. xix. 31. aſks what is the meaning of this, our father is old? this, anſwers he, is the evil imagination, or corruption of nature, which is called, זקן, old, according to Eccl. iv. 13. and is ſaid to be old, שנולד עם האדם, becauſe it is born with the man [o]; or as the reaſon is elſewhere given [p], becauſe it is joined to him from his birth, to his old age: this they ſay [q], is with a man as ſoon as he is born, from the hour of his birth, as ſoon as ever he comes into the world. Now this is ſaid to be crucified with him; that is, with Chriſt, when he was crucified: the Jews [r] have a notion, that the evil imagination, or corruption of nature, לא יתבטל, will not be made to ceaſe, or be aboliſhed out of the world, till the king Meſſiah comes, and by him it is aboliſhed: this is ſo crucified by the death, and at the croſs of Chriſt, as that it cannot exert its damning power over believers; and is ſo crucified by the Spirit and grace of Chriſt in them, as that it can't reign over them, or exerciſe its domineering power over them; wherefore they are dead unto it, and that to them, and therefore can't live in it; which is done, that the body of ſin might be deſtroyed: by the body of ſin is meant, ſin itſelf, which conſiſts as a body does, of various members; and alſo the power and ſtrength of it, which the Jews [s] call, חילא דיצר הרע, the power of the evil imagination; this is crucified with Chriſt, and nailed to his croſs by his ſacrifice and ſatisfaction, that its damning power might be deſtroyed, aboliſhed, and done away; and it is crucified by the Spirit and grace of Chriſt, that its governing power might be took away, and that itſelf be ſubdued, weakened, and laid under reſtraints, and its members and deeds mortified: that henceforth we ſhould not ſerve ſin; not that it ſhould not be in us, for as yet, neither by virtue of the ſacrifice of Chriſt, nor by the power of his grace, is ſin as to its being removed from the people of God; but that we ſhould not ſerve it, make proviſion for it, indulge it and obey it, in the luſts thereof.

Ver. 7. For he that is dead, is freed from ſin.] This is not to be underſtood of a natural or a corporal death; for this is the effect of ſin, and is inflicted by way of puniſhment for it, on Chriſtleſs perſons; ſo far is it from being an atonement for ſin, as the Jews [t] fancy; beſides, there are many perſons, who as they die in their ſins, they'll riſe in them; though a natural death is alluded to, when perſons are free from thoſe laws and obligations to ſervice and duty, they are under whilſt living: but here it is to be underſtood of a ſpiritual or myſtical death, and of perſons who are dead to the law, by the body of Chriſt; dead to ſin by the ſacrifice and grace of Chriſt; who are baptized into the death of Chriſt, and in imitation of him: ſuch are freed from ſin; not from the being of it; nor from the burden of it; nor from a continual war with it; nor from ſlips and falls into it; no, not even freed from it, in the moſt ſolemn ſervices and acts of religion; but they are freed from the dominion of it, from ſervitude to it, and alſo from the guilt of it, and from obligation to puniſhment on account of it; they are, as it is in the Greek text, and as the Vulgate Latin and Arabic verſions read, juſtified from ſin.

Ver. 8. Now if we be dead with Chriſt, &c.] This does not imply any doubt about it, but is rather a taking it for granted; ſeeing we are dead with Chriſt by union with him, as our head and repreſentative, and by communion with him in the benefits of his death, and being planted together in the likeneſs of it; or being dead to the law, ſin, and the world, through the virtue and efficacy of Chriſt's death: we believe that we ſhall alſo live with him; not only a life of juſtification by faith in his righteouſneſs; and a life of ſanctification from him, and to his glory; the continuance of which, and a perſeverance in it, are firmly believed; but a life of glory and happineſs with him hereafter, both in the new Jeruſalem, in the new heavens, and new earth, in the glorious ſtate of the church on earth, and in heaven to all eternity; where they ſhall be perſonally and viſibly with him, in ſoul and body, and ſhall live in the moſt intimate and uninterrupted communion with him, enjoying the higheſt pleaſure, and the moſt conſummate happineſs; and are therefore under the greateſt obligation, whilſt here on earth, to live, not in ſin, but to righteouſneſs, and to his praiſe and glory; with whom they are now dead to ſin, and with whom they not only hope, but believe they ſhall live throughout the endleſs ages of eternity.

Ver. 9. Knowing that Chriſt being raiſed from the dead, &c.] That Chriſt is riſen from the dead, is a certain fact, well atteſted, thoroughly known, and firmly believed; the prophets propheſied of it, Chriſt himſelf foretold it, angels affirmed it, and the Apoſtles were witneſſes of it, as is alſo the Holy Ghoſt: and it is as certain, that he dieth no more; he is raiſed to an immortal life, and will live for evermore; there's no need of his dying again, his death having been a full atonement and expiation of all the ſins and tranſgreſſions of his people: death hath no more dominion over him; it once had dominion over him; it held him under its power for a time, according to the divine determination, and by his own conſent: but it was not poſſible he ſhould be holden of it longer; both on account of the dignity of his perſon, as the Son of God, and the virtue and efficacy of his ſacrifice, as the ſurety of his people, having put away ſin for ever by it. He is the holy man the Jews [u] ſpeak of, "who is "the myſtery of the name Jehovah, and in him "there's no ſin, neither ſhall death have the dominion over him."

Ver. 10. For in that he died, &c.] The death of Chriſt, was ſettled and agreed to in the covenant and council of peace; it was ſpoken of by the prophets, and typified by ſacrifices; Chriſt came into the world in order to die, and actually did die the death of the croſs; in which the great love of God and Chriſt is expreſſed to us; and which is a fundamental article of the chriſtian faith: and when he died, he died unto ſin once; he died to that, which we by nature are dead in, and could never make atonement for; which he himſelf never lived in, and which men naturally love to live in; and which had he not died for, we muſt have died for to all eternity; and he died not for any ſin of his own, or of angels, nor for the ſins of every man, but for the ſins of his people: it may be rendered, he died in ſin; in the likeneſs of ſinful fleſh, in which he was ſent; having as a ſurety ſin laid on him, and bore by him, and for which he was wounded, bruiſed, and died: or rather to ſin; that is, to make atonement for it, procure the pardon of it, take it away, and utterly aboliſh it: and this he did once; this is obſerved, in reference to the repeated ſacrifices of the old law, which could never expiate or remove ſin; and to ſhew, that Chriſt's dying once was enough, his ſacrifice was fully ſatisfactory to the law and juſtice of God: but in that he liveth; which muſt be underſtood, not of his life as God, but as man; and that not on earth, but in heaven; where he lives with God, at the right-hand of God, and by him, by the power of God: and he liveth unto God; to his glory, and to make interceſſion for us.

Ver. 11. Likewiſe reckon ye alſo yourſelves, &c.] Two things the Apoſtle would have believers conſider of themſelves, and reckon themſelves to be, in conſequence of their relation to Chriſt, who was dead, but is alive, and as agreeable thereunto: the one is, that they would look upon themſelves to be dead indeed unto ſin; believe their diſcharge from it, and not fear condemnation and death on account of it; and that it ſhall not be imputed to them, or have any damning power over them, ſince Chriſt has died unto it, or for it; and therefore ſhould have no fellowſhip with it, nothing to do with it, as being dead unto it, and that to them: the other is, that they would conſider themſelves alive unto God, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; and that either in a law ſenſe, as juſtified perſons; men in a ſtate of nature, or of Phariſaiſm, think themſelves alive, when they are not; but when they come under a work of the Spirit of God, they ſee themſelves otherwiſe, and are convinced both of the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin, and the inſufficiency of their own righteouſneſs to juſtify from it; and when they have the righteouſneſs of Chriſt revealed unto them, and faith is wrought in them to look unto it, and lay hold upon it, they are in themſelves, and in their own apprehenſions alive, and that unto God, in the ſight of God; and their life of faith on the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, is unto the glory of God, and will be followed with an eternal life with God, to which the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt gives them a title; and this is all through Chriſt, and his righteouſneſs: or this is to be conſidered by them of themſelves as ſanctified perſons, who are quickned by the Spirit of Chriſt, and can feel the burden of ſin, ſee the corruption of their nature, hear the voice both of law and Goſpel, breathe after ſpiritual things, ſpeak the language of Canaan, walk by faith on Chriſt, and work and act for him; which life of faith and holineſs is unto God, to his glory and honour, and is through Chriſt, and is maintained and ſupported by him: or they ſhould conſider themſelves not only as being juſtified before God, and made alive by his Spirit, but as ſuch who ſhall live to and with God, through Chriſt, for evermore; for as Chriſt died and roſe again, and lives unto and with God for ever, ſo they being dead to ſin through him, and being quickned together with him and by his Spirit, ſhall never die the ſecond death, but ſhall have everlaſting life.

Ver. 12. Let not ſin therefore reign in your mortal body, &c.] Since grace reigns in you, ſin ſhould not; ſeeing ye are dead to ſin, are baptized into the death of Chriſt, and are dead with him, and alive through him, ſin therefore ſhould not reign in you, and over you. This exhortation does not ſuppoſe a free-will power in man naturally, for this is ſpoken to perſons, who had the Spirit and grace of Chriſt, and in whom God had wrought both to will and to do of his good pleaſure; nor is this exhortation unneceſſary to believers, though they are dead to ſin, and though God has promiſed it ſhall not have the dominion over them, and though reigning ſin, as divines ſay, cannot be in regenerate perſons; for though they are entirely dead to ſin as juſtified perſons, yet not perfectly ſo as ſanctified; they are indeed dead to ſin, but ſin is not dead in them; it ſtruggles, it makes war, leads captive, and threatens abſolute and univerſal dominion, wherefore ſuch an exhortation is neceſſary; beſides, though God has promiſed that ſin ſhall not have the dominion, yet making uſe of means, ſuch as prayer to God that it may not, ſtriving againſt it, oppoſing it, in order to hinder its dominion, are no ways inconſiſtent with the promiſe of God, whoſe promiſes often have their accompliſhment in the uſe of means: moreover, whereas ſome divines ſay, that reigning ſin may be, and others that it cannot be in regenerate perſons, it ſhould be obſerved, that if by reigning ſin is meant, ſinning againſt God out of malice and contempt, with the whole heart, without any ſtruggle againſt it, or repentance for it, or ſo as to loſe the grace of God, and never riſe more, then it muſt be ſaid that it cannot be in a regenerate man; but if by it is meant, falling into ſin againſt their conſciences, knowingly and willingly, ſo as to diſtreſs their minds, loſe their peace, and grieve the Spirit of God, ſo as to be held under it, and be led captive by it, ſuch power ſin may have in them, and over them; and therefore the exhortation is not needleſs: and when the Apoſtle ſays, let it not reign in your mortal body, by it is either meant the whole man, or rather the body only, which is the inſtrument of ſinning, and is become mortal through ſin; and being ſo, is a reaſon why it ſhould not reign in it, ſince it has done ſo much miſchief to it already: and this alſo denotes the time of ſin's being in us, and of the danger of its reigning in us; 'tis only whiles we are in this mortal body; and the conſideration of our mortality, ſhould quicken us to war againſt ſin, and be careful not to obey it in the luſts thereof: the luſts of the body, or fleſh, which are therefore ſometimes called fleſhly luſts, are many, and have great power and influence; and may be ſaid to be obeyed, when proviſion is made to fulfil them, when theſe are the buſineſs of a man's life, and the whole of his converſation is taken up in them, without ſtruggle againſt them, or oppoſition to them; and herein lies the reign of ſin.

Ver. 13. Neither yield ye your members, &c.] The Apoſtle more fully explains what he means, by obeying ſin in the luſts thereof; a preſenting, or making uſe of the members, as inſtruments of unrighteouſneſs unto ſin: by their members he means, the ſeveral powers and faculties of the ſoul, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion renders it, your ſouls; or the ſeveral parts of the body, or both; by yielding, or preſenting of them, is deſigned the employment of them in the ſervice of ſin, as inſtruments of unrighteouſneſs unto ſin; that is, as means of performing unrighteous actions, in obedience to ſin, or the corruption of nature with its luſts: the word tranſlated inſtruments, ſignifies arms or weapons; ſo the ancients [w] formerly, reckoned weapons the members of ſoldiers; and here the Apoſtle calls the members weapons, which he would not have the ſaints uſe in favour of ſin, an enemy and a tyrant; for that would be unrighteous in itſelf, and injurious to God and themſelves: but, ſays he, yield yourſelves unto God, as thoſe that are alive from the dead; that is, preſent themſelves ſoul and body to God, give up and devote themſelves to him, and to his ſervice, and yield a chearful obedience to him; conſidering themſelves as under great obligation ſo to do, inaſmuch as they are freed from condemnation and death, by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and quickened, when dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, by his Spirit and grace; and therefore ſhould yield your members, their whole ſelves, as inſtruments, or weapons of righteouſneſs unto God; by fighting againſt ſin, revenging all diſobedience, and fulfilling obedience to the commands of God: the ſame is here meant, as is by putting on the armour of light, and wearing and making uſe of the armour of righteouſneſs, on the right-hand and the left, Rom. xiii. 12. 2 Cor. vi. 7.

Ver. 14. For ſin ſhall not have dominion over you, &c.] It has a dominion over God's people in a ſtate of unregeneracy; and after converſion it is ſtill in them, and has great power oftentimes, to hinder that which is good, and to effect that which is evil; it entices and enſnares, and brings into captivity, and ſeems as though it would regain its dominion, and reign again, but it ſhall not. This is not a precept, exhortation, or admonition, as before, though ſome read it as ſuch, let not ſin have dominion over you; nor does it expreſs merely what ought not to be, but what cannot, and ſhall not be; it is an abſolute promiſe, that ſin ſhall not have the dominion over believers; and reſpects not acts of ſin, but the principle of ſin; and means not its damning power, though that is took away, but its tyrannical, governing power: it ſhall not lord it over you, as the words may be rendered; for in regeneration, ſin is dethroned; Chriſt enters as Lord, and continues to be ſo; ſaints are in another kingdom, the kingdom of Chriſt and grace; could ſin reign again over them, they might be loſt and periſh, which they never can: now this is a noble argument, why ſaints ſhould uſe their members as weapons of righteouſneſs for God and againſt ſin; ſince they are ſure of being conquerors, and are ſecure from the tyrannical government of ſin over them. The Jewiſh doctors ſay [x], there are three perſons, לא שלט בהן יצר הרע, over whom the evil imagination, or ſin, had not the dominion; and theſe are they, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob; but theſe are not the only perſons, for all Abraham's ſpiritual ſeed, all that are of the faith of Abraham, enjoy the ſame favour: the reaſon of this is, for ye are not under the law; by which is meant, not the law of nature; nor the civil law of the Jews; nor their ceremonial law; but either the law of ſin, as a governing principle; or rather the moral law: this they were under, ſo as to obey it, but not in order to obtain righteouſneſs by it; or as forced to obey it by its threats and terrors; they were not under its rigorous exaction; nor under its curſe and condemnation; nor as irritating ſin, and cauſing it to abound; or as a covenant of works: but under grace; under the covenant of grace, and in the enjoyment of the bleſſings of it; under the Goſpel, and the diſpenſation of it, which leads and teaches men to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts; under and in the poſſeſſion of the grace of juſtification and pardon, which ſtrongly influence to righteouſneſs and holineſs; and under regenerating and ſanctifying grace, as a reigning governing principle in the ſoul. The Apoſtle's view in this is, to affect the ſaints with their preſent privilege, and to engage them in a chearful conflict with ſin, and to ſtir up in them an abhorrence of living in it.

Ver. 15. What then? ſhall we ſin, &c.] Does it follow from hence, that therefore we may ſin, and go on and continue in it, becauſe we are not under the law, but under grace? here the Apoſtle meets with an objection of the adverſary, ſaying, that if men are not under the law, and are free from all obligation to it, then they may live as they liſt; nor can they be chargeable with ſin, or that be objected to them; ſince where there is no law, there's no tranſgreſſion, and ſin is not imputed, where there is no law; and if they are under grace, or in the love and favour of God, from which there's no ſeparation, then they cannot be damned, do what they will: but this objection proceeds upon a miſtaken ſenſe of the phraſe, under the law; for believers, though they are not under the law as the miniſtry of Moſes, yet they are under it, as it is in the hands of Chriſt; and though not under its curſe, yet under obligation to obedience to it, from principles of love and grace; and a tranſgreſſion of it is ſin in them, as in others; and which is taken notice of by God, and viſited with ſtripes in a fatherly way, though his loving kindneſs is not removed: and to argue from the unchangeableneſs of God's grace, or the doctrines of it, as encouraging licentiouſneſs, is greatly to abuſe the grace of God, and manifeſtly betrays ſuch perſons to be ignorant of it and its influence; ſince nothing more powerfully engages to a love of holineſs, and hatred of ſin; wherefore the Apoſtle anſwers to this objection in his uſual way, God forbid, ſignifying his abhorrence of every thing of this kind.

Ver. 16. Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourſelves, &c.] The Apoſtle goes on with his anſwer to the above objection, by making uſe of an argument from the nature of ſervants and their obedience, a thing well known to every one, and which none could be ignorant of; which he delivers by way of diſtribution, that ſuch who yield themſelves ſervants to obey, his ſervants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of ſin unto death, or of obedience unto righteouſneſs: ſuch who obey ſin, are the ſervants of ſin; they are at the beck and command of ſin; they give up themſelves to the ſervice of it with delight and diligence, and are perfect drudges to it: this is a very unhappy ſituation; their ſervice is very unreaſonable; and they are rendered uncapable of ſerving God, for no man can ſerve two maſters; they are hereby brought into the drudgery of the devil; into a ſtate of bondage, out of which nothing but grace can extricate them; into a very mean and contemptible condition, and even a deplorable one; for if grace prevent not, they will have the wages of ſin paid them, which is death, for their obedience is of ſin unto death; which will lie in an eternal ſeparation from Father, Son, and Spirit, in a ſenſe of divine wrath, and in the company of devils and damned ſpirits: now this is added, to ſhew the malignant nature and juſt demerit of ſin, and to deter and diſſuade perſons from the ſervice of it: on the other hand, ſuch as obey the Lord, are the ſervants of obedience unto righteouſneſs; but why is not this obedience, which is the obedience of faith to the Goſpel of Chriſt, and of the new man to God or Chriſt, ſaid to be unto life; as the antitheſis ſeems to require? becauſe though death is the fruit of ſin, yet life is not the fruit of obedience, but the fruit of obedience is righteouſneſs; by which is meant, not a juſtifying one before God, but righteouſneſs before men; or a courſe of living ſoberly and righteouſly, which is the effect of being under grace; and hence it appears, that true believers can make no ſuch ill uſe of their privilege, as is ſuggeſted in the objection.

Ver. 17. But God be thanked that ye were the ſervants of ſin, &c.] Not that the Apoſtle muſt be thought to give thanks to God for that theſe perſons had been the ſervants of ſin, than which nothing is more diſagreeable to God, or cauſed more ſhame to themſelves; but that inaſmuch as they had been in the drudgery and ſervice of ſin, they were now freed from it. Juſt as if a perſon that has been a ſlave for ſome time in Algiers, ſhould bleſs God, or be thankful to the inſtrument of his deliverance, that whereas he had been in ſuch ſlavery, he is now redeemed from it: wherefore 'tis added, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. By the form of doctrine, is meant the Goſpel, which is the doctrine of the ſcriptures, of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and is ſound and according to godlineſs; and is a form, or contains a ſummary and compendium of truths, and is a pattern or exemplar, according to which miniſters are to preach, and people to hear and receive. So the word טופס, which is the ſame with τυπος here, is uſed by the Jewiſh [y] writers for a form, copy, pattern, or exemplar of any ſort of writings. This from of doctrine is קבלה, a Cabala, but not like that of the Jews oral law, or form of traditions [z], handed down, as they ſay, from one man, and ſett of men, to another; but this is delivered from the Father to Chriſt, from Chriſt to his Apoſtles, and by them to the ſaints; and into which they were delivered, as it may be rendered, as into a mould; and ſo received the impreſſion of it, and were evangelized by it: ſo ſuch are who have a ſpirit of Goſpel-liberty, in oppoſition to a ſpirit of bondage; who live by faith on Chriſt, and not by the works of the law; who derive their comfort from him, and not from any thing done by them; whoſe repentance and obedience are influenced by the grace of God, and who are zealous of good works, without any dependance on them. This form of doctrine was obeyed by them; by which is meant, not a mere obedience to the ordinances of the Goſpel; nor a bare hearing of the doctrines of it, and giving an aſſent unto them; but an embracing of them by faith for themſelves, ſo as to lay hold on Chriſt in them, ſubmit to his righteouſneſs therein revealed, and be willing to be ſaved by him, and him alone, in his own way; and this is the obedience of faith: the reaſon why faith is expreſſed by obedience, is, becauſe faith receives truth upon the veracity of God, and not upon the dictates of carnal reaſon; and is always more or leſs attended with external obedience to the will of God; and that is rightly performed only by faith. And this obedience did not lie in words, or proceed on mercenary views, and in an hypocritical way; but was from the heart; and was real and ſincere: and good reaſon there is why a hearty, chearful, and voluntary obedience ſhould be yielded to the Goſpel; ſince it is from God; Chriſt is the ſubſtance of it; it is truth, and the word of our ſalvation. The Alexandrian copy reads, from a pure heart; and the Arabic verſion, from the ſincerity of your heart; and the Ethiopic verſion, with your whole heart.

Ver. 18. Being then made free from ſin, &c.] Not from a ſinful nature; nor from a corrupt heart; nor from vain thoughts; nor from ſinful words; nor from ſinful actions altogether; but from the damning power of ſin: ſin brought all men under a ſentence of condemnation; Chriſt has bore the execution of this ſentence in himſelf for his people; hence, as conſidered in him, they are free from it; and ſuch as are born again, have paſſed from death to life, and ſhall never enter into condemnation: likewiſe, ſuch perſons are free from the guilt of ſin; men are in a law-ſenſe arraigned for ſin, accuſed of it, and being convicted, are pronounced guilty before God; and awakened ſouls have a ſenſe of it in themſelves; but the blood of Chriſt ſprinkled on their conſciences, frees them from it; tho' freſh ſins committed bring freſh guilt, which requires the continual application of the blood of Jeſus for pardon and cleanſing: but what is chiefly deſigned here, is freedom from the ſervitude of ſin, as appears from the context. Now God's elect are not releaſed voluntarily by their former maſters; nor is their freedom obtained by their own power and will; but it is of God, Father, Son, and Spirit; and the Goſpel is generally the means of it, and happy are thoſe perſons who are bleſſed with it! They are rid of a bad maſter; are freed from the worſt of bondage; will be no more ſervants, as before; are delivered from the power, and out of the kingdom of darkneſs; are heirs of heaven, and ſhall enjoy the glorious liberty of the children of God: and for the time preſent are become the ſervants of righteouſneſs; ſervants to God, whoſe Goſpel they obey; ſervants to Chriſt, whoſe righteouſneſs they ſubmit to; and ſervants to the law of righteouſneſs, as held forth by Chriſt; they give up themſelves to a courſe and life of righteouſneſs, in which there are true honour, peace, and pleaſure.

Ver. 19. I ſpeak after the manner of men, &c.] This refers either to what the Apoſtle had ſaid already concerning ſervice and liberty, things which were known among men, and eaſy to be underſtood; or to the following exhortation: what he was about to ſay, he delivered in a manner ſuited to their underſtandings, and was ανθρωπινον, that which was human; not angelic, or what required the power, purity, and perfection of angels; or what was unreaſonable or impoſſible, but what was their reaſonable ſervice, as men; and might be done thro' the grace of God, in the ſtrength of Chriſt, and by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit: and tho' he might have inſiſted upon it with good reaſon, that they ought to be more diligent and induſtrious in the ſervice of God, than they had been in the ſervice of ſin; yet becauſe of the infirmity of their fleſh, conſidering that they had fleſh, or corrupt nature, and were attended with weakneſs in knowledge, faith, and obedience; he only preſſed this upon them, that in like manner as they had been ſervants to ſin, they would be ſervants to righteouſneſs: for as ye have yielded your members ſervants to uncleanneſs, and to iniquity unto iniquity; what they yielded to the ſervice of ſin were their members; by which, as before, may be meant, either the powers and faculties of their ſouls, or the parts and members of their bodies, or both; and particularly the latter, as the eyes and ears, the tongue, the mouth, the hands, and feet, which are all employed by a natural man in the drudgery of ſin: theſe are yielded to ſin under the form and character of ſervants; and as ſuch are governed, directed, and ordered to fulfil this and the other luſt, which is done willingly and readily: theſe members are yielded, preſented, and given up chearfully to this ſlavery; which is both ſcandalous and unrighteous: 'tis to uncleanneſs; which deſigns all ſorts of pollution and filthineſs, both of fleſh and ſpirit: and to iniquity; every thing that is contrary to the law, all unrighteouſneſs and ungodlineſs: and 'tis added, unto iniquity; which may deſign all ſorts of ſin, a progreſs in it, adding continually to it; which ſhews them to have been thorough hearty ſervants of ſin. Now what the Apoſtle exhorts to, and requires of them is, that even ſo now they would yield their members ſervants to righteouſneſs unto holineſs; that is, let the ſame members that have been employed in the ſervice of ſin, be made uſe of in the ſervice of righteouſneſs: let your eyes be employed in looking and diligently ſearching into the ſcriptures of truth; your ears in hearing the Goſpel preached; your lips, mouth, and tongue in expreſſing the praiſes of God, for what he has done for you; your hands in diſtributing to the intereſt of religion, and the neceſſities of the ſaints; and your feet in haſtening to attend on public worſhip, and obſerve the teſtimonies of the Lord: let them be employed under the ſame form and character as ſervants, waiting upon the Lord, ready to fulfil his will; and in the ſame manner, freely, willingly, and chearfully, and that conſtantly and univerſally, in all acts of righteouſneſs and holineſs.

[z] Vid. Pirke Abot, c. 1. §. 1.

Ver. 20. For when ye were the ſervants of ſin, &c.] This is an argument uſed, or a reaſon given why regenerate perſons ſhould be diligent in the ſervice of righteouſneſs; becauſe when they were employed in the drudgery of ſin, they were free from righteouſneſs; they had no righteouſneſs, nor were they deſirous of any; yea, averſe to it, threw off the yoke of the law of righteouſneſs, and lived in a very unrighteous manner: hence may be obſerved what is the free-will of man in an unregenerate ſtate; not free to, but from righteouſneſs; free enough to evil, but from all that is good; and alſo what obligation lies upon believers, who are delivered from the bondage of corruption, and the ſervitude of ſin, to a life and ſervice of righteouſneſs; inaſmuch as they were before free from it, and unconcerned about it, but are now made by the grace of God free to it, they ought therefore chearfully to purſue it, and neglect no opportunity of performing it.

Ver. 21. What fruit had ye then in thoſe things? &c.] That is, what profit, pleaſure, ſatisfaction, or comfort, had ye in the commiſſion of ſin? Sin yields no real profit to the ſervants of it. If a man, by ſinful practices, could amaſs together the riches of the Indies, or gain the whole world, yet if his ſoul is loſt thereby, what advantage would it be to him? he would be infinitely the loſer by it; nor would all his wealth and riches profit him in the day of God's wrath and righteous judgment: nor is there any true pleaſure in ſin; perſons may imagine within themſelves they enjoy a real pleaſure whilſt they are ſerving divers luſts; but this is but imaginary, 'tis not real; and this imaginary pleaſure is but for a ſeaſon; it iſſues in bitterneſs and death: nor is there any ſatisfaction in it; when men have endeavoured to gratify their carnal luſts, and ſenſual appetites in every way that can be deviſed, they ſtill remain as they were; nor can they reflect with real ſatisfaction, and without ſome ſtinging remorſe, upon the methods they have purſued to gain it: nor is there any true honour in ſin, nothing but what is ſcandalous and diſgraceful to human nature; ſhame, ſooner or later, is the fruit of ſin: whereof ye are now aſhamed; ſome men may be indeed for the preſent ſo hardened as not to bluſh and be aſhamed at the commiſſion of the vileſt ſins; ſuch are they who have no ſenſe of ſin, have no fear of God, or regard to men; and ſo ſin openly, and without any guiſe, glory in it, and make their boaſt of it: but when perſons are wrought upon by the Spirit of God, they are aſhamed of ſin; which might be exemplified in the caſe of Adam and Eve, of Ephraim, of the prodigal ſon, and of the poor publican: the reaſon is, becauſe light is ſtruck into their hearts; and this makes manifeſt the odious and deteſtable nature of ſin; ſin is hereby ſeen in its own proper colours, as exceeding ſinful, loathſome, and abominable: beſides, the grace and goodneſs of God are diſcovered in the forgiveneſs of it; and the glory of God's purity and holineſs, and the beauty and lovelineſs of Chriſt, are diſcerned by ſuch perſons; all which have a tendency to make them aſhamed of ſin, out of love with it, and to abhor it: and a good thing it is to be brought to be aſhamed of ſin here; for ſuch who are not aſhamed of it here, ſhall be brought to everlaſting ſhame and confuſion hereafter. Nay, this is not all; not only ſhame will be the fruit of ſin, but it will alſo iſſue in death: for the end of thoſe things is death; the profit, the reward, and wages of them is death: ſin not only brings a ſpiritual or moral death on perſons, on all the powers and faculties of their ſouls, and is followed with a corporal death; but if grace prevent not, it will end in an eternal one; for however right and good the ways of ſin may ſeem to the carnal mind, the end thereof are the ways of death.

Ver. 22. But now being made free from ſin, and become ſervants to God, &c.] In what ſenſe regenerate perſons are free from ſin, and are become the ſervants of God, has been obſerved already; the conſequence of which is, that ſuch have their fruit unto holineſs, and the end everlaſting life: holineſs is a fruit of freedom from the bondage of ſin, and of ſerving God; holineſs begun in regeneration, vocation, and converſion, is a fruit of the Spirit; a courſe of living righteouſly is a fruit of holineſs, as a principle implanted; a gradual increaſe in holineſs is carried on by the Spirit of God in a courſe of righteouſneſs; and a courſe of righteouſneſs, from a principle of grace, iſſues in perfect holineſs; without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord: here it ſeems to deſign, that holineſs is fruit, or that which is gain and profit to perſons, in oppoſition to ſin, in which there is no profit: it is not indeed profitable to God in point of merit; yet holineſs, as a principle of grace, is profitable to the ſaints in point of meetneſs for glory; and holineſs, as it denotes an external courſe of life, is uſeful and profitable on many accounts; hereby God is glorified, the doctrine of Chriſt is adorned, religion is honoured and recommended, our own credit, reputation, and peace, are preſerved, and our neighbour's good promoted. And the end is everlaſting life: as ſin iſſues, if grace prevent not, in everlaſting death; holineſs iſſues in eternal life, not by way of merit, but of free-gift.

Ver. 23. For the wages of ſin is death, &c.] By ſin, is meant every ſin, original ſin, actual ſin, every kind of ſin, leſſer and greater: the death which ſin deſerves, is a corporal death; which is not owing to the original nature and conſtitution of men; nor merely to the divine appointment; but to ſin, and the decree of God, on account of it; which is inflicted on Chriſtleſs ſinners, as a puniſhment for ſin, tho' not on believers as ſuch, becauſe Chriſt has took away the ſting and curſe of it: a death of diſeaſes and afflictions alſo follows upon ſin, as its proper demerit; which are properly puniſhments to wicked men, and are occaſioned by ſin in believers: there's a death of the ſoul, which comes by ſin, which lies in an alienation from God, in a loſs of the image of God, and in a ſervitude to ſin; and there is an eternal death, the juſt wages of ſin, which lies in a ſeparation of ſoul and body from God, and in a ſenſe of divine wrath to all eternity; and which is here meant, as is clear from its antitheſis, eternal life, in the next clauſe. Now this is the wages of ſin; ſin does in its own nature produce it, and excludes from life; it is the natural iſſue of it; ſin is committed againſt an infinite God, and righteouſly deſerves ſuch a death; it is its juſt wages by law. The Greek word οψωνια, ſignifies ſoldier's wages; ſee Luke iii. 14. 1 Cor. ix. 7. 1 Maccab. xiv. 32. Sin is repreſented as a king, a mighty monarch, a tyrannical prince; ſinners are his ſubjects and vaſſals, his ſervants and ſoldiers, who fight under him, and for him, and all the wages they muſt expect from him is death. So the word is interpreted in the Gloſſary, μισθος ϛρατιωτικος, ſoldiers wages; and ſo it is uſed by the Jewiſh writers, being adopted into their language; of a king, they ſay [a], that he ſhould not multiply to himſelf gold and ſilver more than to pay אספניא, which they [b] interpret by שכור חיילות, the hire of armies, or the wages of ſoldiers for a whole year, who go in and out with him all the year; ſo that it denotes wages due, and paid after a campaign is ended, and ſervice is over; and, as here uſed, ſuggeſts, that when men have been all their days in the ſervice of ſin, and have fought under the banners of it, the wages they will earn, and the reward that will be given them will be death: and it is frequently obſerved by the Jewiſh doctors [c], that אין מיתה בלא חטא, there's no death without ſin; ſin is the cauſe of death, and death the fruit and effect of ſin: but the gift of God is eternal life, thro' Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. Theſe words, at firſt ſight, look as if the ſenſe of them was, that eternal life is the gift of God thro' Chriſt, which is a great and glorious truth of the Goſpel; but their ſtanding in oppoſition to the preceding words, require another ſenſe, namely, that God's gift of grace iſſues in eternal life, thro' Chriſt: wherefore by the gift of God is not meant eternal life, but either the gift of a juſtifying righteouſneſs, or the grace of God in regeneration and ſanctification, or both, which iſſue in eternal life; the one is the ſaints right and title, the other their meetneſs for it: ſo that as death is the wages of ſin, and is what that iſſues in, and brings unto, eternal life is the effect of grace, or what the grace of God in juſtifying and ſanctifying his people iſſues in; even a life free from all ſorrow and imperfection; a life of the utmoſt perfection and pleaſure, and which will laſt for ever: and as the grace of God, which juſtifies and ſanctifies them, is through Chriſt, ſo is the eternal life itſelf which it brings unto: this is in Chriſt, comes thro' his righteouſneſs, ſufferings, and death; is beſtowed by him, and will greatly conſiſt in the enjoyment of him. All grace is the gift of God, and is freely given, or otherwiſe it would not be grace; particularly the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt is the gift of God; and the rather this may be meant here, ſince the Apoſtle had been treating of it ſo largely before, and had ſo often, in the preceding chapter, called it the gift of righteouſneſs, the free gift, and gift by grace, and juſtification by it the juſtification of life, becauſe it entitles to eternal life, as here: it may be ſaid to iſſue in it; for between juſtification and glorification there is a ſure and cloſe connexion; they that are juſtified by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, are certainly glorified, or enjoy eternal life; and tho' this may be principally intended here, yet is not to be underſtood to the excluſion of other gifts of grace, which have the ſame connexion and iſſue: thus, for inſtance, faith is the gift of God, and not of a man's ſelf, and he that has it, has eternal life, and ſhall for ever poſſeſs it; repentance is a free-grace gift, it is a grant from the Lord, and it is unto life and ſalvation; and on whomſoever the grace of God is beſtowed, ſo as to believe in Chriſt for righteouſneſs, and truly repent of ſin, theſe ſhall partake of eternal glory. It may be obſerved, that there is a juſt proportion between ſin, and the wages of it, yet there is none between eternal life, and the obedience of men; and therefore though the Apoſtle had been preſſing ſo much obedience to God, and to righteouſneſs, he don't make eternal life to be the fruit and effect of obedience, but of the gift of the grace of God.

CHAP. VII.

THE Apoſtle in this chapter, diſcourſes concerning the freedom of juſtified and regenerated perſons from the law, and concerning the nature, uſe and excellency of it; in which he removes ſeveral objections to it, and gives an account from his own experience of the ſtruggle and combat there is between fleſh and ſpirit in a regenerate perſon; and which ſhews, that though believers are juſtified from ſin, yet ſtill ſin remains in them, and is the complaint of their ſouls. Whereas he had in ver. 14. of the preceding chapter, aſſerted that believers are not under the law, but under grace: he knew that this would be matter of offence to the believing Jews, who ſtill retained an high opinion of the law; wherefore he takes it up in the beginning of this chapter, and explains his meaning, and ſhews in what ſenſe juſtified ones are delivered from it; and firſt obſerves a known maxim, which every one, eſpecially ſuch as know any thing of the nature of laws, muſt allow of; that the law has power over a man as long as he lives, and no longer, ver. 1. and then particularly inſtances in the law of marriage, ver. 2. which is in force as long as both parties live and no longer: during the huſband's life the wife is bound, but when dead ſhe is looſed, and which is further explained, ver. 3. that ſhould ſhe marry another while her huſband is alive, ſhe would be an adultereſs; but he being dead, ſhould ſhe marry, ſhe is liable to no ſuch imputation: this the Apoſtle accommodates, ver. 4. to the caſe of the law, and the ſaints deliverance from it, in which he aſſerts that they are dead to the law, and that to them, as in ver. 6. by the body of Chriſt; and therefore the law could have no dominion over them, as is the caſe of all laws when men are dead; and ſo they might be lawfully married to another, to bring forth fruit to God, according to the particular law of marriage. This is illuſtrated by the different ſtate and condition of God's elect, before and after converſion; whilſt in an unconverted ſtate the law irritates indwelling ſin, and the luſts of it, and by the members of the body operates to the bringing forth the deadly fruit of ſin, ver. 5. but when delivered from the irritating power of the law, that being dead in conſequence of the ſufferings and death of Chriſt, they are both in a capacity, and under an obligation to ſerve the Lord, in a new and ſpiritual manner, ver. 6. and whereas he had ſaid that the motions of ſin are ſtirred up by the law, ver. 5. he ſaw that an objection might be raiſed againſt the law, as if that was ſinful; this he removes by expreſſing his abhorrence of ſuch a thought, by pointing out the law as that which makes known ſin, and by the experience he himſelf had of it, making known indwelling ſin to him, ver. 7. when he goes on to give an account of the workings of corrupt nature in him, under the prohibition of the law; how it was with him before it entred into his conſcience, and how it was with him afterwards; that before he thought himſelf alive, and in a fair way to eternal life; but afterwards, as ſin appeared to him more vigorous than ever, he found himſelf a dead man, and dead to all hope of life by the law, being killed by it, or rather by ſin which worked by it, ver. 8, 9, 10, 11. and therefore he vindicates the law as holy, juſt, and good, ver. 12. and anſwers an objection that might be formed from what he had ſaid concerning the effect the law had upon him, as if it was made death unto him; whereas the office it did was to ſhew him the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin, which, and not the law, was the cauſe of death, ver. 13. for to it with other ſaints he bears this teſtimony, that it is ſpiritual, tho' in compariſon of it he was carnal and ſold under ſin, ver. 14. and from henceforward to the end of the chapter, he gives an account of the force and power of indwelling ſin in him, and the conflict there was in him between grace and corruption: he had knowledge of that which is good, approved of it, and yet did it not, hated ſin and yet committed it, ver. 15. but however, his deſire after that which was good, and his approbation of it, ſhewed that he agreed to this, that the law was good, ver. 16. nor was his commiſſion of ſin to be imputed to his renewed ſelf, but to indwelling corruption, ver. 17. the fleſhly part in him, in which was no good thing, ver. 18. he found he had a will to that which is good, but not power to perform it; which was abundantly evident by his practice, ſeeing what he would he did not, and what he would not he did. ver. 19. from whence he concludes again, ver. 20. as in ver. 17. that the evil he did was to be reckoned not to his ſpiritual, or renewed ſelf, but to his corrupt nature; which he found, as a law that had power to command and to cauſe to obey, always at hand, cloſe by him when he was deſirous of doing good, ver. 21. and yet amidſt all theſe workings of ſin in him, he found a real delight and pleaſure in the holy law of God, as he was renewed in the ſpirit of his mind, ver. 22. upon the whole he perceived there were two contrary principles in him, which militated one againſt the other, and ſometimes ſo it was, that thro' the ſtrength of corrupt nature in him, he was made a captive to the law of ſin and death, ver. 23. which fetched from him a doleful lamentation and complaint, as if his caſe was deſperate, and there was no deliverance for him, ver. 24. and yet upon a view of his great redeemer and ſaviour Jeſus Chriſt, he takes heart, and thanks God that there was, and would be a deliverance for him thro' Chriſt, ver. 25. and then cloſes the account which ſtood thus in his experience, and does in the experience of every regenerate man; that with his renewed mind he ſerved the holy law of God from a principle of grace, and with his fleſhly and carnal part the law of ſin.

Ver. 1. Know ye not brethren, &c.] The Apoſtle having aſſerted, chap. vi. 14. that the believing Romans were not under the law; which he knew would be diſpleaſing to many, and excepted to by them, eſpecially the Jews that were among them, who tho' they believed in Chriſt, yet were zealous of the law, takes it up again, and explains and defends it. That they were the Jewiſh converts at Rome he here particularly addreſſes, appears partly from his calling them brethren, for they were ſo according to the fleſh, as well as in a ſpiritual relation, and this he rather mentions to ſoften their reſentments, and conciliate their minds to him; and partly from the words included in a parentheſis, for I ſpeak to them that know the law; not the law of nature, but the law of Moſes, as the Jews did, being trained up in the knowledge of it; to theſe he appeals, ſaying, know ye not, for the truth of a principle or maxim he afterwards improves, which they could not be ignorant of, how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he, or it liveth; for the word liveth, may refer either to man or to the law. The law may be ſaid to live, when it is in full force, and to be dead, when it is abrogated and diſanulled; now whilſt it lives, or is in force, it has dominion over a man; it can require and command obedience of him, and in caſe of diſobedience can condemn him, and inflict puniſhment on him: and this power it has alſo as long as the man lives who is under it, but when he is dead it has no more dominion over him; then the ſervant is free from his maſter, Job iii. 19. that is, from the law of his maſter; and children are free from the law of their parents, the wife from the law of her huſband, and ſubjects from the law of their prince. This is ſo clear a point that none can doubt of it. The Jews have a ſaying[d], that "when a man is dead, he "becomes חפשי מן תורה ומן המצות, free from "the law, and from the commands."

Ver. 2. For the woman which hath an huſband, &c.] The former general rule is here illuſtrated by a particular inſtance and example in the law of marriage; a woman that is married to a man, is bound by the law to her huſband; to live with him, in ſubjection and obedience to him, ſo long as he liveth; except in the caſes of adultery, Matt. xix. 9. and deſertion, 1 Cor. vii. 15. by which the bond of marriage is looſed, and for which a divorce or ſeparation may be made, which are equal to death: but if the huſband be dead, ſhe is looſed from the law of her huſband; the bond of marriage is diſſolved, the law of it is aboliſhed, and ſhe is at entire liberty to marry whom ſhe will, 1 Cor. vii. 39.

Ver. 3. So then if while her huſband liveth, &c.] True indeed it is, that whilſt her huſband is alive, if ſhe be married to another man, ſhe ſhall be called an adultereſs; ſhe will be noted and accounted of as ſuch by every body, except in the above-mentioned caſes: but if her huſband be dead; then there can be no exception to her marriage: ſhe is free from the law; of marriage, by which ſhe was before bound: ſo that ſhe is no adultereſs; nor will any reckon her ſuch; ſhe is clear from any ſuch imputation: tho' ſhe be married to another man; hence it appears that ſecond marriages are lawful.

Ver. 4. Wherefore, my brethren, ye alſo, &c.] Here the Apoſtle accommodates the foregoing inſtance and example to the caſe in hand, ſhewing that the ſaints were not under the law, the power and dominion of it; ſince that, as when a man is dead, the woman is looſed from that law by which ſhe was bound whilſt he lived, that ſhe may lawfully marry another man, and bear children to him without the imputation of adultery; ſo believers being dead to the law, and the law dead to them, which is all one, they are looſed from it, and may be, and are lawfully married to Chriſt, that they may bring forth the genuine fruits of good works, not in order to obtain righteouſneſs and life by them, but for the honour and glory of God; in which account may be obſerved, an aſſertion that the ſaints and children of God, are become dead to the law, and that to them, as in ver. 6. and can have no more power over them, than a law can have over dead perſons, or a dead abrogated law can have over living ones. They are repreſented as, dead to ſin, and dead with Chriſt, chap. vi. 2, 8. and here, dead to the law, as in Gal. ii. 19. and conſequently cannot be under it; are out of the reach of its power and government, ſince that only has dominion over a man as long as he lives. The law is dead to them; it has no power over them, to threaten and terrify them into obedience to it; nor even rigorouſly to exact it, or command it in a compulſory way; nor is there any need of all this, ſince believers delight in it after the inward man, and ſerve it with their minds freely and willingly; the love of Chriſt, and not the terrors of the law, conſtrains them to yield a chearful obedience to it; it has no power to charge and accuſe them, curſe or condemn them, or miniſter death unto them, no not a corporal one as a penal evil, and much leſs an eternal one. And the way and means by which they become dead to the law, and that to them is, by the body of Chriſt; not by Chriſt, as the body or ſubſtance of the ceremonial law; ſee Col. ii. 17. ſince that is not ſingly deſigned, but the whole law of Moſes; but by the body of Chriſt, is either meant Chriſt himſelf, Heb. x. 10. and ix. 14. or rather the human nature of Chriſt, Heb. x. 5. in which the law meets with every thing it can require and demand, as holineſs of nature, which is the ſaints ſanctification in Chriſt; obedience of life, which is their righteouſneſs; and ſufferings of death, which is the penalty the law enjoins, whereby full expiation of ſin is made, compleat pardon is procured, and eternal redemption obtained; ſo that the law has nothing more to demand; its mouth is ſtopped, it is not in its power to curſe and damn believers, they are dead to that and that to them: the reaſon why the law is become ſo to them, and they to that is, that ye ſhould be married to another; or that ye ſhould be to another, or be anothers; that is, that ye ſhould appear to be ſo in a juſt and legal way; for they were anothers, they were Chriſt's before by the Father's gift, and were ſecretly married to him in the everlaſting covenant, before he aſſumed their nature, and in the body of his fleſh bore their ſins, ſatisfied law and juſtice, paid their debts, and ſo freed them from the power of the law, its curſe and condemnation, or any obligation to puniſhment; all which was done in conſequence of his intereſt in them, and their marriage relation to him; but here reſpect is had to their open marriage to him in time, the day of their eſpouſals in converſion; to make way for which, the law, their former huſband, muſt be dead, and they dead to that, that ſo their marriage to Chriſt might appear lawful and juſtifiable; who is very fitly deſcribed by him, who is raiſed from the dead; and is a living huſband, and will ever continue ſo, will never die more; and therefore as the ſaints can never be looſed from the marriage-bond of union between Chriſt and them, ſo they can never be looſed from the law of this huſband; wherefore tho' they are dead to the law, as a covenant of works, and as miniſtred by Moſes, and are free from any obligation to it, as ſo conſidered yet they are under the law to Chriſt; under obligation, by the ties of love, to obedience to it, and ſhall never be looſed from it. The end of being dead to the law, and of being married to Chriſt is, that we ſhould bring forth fruit unto God. The alluſion is to children being called, the fruit of the womb, Pſal. cxxvii. 3. Luke i. 42. and here deſigns good works, the fruits of righteouſneſs, which are brought forth by perſons eſpouſed to Chriſt, under the influence of the ſpirit and grace of God: and they are unto God, that is, for the honour and glory of God; meaning either Chriſt the huſband of believers, who is God over all bleſſed for ever; or God the Father, to whoſe praiſe and glory they are by Chriſt; and which is a reaſon and argument which ſtrongly excites and encourages the ſaints to the performance of them: and let it be obſerved, that as children begotten and born in lawful marriage, are only true and legitimate, and all before marriage are ſpurious and illegitimate; ſo ſuch works only are the true and genuine fruits of righteouſneſs, which are in conſequence of a marriage relation to Chriſt; are done in faith, ſpring from love, and are directed to the glory of God; and all others, which are done before marriage to Chriſt, and without faith in him, are like ſpurious and illegitimate children.

Ver. 5. For when we were in the fleſh, &c.] This reſpects not their being under the legal diſpenſation, the Moſaical œconomy; which lay greatly in meats and drinks, and divers waſhings, and carnal ordinances, ſuch as regarded the fleſh chiefly: ſo their meats and drinks concerned the body; their ablutions and waſhings ſanctified to the purifying of the fleſh; their circumciſion was outward in the fleſh; the ſeveral rituals of the law conſiſted in outward things, tho' typical of internal and ſpiritual ones; hence thoſe that truſted in them truſted in the fleſh: but to be in the fleſh ſtands oppoſed, chap. viii. 9. to a being in the ſpirit; whereas there were many under that legal and carnal diſpenſation who were in the ſpirit, and had the ſpirit of God, as David and others; beſides, the Apoſtle muſt be thought to uſe the phraſe in ſuch a ſenſe, as to include all the perſons he is ſpeaking of and writing to, who were both Jews and Gentiles, for of ſuch the church at Rome conſiſted; and the ſenſe is this, for when we, Jews and Gentiles, who are now believers in Chriſt, were formerly, before our converſion to, and faith in Chriſt, in the fleſh, that is, in a corrupt, carnal, and unregenerate ſtate and condition; in which ſenſe the word fleſh is frequently uſed in the next chapter: now not all ſuch who have fleſh, ſin, or corrupt nature in them, muſt be reckoned to be in the fleſh, for there's a difference between fleſh being in perſons, from which none are free in this life, and their being in the fleſh; nor all ſuch who commit ſin, or do carnal things at times, for there is not a juſt man that doth good and ſinneth not; but ſuch who are as they were born, without any alteration made in them by the ſpirit and grace of God; who have nothing but fleſh in them, no fear of God, nor love to and faith in Chriſt, nor any experience of the work of the Spirit of God upon their ſouls; no true ſight and ſenſe of ſin, nor any ſpiritual knowledge of ſalvation by Chriſt; in whom fleſh is the governing principle, whoſe minds and principles are carnal, and their converſation wholly ſo; yea, perſons may be in the fleſh, in an unregenerate ſtate, who may abſtain from the groſſer immoralities of life, and even make a profeſſion of religion: now ſuch theſe had been, the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of and to, and tells how it was with them when in this ſtate; the motions of ſins which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death: by the motions of ſins are meant, the evil paſſions and affections of the mind, the luſts of the heart, ſinful deſires, evil thoughts, the imaginations of the thoughts of the heart, the firſt motions of the mind to ſin: theſe were by the law; not as the efficient cauſe of them, that neither produces nor encourages them; it is holy, juſt, and good, requires truth in the inward parts, and not only forbids the outward acts of ſin, but even covetous deſires, and luſtful thoughts: no, theſe inward motions of ſin ariſe from a corrupt heart and nature; are encouraged and cheriſhed by the old man that dwells there; and men are enticed by ſatan to a compliance with them. Some think that the meaning of the phraſe is, that theſe ſecret luſts of the heart are made known by the law, as in ver. 7. ſo they are, but not whilſt a man is in the fleſh, or in an unregenerate ſtate, but when he comes to be wrought upon powerfully by the Spirit of God, who makes uſe of the law to ſuch a purpoſe: but the true ſenſe of it is, that theſe motions of ſin are irritated, provoked and increaſed thro' the law's prohibition of them; which is not to be charged as a fault on the law, but to be imputed to the depravity and corruption of man; who is like to one in a burning fever, very deſirous of drink, who the more it is forbid, the more eager is he of it; or like a mighty torrent of water, which riſes, rages, flows and overflows the more any methods are taken to ſtop its current; or like a filthy dunghil, which when the ſun ſtrikes powerfully on it, it exhales and draws out its filthy ſtench; which nauſeous ſmell is not to be imputed to the pure rays of the ſun, but to the filthineſs of the dunghil: theſe motions of ſin are ſaid to work in our members; in the members of our bodies, which theſe ſinful affections of the ſoul make uſe of to put them into action, and ſo they bring forth fruit; very evil fruit indeed, for nothing elſe can be expected from ſuch an evil tree as the corrupt nature of man is: and this fruit is unto death; deadly fruit, worthy of death, and would iſſue in eternal death, if grace did not prevent: the riſe, beginning, motion, progreſs and iſſue of ſin are moſt exactly and beautifully deſcribed, agreeable to this account here, by the Apoſtle James, chap. i. 13, 14, 15.

Ver. 6. But now we are delivered from the law, &c.] From the miniſtration of it, by Moſes; from it, as a covenant of works; from its rigorous exaction; from its curſe and condemnation, all this by Chriſt; and from its being an irritating, provoking law to ſin, thro' the corruption of nature, by the Spirit and grace of Chriſt; but not from obedience to it, as in the hands of Chriſt. The Vulgate Latin verſion, and ſome copies, read, from the law of death; and the Ethiopic verſion renders it, we are looſed from the law, and are delivered from the former doctrine; the doctrine of the legal diſpenſation. That being dead; not ſin, but the law: in what ſenſe believers are dead to the law, and that to them, has been ſhewn on ver. 4. Wherein we were held; as a woman is by the law to her huſband, or as perſons guilty, who are detained priſoners; ſo we were kept under the law, ſhut up unto the faith, as in a priſon, Gal. iii. 23. Now the ſaints deliverance from the law, thro' the abrogation of it, that loſing its former life, vigour, power, and dominion, is not that they may live a looſe, licentious life and converſation, but that they ſhould ſerve the Lord their God without ſlaviſh fear, and with a godly one, acceptably, in righteouſneſs and holineſs, all the days of their lives; and their Lord and maſter Jeſus Chriſt, who is king of ſaints, lawgiver in his church, and whoſe commandments are to be obſerved from a principle of love, in faith, and to his glory; yea, even the law itſelf, as held forth by him, as the Apoſtle ſays in the cloſe of this chapter, with the mind I myſelf ſerve the law of God: the manner in which this ſervice is to be, and is performed, is, in newneſs of ſpirit; under the influences of the Spirit of God, the author of renovation, of the new creature, or new man created in us, in righteouſneſs and true holineſs; and from a new heart, and new ſpirit, and new principles of life, light, love, and grace formed in the ſoul; and by walking in newneſs of life, or by a new life, walk, and converſation: and not in the oldneſs of the letter; not in the outward obſervance of the law of Moſes, which is the letter; not indulging the old man, or walking after the dictates of corrupt nature; nor behaving according to the old former courſe of living: on the whole it may be obſerved, that a believer without the law, being delivered from it, that being dead to him, and he to that, lives a better life and converſation under the influence of the Spirit of God, than one that is under the law, and the works of it, deſtitute of the grace of God; the one brings forth fruit unto death, the other ſerves the Lord, in newneſs of ſpirit, and not in the oldneſs of the letter.

Ver. 7. What ſhall we ſay then? is the law ſin? &c.] The Apoſtle having ſaid, that the motions of ſins were by the law, meets with an objection, or rather an ill-natured cavil, is the law ſin? if the motions of ſins are by it, then it inſtigates and prompts men to ſin; it cheriſhes it in them; it leads them, and impels them to the commiſſion of it, and therefore muſt be the cauſe of ſin; and if the cauſe of ſin, then it muſt be ſin, or ſinful itſelf: what ſhall we ſay then? how ſhall we remove this difficulty? anſwer this objection, and ſilence this cavil? To this it is replied by way of deteſtation and abhorrence, God forbid! a way of ſpeaking often made uſe of by the Apoſtle, when any dreadful conſequence was drawn from, or any ſhocking objection was made to his doctrine, and which was ſo monſtrous as ſcarcely to deſerve any other manner of refutation; ſee chap. iii. 3, 4, 5. and vi. 1, 2, 15. and next by obſerving the uſe of the law to diſcover ſin; which it does by forbidding it, and threatning it with death; by accuſing for it, convincing of it, and repreſenting it in its proper colours it being as a glaſs in which it may be beheld juſt as it is, neither greater nor leſs; which muſt be underſtood as attended with a divine power and light, otherwiſe as a glaſs is of no uſe to a blind man, ſo neither is the law in this ſenſe, to a man in a ſtate of darkneſs, until the Spirit of God opens his eyes to behold in this glaſs what manner of man he is: now ſince the law is ſo uſeful to diſcover, and ſo to diſcountenance ſin, that itſelf cannot be ſin, or ſinful. The Apoſtle exemplifies this in his own caſe, and ſays, nay, I had not known ſin, but by the law; which he ſays not in the perſon of another, there is no room nor reaſon for ſuch a fancy; but in his own perſon, and of himſelf: not of himſelf at that preſent time, as is evident from his way of ſpeaking; nor of himſelf in his childhood, before he came to years of diſcretion to diſcern between good and evil; but as, and when he was a grown perſon, and whilſt a Phariſee; he did not know ſin during his being in that ſtate till the law came, and entred into his conſcience, and then, and by it, he knew ſin, the exceeding ſinfulneſs of it, and that he himſelf was the chief of ſinners. Nay, he goes on to obſerve, that by the law he came to know, not only the ſinfulneſs of outward actions, but alſo of inward luſts; for I had not known luſt, ſays he, except the law had ſaid, thou ſhalt not covet; as it does in Exod. xx. 17. This is a way of ſpeaking uſed by the Jews, when they produce any paſſage out of the law, thus [e], התורה אמרה, the law ſays, if any one comes to kill thee; referring either to 1 Sam. xxiv. 11. or Exod. xxii. 1. and a little after, the law ſays, namely, in Exod. iii. 5. put off thy ſhoes from off thy feet, &c. By luſt is meant the inward motions of ſin in the heart, any and every deſire of the mind after it; not only ſtudied and concerted ſchemes, how to bring about and compaſs an evil action; but every looſe vagrant thought of ſin and inclination to it; yea, every imagination of the thought of the heart, before the imagination is well formed into a thought; and not only a dallying with ſin in the mind, dwelling upon it with pleaſure in thought, but even ſuch ſudden motions and ſtarts of the mind to ſin, to which we give no aſſent; ſuch as are involuntary, yea, contrary to the will, being the evil we would not, and are diſpleaſing and hateful to us; theſe are meant by luſt, and which by the law of God are known to be ſinful, and only by that. Theſe were not known to be ſo by the Gentiles, who only had the law and light of nature; nor are they condemned, nor any proviſion made againſt them, nor can there be any made, by the laws of men: and tho' theſe inward luſts are condemned by the law of God, yet inaſmuch as they were not puniſhable by men, and could be covered with the guiſe of an external righteouſneſs, multitudes who were born under, and brought up in that law, were ſecure and indolent about them, did not look upon them as ſins, or as at all affecting their righteouſneſs; but imagined that, touching the righteouſneſs of the law, they were blameleſs; which was the caſe of all the Phariſees, and of the Apoſtle whilſt ſuch: but when the law came and entred his conſcience with power and light attending it, then he ſaw ſuch innumerable ſwarms of luſts in his heart, and theſe to be ſinful, which he never ſaw and knew before; juſt as in a ſun-beam we behold thoſe numerous little atoms, which otherwiſe are indiſcernable by us. Now ſince the law is of ſuch uſe, not only to diſcover the ſinfulneſs of outward actions, but alſo of inward luſts and deſires, that itſelf cannot be ſinful.

Ver. 8. But ſin taking occaſion by the commandment, &c.] By the commandment is meant, either the whole moral law, or that particular commandment, thou ſhalt not covet; which the Jews ſay, comprehends all; "God ſay they [f], cauſed them "(the Iſraelites) to hear the ten words, which he "concluded with this word, thou ſhalt not covet; "שכולם תלוים בו, for all of them depend on that; "and to intimate, that whoever keeps this commandment, it is as if he kept the whole law, and "whoever tranſgreſſes this, it is all one as if he "tranſgreſſed the whole law;" and no doubt but it does refer to any unlawful thought of, deſire after, and inclination to any thing forbidden in the other commandments. By ſin is meant, not the devil, as ſome of the ancients thought; but the vitioſity and corruption of nature, indwelling ſin, the law in the members that took occaſion by the law of God; ſo that the law at moſt could only be an occaſion, not the cauſe of ſin, and beſides, this was an occaſion not given by the law, but taken by ſin; ſo that it was ſin, and not the law which wrought in him all manner of concupiſcence. The law forbidding every unclean thought, and covetous deſire of unlawful objects, ſin took an occaſion thro' theſe prohibitions to work in him, ſtir up and excite concupiſcence, evil deſire after all manner of things forbidden by the law; hence it is clear that not the law, but ſin, is exceeding ſinful: for without the law ſin was dead; not that before the law of Moſes was given, ſin lay dead and unexerted; for during that interval between Adam and Moſes ſin was, and lived and reigned, and death by it as much as at any other time; but when the Apoſtle was without the law, that is without the knowledge of the ſpirituality of it, before it came with power and light into his heart and conſcience, ſin lay as tho' it was dead; it was ſo in his apprehenſion, he fancied himſelf free from it, and that he was perfectly righteous.

Ver. 9. For I was alive without the law once, &c.] The Apoſtle ſays this, not in the perſon of Adam, as ſome have thought; who lived indeed, in a ſtate of innocence, a perfectly holy and righteous life, but not without the law, which was the rule of his actions, and the meaſure of his obedience; he had the law of nature written upon his heart, and a poſitive law reſpecting the forbidden fruit given him, as a trial of his obedience; and tho' when he tranſgreſſed he became mortal, yet ſin could not be ſaid to revive in him, which never lived before: nor does the Apoſtle ſpeak in the perſon of a Jew, or the whole body of the people of Iſrael before the law was given on mount Sinai; before that time the ſons of Abraham did not live without a law; for beſides the law of nature, which they had in common with others, they were acquainted with other laws of God, as the laws of circumciſion, ſacrifices, and the ſeveral duties of religion; ſee Gen. xviii. 19. and when the law did come from mount Sinai, it had not ſuch effects upon them as are here expreſſed: but the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of himſelf, and that not as in his ſtate of infancy before he could diſcern between good and evil, but when grown up, and whilſt a Phariſee; who tho' he was born under the law, was brought up and more perfectly inſtructed in it, than the common people were, and was a ſtrict obſerver of it, yet was without the knowledge of the ſpirituality of it; he, as the reſt of the Phariſees, thought it only regarded the outward actions, and did not reach to the ſpirits or ſouls of men, the inward thoughts and affections of the mind; the law was as it were at a diſtance from him, it had not as yet entered into his heart and conſcience; and whilſt this was his caſe he was alive, he did not know that he was dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, a truth he afterwards was acquainted with; nor that he was ſo much as diſordered by ſin, he thought himſelf healthful, ſound and whole, when he was diſeaſed and full of wounds, bruiſes, and ſores from head to foot; he lived in the utmoſt peace and tranquillity, without the leaſt ruffle and uneaſineſs, free from any terror or deſpondency, and in perfect ſecurity, being in ſure and certain hope of eternal life; and concluded if ever any man went to heaven he certainly ſhould, ſince, as he imagined, he lived a holy and righteous life, free of all blame, and even to perfection: but when the commandment came; not to Adam in the garden of Eden; nor to the Iſraelites at mount Sinai; but into the heart and conſcience of the Apoſtle, with power and light from above: ſin revived; it lift up its monſtrous head, and appeared in its ugly ſhape, exceeding ſinful indeed; it grew ſtrong and exerted itſelf; its ſtrugglings and oppoſition, its rebellion and corruption were ſeen and felt, which ſhew that it was not dead before, only ſeemed to be ſo; it was in being, and it lived and acted before as now; the difference was not in that, but in the Apoſtle's ſenſe and apprehenſion of it, who upon ſight of it died away: and I died; he now ſaw himſelf a dead man, dead in ſin, dead in law, under a ſentence of death which he now had within himſelf; he ſaw he was deſerving of eternal death, and all his hopes of eternal life by his obedience to the law of works died at once; he now experimentally learnt that doctrine he ſo much inſiſted on afterwards in his miniſtry, and to the laſt maintained, that there can be no juſtification of a ſinner by the deeds of the law, ſince by it is the knowledge of ſin.

[e] T. Bab. Beracot, fol. 62. 2.

[f] Abkath Rochel, l. 1. par. 1. p. 3. Ed. Hulſ.

Ver. 10. And the commandment which was ordained to life, &c.] The law which promiſed a continuance of an immortal life to Adam, in caſe of perfect obedience to it; and which was appointed to the Iſraelites, that by the obſervation of it they might live in the land of Canaan, and in the quiet and full poſſeſſion of their priviledges and enjoyments; but was never ordained to eternal life, or that men ſhould obtain that by their obedience to it; ſince eternal life is the free gift of God without reſpect to any works of men; ſee Gal. iii. 21. This ſame law, the Apoſtle ſays, I found to be unto death; as it was an occaſion, thro' the vitioſity of nature, of ſtirring up ſin in him, which brought forth fruit unto death; as it convinced him that he was a dead man and worthy of death; as it threatned him with it, and ſtruck all his hopes of eternal life dead, and left him in this condition without giving him the leaſt direction or aſſiſtance whereby to obtain life.

Ver. 11. For ſin taking occaſion by the commandment, &c.] As in ver. 8. deceived me; either by promiſing pleaſure or impunity: the ſame effect is aſcribed by the Jews to the evil imagination or corruption of nature, which they ſay is called an enticer, שמפתה ארם, that deceives man[g]: and by it ſlew me; mortally wounded me: not the law, but ſin by the law, deceived and ſlew him; ſo that as before, the law is cleared from being the cauſe of ſin, ſo here, from being the cauſe of death; for tho' the law is a killing letter, the miniſtration of condemnation and death, yet it is not the cauſe of it; but ſin, which is a tranſgreſſion of the law, is that which deceives or leads out of the way, as the word ſignifies, and then kills. The metaphor is taken from a thief or a robber, who leads a man out of the way into ſome bye path, and then murders him.

Ver. 12. Therefore the law is holy, &c.] This is a concluſion or inference drawn from the preceding diſcourſe, in commendation of the law; that ſtanding clear of any charge or imputation of ſin, as being the cauſe of it. This epithet the Apoſtle gives to the law, is what the Jews frequently give it; worthy are the Iſraelites, ſay they[h], "to whom is given אורייתא קדישא, the holy law; "in which they ſtudy day and night." By the law is meant the whole body of the precepts of it in general; and by the commandment, either the ſame, or every one of the commandments in particular, and eſpecially that which is cited, thou ſhalt not covet. Some have thought that the three properties of it deſign the threefold diviſion of the law; and ſuppoſe that by that which is holy is meant the ceremonial law, which ſanctified to the purifying of the fleſh; by that which is juſt, the judicial law, which pointed out to the Jewiſh commonwealth what was right and wrong; and by that which is good, the moral law in all its precepts: but nothing is more certain, than that the moral law is only ſpoken of in this context, which may be ſaid to be holy, becauſe of its author the holy God, from whom nothing can come but what is holy; and becauſe of the matter of it, it is a tranſcript of the holy nature of God, a declaration of his holy will; it requires holineſs both of heart and life; it forbids whatever is unholy, and commands nothing but what is holy; it teaches men to live holy, ſober, righteous and godly lives. It may be truly called juſt, or righteous, as it demands perfect obedience to all its precepts, or it won't admit of it as a righteouſneſs; as it pronounces guilty, curſes and condemns for every diſobedience of it; as it deals impartially with perſons the tranſgreſſors of it; and as it acquits believers upon the foot of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, the fulfilling end of it. It is rightly called good from the author of it God, from whom every good thing comes, and nothing elſe; from the matter of it, and from the uſe of it both to ſaints and ſinners.

Ver. 13. Was then that which is good, made death unto me? &c.] An objection is ſtarted upon the laſt epithet in commendation of the law; and it is as if the objector ſhould ſay, if the law is good, as you ſay, how comes it to paſs that it is made death, or is the cauſe of death to you? can that be good, which is deadly, or the cauſe of death? or can that be the cauſe of death which is good? This objection taken out of the mouth of another perſon proceeds upon a miſtake of the Apoſtle's meaning; for tho' he had ſaid that he died when the commandment came, and found by experience that it was unto death, yet does not give the leaſt intimation that the law was the cauſe of his death; at moſt, that it was only an occaſion, and that was not given by the law, but taken by ſin, which, and not the law, deceived him and ſlew him. Nor is it any objection to the goodneſs of the law, that it is a miniſtration of condemnation and death to ſinners; for lex non damnans non eſt lex, a law without a ſanction or penalty, which has no power to condemn and puniſh is no law, or at leaſt a law of no uſe and ſervice; nor is the judge, or the ſentence which he according to law pronounces upon a malefactor, the cauſe of his death, but the crime which he is guilty of; and the caſe is the ſame here, wherefore the Apoſtle anſwers to this objection with abhorrence and deteſtation of fixing any ſuch charge upon the law, as being the cauſe of death to him, ſaying, God forbid; a way of ſpeaking uſed by him, as has been obſerved, when any thing is greatly diſliked by him, and is far from his thoughts. Moreover, he goes on to open the true end and reaſon of ſin by the law working death in his conſcience; but ſin, that it might appear ſin, working death in me by that which which is good; that is, the vitioſity and corruption of nature, which is deſigned by ſin, took an occaſion, by that which is good, that is, the law, thro' its prohibition of luſt, to work in me all manner of concupiſcence, which brought forth fruit unto death; wherefore, upon the law's entrance into my heart and conſcience, I received the ſentence of death in myſelf, that ſo ſin by it, working death in me, might appear ſin to me, which I never knew before. This end was to be, and is anſwered by it, yea, that ſin by the commandment might become exceeding ſinful; that the corruption of nature might not only be ſeen and known to be ſin, but exceeding ſinful; as being not only contrary to the pure and holy nature of God, but as taking occaſion by the pure and holy law of God to exert itſelf the more, and ſo appear to be as the words καθ᾽ υπερβολην αμαρτωλος may be rendered, exceedingly a ſinner, or an exceeding great ſinner; that being the ſource and parent of all actual ſins and tranſgreſſions; wherefore not the law, but ſin was the cauſe of death, which by the law is diſcovered to be ſo very ſinful.

Ver. 14. For we know that the law is ſpiritual, &c.] We who have a ſpiritual underſtanding of the law, who have been led into the true nature of it by the Spirit of God, know by experience that that itſelf is ſpiritual; and therefore can never be the cauſe of ſin or death: the law may be ſaid to be ſpiritual, becauſe it comes from the Spirit of God; and reaches to the ſpirit of man; it requires truth in the inward parts; ſpiritual ſervice and obedience; a ſerving of it with our minds; a worſhipping of God in ſpirit and truth; a loving of him with all our hearts and ſouls, as well as a performance of all the outward acts of religion and duty; and becauſe it cannot be truly obeyed and conformed to without the aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God. To this ſpirituality of the law the Apoſtle oppoſes himſelf, but I am carnal, ſold under ſin: from hence to the end of the chapter many are of opinion, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks in the perſon of an unregenerate man, or of himſelf as unregenerate; but nothing is more clear, than that he ſpeaks all along of himſelf in the firſt perſon, I am carnal, &c. αυτος εγω, I myſelf, as in ver. 25. and in the preſent tenſe of what he then was and found; whereas when he ſpeaks of his unregenerate ſtate, and how it was with him under the firſt convictions of ſin, he ſpeaks of them as things paſt, ver. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. beſides ſeveral things which are ſaid by the Apoſtle, can neither agree with him, nor any other, but as regenerate; ſuch as to hate evil, delight in the law of God, and ſerve it with the mind, ver. 15, 22, 25. Moreover, the diſtinctions between fleſh and ſpirit, the inward and the outward man, and the ſtruggle there is between them are to be found in none but regenerate perſons; and to ſay no more, the thankſgiving for deliverance from ſin by Chriſt can only come from ſuch; nor are any of the things ſaid inapplicable to men that are born again, as will appear by the conſideration of them as they follow: for when the Apoſtle ſays, I am carnal, his meaning is, either that he was ſo by nature, and as he ſaw himſelf when ſin thro' the law became exceeding ſinful to him; or as he might be denominated from the fleſh or corruption of nature which was ſtill in him, and from the infirmities of the fleſh he was attended with; juſt as the Corinthians, tho' ſanctified in Chriſt Jeſus, and called to be ſaints, are ſaid to be carnal on account of their envying, ſtrife and diviſions, 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2, 3, 4. or in compariſon of the ſpiritual law of God, which was now before him, and in which he was beholding his face as in a glaſs, and with which when compared, the holieſt man in the world muſt be reckoned carnal. He adds, ſold under ſin; he did not ſell himſelf to work wickedneſs, as Ahab and others; he was paſſive and not active in it; and when at any time he with his fleſh ſerved the law of ſin, he was not a voluntary, but an involuntary ſervant; beſides, this may be underſtood of his other I, his carnal I, his unrenewed ſelf, the old man which is always under ſin, when the ſpiritual I, the new man, is never under the law of ſin, but under the governing influence of the grace of God.

Ver. 15. For that which I do, I allow not, &c.] The Apoſtle having cleared the law from the charge of being the cauſe either of ſin or death, and taken the blame to himſelf, proceeds to give an account of the ſtruggle and combat he found in himſelf between the fleſh and ſpirit; that which I do, I allow not. That which he did was evil, ſince he allowed not of it; but this is to be underſtood not of any notorious crime committed by him, and repeated again and again; nor of a ſinful courſe of life, for before his converſion he was not a prophane man, but externally moral, and after his converſion, had his converſation in the world by the grace of God in righteouſneſs and holineſs; a vitious courſe of life being contrary to the grace of God implanted in him, and the doctrines of grace profeſſed by him; but of internal luſts, the workings of corruptions in his heart, and which are real actions of the mind, together with the various frailties and infirmities of life: when the Apoſtle ſays that what he did, γινωσκω, I know not; his meaning is, not that he was utterly ignorant of them, of their nature and operations; that he was inſenſible of their motions, and unconcerned about them; for his ſenſe of them, and concern for them, are expreſſed by him in the ſtrongeſt terms, I know, I find, I ſee, O wretched man, &c. ver. 18, 21, 23, 24. but either that the efforts and effects of ſin in him were ſo ſudden, and at an unawares, that he was ſometimes overtaken and held captive, before he knew well where he was, or what he was doing; or the ſenſe is, that he had not a full knowledge of the evil of his heart, the corruptions of his nature, nor did he underſtand all his infirmities and the errors of his life; or elſe the meaning is, I own it not as right, but confeſs it to be wrong, I don't acknowledge theſe actions as the productions of the new man, they are alien to him, but as the deeds of the old man; or rather, I don't approve of them, I diſlike, abhor and deteſt them; I cannot excuſe or palliate them, but muſt condemn them; ſo words of knowledge in the Hebrew language are expreſſive of love, liking, and approbation; ſee Pſal. i. 6. Hoſ. viii. 4. Gen. xviii. 19. on which laſt text, I know him, ſays Jarchi, לשון חבה, it is the language of love, or a phraſe expreſſive of ſtrong affection; and ſo here, I know not, I don't like, love and approve of theſe things, or I don't allow of them, and indulge myſelf in them, I loath them and myſelf for them; and is this talking like an unregenerate man? can it be thought that the Apoſtle ſpeaks of himſelf as unregenerate? or perſonates ſuch a man? for what I would that do I not; what he deſired and willed was good, tho' he did it not; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion reads, for not the good which I would, I do; and ſo the next clauſe, but the evil which I hate, I do: and what was that? he would have had his thoughts always employed about the beſt things; he would have had his affections continually and alone ſet on God, Chriſt, and the things of another world; he would, he was deſirous to keep the whole law of God, and do the whole will of God, and live without ſin, and as the angels do in heaven: now ſuch a will as this, is never to be found in unregenerate perſons; this is from God, and the power of his grace: when he ſays he did not what he willed, what he was deſirous of, and bent upon, his ſenſe is, not that he never did any good thing he willed; for he did many good things, as every good man does, but he did not always do the good he willed, and never perfectly, nor any thing without grace and ſtrength from Chriſt: he adds, but what I hate that do I; ſin was what he hated; it being contrary to the pure and holy nature of God, to the good and righteous law of God, and was in itſelf to his view, exceeding ſinful: he hated vain thoughts, unclean deſires, revengeful luſts, the ſecret motions of all ſin in his heart, and the various evil actions of life; which can never be ſaid of an unregenerate man; who loves ſin, delights in iniquity, and takes pleaſure in them that do it; and yet what the Apoſtle hated he did; he wrought with his carnal I, his fleſh, and through the power of it, and force of temptation, though not without reluctance, remorſe, and repentance. The Karaite Jews, which were the better ſort of them, ſay and hold ſome things, not much unlike to what is here delivered; "though a man, "ſay they [1], ſhould tranſgreſs ſome of the commandments, or the commandments in part, "לתגבורת תאוה לא על צד החפץ, through the "ſtrength of luſt, and not on account of, or with "pleaſure and delight, he ſhall be one of thoſe that "ſhall enter into paradiſe."

Ver. 16. If then I do that which I would not, &c.] This is a corollary, or an inference from what he had related of his own experience; that ſince what he did, though it was contrary to the law of God, yet was what he did not will nor allow of, but hated, it muſt be a clear point, that he conſented to the law, that it was good; lovely and amiable; that it forbad thoſe things which were hateful, and commanded thoſe things which were deſireable to a good man; and ſo is acknowledged to be a very beautiful rule of obedience, walk, and converſation.

Ver. 17. Now then, it is no more I that do it, &c.] This is another inference, deduced from what is before ſaid, that ſince he did not approve, but hated what he did, and willed the contrary, it was not he as ſpiritual, as born again, as a new man, a new creature, that did it; ſee 1 John iii. 9. But ſin, ſays he, that dwelleth in me; the old man, the carnal I, the evil preſent with him, the law in his members; which not only exiſted in him, and wrought in him, and that at times very ſtrongly, but dwelt in him, had its abode in him, as it has in all regenerate perſons, and will have, as long as they are in the body.

Ver. 18. For I know that in me, that is, in my fleſh, &c.] The Apoſtle goes on to give ſome further account of himſelf, what he knew, and was fully aſſured of by long experience; as that no good thing dwelt in him, that is, in his fleſh, or carnal ſelf; for otherwiſe there were many good things dwelt in him; there was the good work of grace, and the good word of God in him, and even Father, Son, and Spirit, dwelt in him; but his meaning is, that there was no good thing naturally in him; no good thing of his own putting there; nothing but what God had put there; no good thing, but what was owing to Chriſt, to the grace of God, and influence of the Spirit; or as he himſelf explains it, there was no good thing in his fleſh; in the old man that was in him, which has nothing in his nature good; no good thing comes out of him, nor is any good thing done by him: and this explanative and limiting clauſe, that is in my fleſh, clearly proves, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks of himſelf, and as regenerate; for had he ſpoke in the perſon of an unregenerate man, there would have been no room nor reaſon for ſuch a reſtriction, ſeeing an unregenerate man is nothing elſe but fleſh, and has nothing but fleſh, or corrupt nature in him; and who does not know, that no good thing dwells in ſuch perſons? whereas the Apoſtle intimates by this explication, that he had ſomething elſe in him beſide fleſh, and which is oppoſed to it; and that is ſpirit, or the new man, which is of a ſpiritual nature, and is ſeated in the ſpirit, or ſoul, and comes from the Spirit of God; and in this ſpiritual man dwell good things, for the fruit of the Spirit, is in all goodneſs, righteouſneſs, and truth; ſo that though there was no good thing dwelling in his fleſh, in the old man, yet there were good things dwelling in his ſpirit, in the new and ſpiritual man, the hidden man of the heart: and he adds, to will is preſent with me; which muſt be underſtood, not of the power and faculty of the will, with reſpect to things natural and civil, which is common to all men; nor of a will to that which is evil, which is in wicked men; but of a will to that which is good, which he had not of himſelf, but from God, and is only to be found in regenerate perſons; and denotes the readineſs of his mind and will to that which is ſpiritually good, like that which Chriſt obſerves of his diſciples, when he ſays, the ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is weak, Matt. xxvi. 41. which may ſerve much to illuſtrate the paſſage before us: ſince it follows, but how to perform that which is good, I find not; he found he had no ſtrength of himſelf to do what he willed; and that he could do nothing without Chriſt; and that what he did by the ſtrength and grace of Chriſt, he did not do perfectly. To will to live without ſin, not to have a luſtful or a revengeful thought in his breaſt was preſent with him, but how to perform, how to live in this manner, which was ſo deſireable to him, being born again, he found not. It may be aſked, how does this agree with what the Apoſtle ſays, it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleaſure? To this it may be replied, that when God does work in his people both to will and to do, he does not work both equally alike, or to the ſame degree, ſo that the work anſwers to the will; God never works in them ſo to do, as to will, for when they are wrought in, acted upon, and influenced to do the moſt, and that in the beſt manner, they never do all that they would; and ſometimes God works in them to will, when he does not work in them to do; as in the caſe of the diſciples of Chriſt, in whom he worked to will to watch with Chriſt an hour, but did not work in them to do; and whenever he works in the ſaints, whether to will or to do, or both, 'tis always of his own good pleaſure.

Ver. 19. For the good that I would, I do not, &c.] The Apoſtle here repeats what he had delivered in ver. 15, 16. to ſtrengthen and confirm this part of his experience; that though he had a will to that which was good, yet he wanted power, and had none of himſelf to perform; and therefore often did what he would not, and what he would he did not.

[1] R. Eliahu in Addareth, c. 3. apud Trigland de Sect. Karaeorum, c. 10. p. 176.

Ver. 20. Now if I do that I would not, &c.] The ſame concluſion is formed here, as in ver. 17. not with any view to excuſe himſelf from blame in ſinning, but to trace the luſts of his heart, and the ſins of his life, to the ſource and fountain of them, the corruption of his nature; and to aſcribe them to the proper cauſe of them, which was not the law of God, nor the new man, but ſin that dwelt in him.

Ver. 21. I find then a law, &c.] This is to be underſtood either of the corruption of nature, which he found by experience to be in him; and which becauſe of its force, power, and prevalence, it ſometimes had in him, he calls a law; it forcibly demanding compliance with its luſts; and is the ſame with what he calls evil, and which the Jews ſo frequently ſtile, יצר הרע, the evil imagination, by which they mean the corruption of nature; and one of the ſeven names, and the firſt of them, by which it is called, they tell us [k], is, רע, evil; the very name it goes by here, and which they ſay God calls it, Gen. vi. 5. and well may it be ſo called, ſince it is originally, naturally, and continually evil; it is evil in its nature and conſequences; it is the ſource and ſpring of all evil: that when I would do good, ſays the Apoſtle, as ſoon as any good thought ariſes in me, any good reſolution is entered into by me, or I am about to do any thing that is good, evil, the vitioſity of nature, is preſent with me, and hinders me; it came into the world with me, and it has continued with me ever ſince; it cleaves cloſe unto me, it lies very nigh me, and whenever there is any motion to that which is good, it ſtarts up, which ſeemed to lie aſleep before, and exerts itſelf, ſo that I cannot do the good I would. The Jews ſay [l], there are, שתי לבבות, two hearts in man, the good imagination, and the evil imagination. The Apoſtle here ſpeaks as of two wills in regenerate men, one to good, and another to evil: or this may be underſtood of the law of God, which he found agreed with his mind, willing that which is good, though ſin lay ſo near to him; or he found that willing that which was good, was the law of God, very agreeable to it; and that the law was on his ſide, favouring him, encouraging him to that which is good, though ſin kept ſo cloſe to him; to which ſenſe agree the following words.

Ver. 22. For I delight in the law of God, &c.] This an unregenerate man cannot do; he don't like its commands, they are diſagreeable to his corrupt nature; and as it is a threatening, curſing, damning law, it can never be delighted in by him: the moraliſt, the Phariſee, who obeys it externally, don't love it, nor delight in it; he obeys it not from love to its precepts, but from fear of its threatnings; from a deſire of popular eſteem, and from low mercenary ſelfiſh views, in order to gain the applauſe of men, and favour of God: only a regenerate man delights in the law of God; which he does, as it is fulfilled by Chriſt, who has anſwered all the demands of it; and as it is in the hands of Chriſt, held forth by him as a rule of holy walk and converſation; and as it is written upon his heart by the Spirit of God, to which he yields a voluntary and chearful obedience: he ſerves it with his mind, of a ready mind freely, and without any conſtraint, but that of love; he delights together with the law, as the word here uſed ſignifies; the delight is mutual and reciprocal, the law delights in him, and he delights in the law; and they both delight in the ſelf-ſame things, and particularly in the perfect obedience which the Son of God has yielded to it. The Apoſtle adds, after the inward man; by which he means the renewed man, the new man, or new nature, formed in his ſoul; which had its ſeat in the inward part, is an internal principle, oil in the veſſel of the heart, a ſeed under ground, the kingdom within us, the hidden man of the heart, which is not obvious to every one's view, it being not any thing that is external, though never ſo good; this in its nature is agreeable to the law of God, and according to this a regenerate man delights in it: but then this reſtrictive limiting clauſe, ſuppoſes another man, the old man, the carnal I, according to which the Apoſtle did not delight in the law of God; and proves, that he ſpeaks of himſelf as regenerate, and not as unregenerate, or as perſonating an unregenerate man, becauſe no ſuch diſtinction is to be found in ſuch a perſon; nor does ſuch a perſon delight at all in any ſenſe, upon any conſideration in the law of God, but is enmity againſt it, and unſubjected to it; nor can he be otherwiſe, without the grace of God.

Ver. 23. But I ſee another law in my members, &c.] That is, he ſaw, he perceived it by experience; he felt the force and power of inbred corruption working in him, and as a law demanding obedience to it; and which he might well call another law, it being not only diſtinct from, but oppoſite to the law of God he delighted in; the one is good, the other evil; this other law is a tranſgreſſion of the law of God, and which he obſerved to be in his members, i. e. in the members of his body; not that it had its ſeat only, or chiefly in his body, and the parts of it, but becauſe it exerted itſelf by them, it made uſe of them to fulfil its luſts: the ſame phraſe is uſed in the Targum on Pſal. xxxviii. 3. which renders the words there thus, there's no peace, באברי, in my members, becauſe of my ſin: now this law was warring, ſays he, againſt the law of my mind; by the law of his mind is meant, either the law of God written on his mind in converſion, and which he delighted in, and ſerved with his mind, as renewed by the Spirit of God; or the new nature in him, the principle of grace wrought in his mind, called the law of it, becauſe it was the governing principle there; which reigns, and will reign in every regenerate perſon through righteouſneſs, unto eternal life, though the law of ſin oppoſes all its force and power againſt it; that is not only contrary to it, luſts againſt it, but wars, and commits acts of hoſtility againſt it: the ſtate of regenerate perſons is a warfare, they have many enemies to combat with, as ſatan and the world; but thoſe of their own houſhold, within themſelves, in their own hearts, are the worſt of all; there's an inteſtine war in them, as it were a company of two armies, fleſh and ſpirit, ſin and grace, combating together; and ſo it will be as long as this life laſts; ſo true is that ſaying of the Jews [m], in which they agree with the Apoſtle, "as "long as the righteous live, נלחמים עם יצרן, "they are at war with the corruption of their na-"ture; when they die they are at reſt:" hence we read of, מלחמת יצר הרע, the war of the evil imagination [n]: but what is worſt of all, this is ſometimes bringing them into captivity to the law of ſin, which is in their members; that is, to itſelf; for the law in the members, and the law of ſin in the members, muſt be the ſame: and it may be ſaid to bring into captivity to itſelf, when it only endeavours to do it, though it does not effect it; for ſometimes words which expreſs an effect, only deſign the endeavour to effect, but not that itſelf; ſee Ezek. xxiv. 13. Gen. xxxvii. 21, 22. Exod. viii. 18. But admitting that this phraſe intends the real and actual effecting of it, it is to be underſtood of a captivity to ſin, different from that an unregenerate man is in; who is a voluntary captive to ſin and ſatan, gives up himſelf to ſuch ſlavery and bondage, and rather goes, than is brought or carried into it; whereas a regenerate man is, through the force of ſin, and power of temptation, violently drawn and carried into captivity; in which he is held againſt his will, and to his great uneaſineſs: beſides, this expreſſion does not denote abſolute dominion, which ſin has not over a regenerate man; nor is it utterly inconſiſtent with his character as ſuch; for as a ſubject of one nation may be taken a priſoner, and be carried captive into another nation, and yet remain a ſubject where he was, and does not become one of that country into which he is carried captive; ſo a regenerate man, being carried captive by ſin, does not come under the abſolute dominion of ſin, or ceaſe to be a ſubject of the kingdom of grace, or in other words, a regenerate perſon: moreover, the very phraſe of bringing into captivity, ſuppoſes that the perſon before was not a captive; whereas every unregenerate man is one, was always ſo, and never otherwiſe: add to all this, that this captivity was very diſtreſſing and uneaſy to the perſon, and makes him cry out, O wretched man, &c. whereas the captivity of an unregenerate perſon is very agreeable to him; he likes his priſon, he loves his chains, and don't chuſe to be in any other ſtate and condition; though as the Jews[o] ſay, there's no captivity, כגלות הנשמה, like the captivity of the ſoul; and nothing ſo grieving and afflictive to a good man, as that is. The Apoſtle uſes much ſuch language as his countrymen do, who frequently repreſent man as having two principles in him, the one good, the other bad; the one they call, יצר הרע, the evil imagination, or corruption of nature; the other they call, יצר הטוב, the good imagination, or principle of grace and goodneſs; which they ſay[p], are at continual war with each other, and the one is ſometimes, נשבה, carried captive by the other. The good imagination they ſay[q], is like to one that, חבוש בבית האסורין, is bound in a priſon; as it is ſaid, out of priſon he cometh to reign; to which agrees what they ſay[r], "how ſhall I ſerve my Creator, whilſt I am, "אסיר יצרי, a captive to my corruption, and a ſer-"vant to my luſt?"

Ver. 24. O wretched man that I am, &c.] Not as conſidered in Chriſt, for as ſuch he was a moſt happy man, being bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings, and ſecure from all condemnation and wrath; nor with reſpect to his inward man, which was renewing day by day, and in which he enjoyed true ſpiritual peace and pleaſure; nor with regard to his future ſtate, of the happineſs of which he had no doubt: he knew in whom he had believed; he was fully perſuaded nothing could ſeparate him from the love of God; and that when he had finiſhed his courſe, he ſhould have the crown of righteouſneſs laid up for him: but this exclamation he made, on account of the troubles he met with in his chriſtian race; and not ſo much on account of his reproaches, perſecutions, and diſtreſſes, for Chriſt's ſake, though theſe were many and great, yet theſe did not move, or much affect him, he rather took delight and pleaſure in them; but on account of that continual combat between the fleſh and ſpirit in him; or by reaſon of that maſs of corruption, and body of ſin he carried about with him; much ſuch a complaint Iſaiah makes, chap. vi. 5. which in the Septuagint is, ω ταλας εγω, O miſerable I. This ſhews him to be, and to ſpeak of himſelf as a regenerate man; ſince an unregenerate man feels no uneaſineſs upon that ſcore, or makes any complaint of it, ſaying as here, who ſhall deliver me from the body of this death? or this body of death; by which ſome underſtand, this mortal body, or the body of fleſh ſubject to death for ſin; and ſuppoſe the Apoſtle expreſſes his deſire to quit it, to depart out of it, that he might enjoy an immortal life, being weary of the burden of this mortal body he carried about with him: ſo Philo the Jew[s] repreſents the body as a burden to the ſoul, which νεκροφορουσα, it carries about as a dead carkaſs, and never lays down from his birth till his death: though it ſhould be obſerved, that when the Apoſtle elſewhere expreſſes an earneſt longing after a ſtate of immortality and glory, ſome ſort of reluctance and unwillingneſs to leave the body is to be obſerved, which is not to be diſcerned here; and was this his ſenſe, one ſhould think he would rather have ſaid, when ſhall I be delivered? or why am I not delivered? and not who ſhall deliver me? though admitting this to be his meaning, that he was weary of the preſent life, and wanted to be rid of his mortal body, this did not ariſe from the troubles and anxieties of life, with which he was preſſed, which oftentimes make wicked men long to die; but from the load of ſin and burden of corruption, under which he groaned, and ſtill beſpeaks him a regegenerate man; for not of outward calamities, but of indwelling ſin is he all along ſpeaking in the context: wherefore 'tis better by this body of death to underſtand, what he in ch. vi. 6. calls the body of ſin; that maſs of corruption that lodged in him, which is called a body, becauſe of its fleſhly carnal nature; becauſe of its manner of operation, it exerts itſelf by the members of the body; and becauſe it conſiſts of various parts and members, as a body does; and a body of death, becauſe it makes men liable to death: 'twas that which the Apoſtle ſays ſlew him, and which itſelf is to a regenerate man, as a dead carkaſs, ſtinking and loathſome; and is to him like that puniſhment Mezentius inflicted on criminals, by faſtening a living body to a putrid carkaſs[t]: and it is emphatically called the body of this death, referring to the captivity of his mind, to the law of ſin, which was as death unto him; and no wonder therefore he ſo earneſtly deſires deliverance, ſaying, who ſhall deliver me? which he ſpeaks not as being ignorant of his deliverer, whom he mentions with thankfulneſs in the next verſe; or as doubting and deſpairing of deliverance, for he was comfortably aſſured of it, and therefore gives thanks before hand for it; but as expreſſing the inward pantings, and earneſt breathings of his ſoul after it; and as declaring the difficulty of it, yea, the impoſſibility of its being obtained by himſelf, or by any other than he, whom he had in view: he knew he could not deliver himſelf from ſin; that the law could not deliver him; and that none but God could do it; and which he believed he would, through Jeſus Chriſt his Lord.

Ver. 25. I thank God, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, &c.] There's a different reading of this paſſage; ſome copies read, and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, thus, the grace of God through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; which may be conſidered as an anſwer to the Apoſtle's earneſt requeſt for deliverance, who ſhall deliver me? the grace of God ſhall deliver me. The grace of God the Father, which is communicated through Chriſt the mediator by the Spirit, the law of the ſpirit of life which is in Chriſt, the principle of grace formed in the ſoul by the Spirit of God, which reigns in the believer as a governing principle, through righteouſneſs unto eternal life, will in the iſſue deliver from indwelling ſin, and all the effects of it: but the more general reading is, thanks be to God, or I thank God; the object of thankſgiving is God, as the Father of Chriſt, and the God of all grace: the medium of it is Chriſt as mediator, through whom only we have acceſs to God; without him we can neither pray to him, nor praiſe him aright; our ſacrifices of praiſe are only acceptable to God, through Chriſt; and as all our mercies come to us through him, it is but right and fitting that our thankſgivings ſhould paſs the ſame way: the thing for which thanks is given is not expreſſed, but is implied, and is deliverance; either paſt, as from the power of ſatan, the dominion of ſin, the curſe of the law, the evil of the world, and from the hands of all ſpiritual enemies, ſo as to endanger everlaſting happineſs; or rather, future deliverance, from the very being of ſin: which ſhews, that at preſent, and whilſt in this life, ſaints are not free from it; that it is God only that muſt, and will deliver from it; and that through Chriſt his Son, through whom we have victory over every enemy, ſin, ſatan, law, and death; and this ſhews the Apoſtle's ſure and certain faith and hope of this matter, who concludes his diſcourſe on this head thus: ſo then with the mind I myſelf ſerve the law of God, but with the fleſh the law of ſin; obſerve he ſays, I myſelf, and not another; whence its clear, he does not perſonate another man in this diſcourſe of his; for this is a phraſe uſed by him, when he can't poſſibly be underſtood of any other but himſelf; ſee Rom. ix. 3. 2 Cor. x. 1. and xii. 13. he divides himſelf as it were into two parts, the mind, by which he means his inward man, his renewed ſelf; and the fleſh, by which he deſigns his carnal I, that was ſold under ſin: and hereby he accounts for his ſerving at different times, two different laws; the law of God, written on his mind, and in the ſervice of which he delighted as a regenerate man; and the law of ſin, to which he was ſometimes carried captive: and it ſhould be taken notice of, that he does not ſay I have ſerved, as referring to his paſt ſtate of unregeneracy, but I ſerve, as reſpecting his preſent ſtate as a believer in Chriſt, made up of fleſh and ſpirit; which as they are two different principles, regard two different laws: add to all this, that this laſt account the Apoſtle gives of himſelf, and which agrees with all he had ſaid before, and confirms the whole, was delivered by him, after he had with ſo much faith and fervency, given thanks to God in a view of his future compleat deliverance from ſin; which is a clenching argument and proof, that he ſpeaks of himſelf, in this whole diſcourſe concerning indwelling ſin, as a regenerate perſon.

CHAP. VIII.

AS the former chapter ſhows, that ſanctified ones are not free from the being of ſin in them, which is a ground of general complaint and uneaſineſs; this chapter ſhews, that juſtified ones are freed from the guilt of ſin, and ſecure from puniſhment for it; and have the utmoſt reaſon to rejoice and be glad, and even to triumph in a plerophory and full aſſurance of faith, on account of the various privileges they enjoy, through the grace of the Father, of the Son, and of the Spirit; and which are diſtinctly, largely, and ſeverally mentioned: it begins ver. 1. with taking notice of a particular privilege ſaints have in Chriſt, and by virtue of union to him, ſecurity from all condemnation; and which is inferred, from their ſure and certain deliverance from ſin by Chriſt, ch. vii. 25. the perſons ſharing in this privilege, are deſcribed by their being in Chriſt, and by their walking after the Spirit of Chriſt, in conſequence of it: a reaſon confirming this privilege is given, ver. 2. taken either from the Goſpel, declaring the ſaints freedom from the law; or from the power and efficacy of the Spirit, delivering them from the tyranny and dominion of ſin; or rather from the holineſs of Chriſt's human nature, as a branch of their juſtification: this privilege is made more fully to appear, and the ſaints intereſt in it by the miſſion of Chriſt, to bring in everlaſting righteouſneſs for them, which is the foundation of it, ver. 3. the occaſion of which was the weakneſs of the law, or rather the impotency of man through the corruption of nature, to fulfil the law: the ſender, or the efficient cauſe of this miſſion, is God the Father; the perſon ſent, his own Son; the manner in which he was ſent, in human nature, which had the appearance of being ſinful; what God did in it, he condemned ſin in it; which is a reaſon, why there's no condemnation to them, that are in him; and the end of all this, ver. 4. was, that the law of righteouſneſs might be perfectly fulfilled by Chriſt for them, or by them in him; who are deſcribed in part, as in ver. 1. upon the repetition of which part of the deſcription, the Apoſtle proceeds to ſhew the difference between unregenerate and regenerate perſons, ver. 5. partly by their characters; the one being carnal, or after the fleſh, the other being ſpiritual, or after the Spirit; and by their different affections, the one minding the things of the fleſh, the other the things of the Spirit; the different iſſue and effect of which, namely a carnal and a ſpiritual mind, are obſerved, ver. 6. death following upon the one, life and peace upon the other; the reaſons of which with reſpect to the former, are given, ver. 7. taken from the enmity of the carnal mind to God, and the non-ſubjection of it to the law of God, and the impoſſibility of its being ſubject to it; and therefore nothing but death can be expected; from whence this concluſion is made, ver. 8. that unregenerate men are not in a ſtate, nor in a capacity to pleaſe God, or do what is acceptable to him, the above being the diſpoſition and temper of their minds: and then in ver. 9. the Apoſtle returns to the argument from whence he had digreſſed, and ſuggeſts, that though he had ſaid the above things of unregenerate men, he had other thoughts of thoſe to whom he writes; they were not in the fleſh, nor minded the things of the fleſh, and ſo were not liable to condemnation and death; and which he proves, by the inhabitation of the Spirit of God in them; for ſuch who have him not, have no proof nor evidence of their being Chriſt's, and ſo conſequently have no proof of their ſecurity from condemnation; and partly by Chriſt's being in them, and which is the evidence of their being in Chriſt, and ſo of the above privilege, ver. 10. the conſequence of which is, that though by reaſon of ſin the body is mortal, and does die, yet the ſoul lives not only naturally, but ſpiritually, by faith in Chriſt now, and in glory hereafter, by virtue of Chriſt's righteouſneſs imputed to it, and ſo is free from condemnation and death; beſides, by virtue of the Spirits dwelling in them, their mortal bodies will be quickened in the general reſurrection, ver. 11. and from all theſe bleſſings of divine goodneſs, both in ſoul and body, the Apoſtle infers, that the ſaints are under obligation, not to live in a carnal, but in a ſpiritual manner, ver. 12. and to which he exhorts, ver. 13. and preſſes by motives, taken from the different conſequences of thoſe things; death following by living after the fleſh, and life through the mortification of ſin, by the Spirit of God: and whereas the walking after the Spirit, by which he had deſcribed thoſe that are ſafe from condemnation, is owing to their being led by him; and their being led by him, being an evidence of their divine ſonſhip, ver. 14. from hence he paſſes to conſider the privilege of adoption: and that theſe ſaints were intereſted in this privilege, he proves ver. 15. partly by their not having the ſpirit of bondage which belongs to ſervants; and partly by their having the Spirit of adoption, who had made known this grace unto them, and their intereſt in it: and that they had received him as a ſpirit of adoption, was evident by their calling God their Father under his influence; and alſo by the witneſs he bore to their ſpirits, that they were the children of God, ver. 16. of which they were conſcious: and from this privilege of adoption, the Apoſtle concludes heirſhip, ver. 17. and which is of ſuch a nature, that there is none like it; both with reſpect to the ſubject of it, God himſelf; with reſpect to him with whom they are heirs, Chriſt Jeſus; and the way in which they come to ſhare the glorious inheritance with him, is through ſuffering with him, and for him; and this they need not grudge to do, ſince there is no compariſon between their ſufferings, and the glory they ſhall enjoy, ver. 18. which both Jews and Gentiles were in the expectation of; the latter of which are deſcribed in ver. 19, 20, 21, 22. by their name, the creature, the whole creation; and by their preſent condition, the Goſpel being come among them to the converſion of many, which raiſed an expectation of many ſons and daughters being born to God among them, ver. 19. and by their former ſtate and condition, ver. 20. which is mentioned, to illuſtrate the grace of God in the preſent bleſſing beſtowed upon them, in ſending the Goſpel to them; which ſtate was a ſubjection to vanity, through the God of this world, who led them captive at his will, ver. 21. and then by the deliverance of them, they were in hope and expectation of, from bondage to liberty, ver. 21. and this groaning and travailing in birth in a ſpiritual ſenſe, for the bringing forth of many ſons to God among the Gentiles, the Apoſtle, and other miniſters of the word, who had preached the Goſpel among them, were witneſſes of, ver. 22. yea, not only the Gentiles, but the Jews alſo, who are deſcribed as having the firſt fruits of the Spirit, ver. 23. were waiting for the manifeſtation of the children of God among the Gentiles, with them to compleat at laſt the myſtical body, who ſhall ſhare together the glory before ſpoken of, which their ſonſhip and heirſhip entitle them to; and for which there is encouragement to wait with patience and in hope, from the connexion of ſalvation with the grace of hope; and from the nature of the thing hoped for, which is unſeen, but certain, ver. 24, 25. From hence the Apoſtle proceeds to conſider another privilege which the ſaints have, who are in the Spirit, and walk after the Spirit, the Spirit helps their infirmities; particularly in prayer, the matter of which in ſome caſes, they are at a loſs about, ver. 26. and this he does, by making interceſſion for them; the manner in which this is done in them, is with unutterable groans; and the rule according to which it is made, is the will of God, the mind of the Spirit being known by the ſearcher of hearts, ver. 27. in a word, ſuch are the privileges of believers in Chriſt, that every thing in the whole world, in heaven, and in earth, in themſelves and others, whether good or bad, proſperous or adverſe, work together for their good, ſo that nothing can go wrong with them in the iſſue, ver. 28. who are deſcribed by their love to God, and by their effectual vocation, according to his purpoſe; which being mentioned, leads the Apoſtle to the ſource and ſpring of all theſe and other privileges, the everlaſting love of God; ſignified by his foreknowledge of his people, ver. 29. which is the cauſe of their predeſtination to a conformity to the image of Chriſt, the firſt-born among many brethren; with which predeſtination, vocation, juſtification, and glorification, are inſeparably connected, ver. 30. from all which bleſſings of grace it may be concluded, that God is on the ſide of ſuch perſons, who are intereſted in theſe favours; and nothing is to be feared, but every good thing is to be expected by them, ver. 31. which is confirmed by an argument from the greater to the leſſer, that if God has given his Son for them, he will freely give all things to them, ver. 32. in a view of which, the Apoſtle riſes up in a triumph of faith, and challenges all the enemies of the ſaints, and denies that any charge can be brought againſt them of any avail, ſince God is the juſtifier of them, ver. 33. or that they ſhall ever enter into condemnation, being ſecured from it by the death of Chriſt; and which ſecurity is yet more ſtrengthened by his reſurrection, ſeſſion at the right-hand of God, and interceſſion for them, ver. 34. and then aſks, ſince Chriſt has ſhewn ſuch love to them, by theſe inſtances of it, what can ſeparate from it, ver. 35. and enumerates ſeveral things which befal the ſaints in this life, which however mean and abject they may render them in the eſteem of men, don't at all abate the love of Chriſt to them: that ſuch is their caſe, that they are expoſed to afflictions and ſufferings, and even death itſelf, for the ſake of Chriſt, is proved ver. 36. by a teſtimony out of Pſal. xliv. 22. and then an anſwer is returned to the above queſtion in the negative, that none of the things mentioned, could ſeparate them from the love of Chriſt; ſo far from it, that by virtue of Chriſt who had loved them, they were conquerors, and more than conquerors in all theſe things, and over all their enemies, ver. 37. and the chapter is concluded in ver. 38, 39. with the full and firm perſuaſion of the Apoſtle, that nothing in the whole univerſe, in the whole compaſs of created beings, be they what they will, good or bad, or which are or ſhall be, an enumeration of many of which is made, ſhould ever ſeparate him, or any of the people of God from his love, which is in Chriſt Jeſus: ſo that upon the whole, notwithſtanding indwelling ſin, notwithſtanding the various afflictions which attend them in this world, yet in conſideration of the many privileges they enjoy, and the glory they are heirs of, they have great reaſon to rejoice, and look upon themſelves to be in the moſt ſafe and happy condition.

Ver. 1. There is therefore now no condemnation, &c.] The Apoſtle having diſcourſed largely in the preceding chapter, concerning the ſtruggle and combat believers feel within themſelves, and opened the true cauſes and reaſons of the ſaints grievances and complaints, and what gives them the greateſt uneaſineſs in this life, proceeds in this to take notice of the ſolid ground and foundation they have, of ſpiritual peace and joy; which ariſe from their juſtification and adoption, the purpoſes and decrees of God, and particularly the everlaſting and unchangeable love of God in Chriſt, the ſource, ſpring, and ſecurity, of all the bleſſings of grace. The chapter begins with a moſt comfortable account of the ſafety of believers in Chriſt; the Apoſtle does not ſay there is nothing condemnable in them, for ſin is in them, and is condemnable, and condemned by them; and is hurtful to their ſpiritual joy and comfort, though it cannot bring them into condemnation, becauſe of their being in Chriſt Jeſus: he ſays there is ȣδεν κατακριμα, not one condemnation to them, or one ſentence of condemnation againſt them; which muſt be underſtood not of illegal ones, for they are liable to many condemnations from their own hearts, from the world and the devil; but of legal, juſtifiable ones, and there are none ſuch, neither from God the Father, for he juſtifies; nor from the Son, for by his righteouſneſs they are juſtified; nor from the Holy Spirit, who bears witneſs to their ſpirits, that they are in a ſtate of juſtification: there's not one condemnation lies againſt them, with reſpect to their numerous ſins, original and actual, though every ſin deſerves one; not one from the law of God, of which ſin is a tranſgreſſion; for though that is a condemning law, yet it is only ſo to them that are under it; not to them that are Chriſt's, whom he has redeemed from it: moreover, the Apoſtle ſays, that there's no condemnation now to the ſaints; which now muſt not be conſidered, as if it ſuppoſes that there was formerly condemnation to them; 'tis true indeed they were under a ſentence of condemnation, as conſidered in Adam, and under a covenant of works with him, and in their own apprehenſions when convicted; but as conſidered in Chriſt, as the elect of God always were, and who was their ſurety, and ſo their ſecurity from all eternity, they never were in a ſtate of condemnation: nor does this ſuppoſe, that there may be condemnation to them hereafter, though not now; for ſin, the cauſe of condemnation, is removed; Chriſt has bore the condemnation their ſins deſerved in himſelf; their juſtification is from all ſin, paſt, preſent, and to come; their union to Chriſt is indiſſoluble, and neither the love of Chriſt, nor the juſtice of God, will admit of their condemnation; for this now, is not an adverb of time, but a note of illation; the Apoſtle inferring this privilege, either from the grace of God, which iſſues in eternal life, ch. vi. 23. or from that certain deliverance believers ſhall have from ſin, for which he gives thanks, ch. vii. 24, 25. The privilege itſelf here mentioned is, no condemnation: condemnation is ſometimes put for the cauſe of it, which is ſin, original and actual; now though God's elect are ſinners, both by nature and practice, and after converſion have ſin in them, their ſanctification being imperfect, yet there's none in them with reſpect to juſtification; all is transferred to Chriſt, and he has removed all away; he has procured the pardon of all by his blood, he has aboliſhed all by his ſacrifice, he juſtifies from all by his righteouſneſs, and ſaves his people from all their ſins: condemnation may alſo be conſidered with reſpect to guilt; all mankind are guilty of Adam's ſin, and are guilty creatures, as they are actual tranſgreſſors of the law; and when convinced by the Spirit of God, acknowledge themſelves to be ſo; and upon the repetition of ſin, contract freſh guilt on their conſciences; but an heart ſprinkled with the blood of Chriſt, is clear of guilt; for all the guilt of ſin is removed to Chriſt, and he has took it away; hence there's no obligation to puniſhment on them, for whom Chriſt died: again, condemnation may deſign the ſentence of it: now though the law's ſentence paſſed upon all in Adam, and ſo upon God's elect, as conſidered in him; yet as this ſentence has been executed on Chriſt, as their ſurety, in their room and ſtead, there's none lies againſt them: once more, condemnation may mean actual damnation, or eternal death, the wages of ſin, which thoſe who are in Chriſt ſhall never die; they are ordained to eternal life, and are redeemed from this death; they are made alive by Chriſt, and have eternal life ſecured to them in him, and which they ſhall certainly enjoy: the perſons intereſted in this privilege are deſcribed, as ſuch which are in Chriſt Jeſus; not as mere profeſſors are in Chriſt, who may be loſt and damned: but this being in Chriſt, reſpects either that union and intereſt which the elect of God have in Chriſt, from everlaſting; being loved by him with an everlaſting love; betrothed to him in a conjugal relation; choſen in him before the foundation of the world; united to him as members to an head; conſidered in him in the covenant of grace, when he engaged for them as their ſurety; and ſo they were preſerved in him, notwithſtanding their fall in Adam; in time he took upon him their nature, and repreſented them in it; they were reckoned in him when he hung upon the croſs, was buried, roſe again, and ſat down in heavenly places; in conſequence of which union to Chriſt, and being in him, they are ſecure from all condemnation: or this may reſpect an open and manifeſtative being in Chriſt at converſion, when they become new creatures, paſs from death to life, and ſo ſhall never enter into condemnation: hence they ſtand further deſcribed, as ſuch who walk not after the fleſh; by which is meant, not the ceremonial law, but the corruption of nature, or the corrupt nature of man, called fleſh; becauſe propagated by carnal generation, has for its object fleſhly things, diſcovers itſelf moſtly in the fleſh, and makes perſons carnal and fleſhly: the Apoſtle does not ſay, there is no condemnation to them that have no fleſh in them, for this regenerate perſons have; nor to them that are in the fleſh, that is, the body; but who walk not after the fleſh, that is, corrupt nature; and it denotes ſuch, who do not follow the dictates of it, don't make it their guide, or go on and perſiſt in a continued ſeries of ſinning: but after the Spirit; by which is meant, not ſpiritual worſhip, in oppoſition to carnal ordinances; but rather, either a principle of grace, in oppoſition to corrupt nature, called ſpirit, from the author, ſubject, and nature of it; or the Holy Spirit of God, the efficient cauſe of all grace: to walk after him, is to make him our guide, to follow his dictates, influences, and directions; as ſuch do, who walk by faith on Chriſt, and in imitation of him, in the ways of righteouſneſs and holineſs; and ſuch perſons walk pleaſantly, chearfully, and ſafely: now let it be obſerved, that this walk and converſation of the ſaints, is not the cauſe of there being no condemnation to them; but is deſcriptive of the perſons intereſted in ſuch a privilege; and is evidential of their right unto it, as well as of their being in Chriſt: and it may be further obſerved, that there muſt be union to Chriſt, or a being in him, before there can be walking after the Spirit. The phraſe, but after the Spirit, is left out in the Alexandrian copy, and in the Vulgate Latin, and Syriac verſions; and the whole deſcription of the perſons in ſome copies, and in the Ethiopic verſion.

Ver. 2. For the law of the Spirit of life in Chriſt Jeſus, &c.] Theſe words are of difficult interpretation. They may be underſtood of the Goſpel revealing and declaring deliverance from the law of Moſes; wherefore there can be no condemnation by it. The Goſpel may be deſigned, by the law of the Spirit of life in Chriſt Jeſus; which may be called a law, not as ſucceeding the law of works, by which that is abrogated; nor as requiring conditions to be performed, or as enjoining duties to be obſerved, or as delivering out threatnings in caſe of diſobedience; but as it is a doctrine, order, and chain of truths, as the Hebrew word תורה ſignifies, and which is ſometimes uſed for the Goſpel, Iſa. ii. 3. and xlii. 4. as νομος is, Rom. iii. 27. It may be called the law, or doctrine of the Spirit, becauſe the Spirit is the author of it, and makes it powerful and effectual to the good of ſouls; by it the Spirit of God is conveyed into the heart; and the ſubſtance of it are ſpiritual things: and the law of the Spirit of life, becauſe it diſcovers the way of life and ſalvation by Chriſt; is the means of quickening dead ſinners; of working faith in them, by which they live on Chriſt, and of reviving drooping ſaints; and alſo it affords ſpiritual food, for the ſupport of life: and this may be ſaid to be in Chriſt, or by him, inaſmuch as it comes from, and is concerning him; he is the ſum, the ſubſtance, and ſubject matter of it: the law of ſin and death, may intend the law of Moſes, called the law of ſin; not as if it was ſinful, or commanded or encouraged ſin, for it ſeverely prohibits it; but becauſe by it, through the corruption of man's nature, ſin is irritated, and made to abound; it is the ſtrength of ſin, and by it is the knowledge of it: and it may be called the law of death, becauſe it threatened with death, in caſe of diſobedience; it ſentences and adjudges tranſgreſſors to death; and when it is attended with power, it ſtrikes dead all a man's hopes of life, by obedience to it; it leaves perſons dead as it finds them, and gives no life, nor hopes of it; by it none can live, or be juſtified: now, though Chriſt is the author of deliverance from it, yet the Goſpel is the means of revealing and declaring this deliverance; which deſigns not an exemption from obedience to it, but freedom from the curſe and condemnation of it; and this ſenſe well agrees with the foregoing verſe: likewiſe the words are capable of being underſtood of the power and efficacy of the Spirit of God, in delivering regenerate perſons, from the dominion and tyranny of ſin; and which may be conſidered as a reaſon, why they walk not after the fleſh, but after the Spirit: life may well be aſcribed to the Spirit of God, or he called the Spirit of life, becauſe he has life in himſelf, as the Father and Son have; and is the author of life to others, of natural life to all men as creatures, and of ſpiritual life to the people of God in regeneration; and is a quickening Spirit to them afterwards, as he will be to the dead bodies of the ſaints in the reſurrection: by the law of the Spirit may be meant, the energy and power of the Spirit in converſion; which work requires power, and a man has no power of himſelf to effect it; but there is a power in the Spirit, which works irreſiſtibly, though not by any force or compulſion to the will, but it moves upon it ſweetly, powerfully, and effectually: and all this may be ſaid to be in Chriſt; the life which the Spirit is the author and giver of, is in Chriſt as the head of his people, the proper repoſitory of all grace, and the fountain of life; the Spirit himſelf is in him, both as God and as man, and as mediator, hence the ſaints receive him and his gifts and graces from him; and the law of the Spirit, or his power and efficacy in working, is in or by Chriſt, through his ſufferings and death, and in conſequence of his mediation: now this powerful and quickening efficacy of the Spirit, delivers regenerate perſons from the force and tyranny of ſin, called here the law of ſin and death; a law of ſin, becauſe it has power and dominion over unregenerate perſons, its throne is in the heart of man, and its laws are many and powerful; and the law of death, becauſe its reign is tyrannical, barbarous and cruel, 'tis unto death: and from its governing influence and tyrannical power, does the Spirit of God free his people in regeneration; not from the being of ſin; nor from the rage of it, and diſturbance it gives; nor from ſuch power of it, but that they may fall into ſin; but ſo as that ſin does not properly reign over them, nor legally, nor univerſally, or ſo as to bring a death on their graces, and their perſons into condemnation. Once more, theſe words may be underſtood of the holineſs of Chriſt's human nature, as a branch of our juſtification, and freedom from the guilt of ſin, and condemnation by it: for as the law of ſin and death, may deſign inherent corruption, and the force and power of it in the ſaints; ſo the oppoſite to it, the law of the Spirit of life in Chriſt, may mean the purity and holineſs of his human nature. That Chriſt's human nature is pure and holy is certain, from expreſs texts of ſcripture, from its union to the Son of God, from the ends and purpoſes of its aſſumption, from the inefficacy of ſatan's temptations, and from the whole courſe of his life and converſation; for though he was in the likeneſs of ſinful fleſh, was reckoned a ſinner by men, was attended with infirmities the effects of ſin, though not ſinful, had all the ſins of his people imputed to him, and endured afflictions, and at laſt death; yet his nature was pure and untainted: for he did not deſcend from Adam by ordinary generation; and though made of a woman, yet the fleſh he took of her, was ſanctified by the Holy Ghoſt; his body was prepared by God, and curiouſly wrought by the Spirit, from whom his whole human nature received a fulneſs of habitual holineſs: and this may be called the Spirit of life in him, becauſe he is a quickening Spirit in regeneration, juſtification, and the reſurrection from the dead; the law of it, becauſe the holineſs of his nature lies in, ariſes from, and is conformable to a law that is within him, written on his heart; and becauſe together with his obedience and death, it has a force, power, and authority, to free from condemnation; for this is not a mere neceſſary qualification of him to be the mediator, or what renders his obedience, ſacrifice, and interceſſion, efficacious and valuable, or is merely exemplary to us, but is what is imputed to us, as a part of our juſtification. The law requires a holy nature of us, we have not one, Chriſt aſſumed one for us, and ſo is the end of the law, or anſwers the requitement of the law in this reſpect, as well as in all others; and hence, though ſanctification begun in us, does not free us from the being of ſin, and all its force and power, yet perfect ſanctification in Chriſt frees from all condemnation by it.

Ver. 3. For what the law could not do, &c.] This is not to be underſtood of the law of the mind, in oppoſition to the law of ſin, which indeed is very feeble and impotent; man had a power originally of obeying the divine commands, but through ſin he has loſt his ſtrength and power; and even a renewed mind can't perform what it would, which is owing to the fleſh, or corrupt nature; it has ſtrong deſires after holineſs, and keeping all the commandments of God; but theſe deſires can't be fulfilled by it, and indeed without Chriſt it can do no good thing: nor is the ceremonial law intended, though this is weak, and there are many things it could not do; it could not expiate and atone for ſin; nor remove the guilt of it; nor cleanſe from the filth of it: but the moral law is here deſigned; this, though it can, and does accuſe of ſin, can convince of it, can curſe, condemn, and adjudge to death for it; yet it could not condemn ſin itſelf, which is only aboliſhed by Chriſt; it can't reſtrain from ſin, nor change a ſinful nature, nor ſanctify an impure heart; nor free from the guilt of ſin, nor comfort a diſtreſſed mind under a ſenſe of it; it can't ſubject perſons, or bring them to obedience to itſelf, its own laws; it can't juſtify any before God, or give life, or ſave from death; the reaſon is, in that, or becauſe it was weak through the fleſh. The weakneſs of the law, is total and univerſal, it has no ſtrength at all; though not original and natural, but accidental; 'tis owing to the fleſh, or the corrupt nature of man: or rather the weakneſs is in ſinful men, and not in the law; and the ſenſe is this, that human nature is ſo weakened by ſin, that it is uncapable of fulfilling the law; the weakneſs of the law is not from itſelf, but from man: to this agrees what the Jewiſh writers [u] ſay, "there is not a word in the law weak, or broken; wherefore when thou conſidereſt and obſerveſt it, that thou doſt not find it ſtrong, as an hammer that breaks the rocks, ואי חלשא מינך הוא, but if weak, it is of thyſelf." To which may be added that uſual ſaying of theirs, אין עון אלה תורה, there is no ſtrength but the law [w]; unleſs the Apoſtle can be thought to oppoſe this notion of theirs. Wherefore becauſe of the weakneſs of the law, or of human nature to fulfil it, God ſending his own Son in the likeneſs of ſinful fleſh, and for ſin, condemned ſin in the fleſh. The perſon ſending is God, who gave the law weakened by the fleſh, againſt whom we have ſinned; and who is righteous, pure, and holy; which conſiderations enhance his grace and goodneſs, in the miſſion of Chriſt. This muſt be underſtood of God the Father, who is here manifeſtly diſtinguiſhed from the Son; and who is God, but not ſolely, or to the excluſion of the Son and Spirit; and who ſent Chriſt, though not ſingly, for the Lord God and his Spirit ſent him, Iſa. xlviii. 16. though as it is moſt agreeable, for a Father to ſend his Son, this is generally aſcribed to him; and he being the firſt perſon in the Godhead, is the firſt in order of working, and ſo in redemption. The perſon ſent, is his own Son; not by creation, as angels and men are; nor by adoption, as ſaints are; nor is he called ſo, on account of his incarnation, reſurrection, or mediatorſhip, for he was the Son of God antecedent to either of them; but his own proper Son, and not in any metaphorical ſenſe; a Son of the ſame nature with him, begotten of him; and his Son in that nature in which he is God. The act of ſending, does not ſuppoſe inequality of nature; for though he that is ſent is not greater, yet as great as he that ſends; two equals, by agreement, may ſend each other; a divine perſon may aſſume an office, and under that conſideration be ſent, without ſuppoſing inferiority of nature, as in the caſe of the Holy Spirit; and an inferiority as to office, is allowed in the caſe of the Son; God ſent his Son under the character of a ſervant, to do work: nor does this act imply change of place; there is indeed a terminus a quo, from whence he was ſent, from heaven, from his Father there; and there is a terminus ad quem, to which he was ſent, into this world; but then this coming of his from heaven to earth, was not by local motion, but by aſſumption of nature: nor was it out of any diſreſpect to his Son, but out of love to us, that he ſent him: nor was he ſent againſt his will; he ſhewed no reluctance at the propoſal to him in the council of peace, but the utmoſt willingneſs; nor any at his coming into the world; nor at the work itſelf, which he entered upon, and went through with the greateſt eagerneſs and chearfulneſs: nor does it ſuppoſe him whilſt ſent, and here on earth, to be in a ſtate of abſence and ſeparation from his Father; he was ſtill in his boſom, yet in heaven, and his Father always with him: but it ſuppoſes that he exiſted before he was ſent; that he was a perſon, and diſtinct from the Father, or he could not be ſent by him; that he had authority from him, conſidered in his office-capacity: in a word, this ſending of the Son, deſigns the manifeſtation of him in human nature; as appears from the form and manner in which he was ſent, in the likeneſs of ſinful fleſh: which expreſſes the reality of his incarnation, of his having a true real human nature; for fleſh is not to be taken ſtrictly for a part of the body, nor for the whole body only, but for the whole human nature, ſoul and body; which though it looked like a ſinful nature, yet was not ſinful: the likeneſs of it denotes the outward appearance of Chriſt in it; who was born of a ſinful woman; was ſubject to the infirmities of human nature, which though not ſinful, are the effects of ſin; was reckoned among tranſgreſſors, was traduced as one himſelf by men, and treated as ſuch by the juſtice of God; he having all the ſins of his people on him, for which he was anſwerable: and hence God for ſin, condemned ſin in the fleſh; not the law which was weak through the fleſh; nor ſinners, who broke the law; but ſin itſelf, the tranſgreſſion of the law, all kind of ſin, and all that is in it. The act of condemning it, does not deſign God's diſapproving of it, and judging it to be evil; this he could not but do, as being contrary to his nature, an act of hoſtility againſt him, a breach of his law, and what brings ruin upon his creatures; and this he would have done, if Chriſt had never ſuffered in the fleſh; and he has taken other methods, both among his own people and the world, to ſhew his diſlike of ſin: nor does this act intend the deſtruction of the power and dominion of ſin, in regeneration; this is the work of the Spirit, and is done in our fleſh, and not in the fleſh of Chriſt; but it is to be underſtood of the condemnation and puniſhment of ſin, in the perſon of Chriſt: ſin was laid on him by the Father, and he voluntarily took it upon himſelf; juſtice finding it there, charges him with it, demands ſatisfaction, and condemns him for it; and hereby ſin was expiated, the pardon of it procured, and it was entirely done away: now this is ſaid to be done for ſin; ſome join the phraſe with the former part of the text, either with the word ſending, and take the ſenſe to be, that God ſent his Son for, or on the account of ſin, to take it away, and ſave his people from it; or with ſinful fleſh, which was taken from a ſinful perſon; but it ſtands beſt as it does in our verſion, and may be rendered of ſin; for God condemned ſin of ſin in Chriſt, that is, by the vengeance he took of it, in the ſtrictneſs of his juſtice, through the ſufferings of his Son, he ſhewed ſin to be exceeding ſinful indeed; or rather by ſin, that is by an offering for ſin, ſo the word is uſed in Heb. x. 6, 8. and anſwers to חטאה, in Pſal. xl. 6. by being made which, ſin was condemned in the fleſh of Chriſt, who was put to death in the fleſh, for the ſins of his people, and bore all the puniſhment due unto them: from hence we learn the evil of ſin, the ſtrictneſs of juſtice, and the grace of the Redeemer.

[u] Zohar in Lev. fol. 3. 2.

[w] Shirhaſhirim Rabba, fol. 4. 4. & 9. 4.

Ver. 4. That the righteouſneſs of the law might be fulfilled in us, &c.] By the righteouſneſs of the law, is not meant the righteouſneſs of the ceremonial law, though that was fulfilled by Chriſt; but of the moral law, which requires holineſs of nature, righteouſneſs of life, and death in caſe of diſobedience; active righteouſneſs, or obedience to the precepts of the law, is deſigned here. This is what the law requires; obedience to the commands of it is properly righteouſneſs; and by Chriſt's obedience to it, we are made righteous, and this gives the title to eternal life: now this is ſaid to be fulfilled in us; this is not fulfilled by us in our own perſons, nor can it be; could it, where would be the weakneſs of the law? man might then be juſtified by it, and ſo the grace of God, and the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, muſt be ſet aſide: there never was any mere man, that could fulfil it; for obedience to it, muſt not only be performed perfectly, but with intenſeneſs of mind and ſpirit; a man muſt be ſinleſs in thought, word, and deed; and this would be to put man upon a level with Adam in a ſtate of innocence, and the angels in heaven: nor is this to be underſtood of any righteouſneſs inherent in man; internal holineſs is never called the righteouſneſs of the law; and could it be thought to be righteouſneſs, yet it can never be reckoned the whole righteouſneſs of the law; and though it is a fruit of Chriſt's death, it is the work of the Spirit, and is neither the whole, nor any part of our juſtification: but this is to be underſtood of the righteouſneſs of the law fulfilled by Chriſt, and imputed to us; Chriſt has fulfilled the whole righteouſneſs of the law, all the requirements of it; this he has done in the room and ſtead of his people; and is imputed to them, by virtue of a federal union between him and them, he being the head, and they his members; and the law being fulfilled by him, it is reckoned all one as if it was fulfilled in, or by them; and hence they are perſonally, perfectly, and legally juſtified; and this is the end of Chriſt's being ſent, of ſin being laid on him, and condemned in him. The deſcriptive character of the perſons, who appear to be intereſted in this bleſſing, is the ſame with that in ver. 1. who walk not after the fleſh, but after the Spirit; ſee the note there.

Ver. 5. For they that are after the fleſh, &c.] By fleſh is meant, the corruption of nature; and they may be ſaid to be after it, not all that have fleſh in them, for the beſt of ſaints have it in them; regenerating grace does not remove it from them; there's a difference between being in and after the fleſh, and fleſh being in us; but ſuch who are as they were born, who have nothing but fleſh, or corrupt nature in them, in whom that is the governing principle, whoſe minds are carnal, and whoſe whole walk and converſation is ſuch, are here meant: and theſe perſons do mind the things of the fleſh; not merely things corporal, belonging to the welfare of the body; or things natural for the improvement of the mind; or things civil as riches, &c. which may be minded and ſought after in a lawful way; but things ſinful, the luſts, works, and ſins of the fleſh: which they may be ſaid to mind, ſince they judge them to be good; the bent and application of their minds are to them; their affections are ſet upon them; they are ſolicitouſly careful to provide for them, and ſavour and reliſh them: nor is it to be wondered at, ſince theſe are natural to them; they are oppoſite to God, and ſo agreeable to them; they have no mind, thought, affection, or reliſh, for any thing elſe; and it is entirely owing to mighty grace, that any mind the things of the Spirit: but they that are after the Spirit; not ſuch who follow the dictates of their own ſpirits; or are outwardly reformed; nor all that have ſpiritual gifts; or profeſs themſelves to have the grace and Spirit of God; but ſuch who are born again, are renewed in the ſpirit of their minds, in whom grace is the governing principle; the work of the Spirit is begun in them, though not perfected; the Spirit himſelf dwells in them, and they walk after him; their minds and converſations are ſpiritual, though there may be a great deal of carnality in their hearts, thoughts, words, and actions, which is matter of grief unto them: theſe mind the things of the Spirit; the graces of the Spirit; ſpiritual bleſſings; the doctrines of the Goſpel; ſpiritual ſacrifices and ſervices: theſe have ſome underſtanding of, can diſcern the difference between them and carnal things; judge and approve of them as right; have a great eſteem and affection for them, and taſte a ſweetneſs in them. They have no mind naturally to theſe things; nor is the biaſs of their minds altered by themſelves, nor could it; this is wholly the work of the Spirit of God; and theſe things are minded only becauſe, and as they are agreeable to the ſpiritual part, the inward man.

Ver. 6. For to be carnally minded is death, &c.] The phraſe the Apoſtle here uſes, includes the beſt part of corrupt man; the mind, the underſtanding, the judgment, the will, the affections, the thoughts, the reaſon, and reaſonings of man; and may be rendered, the wiſdom, or prudence of the fleſh; ſo called, to diſtinguiſh it from that wiſdom which is from above; from that natural and civil wiſdom, which is laudable; and it ſhews that the wiſeſt part of man is but carnal: all ſorts of perſons deſtitute of the grace of God, are concerned herein; or this is applicable to them all, as the ſenſualiſt, the worldling, the proud Phariſee, and the wiſe diſputer of this world. This wiſdom of the fleſh, or carnal mindedneſs, is death; not that it is converſant about death; or that ſuch perſons are thoughtful of it, endeavour to make it familiar to them; or are deſirous of it, and eſteem it as a privilege; this only ſpiritually minded men do: but the ſenſe is, that this iſſues in death; death is not the object, but the end of carnal mindedneſs; carnal mindedneſs, ſo far as it prevails in the ſaints, brings a death upon them. 'Tis true indeed, they cannot die a ſpiritual, or an eternal death; yet ſometimes they are very dead and lifeleſs in their frames, in the exerciſe of grace and diſcharge of duty; which is frequently owing to their carnality: and the effect of this muſt needs be death in carnal men; ſince it alienates from God; it renders them tranſgreſſors of the law, and obnoxious to its curſe; it ſets the ſoul againſt, and diverts it from Chriſt the way of life; and if grace prevent not, muſt be the cauſe of, and iſſue in eternal death; becauſe it is ſin and ſinful, it is enmity to God, it diſqualifies for life, and makes perſons fit companions for the heirs of wrath: but to be ſpiritually minded, is life and peace; ſpiritually minded men are the only living perſons in a ſpiritual ſenſe, for all that are in and after the fleſh are dead; and ſo far as carnal mindedneſs prevails in profeſſors, there is a deadneſs in them as to all ſpiritual exerciſes; and oftentimes as to outward appearance, there is no difference between them and dead men: but ſpiritually minded men are evidently living perſons; they have a ſpiritual diſcerning of ſpiritual things; they breathe after them, ſavour and reliſh them; they talk of ſpiritual things, and walk in a ſpiritual manner; they are not only alive, but lively in the exerciſe of grace and diſcharge of duty; and are the means of enlivening others; and their end will be everlaſting life; which is certain from the declared will and promiſe of God, and from the grace of life and ſpirit of life which are in them. Peace alſo is another effect of ſpiritual mindedneſs; ſuch enjoy peace of conſcience: this is a fruit of the Spirit; a part of the kingdom of grace they are poſſeſſed of; and the things their minds are converſant with are productive of it; which is the gift of God, paſſes all underſtanding, and is of more worth than all the world: ſuch men are alſo of peaceable diſpoſitions in commonwealths, in neighbourhoods, in families and churches; induced thereunto by the nobleſt arguments; and their end will be peace, which will be perfect and eternal.

Ver. 7. Becauſe the carnal mind is enmity againſt God, &c.] Theſe words contain a reaſon why the iſſue of carnal mindedneſs is death; becauſe the carnal mind, the wiſdom of the fleſh, is not only an enemy, but enmity itſelf againſt God: againſt his being; it reaſons againſt it; it wiſhes he was not; it forms unworthy notions of him; thinks him ſuch an one as itſelf; and endeavours to bury him in forgetfulneſs, and eraſe out of its mind all memorials of him: it is at enmity againſt his perfections; either denying his omniſcience; or arraigning his juſtice and faithfulneſs; or deſpiſing his goodneſs, and abuſing his grace and mercy: it finds fault with, and abhors his decrees and purpoſes; quarrels with his providences; it's implacable againſt his word and Goſpel; eſpecially the particular doctrines of grace, the Father's grace in election, the Son's in redemption, and the Spirit's in regeneration; and has in the utmoſt contempt the ordinances and people of Chriſt. This enmity is univerſal, 'tis in all men in unregeneracy, either direct or indirect, hidden or more open; it's undeſerved; it's natural and deeply rooted in the mind, and irreconcileable without the power and grace of God. It ſhews itſelf in an eſtrangedneſs from God; in holding friendſhip with the world, in harbouring the profeſſed enemies of God, in living under the government of ſin and ſatan; in hating what God loves, and in loving what God hates; in omitting what God commands, and committing what he forbids; it manifeſts itſelf in their language, and throughout the whole of their converſations. For it is not ſubject to the law of God; carnal men are ſubject to the law's ſentence of condemnation, but not to its precepts, by obedience to them; there may be an external, and which is a ſervile obedience to it, but not a free, voluntary, internal one; and ſtill leſs a perfect one: the carnal mind is ſo far from an obediential ſubjection to the law, that it is far off from the law, and the law from that; it hates and deſpiſes it, thwarts and contradicts it in every inſtance, and, as much as in it lies, makes it void; which fully proves the enmity of the carnal mind againſt God; for hereby his being is tacitly denied, his ſovereignty diſputed, his image defaced, his government withdrawn from, and theſe perſons are declared, and declare themſelves enemies to him: neither indeed can be; without regenerating grace, without the power and Spirit of God, unleſs it is written upon the heart by the finger of God; for carnal men are dead in ſin, and ſo ſtrengthleſs to obey the law; and beſides, the carnal mind, and the law of God, are directly contrary one to another. Where's man's power and free will? no wonder the carnal mind don't ſtoop to the Goſpel of Chriſt, when it is not, and cannot be ſubject to the law of God. Hence we ſee the neceſſity of almighty power, and efficacious grace in converſion. It is Chriſt's work to ſubject men to the law, and which is done when he juſtifies by his righteouſneſs: agreeably to which the Targum on Iſ. liii. 11. paraphraſes it thus: "in his wiſdom he ſhall juſtify the "righteous, that לשעבדא סגיאין לאוריתא, he "may ſubject many to the law." And in ver. 11. the tranſgreſſors he hath ſubjected to the law.

Ver. 8. So then they that are in the fleſh, &c.] They that are in the fleſh are the ſame who are ſaid to be after it, ver. 5. and are there deſcribed. Such cannot pleaſe God; men, whilſt unregenerate, and as ſuch, cannot pleaſe God; for tho' the perſons of God's elect are well-pleaſing to him always, as conſidered in Chriſt, in whom they are loved with an everlaſting love, and were choſen in him, and all proviſions of grace and glory made for them in him; yet as conſidered in themſelves, and whilſt in the fleſh, do not pleaſe him; for they are ſtraying from him, are alienated from his life, are deſtitute of all grace, and particularly faith, without which it is impoſſible to pleaſe him; are filthy and unclean, and hence, whilſt ſuch have no enjoyment of him, or communion with him; wherefore he ſends his Spirit to work in them that which is well-pleaſing in his ſight: but this is not to be underſtood ſo much of perſons, and their non-acceptableneſs to God, as of the inability of unregenerate men to obtain the good will of God, or make their peace with him; which they have no inclination to, being enmity againſt him; and were they inclined to it, know not how to go about it; nor can they draw nigh to God to treat with him about terms of peace; nor can they do that which can procure peace; Chriſt is the only perſon that can make peace, and has done it: or rather, of the impotency of natural men to do any thing which is pleaſing in the ſight of God. There are many things which are pleaſing to him, ſuch as prayer, praiſe, giving of alms, keeping his commandments, and walking in his ways; but theſe unregenerate men cannot do in any acceptable manner to God; for they are without the Spirit, without Chriſt, without faith; and in all they do have no view to the glory of God: they have neither grace, nor ſtrength, nor right principles, nor right ends.

Ver. 9. But ye are not in the fleſh, but in the Spirit, &c.] That is, ye are not carnal, but ſpiritual men; or ye are not in a ſtate of unregeneracy, but in a ſtate of grace: the reaſon proving this is, if ſo be, or ſeeing that the Spirit of God dwell in you; the inhabitation of the Spirit is a diſtinguiſhing character of a regenerate man; which is to be underſtood not of his omnipreſence, nor of a participation of his gifts, whether ordinary or extraordinary: nor does the Spirit of God only dwell in his people by his graces, but in perſon as in office, and in a way of ſpecial favour; as a ſpirit of illumination, regeneration, ſanctification, and faith, as a comforter, a Spirit of adoption, an interceſſor, and as a pledge and ſeal of happineſs: which inhabitation is perſonal; is not peculiar to him to the excluſion of the Father and of the Son; is expreſſive of property and dominion; is not confined to the ſouls of men, for he alſo dwells in their bodies; it is operative, powerful, and perpetual; it is the ſecurity of the ſaints perſeverance, and the pledge of their reſurrection and future glory. This is owing not to any goodneſs in them, or to any fitneſs and preparations of theirs to receive him; but to a federal union to Chriſt and relation to him, to our Lord's aſcenſion and interceſſion, and to the love and grace of the Father; and this proves a man to be a regenerate man, to be in the ſpirit, and not in the fleſh; for the Spirit of God is never in this ſenſe in an unregenerate man, nor is he in any ſuch ſenſe without his grace; ſo that the indwelling of the Spirit is the grand evidence of relation to God, of an intereſt in Chriſt and union to him, and of a man's ſtate and condition Godward: now if any man have not the Spirit of Chriſt, he is none of his. By the Spirit of Chriſt, is not meant the human ſoul of Chriſt; nor his divine nature; nor his Goſpel, which is the ſpirit that gives life; but the Holy Ghoſt, the third perſon in the Trinity, the ſame which is called the Spirit before; and proves Chriſt to be God, he proceeds from him as from the Father, is ſent by him, and with which Chriſt's human nature was fitted and filled. The Jews[x] often ſpeak of רוח המשיח, or רוחא דמשיח, the ſpirit of the Meſſiah. Now to have him is not barely to partake of his gifts, but of his graces; to be poſſeſſed of him as ones own; to have communion with him, and to have him dwelling in us. There are ſome who have him not, nor never will have him, being none of Chriſt's; and God's elect, whilſt in an unregenerate ſtate, are without him; and whilſt ſuch, tho' they are his choſen and adopted ones, they are his by his Father's gift and his own purchaſe, they are his pardoned ones thro' his blood, and his juſtified ones thro' his righteouſneſs; yet they are not his regenerated, called and ſanctified ones; nor can they claim any intereſt in him; nor are they known to be his by themſelves or others; nor have they any communion with him, or enjoyment of him.

Ver. 10. And if Chriſt be in you, &c.] Not as he is in the whole world, and in all his creatures, or circumſcriptively, and to the excluſion of himſelf elſewhere; for his perſon is above in heaven, his blood is within the vail, his righteouſneſs is upon his people, and his ſpirit and grace are in them; and ſo he comes to be in them, he is formed in their hearts by the Spirit of God in regeneration, when the Father reveals him not only to them, but in them; and he himſelf enters and takes poſſeſſion of them as his own, manifeſts himſelf to them, communicates his grace, and grants them communion with him. This being their caſe, the body is dead becauſe of ſin; by which is meant, not the body of ſin, tho' this is called a body, and a body of death, yet is not dead, much leſs is it ſo by reaſon of ſin; but this fleſhly body, becauſe liable to afflictions, which are called deaths, has the ſeeds of mortality in it, and ſhall in a little time die, notwithſtanding the gift of it to Chriſt, tho' it is redeemed by his blood, and united to him; the reaſon of it is not merely the decree of God, nor does it ariſe from the original conſtitution of the body, but ſin is the true reaſon of it, ſin original and actual, indwelling ſin; but not by way of puniſhment for it, for Chriſt has bore that, death is one of the ſaints privileges, it is for their good, and therefore deſired by them; but that they might be rid of it, and freed from all thoſe troubles which are the conſequents of it: but the Spirit is life, becauſe of righteouſneſs; not the Spirit of God, who lives in himſelf, is the author of life to others, of natural and ſpiritual life, continues as a principle of life in the ſaints, is the pledge of everlaſting life, and is ſo to them becauſe of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; nor grace, or the new creature, which is ſometimes called ſpirit, and may be ſaid to be life, it lives unto righteouſneſs, and is owing to and ſupported by the righteouſneſs of the Son of God; but the ſoul of man is here meant, in oppoſition to the body, which is of a ſpiritual nature, immaterial and immortal; and this may be ſaid in believers to be life or live, for it not only lives naturally, but ſpiritually; it lives a life of holineſs from Chriſt, a life of faith upon him, and a life of juſtification by him, and will live eternally; firſt in a ſeparate ſtate from the body after death, till the reſurrection morn, it does not die with the body, nor ſleep with it in the grave, nor is it in any limbus or ſtate of purgatory, but in paradiſe, in heaven, in the arms and preſence of Chriſt, where it is not inactive, but employed in the beſt of ſervice; and after the reſurrection it will live with the body in glory for evermore; and this is owing to righteouſneſs, not to the righteouſneſs of man, but the imputed righteouſneſs of Chriſt; for as it was ſin, and loſs of righteouſneſs thereby which brought death on man, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is that on which believers live now, and is their right and title to eternal life hereafter.

Ver. 11. But if the Spirit of him that raiſed up Jeſus from the dead, &c.] Theſe words are not to be underſtood as they are by ſome, of the continued work of ſanctification in the heart by the Spirit of God; for regeneration, and not ſanctification, is ſignified by quickning, which quickning is when the Spirit of God firſt takes up his dwelling in the ſoul; beſides, the Apoſtle had ſpoke of the life of the ſpirit or ſoul before; and they are mortal bodies and not immortal ſouls, which are ſaid to be quickned; for theſe cannot mean the body of ſin, or the remains of corruption, as they are ſaid to be, and which are never quickened, nor never can be. To underſtand the words in ſuch a ſenſe, is not ſo agreeable to the reſurrection of Chriſt here mentioned; whereas Chriſt's reſurrection is often uſed as an argument of ours, which is deſigned here, where the Apoſtle argues from the one to the other. The Spirit dwells in the ſaints as his temples; the Spirit that dwells in them is, the Spirit of him that raiſed up Jeſus from the dead; by whom is meant God the Father, to whom the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, is here and elſewhere aſcribed. This periphraſis of him is uſed, to expreſs the power, juſtice and grace of God in the reſurrection of his Son; to ſhew that the Spirit of God was concerned in it; and the greatneſs of the perſon of the Spirit that dwells in the ſaints; and what reaſon they have to believe the ſanctification of their ſouls, and the redemption of their bodies, ſince ſuch a divine Spirit dwells in them; wherefore, he that raiſed up Chriſt from the dead, which is the Father, ſhall alſo quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you; not the ſouls of the ſaints, for theſe die not; but their bodies, called mortal, becauſe appointed to death, are under the ſentence of it, and in which it already works; your bodies and not others; mortal ones, and not airy, celeſtial, immortal ones; the very ſame they carry about with them here, and in which the Spirit of God had dwelt. Theſe ſhall be quickned. The Jews frequently expreſs the reſurrection by תחיית המתים, the quickning of the dead; ſome diſtinguiſh [y] between תקומה, the reſurrection of the dead, which is common to the wicked, and תחיית, the quickning of them, peculiar to the righteous; tho' it is obſerved, this diſtinction does not always hold: however, this act of quickning ſeems here deſigned to expreſs the peculiar bleſſing of the ſaints; for tho' the wicked ſhall be raiſed from the dead, yet they will not riſe with the ſaints, nor by virtue of union to Chriſt, nor to an eternal life of joy and happineſs; in this ſenſe the ſaints only will be quickned, by the Spirit: not as an inſtrument, but as a co-efficient cauſe with the Father and Son; or becauſe of the Spirit that dwelleth in you; the bodies of the ſaints are the temples of the Holy Ghoſt, they are ſanctified by him, where he continues to dwell by virtue of union to Chriſt, and in conſequence of it will quicken them at the laſt day; ſo the Jews ſay, that the Holy Ghoſt brings to the reſurrection of the dead [z].

[x] Zohar in Gen. fol. 19. 3. & 107. 3. & 128. 3. Baal Hatturim in Gen. 1, 2. Caphtor, fol. 113. 2.

Ver. 12. Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, &c.] The appellation, brethren, is not uſed, becauſe they were ſo by nation or by blood, tho' many in the church at Rome were Jews; nor merely in a free familiar way of ſpeaking; but rather on account of church memberſhip, and eſpecially becauſe they were in the ſame ſpiritual relation to God and Chriſt: and the uſe of it by the Apoſtle, ſhews his great humility and condeſcenſion, and his love and affection for them; and is deſigned to engage their attention and regard to what he was about to ſay, to them and of them; as that they were debtors: which is to be underſtood of them not as ſinners, who as ſuch had been greatly in debt, and had nothing to pay, and were liable to the priſon of hell; for no mere creature could ever have paid off their debts; but Chriſt has done it for them, and in this ſenſe they were not debtors; but they were ſo as ſaints, as men freed from condemnation and death; which doctrine of chriſtian liberty is no licentious one; it does not exempt from obedience, but the more and greater the favours are which ſuch men enjoy, the more obliged they are to be grateful and obey; they are debtors, or under obligation, not to the fleſh, to corrupt nature, to live after the fleſh, the dictates of that; nor ſhould they be, both on God's account, ſince that is enmity to him, and is not ſubject to his law; and on their own account, becauſe it is an enemy to them, brings reproach on them, and expoſes them to death: but tho' it is not expreſſed, it is underſtood, that they are debtors to God; to God the Father, both as the God of nature and of grace, as their covenant God and Father in Chriſt, who has bleſſed them with all ſpiritual bleſſings in him; to Chriſt himſelf, who has redeemed them by his blood; and to the Spirit of God who is in them, and for what he has been, is, and will be to them.

Ver. 13. For if ye live after the fleſh, ye ſhall die, &c.] Such perſons are dead whilſt they live, and ſhall die a ſecond or an eternal death, if grace prevent not. It may be aſked, whether one that has received the grace of God in truth, can live after the fleſh? fleſh, or corrupt nature, tho' ſtill in ſuch a perſon, has not the dominion over him; to live in ſin, or in a continued courſe of ſinning, is contrary to the grace of God; but fleſh may prevail and greatly influence the life and converſation, for a while; how long this may be the caſe of a true believer, under backſlidings, thro' the power of corruptions and temptations, cannot be known; but certain it is, that it ſhall not be always thus with him. It may be further enquired, whether ſuch an one may be ſo left to live after the fleſh, as to die and periſh eternally? Chriſt expreſsly ſays, ſuch ſhall not die that live and believe in him; grace, which is implanted in their ſouls, is an incorruptible and never dying ſeed; grace and glory are inſeperably connected together; but then ſuch perſons may die with reſpect to their frames, their comforts and the lively exerciſe of grace, which ſeems to be here intended; as appears from the next clauſe, but if ye thro' the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye ſhall live. This is not to be underſtood of the mortification of the body itſelf; nor does it deſign any maceration or afflicting of it by any ſeverities of life; nor of the deſtruction of the body of ſin by Chriſt; or of the being and principles of ſin in the ſaints by the Spirit of Chriſt; which is contrary to ſcripture, to the experience of the ſaints, who find it in them, alive in them, and to their expectations, whilſt in this world: nor is this mortification to be conſidered as a part of regeneration, which by ſome divines is made to conſiſt in a ſenſe of ſin, grief for it, and hatred of it, in avoiding it, and in an expulſion of vitious habits and inclinations; but it ſhould be obſerved, that the Apoſtle is writing to perſons that were already regenerate; nor does he ever exhort perſons to regenerate themſelves, which he would do here, if this was the ſenſe; regeneration is a work of the Spirit of God, in which men are paſſive, whereas in the mortification here ſpoken of the ſaints are active, under the influence of the Spirit of God; beſides, regeneration is done at once, and does not admit of degrees; and in and by that, ſin, as to its being and principle, is ſo far from being deſtroyed, that it ſeems rather to revive in the ſenſe and apprehenſion of regenerated perſons: but it is a mortification of the outward actings of ſin in the converſation, called, the deeds of the body; and in the Claromontane exemplar, and in the Vulgate Latin verſion, the deeds of the fleſh; or as the Syriac verſion renders it, הופכי, the converſations, or manners of it, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion; that is, its outward courſe of life: and it ſignifies a ſubduing and weakening the vigour and power of ſin in the lives and converſations of the ſaints, to which the grace and aſſiſtance of the Spirit are abſolutely neceſſary; and ſuch who are enabled to do ſo, ſhall live comfortably; they ſhall have communion with Chriſt here, and ſhall live a life of glory with him hereafter. Such a way of ſpeaking as this is uſed by the Jews; ſay they [a], "what ſhall a man do that he may "live? it is replied, ימות עצמו, he ſhall mortify "himſelf;" which the Gloſs explains by he ſhall humble himſelf; walk humbly before God and men, in his life and converſation.

Ver. 14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, &c.] Not by the ſpirit of the world, or of the devil, or by their own ſpirits: the act of leading aſcribed to the ſpirit is either in alluſion to the leading of blind perſons, or ſuch who are in the dark; or rather to the leading of children and teaching them to go; which ſuppoſes life in thoſe that are led, and ſome degree of ſtrength, tho' a good deal of weakneſs; and is a diſplay of powerful and efficacious grace, and is always for their good: the Spirit of God leads them from ſin, and from a dependance on their own righteouſneſs, in paths they formerly knew not, and in which they ſhould go, in the paths of faith and truth, of righteouſneſs and holineſs, and in a right, tho' ſometimes a rough way; he leads them to the perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and to the fulneſs of grace in him; into the preſence of God, to the houſe and ordinances of God; into the truths of the Goſpel, from one degree of grace to another, and at laſt to glory; which he does gradually, by little and little he leads them to ſee the iniquity of their hearts and natures, to lay hold on Chriſt and ſalvation by him, into the doctrines of grace, and the love and favour of God, and proportionably to the ſtrength he gives: now ſuch perſons, they are the ſons of God; not in ſo high a ſenſe as Chriſt is; nor in ſo low a ſenſe as Adam was, and Angels are; much leſs in ſuch ſenſe as wicked magiſtrates be; nor merely as profeſſors of religion in common; but by adoption, not national, ſuch as that of the Jews, but ſpecial; and which has ſome agreement with civil adoption, it being of perſons to an inheritance, which they have no legal right unto, and it is done freely: tho' there's a difference between the one and the other; for in divine adoption there is no need on the adopter's ſide; nor no worth on the ſide of the adopted; proper qualifications are conveyed to them for the enjoyment of the inheritance, and which is enjoyed, the Father and firſtborn being living, and is an inheritance which vaſtly exceeds all others: now this bleſſing of being the ſons of God, is owing not to ourſelves, nor to our earthly parents, but to God; to the Father who predeſtinated to it, and fixed it in the covenant of grace; to Chriſt, 'tis by him, as the ſon of God, it is through him, as the mediator, and it is for him, it is for his glory; and alſo to the ſpirit of God, who manifeſts it, works faith to receive it, witneſſes to it, and ſeals up to the full enjoyment of it. This favour is an inſtance of ſurprizing grace, exceeds other bleſſings, makes the ſaints honourable, is attended with many privileges, and laſts for ever; ſuch who are in this relation to God, ought to aſcribe it to his grace, to requite him with thankfulneſs, and a becoming converſation, to be followers of him, and to love, honour and obey him.

[a] T. Bab. Tamid, fol. 32. 1. Vid. T. Bab Beracot, fol. 63. 2. Raya Mehimna in Zohar in Exod. fol. 65. 3.

Ver. 15. For ye have not received the ſpirit of bondage again to fear, &c.] By the ſpirit of bondage is meant, not the Spirit of God; for this is juſt the reverſe of his character, who is a free Spirit, or רוח נדיבה, a Spirit of liberty; and is contrary to his work and office, which is to ſhew a ſoul its ſtate of bondage by nature, and to deliver out of it; and tho' fear may ariſe from the convictions of ſin, yet this he removes by diſcoveries of love; moreover, his work is to make application of grace and righteouſneſs to ſenſible ſinners, and to adminiſter comfort to diſtreſſed minds, and make them meet for glory; and it is alſo contrary to the character of the perſons in whom he dwells, who are the ſons of God; beſides, the Spirit of God, as a ſpirit of adoption, is in the text itſelf manifeſtly oppoſed to this ſpirit: but by it is intended a man's own ſpirit whilſt in a ſtate of unregeneracy, and particularly whilſt under a work of the law; and it refers to that phariſaical ſpirit which prevailed among the Jews. Men in a ſtate of nature are under a ſpirit of bondage to the luſts of the fleſh; by theſe they are captivated and enſlaved, and the conſequence of it is a fearful apprehenſion, when convicted, of death, judgment, and wrath to come. They are in ſlavery to the God of this world, who leads them captive, and by injecting into them fears of death, are ſubject to bondage. The Jews in particular were in bondage to the law, ceremonial and moral; to the ceremonial law, as circumciſion, obſervation of days, and multitudes of ſacrifices. This law was an handwriting of ordinances againſt them; it obliged them to keep the whole moral law; the ſacrifices of it could not take away ſin; the breach of it being puniſhable with death, muſt unavoidably induce a ſpirit of bondage unto fear: they were in bondage to the moral law, which naturally genders to it, as it demands perfect obedience, but gives no ſtrength to perform; as it ſhews a man his ſin and miſery, but not his remedy, as it accuſes of, charges with ſin, and curſes and condemns for it; moreover, a ſpirit of bondage is brought upon perſons thro' it, when they ſeek for juſtification and ſalvation by the works of it; for ſuch obey it with mercenary views, not from love, but fear; and their comforts riſe and fall according to their obedience: now theſe believers, tho' they had formerly been under ſuch a ſpirit of bondage, were now delivered from it; nor ſhould they return to it again: but ye have received the Spirit of adoption; by which is deſigned not a ſpirit of charity, or love, or inherent grace; adoption is not owing to inherent grace, or is any part of it: regeneration and adoption differ; adoption makes men the children of God, regeneration makes them appear to be ſo by giving them the nature of children; adoption is not a work of grace in us, but an act of grace without us, having its compleat being in the mind of God; it is antecedent to a work of grace, inherent grace is a conſequence of it, tho' no man knows, or has the comfort of his adoption, until he believes: rather a filial childlike ſpirit, ſuch a ſpirit as becomes the children of God is here meant; a ſpirit of freedom with God, of reverence of him, and of love of him, and of obedience to him, ſpringing from filial affection and without mercenary views; a meek harmleſs and inoffenſive ſpirit. Tho' it ſeems beſt of all, to underſtand by it the holy Spirit of God, who is diſtinguiſhed from the Spirit of believers, ver. 16. and is called the ſpirit of his Son in a parallel place, Gal. iv. 6. and ſtands oppoſed here to a ſpirit of bondage; and may be ſo called, becauſe as a ſpirit of grace he flows from adoption; and is the diſcoverer, applier, witneſs and ratifier of the bleſſing of adoption; and is the pledge, earneſt, or ſeal of the future adoption or eternal inheritance: now the ſpirit is received as ſuch from the Father and the Son into the hearts of believers, by the means of the Goſpel, in order to make known their adoption to them, which is an inſtance of grace, and ought to be acknowledged; for we cry Abba father, by the help of the ſpirit of adoption; we, the ſaints under the Goſpel diſpenſation, in oppoſition to the legal one, under which they had not that freedom; cry, which denotes an internal vehemency and affection of ſoul, and an outward calling upon God, as a father, with confidence; Abba father, father is the explanation of the word Abba, and which is added for explanation ſake, and to expreſs the vehemency of the affection, and the freedom and liberty which belongs to children: the words in the original are, the one a Syriac word in uſe with the Jews, the other a Greek one, and denotes that there is but one father of Jews and Gentiles. The word Abba ſignifies my father, and is expreſſive of intereſt and of faith in it; and read backwards is the ſame as forwards, God is the father of his people in adverſity as well as proſperity; it is the word uſed by Chriſt himſelf in prayer, and which he directs his people to; to ſay no more, it is a word which the Jews did not allow ſervants, only freemen to make uſe of, and to be called by; "it is a tradition, ſay they[b], that ſervants and handmaids, they don't uſe to call אבא פלוני ואימא פלונית, father ſuch a one, or mother ſuch a one;" in alluſion to which the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that only freemen, ſuch as have the ſpirit of adoption, and not ſervants or bondſmen, can make uſe of this word Abba, or call God their father.

Ver. 16. The Spirit itſelf beareth witneſs, &c.] The thing which the Spirit of God witneſſes to is, that we are the ſons of God; which ſuppoſes the caſe in ſome ſenſe doubtful and uncertain, at leaſt that it is called in queſtion; not by others, tho' it ſometimes is, as by ſatan, which need not ſeem ſtrange, ſince he called in queſtion the Sonſhip of Chriſt himſelf, and by the world who know them not, and by good men, till better informed: but the teſtimony of the Spirit is not for the ſatisfaction of others, but the ſaints themſelves; who are ready to doubt of it at times, becauſe of the greatneſs of the favour, and their own ſinfulneſs and unworthineſs, eſpecially after backſlidings, thro' the temptations of the devil, and becauſe of their many trials and afflictions. Now this witneſs of the Spirit is to eſtabliſh and confirm it; not to make the thing itſelf ſurer, for that ſtands on the ſure foundation of predeſtination, on the unalterable covenant of grace, on union to Chriſt, redemption by him, the gift of Chriſt, and continuance of the Spirit; but to aſſure them of it, and of their intereſt in it; for the teſtimony is given to our ſpirits; ſo the words are read by the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions, and by the Vulgate Latin; which reading ſeems better than with our ſpirits; for our own ſpirits are no witneſſes to ourſelves: the Father and Son are co-witneſſes of the Spirit, but not our own ſpirits; the ſpirits of the ſaints are they which receive the witneſs of the Spirit of God, to which it is made; not to their ears, for it is not an audible teſtimony; but to their hearts, it is internal; to their renewed ſouls, where faith is wrought to receive it; to their underſtandings, that they may know and be aſſured of it; to their ſpirits, which are apt to faint and doubt about it. Now it is the Spirit itſelf that bears this witneſs, and not others, or by others, but he himſelf in perſon; who is a divine witneſs, whoſe teſtimony therefore muſt be greater than others, and a faithful one, who will never deceive; for he witneſſes what he knows, and what is ſure and certain: his very being and habitation in the ſaints are witneſſes and proofs of their adoption; his powerful operations and divine leadings perſuade to a belief of the truth of it; and by ſhedding abroad the Father's love in the heart, and by the application of Goſpel-promiſes, he cauſes and encourages them to cry Abba father; which is a wonderful inſtance of his condeſcenſion and grace.

Ver. 17. And if children, then heirs, &c.] Children, whether natural or adopted, are heirs to their parents; and according to the Roman laws, which ſome think the Apoſtle here reſpects, whether male or female; but according to the Jewiſh laws[c], females did not inherit only in caſe of want of male iſſue; for tho' Job's daughters inherited with his ſons, this was a peculiar caſe; and the Jewiſh writers ſay[d], it was מתוך חשיבתן ויופיון, on account of their worth and beauty; yet adopted children among them, whether male or female, were equal to natural children in poſſeſſing the inheritance; however, the Apoſtle includes both here, who are all one in Chriſt Jeſus, and are all the children of God by faith in him, and ſo heirs of God: either efficiently, he makes them heirs; they are not ſo by nature, nor do they become ſuch by the works of the law; but God of his rich grace adopts them into his family, begets them again, and freely beſtows the inheritance on them: or ſubjectively, they are heirs of himſelf; he not only makes them his heirs, but he himſelf is their inheritance and portion; they are heirs of all things which are his; they ſhare in his love, grace, and mercy; and his wiſdom, power, truth, and faithfulneſs, and indeed, every perfection of his are engaged on their ſide, and in their favour; all things are theirs who have God to be their God and father; the Goſpel and the miniſters of it are theirs; the world and the things of it, life and death, things preſent and things to come; heaven and happineſs, which go by the names of glory, riches of glory, kingdom, eternal life and ſalvation, are all repreſented as things to be inherited by the ſaints. The Jews ſpeak of God's inheriting of man, as the higheſt pitch of greatneſs man can arrive unto; thus explaining and paraphraſing on the names of the places from which the Iſraelites journeyed, Numb. xxi. 18, 19. ſay[e], "when a man makes himſelf as a wilderneſs, which is common to all, the law is given to him by gift, as it is ſaid, and from the wilderneſs to Mattanah; and when it is given to him by gift, נחלו אל, God inherits him, as it is ſaid, and from Mattanah to Nahaliel; the Gloſs upon it is, the law becomes to him כמו נחלה, as an inheritance; and when שנחלו אל, God inherits him, he aſcends to his greatneſs, i. e. to the higheſt pitch of it, as it is ſaid, from Nahaliel to Bamot;" for when a man is worthy of this, as one of their commentators[f] on this place obſerves, he is called, the inheritance of God, according to Deut. xxxii. 9. but our Apoſtle ſpeaks not of the ſaints as God's inheritance, which to be ſure they are, but of God as theirs; and not of their inheriting the law, but God himſelf, which is certainly the higheſt pitch of honour and greatneſs that men can poſſibly enjoy. 'Tis added, and joint-heirs with Chriſt; it is thro' him they are heirs of God and of glory; and with him will they partake of and enjoy the inheritance, which is ſecured to them by their being co-heirs with him; nor does this at all derogate from the honour of Chriſt, as heir of all things, ſince he is the firſt-born among many brethren, and in this, as in all things, he has the pre-eminence. But before the ſaints enjoy the inheritance with Chriſt they muſt expect to ſuffer with him and for him; tho' in the iſſue they may be aſſured of this, that they ſhall be glorified together; their ſufferings lie in the way to glory, and glory is and will be the end of their ſufferings: if ſo be that we ſuffer with him, him, that we may be alſo glorified together; Chriſt and his people being one, he the head, and they the members, ſuffer together; when he ſuffered, they ſuffered with him and in him, as their head and repreſentative; and they partake of the virtue and efficacy of his ſufferings; and they alſo ſuffer afflictions, many of them at leaſt of the ſame kind with Chriſt, only with theſe differences; his were penal evils, theirs not; his were attended with a vaſt ſenſe of wrath and terror, theirs oftentimes with joy and comfort; his were meritorious, not ſo theirs. Moreover, many of their ſufferings are for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel; on the other hand, by reaſon of that union which is between Chriſt and believers, he ſuffers with them, he reckons their afflictions his, and ſympathizes with them; and the conſideration of this greatly animates and encourages them in their ſufferings, and eſpecially when they obſerve that they ſhall be glorified together; not with his eſſential glory, nor with his mediatorial glory, but with that glory which his Father has given him for them. There's a glorification of the ſaints in Chriſt, and a glorification of them by Chriſt, and a glorification of them with Chriſt, which will conſiſt in likeneſs to him, and in the everlaſting viſion and enjoyment of him.

Ver. 18. For I reckon, that the ſufferings of this preſent time, &c.] By this preſent time may be meant, the then preſent age, in which the Apoſtle lived; which was an age in which the people of God ſuffered much, as was foretold by Chriſt, and which was neceſſary for the confirmation of the Goſpel; for grace and ſtrength anſwerable to their trials were given them; and the power of God was viſibly to be ſeen in the ſupporting of them; tho' this was not the only ſuffering age: wherefore by the preſent time may be underſtood, the preſent time of life here on earth; which is a time of ſuffering, and which can't well be otherwiſe, conſidering the world in which we are, and the nature of it, the ſtate and condition of our ſouls, and the conſtitution of our bodies, and the many enemies we have about us; but then this preſent time of life is the only ſuffering time to the ſaints, for no ſooner are they removed from hence, but they are in heaven, where neither wicked men nor devils can reach them, where their ſouls are freed from ſin and unbelief, from doubts and fears, and every thing that is diſtreſſing; and after the reſurrection there will be no more diſeaſes nor death in their bodies; and this preſent time is but a ſhort time, a little while, and all ſufferings will be at an end; wherefore they are not worthy to be compared with the glory that ſhall be revealed in us. The future happineſs of the ſaints is expreſſed by glory, of which the glory of this world is but a faint reſemblance; a glory which is already given to Chriſt, and he is entered into the poſſeſſion of; it is already, but as yet it is unſeen, but will be revealed hereafter, when Chriſt himſelf ſhall appear in it; and it will not only be revealed to the ſaints, as the glory of Chriſt, as mediator; and it will not only be viſible upon them, upon their bodies, which will be made like to the glorious body of Chriſt; but it will be revealed in them, and greatly lie in the perfection of knowledge and holineſs in their ſouls: now between the ſufferings of the ſaints in the preſent ſtate of things and their future happineſs, is no compariſon, either with reſpect to quality or quantity. Their afflictions are light in compariſon of the due deſert of ſin, the ſufferings of Chriſt, and the torments of the damned in hell, and when under divine ſupports; but glory is heavy, tis a weight of glory. The ſufferings of the ſaints are but for a time, but their glory is eternal; nor is there any compariſon to be made between them by way of merit, for there is no manner of proportion between the one and the other, nor can the one have any cauſal influence upon the other. This is the judgment of things the Apoſtle made, I reckon or I think; which is ſaid, not as his bare opinion, or as in the leaſt doubting the truth of what he ſaid; but having deliberately weighed things in his mind, and reaſoned upon them, came to this concluſion, that ſo it muſt be. The alluſion is either to logicians, who having ſettled the premiſes draw the concluſion; or to arithmeticians, who having caſt up the account, give the ſum total. Tho' after all, the glory here ſpoken of may mean the glorious Goſpel of Chriſt, which was more and more to be revealed in the Gentile world, in or by us the Apoſtles, in compariſon of which all their ſufferings were as nothing.

Ver. 19. For the earneſt expectation of the creature, &c.] Some by the creature underſtand the univerſe, all created beings animate and inanimate, which having ſuffered much by the ſin of man, are introduced by a rhetorical figure, as waiting for deliverance and a reſtoration to their paridiſaical eſtate; but ſome part of the world is manifeſtly diſtinguiſhed from them, ver. 23. others think that angels are here meant, who being obliged to miniſter to ſinful men, are repreſented as groaning and longing for the time when all the children of God ſhall be brought in, that they may be diſmiſſed from their ſervice; but what is ſaid of ſubjection to vanity, of the bondage of corruption, and of their groaning and travailing in pain, can never agree with ſuch happy ſpirits: others ſuppoſe that men in general are deſigned, being by ſin brought into a ſtate of bondage and corruption, ſubjected to vanity, attended with troubles, and liable to death, and ſo groan under their preſent miſeries for deliverance; but to deſire any thing of a ſpiritual nature can't be aſcribed to men in general; and beſides, as before obſerved, ſome perſons are diſtinguiſhed from them, ver. 23. others have been of opinion, that the new creature, or renewed perſons, are here intended, who being burdened with indwelling ſin, groan under it, long for deliverance from it, and are waiting for the heavenly glory; but theſe can't be ſaid to be in a ſtate of bondage to corruption, for they are freed from the dominion of ſin, and are become the ſervants of righteouſneſs. 'Tis beſt of all by the creature to underſtand the Gentile world. The creature here, and the whole creation, ver. 22. muſt be the ſame; now the phraſe πασα κτισις, the whole creation, or every creature, as it may rendered, ſignifies the nations of the world, in diſtinction to the Jews; ſee Mark xvi. 15. Col. i. 23. compared with Matt. xxviii. 19. and anſwers to בריות, the creatures; by which name the Jews often in their writings call the Gentiles, to diſtinguiſh them from the Iſraelites. Take two or three inſtances, as follow,[a] "let your commerce, ſay they, &c. be "in a peaceable manner עם הבריות, with the "creatures; what do the creatures ſay concerning "him? ſuch an one bleſſed be his father who "taught him the law, bleſſed be his maſter who "taught him the law; wo להם לבריות, to the "creatures, becauſe they learn not the law; ſuch "an one who hath learned the law, they obſerve "how beautiful are his ways, and how well ordered "his works; of him it is written, ſaying, and ſaid "unto me, thou art my ſervant, O Iſrael, in whom I "will

"will be glorified;" where the creatures and the Iſraelites, are evidently diſtinguiſhed from one another: again [h], "wo, להם לבריות, to the creatures, who know not, nor have they any regard for the ſervice of their Creator; for it is a tradition, ſays R. Iſaac, that Bath Kol, or a voice, goes out every day from mount Horeb, and ſays, wo, להם לבריות, to the creatures, becauſe of the ſervice of their Creator." And a little after, "if הבריות, the creatures knew the love with which the holy bleſſed God loves Iſrael, they would roar like young lions to follow after him." Once more [i], "all the prayer, של הבריות, of the creatures, is only for the earth; Lord let the earth be fruitful, Lord let the earth proſper; all the prayer, של ישראל, of the Iſraelites, is only for the houſe of the Lord, Lord let the houſe of the ſanctuary be built." Now what the creature, the Gentile world, is repreſented as earneſtly waiting, and wiſhly looking out for, is the manifeſtation of the ſons of God; which is made firſt at their converſion, and afterwards openly and more fully at the appearance of Chriſt in the reſurrection morn. There's a manifeſtation of the ſons of God, at converſion. They that are the ſons of God, are his ſons before by divine predeſtination, and through the covenant of grace; as ſuch they were given to Chriſt; and under this character, and as ſtanding in this relation, he aſſumed their nature, and died for them, in order to gather them together; and indeed, this previous relation, is the ground and foundation of the Spirit of Chriſt being ſent down into their hearts, to manifeſt their adoption to them; for before converſion it is not manifeſted, neither to themſelves nor others, but then it is in ſome meaſure made known. This may in a particular manner be applied to the Gentiles, and God's elect among them. They were the ſons of God before they were manifeſted as ſuch; they are ſpoken of in prophecy as in that relation; ſee Iſa. xlv. 11. and ſeem to be deſigned chiefly, if not altogether, by the children of God ſcattered abroad, in John xi. 51, 52. Theſe were not known, nor looked upon by the Jews, to be the children of God; but when the Goſpel came in among them, as the power of God, it manifeſted them to be ſuch; ſo that where it was formerly ſaid, ye are not my people, there it is ſaid, ye are the ſons of the living God, Hoſ. i. 10. But the full manifeſtation of the ſons of God, will be in their glorification at Chriſt's ſecond coming; when they ſhall be openly taken into God's family, and ſhall be owned by Chriſt in this relation, before angels and men; they'll appear in themſelves, otherwiſe than now they do; they'll be put into the poſſeſſion of the inheritance they are adopted to, and will have that honour and dignity which belong to their character, actually conferred on them; ſo that they ſhall appear, not only to themſelves, but to all the world, to be what they are: now this in the whole compaſs of it, the Gentiles might be ſaid to be in earneſt expectation of, and waiting for. They may be ſaid, in ſome ſenſe, to expect and wait for the manifeſtation of the Son of God himſelf, the Meſſiah, who is called the deſire of all nations; for it was promiſed, that to him ſhould the gathering, or as ſome read it, the expectation of the people, or nations be: they alſo waited for his law, his doctrine, the everlaſting Goſpel, Iſa. xlii. 4. and when that was come among them, and became the power of God to the ſalvation of many of them, this raiſed in them an earneſt expectation of many, of multitudes of the ſons of God being manifeſted among them, according to ſeveral prophecies of the Old Teſtament, which largely ſpeak of this matter; and they continue to wait for the bringing in of the fulneſs of them in the latter day, and for the ultimate glory, which all the ſons of God, whether Jews or Gentiles, ſhall enjoy together.

Ver. 20. For the creature was made ſubject to vanity, &c.] This deſigns the vanity and emptineſs of the minds of the Gentiles, who were without God and Chriſt, and the Holy Spirit, without the law and Goſpel, and grace of God; alſo the vain conceits they had of themſelves, of their wiſdom, knowledge, learning, and eloquence; likewiſe their vain philoſophy, particularly their groſs idolatry, their polytheiſm, or worſhipping of many gods; together with their divers luſts and vices, to which they were addicted, to ſuch a degree, that they might be truly ſaid to be made ſubject thereunto; being under the government of theſe things, ſlaves unto them, and in ſuch ſubjection, as that they could not deliver themſelves from it; though it is ſaid, not willingly, but by reaſon of him who hath ſubjected the ſame in hope. Though they were willingly vain, yet they were not willingly made ſubject to vanity; they willingly went into idolatrous and other evil practices, but the devil made them ſubject, or ſlaves unto them; he led them captive at his will, and powerfully worked in them, by divine permiſſion, ſo that they became vaſſals to him, and to their luſts; for he ſeems to be deſigned, by him who hath ſubjected the ſame, and not Adam, by whom ſin entered into the world.

Ver. 21. Becauſe the creature itſelf alſo, &c.] The phraſe in hope, which ſtands in our verſion, at the end of the preceding verſe, ſhould be placed in the beginning of this, and be read in connexion with ver. 19th, the 20th verſe being a parentheſis, thus; the earneſt expectation of the creature, waiteth for the manifeſtation of the ſons of God, in hope that the creature itſelf alſo ſhall be delivered from the bondage of corruption; and ſo it is placed in ſome copies, and in the Syriac verſion: that is, the Gentiles earneſtly wait and expect, a larger number of converts among them, in hopes that e'er long, the whole Gentile world will be freed from the bondage of corruption, under which it at preſent groaned; by which is meant, the bondage they were in, not only to their ſinful luſts, but to ſatan the god of this world; and particularly to their idols, by which they corrupted themſelves, and to which they were enſlaved: they hoped for a deliverance from hence, into the glorious liberty of the children of God; which deſigns either the liberty of grace the children of God have here; and which conſiſts in a freedom from the dominion of ſin and ſatan, from the law, and the bondage of it, in the free uſe of Goſpel ordinances, in liberty of acceſs to God, and a freedom from the fear of death, and a glorious liberty it is; or the liberty of glory the ſaints ſhall enjoy in the other world, which will lies in a freedom from the priſon of the fleſh, from the body of ſin and death, from all ſorrows and afflictions, from all reproaches and perſecutions, from the temptations of ſatan, from doubts, fears, and unbelief, and in the full viſion of God through Chriſt, and in a free converſation with angels and ſaints.

Ver. 22. For we know that the whole creation groaneth, &c.] As a woman with child, ready to bring forth: for 'tis added, and travaileth in pain together together until now; regeneration is owing to the grace of God, which is compared to ſeed, of which men are born again; the means of conveying it is the Goſpel, and miniſters are the inſtruments of begetting ſouls to Chriſt, and who travail in birth till Chriſt be formed in them: now the Goſpel being carried by the Apoſtles into the Gentile world, and being ſucceeded there, it was like a woman big with child, ready to bring forth many ſons to God; for as it was propheſied, ſo it came to paſs, that more are the children of the deſolate, than the children of the married wife; and theſe births were attended with pain. The Apoſtles preached the word with much contention, and the Gentiles received it in much affliction, though with the joy of the Holy Ghoſt; as a woman rejoices when a man child is brought forth, though the birth has been attended with pain and labour. This was an united groan, and travail of all the converted Gentiles in the ſeveral parts of the world, together with the miniſters of the Goſpel, earneſtly deſiring more inſtances of converſion among them; and this vehement deſire had appeared until now, from the firſt time of the preaching of the Goſpel among the Gentiles, to the writing of this epiſtle; and ſuppoſes, that though there were many ſpiritual births, there were more to come; as there has been, and will be more abundantly, in the latter day: and moreover, this painful labour, and theſe united groans for ſpiritual births, the Apoſtles were well acquainted with, and therefore could ſay, we know, &c. by their preaching among them, in whom they could eaſily obſerve, and do in their writings take notice, how eagerly deſirous they were of having the Goſpel preached unto them.

Ver. 23. And not only they, but ourſelves alſo, &c.] Not only they Gentiles, but we Jews likewiſe: which have the firſt fruits of the Spirit; meaning either the Apoſtles, who were all Jews, and who moſt of them received the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit on the day of pentecoſt, which was the day of the firſt fruits, Numb. ~~xxvi. 28.~~ umb. 28. 26. and to which there ſeems to be an alluſion here; or elſe the Jewiſh converts in general: to the Jews the promiſes of the Meſſiah were made; to them he firſt came; the Goſpel was firſt preached unto them, and ſome of them firſt believed in Chriſt; they had the grace of God communicated to them in converſion, which they received as the firſt fruits, with reſpect to an after increaſe; or in regard to glory, for like the firſt-fruits, grace is of the ſame kind with glory, and is a pledge and earneſt of it; ſaints judge by grace the firſt fruits, what glory is, and therefore long after it: now of theſe perſons thus deſcribed 'tis ſaid, even we ourſelves groan within ourſelves; their groans were inward from their hearts, not hypocritical; or were among themſelves, common to them all; and that not merely on their own account, the corruptions of their hearts, the ſufferings they endured for the ſake of the Goſpel, and in a longing expectation for the heavenly glory, but alſo for the converſion of the Gentiles, for which they inceſſantly laboured, and prayed night and day; waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. Adoption is explained by the redemption of the body; and by the one may be known, what the other means: by the redemption of our body is not meant, the redemption of God's elect, body and ſoul, by the blood and death of Chriſt, which was already finiſhed; and which the ſaints who had received the firſt-fruits, were partakers of in themſelves, and therefore could not be ſaid to be waiting for it; but it deſigns either the redemption of the natural body, by the reſurrection from the dead; when the bodies of the ſaints will be delivered from that mortality, corruption, weakneſs, and diſhonour, under which they lie in the grave; when they will be refined and ſpiritualized, and freed from every thing which makes them an incumbrance, and an uneaſineſs to their ſouls or ſpirits now; or elſe the redemption of the myſtical body the church, of which the Gentiles make a conſiderable part, and is to be underſtood of a deliverance of the church, from the diſtreſſes and perſecutions it then laboured under; or rather of a making up of the body, the church, by a redemption or deliverance of that part of it, which lay among the Gentiles, from that vanity and bondage of corruption, to which it was ſubject, into the manifeſtation and glorious liberty of the ſons of God: and then by adoption is meant, the ſpecial grace of adoption, manifeſted to the Gentiles in their effectual vocation; which the Jews who had received the firſt-fruits of the Spirit were waiting for, and had good reaſon to expect, from many prophecies in the writings of the Old Teſtament; and to which they were the more encouraged, by many appearances of the grace and power of God, attending the miniſtry of the Goſpel among them; and which adoption will be more fully manifeſted in the reſurrection morn; wherefore alſo the inheritance, which the whole myſtical body the church will then enter upon the poſſeſſion of, may well be called the adoption, becauſe the ſaints are adopted to it; adoption gives them the title to it, none but adopted ones will enjoy it; and their enjoyment of it, will be the full manifeſtation and completion of the grace of adoption; this ſaints are waiting for, both for themſelves and others, and 'tis worth waiting for; for it is an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, which fades not away, reſerved in the heavens: and there is good ground to wait for it; 'tis a bequeſt of their heavenly Father, who has adopted them; it is a gift of his free grace; 'tis already in the hands of Chriſt, with whom they are coheirs; and they have already the Spirit, as the earneſt of it.

Ver. 24. For we are ſaved by hope, &c.] We who have received the firſt fruits, who were in a loſt periſhing condition, and by nature no better than others, than the Gentiles, are ſaved from ſin and wrath to come by Chriſt, with a ſpiritual and everlaſting ſalvation. They were already ſaved in the preparations and purpoſes of God; in the covenant of grace; in the arms and hands of Chriſt, through his purchaſe; and as conſidered in him; and with reſpect to the inchoation and application of ſalvation, in effectual calling, and their right unto it by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and with regard to the certainty of it, in faith and hope: the manner in which they are ſaid to be ſaved, is by, or in hope; not that hope is the cauſe of ſalvation, but the means by which ſouls are brought to the enjoyment of it; ſalvation, or glory, is the object of it: but hope that is ſeen, is not hope; for what a man ſeeth, why doth he yet hope for? in the former clauſe, hope ſignifies the grace itſelf, but here the object of it; which is repreſented as unſeen, not yet fully enjoyed, ſomething future, and to be hoped for; as the reſurrection of the dead, which is the object of hope, and is unſeen, and even incredible to carnal reaſon, and is to come; and good foundation there is in divine revelation, to hope for it; and the hope of it is of great uſe to the ſaints, whilſt in this world of trouble: eternal glory and happineſs, is alſo the object of the hope of believers; its ſaid to be the hope of their calling, which they are called by grace to; the hope of righteouſneſs, which the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is the ground and foundation of; and that bleſſed hope, the ſum of their happineſs; and hope laid up for them in heaven, where it is ſafe and ſecure; all which is unſeen, and yet to come; but good reaſon there is to hope for it, ſince the ſcriptures of truth ſo clearly expreſs it; and the perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, lay ſuch a ſolid foundation for hope of it: the Alexandrian copy reads, why doth he yet wait for? and ſo the Ethiopic verſion, with which agrees the Syriac verſion, reading the whole, for if we ſee it, why ſhould we wait for it?

Ver. 25. But if we hope for that we ſee not, &c.] Whether it be the hour of death, or the ſecond coming of Chriſt, or the reſurrection of the dead, and eternal glory; all which are unſeen by us, and to be hoped for: then do we with patience wait for it; as that which is certain and real, as ſomething valuable, which will be ſatisfying, and be received with the utmoſt joy. This ſuppoſes, that the perſons who wait for it, believe it, and their intereſt in it, at leaſt hope they have one; that they have a valuable eſteem and affection for it; that they are not in a ſtate of perfection and happineſs; and that they ſit looſe by the things of this world, and are ready to part with the one, and graſp the other: the manner of their waiting is with patience; a grace, of which God is the efficient, Chriſt is the exemplar, and the word the means; and which is of great uſe under afflictions from the hand of God, under the reproaches and perſecutions of men, under deſertions and want of anſwers in prayer, under the temptations of ſatan, and in the expectation of the heavenly glory.

Ver. 26. Likewiſe the Spirit alſo helpeth our infirmities, &c.] The Spirit of God which dwells in us, by whom we are led, who is the Spirit of adoption to us, who has witneſſed to our ſpirits, that we are the children of God, whoſe firſt-fruits we have received, over and above, and beſides what he has done for us, alſo helpeth our infirmities; whilſt we are groaning within ourſelves, both for ourſelves and for others, and are waiting patiently for what we are hoping for. The people of God, all of them, more or leſs, have their infirmities in this life. They are not indeed weak and infirm, in ſuch ſenſe as unregenerate perſons are, who have no ſpiritual ſtrength, are ignorant of their weakneſs, do not go to Chriſt for ſtrength, nor derive any from him, and hence can perform nothing that is ſpiritually good: nor are they all alike infirm, ſome are weaker in faith, knowledge, and experience, than others; ſome are of more weak and ſcrupulous conſciences than others be; ſome are more eaſily drawn aſide through corruption and temptation than others are; ſome have weaker gifts, particularly in prayer, than others have, yet all have their infirmities; not only bodily afflictions, perſecutions of men, and temptations of ſatan, but internal corruptions, and weakneſs to oppoſe them, and to diſcharge their duty to God and man; and alſo have their infirmities in the exerciſe of grace, and in the performance of the work of prayer; though they are not left to ſink under them, but are helped by the Spirit: by whom is meant, not any tutelar angel, or the human ſoul, or the gift of the Spirit in prayer, but the Holy Spirit of God himſelf; who, as the word here uſed ſignifies, helps together, with hope and patience, graces which he has implanted, and which he invigorates and draws forth into act and exerciſe; or with the ſaints labouring under their burdens; or with the Father and the Son, who alſo are helpers of the ſaints: and this helping of them implies, that their infirmities and burdens are ſuch as they muſt ſink under, unleſs they are helped; and which is done by the Spirit, by bringing to remembrance, and applying the precious promiſes of the Goſpel, by ſhedding abroad the love of God in their hearts, by acting the part of a comforter to them, by putting ſtrength into them; and by aſſiſting them in prayer to God: for we know not what we ſhould pray for as we ought. The children of God are not ignorant of the object of prayer, that it is God, and not a creature, God, as the God of nature, providence, and grace, God in the perſons of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Spirit, and with a view to his glorious perfections; nor of the way of coming to God in prayer, through Chriſt; nor of the manner of performing it in faith, with fervency, ſincerity, reverence, humility, and ſubmiſſion; nor who they ſhould pray for, for themſelves, for all men, even enemies, particularly for the ſaints, and miniſters of the Goſpel; nor of many other things reſpecting prayer, as that it is both their duty and privilege, their own inability, and the need of the aſſiſtance of the Spirit in it; but what they are ignorant of is, chiefly the matter of prayer: indeed the whole bible is an inſtruction in general to this work; ſo is the prayer Chriſt taught his diſciples, and the ſeveral prayers of ſaints recorded in the ſcriptures; the promiſes of God, and their own wants and neceſſities, may and do, greatly direct them; as for inſtance, when under a ſenſe of ſin, to pray for a diſcovery of pardoning grace; when under darkneſs and deſertions, for the light of God's countenance; when under a ſenſe of weakneſs of grace, and the ſtrength of corruptions, for freſh ſupplies of grace and ſtrength, for communion with God in ordinances, for more grace here, and glory hereafter; but what of all things they ſeem to be, at leaſt at ſometimes, at a loſs about, is what to pray for with reſpect to things temporal, ſuch as riches, honour, friends, &c. to have preſent afflictions removed, or temptations ceaſe; and too often it is, that they pray with greater importunity for leſſer things, than for things of more importance; and more from an intemperate zeal, and with a view to ſelf, than for the glory of God: but the Spirit itſelf maketh interceſſion for us, with groanings which cannot be uttered; not the ſpirit of a man, or the gift of the Spirit in man; or a man endued with an extraordinary gift of the Spirit; but the Holy Ghoſt himſelf, who makes interceſſion for the ſaints: not in ſuch ſenſe as Chriſt does; for he intercedes not with the Father, but with them, with their ſpirits; not in heaven, but in their hearts; and not for ſinners, but for ſaints: nor in the manner as Chriſt does, not by vocal prayer, as he when on earth; nor by being the medium, or way of acceſs to God; nor by preſenting the prayers of ſaints, and the blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt to God, as Chriſt does in heaven; nor as the ſaints make interceſſion for one another, and for other perſons: but he intercedes for them, by making them to intercede; he indites their prayers for them, not in a book, but in their hearts; he ſhews them their need, what their wants are; he ſtirs them up to prayer, he ſupplies them with arguments, puts words into their mouths, enlarges their hearts, gives ſtrength of faith in prayer, and all the ardour and fervency of it; he enables them to come to God as their Father; and gives them liberty and boldneſs in his preſence, which requires an heart ſprinkled from an evil conſcience, ſcience, faith in the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and a view of God, as a God of peace, grace, and mercy: and this interceſſion he makes, with groanings which cannot be uttered; not that the Spirit of God groans, but he ſtirs up groans in the ſaints; which ſuppoſe a burden on them, and their ſenſe of it: and theſe are ſaid to be unutterable; ſaints under his influence, praying ſilently, without a voice, as Moſes and Hannah did, and yet moſt ardently and fervently; or as not being able to expreſs fully what they conceive in their minds, how great their burdens are, and their ſenſe of their wants.

Ver. 27. And he that ſearcheth the hearts, &c.] This is peculiar to God, and a periphraſis of him; angels neither good nor bad, can ſearch into the hearts of men; one man can't know the heart of another, nor any man fully know his own; this is the prerogative of God: and he knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit; not the ſpirit of men, but of God; that affectionate deſire and meaning of the Spirit of God, in the unutterable groans of the ſaints; he knows the wiſe meaning there is in them, for ſo Φρονημα may ſignify, and is oppoſed to the carnal mind, or wiſdom of the fleſh, which deſires fooliſh things. The ſearcher of hearts knows this, not barely by his omniſcience, but he regards it, approves of it, attends, and gives an anſwer to it; which is no ſmall encouragement to pray, though it be but with ſighs and groans unutterable; ſince the omniſcient God underſtands, and reſpects ſuch kind of prayer: and the reaſon is, becauſe he, the Spirit of God, maketh interceſſion for the ſaints, according to the will of God; the perſons for whom he intercedes, are ſaints; to whom Chriſt is made ſanctification; who are called to be ſaints; are ſanctified by the Spirit of God, and walk after him: now ſuch are the objects of God's delight, they are choſen by him, preſerved in Chriſt, and have his righteouſneſs imputed to them; to theſe he has made known his Goſpel, has given his grace, and will at laſt the inheritance; ſo that interceſſion made for ſuch, will certainly be regarded: it may be rendered, he maketh interceſſion for holy things according to God; for ſpiritual bleſſings, divine favours, things that belong to God; or divine things, which are agreeable to his nature and will: and ſince it is the Holy Spirit that makes interceſſion, and the perſons are holy for whom he makes it, and this is made for holy things, and all according to the will of God, which the Spirit of God muſt fully know, ſaints may be confident of the prevalence and ſucceſs of ſuch interceſſion.

Ver. 28. And we know that all things work together for good, &c.] There is a temporal good, and a ſpiritual good, and an eternal one. Temporal good is what the men of the world are ſeeking after, and generally have the greateſt ſhare of, and the ſaints the leaſt; and yet they have as much as is needful for them, and what they have, they have with a bleſſing; and even ſometimes afflictions, work for the temporal good of God's children: ſpiritual good lies in a lively exerciſe of grace, and a conformity of the ſoul to God; and is what the men of the world leaſt regard, and the ſaints moſt; and ſometimes afflictions iſſue in this ſort of good, as they do alſo in eternal good, for they work for us an exceeding weight of glory: by all things may be meant, all beings good and bad: all good beings increated or created: increated, as Jehovah the Father, all his perfections, purpoſes, promiſes, proviſions, and performances; Jehovah the Son, as the mighty God, and as mediator, all that he is in himſelf, all that he has in himſelf, all that he has done, or is doing, all his titles, characters, and relations; Jehovah the Spirit, in his perſon, offices, and operations; theſe all have worked together in the council of peace, in the covenant of grace, and in redemption; and they do work together in ſanctification, and ſo they will in glorification, and that for the good of the ſaints: all created ones, as good angels, good magiſtrates, good miniſters of the Goſpel: all evil beings, as devils, perſecuting magiſtrates, hereticks, and falſe teachers: all things, good and bad: all good things, outward peace and proſperity, external gifts, the miniſtry of the word, the adminiſtration of ordinances, church cenſures, admonitions, and excommunications; all evil things, ſin the evil of evils: original ſin, or the fall of Adam, which contains all other ſins in it, was attended with aggravating circumſtances, and followed with diſmal conſequences, yet has been overruled for good; hereby a Saviour became neceſſary, who was ſent, came, and wrought out ſalvation; has brought in a better righteouſneſs than Adam loſt; entitled his people to a better life than his was, and makes them partakers of the riches both of grace and glory: actual ſin, inward or outward; indwelling ſin, which is made uſe of, when diſcovered to abate pride, to lead to an entire dependance on Chriſt, to teach ſaints to be leſs cenſorious, to depend on the power and grace of God to keep them, and to wean them from this world, and to make them deſirous of another, where they ſhall be free from it; outward ſins, of others, or their own; the ſins of others, of wicked men, which obſerved, raiſe an indignation in the ſaints againſt ſin, and a concern for God's glory, and to look into their own hearts and ways, and admire the grace of God to them, that this is not their caſe; of good men, which are recorded, and may be obſerved, not for example and encouragement in ſin, but for admonition, and to encourage faith and hope under a ſenſe of it; of their own, for humiliation, which iſſues in weakening the power of ſin in themſelves, and the ſtrengthening of the graces of others: but from all this it does not follow, that God is the author of ſin, only that he overules it to wiſe and gracious purpoſes; nor ſhould any take encouragement to ſin, to do evil that good may come; nor is ſin itſelf a real good; nor is it to be ſaid that it does no hurt; for though it can't hinder the everlaſting ſalvation of God's people, it does a great deal of hurt to their peace and comfort; and that it is made to work in any form or ſhape for good, is not owing to its own nature and influence, which is malignant enough, but to the unbounded power and unſearchable wiſdom of God: all evils or afflictions, ſpiritual and temporal, work together for good; all ſpiritual ones, ſuch as the temptations of ſatan, which are made uſeful for humiliation, for the trial of grace, to ſhew us our weakneſs, our need of Chriſt, and to conform us to him, and alſo to excite to prayer and watchfulneſs; the hidings of God's face, which make his preſence the more prized when enjoyed, and the more deſireable. Temporal afflictions, afflictions in body, name, or eſtate, nay even death itſelf, all work together for the good of God's people. The Jews tell us of one Nahum, the man Gamzu, who they ſay was [k] ſo called, becauſe of every thing that happened to him he uſed to ſay, גם זו לטובה, Gam zu letobah, this is alſo for good: and they give inſtances of ſeveral misfortunes which befel him, upon which account he uſed theſe words, and how they proved in the iſſue to his advantage: agreeable to this is the advice given by them, "for ever "ſay they [l], let a man be uſed to ſay, all that "the Lord does, לטב עביד, he does for good." Now that all things do work together for good, the ſaints know, and are firmly perſuaded of; both from the word and promiſes of God, and from the inſtances of Jacob, Joſeph, Job, and others, and alſo from their own experience: and it is to be obſerved, that it is not ſaid that all things have worked together, and ſo they may again, or that they ſhall work together, but all things work together for good; they now work together, they are always working together, whether it can be obſerved or no: proſperity and adverſity, whether in things temporal or ſpiritual, work together, and make a curious chequer work in providence and grace; which will be viewed with admiration another day: one copy reads, God works together, or cauſes all things to work together for good; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion, we know that God helps them that love him, to every good thing; and to this agrees the Syriac verſion, we know that to them that love God, he in every thing helps them to good; and certain it is, that God is the efficient cauſe, that makes all things work together for his people's good. The perſons to whom all things work together for good, are deſcribed as ſuch that love God; a character, which does not agree with all the ſons and daughters of Adam: love to God is not naturally in men; it is wrought in the ſoul in regeneration, and is an evidence of it; it grows up with faith, which works by it; without it, a profeſſion of religion is vain; and where it is once wrought, it laſts for ever; it ought to be ſuperlative and univerſal, conſtant, warm and ardent, hearty and ſincere: ſuch who have it, ſhew it by a deſire to be like to God, and therefore imitate him, by making his glory the ſupreme end of their actions; by being careful to offend him; by delighting in his preſence, in his people, word, ordinances, ways, and worſhip; and by undervaluing the world, and all things in it, in compariſon of him; who is to be loved for the perfections of his being, the characters and relations he ſtands in and bears to his people, and on account of the love with which he has loved them, and which is indeed the ſpring and ſource of theirs. They are further deſcribed, as ſuch who are the called according to his purpoſe. The called of God and of Jeſus Chriſt; not to any office, or by the external miniſtry of the word only, but by ſpecial grace; from darkneſs to light, from bondage to liberty, from the company of ſinful men, to fellowſhip with Chriſt, from a truſt in their own righteouſneſs, to a dependance on his, to grace here, and glory hereafter; which is done according to the purpoſe of God: the perſons called, are fixed upon by God; none are called, but whom God purpoſed to call; thoſe who are called, can aſſign no other reaſon of it, than the will of God; and no other reaſon but that can be given, why others are not called; the time when, the place where, the means whereby, perſons are called, are all ſettled and determined by the will, and according to the purpoſe of God.

Ver. 29. For whom he did foreknow, &c.] The foreknowledge of God here, does not intend his preſcience of all things future; by which he foreknows and foretells things to come, and which diſtinguiſhes him from all other gods; and is ſo called, not with reſpect to himſelf, with whom all things are preſent, but with reſpect to us, and which is eternal, univerſal, certain, and infallible; for in this ſenſe he foreknows all men, and if this was the meaning here, then all men would be predeſtinated, conformed to the image of Chriſt, called by grace, juſtified and glorified; whereas they are a ſpecial people, whom God has foreknown: nor is this foreknowledge to be underſtood of any previſion or foreſight of the good works, holineſs, faith, and perſeverance of men therein, upon which God predeſtinates them to happineſs; ſince this would make ſomething out of God, and not his good pleaſure, the cauſe of predeſtination; which was done before, and without any conſideration of good or evil, and is entirely owing to the free grace of God, and is the ground and foundation of good works, faith, holineſs, and perſeverance in them: but this regards the everlaſting love of God to his own people, his delight in them, and approbation of them; in this ſenſe he knew them, he foreknew them from everlaſting, affectionately loved them, and took infinite delight and pleaſure in them; and this is the foundation of their predeſtination and election, of their conformity to Chriſt, of their vocation, juſtification, and glorification: for theſe he alſo did predeſtinate to be conformed to the image of his Son; having perfect, diſtinct, ſpecial knowledge of them, joined with love to them, he predetermined, or foreappointed them in his eternal mind, in his everlaſting and unchangeable purpoſes and decrees to this end, conformity to the image of Chriſt; which is not to be underſtood of the Spirit of Chriſt: God's elect indeed are choſen to be holy, and through ſanctification of the Spirit, but are never ſaid to be conformed, or made like to the Spirit, nor is the Spirit ever called the image of Chriſt; but this deſigns either likeneſs to Chriſt as the Son of God, or conformity to him in his human nature. There is indeed a great diſparity between the Sonſhip of Chriſt, and of the ſaints; he is the eternal and natural Son of God, he is the one and only begotten Son, they are adopted ones, yet in ſome things there is a likeneſs; as he is the Son of God, ſo are they the ſons of God, though not in the ſame ſenſe; as he is a beloved Son, ſo are they; as he is the firſt-born with reſpect to them, they are the firſt-born with reſpect to angels; as he has an inheritance, ſo have they: moreover, he has a very great concern in their ſonſhip; the predeſtination of them to it, is by him; the bleſſing itſelf is founded on union to him, on their conjugal relation to him, and his aſſumption of their nature; it comes to them through his redemption, and is actually beſtowed on them by him; and this conformity to Chriſt as ſons, will more fully appear hereafter, when they ſhall be like him, and ſee him as he is: or this may be underſtood of the ſaints conformity to Chriſt in his human nature, both here and hereafter: here, in holineſs; the image of God was in man, in his firſt creation, this is defaced by ſin; and in regeneration, the image of Chriſt is inſtamped, his grace is wrought in them, his Spirit is put into them, to enable them to walk in him, and after him: this will be compleat hereafter, and will conſiſt in perfect holineſs, being freed from the very being, as well as the power and guilt of ſin; in perfect knowledge of every thing that will tend to their happineſs; and in glory like to Chriſt, both in ſoul and body: that he might be the firſt-born among many brethren; the perſons among whom Chriſt is the firſt-born, are deſcribed by their relation, brethren; to one another, being related to the ſame Father, regenerated by the ſame grace, taken into the ſame family, and heirs of the ſame glory; and to Chriſt, which relation, as brethren to him, is not merely founded on his incarnation, but in their adoption; and which is evidenced by their regeneration, and doing the will of his Father; and which relation he owns, and is not aſhamed of: they are alſo deſcribed by their number many; for though they are but few, when compared with the world; yet they are many, a large number, conſidered by themſelves; and among theſe, Chriſt is the firſt-born: he is the firſt-born of God, the begotten of the Father, he is the firſt begotten, and as ſuch he is the only begotten; he is the firſt-born of Mary, ſhe had none before him, and he is the only one that ever was born in the manner he was; he is the firſt begotten from the dead, his reſurrection is called a begetting, and he was the firſt in time that roſe from the dead by his own power, and to an immortal life, and the firſt in cauſality and dignity. Chriſt is the firſt-born, with reſpect to all creatures in general; he was begotten of the Father before all creatures were; he is the firſt cauſe of them all, the governor, baſis, and ſupport of them: and he is the firſt-born with reſpect to the ſaints; who are of the ſame nature with him, are made partakers of the divine nature, are ſons in the ſame family, though not in the ſame claſs of ſonſhip: moreover, this character may regard not ſo much birth, as privilege which belongs to Chriſt as mediator; who, as the firſt-born had, has the bleſſing, the government, the prieſthood, and the inheritance; all which is owing to, and is one end of divine predeſtination. The Cabaliſtic[m] writers among the Jews, give the name of firſt-born, to the ſecond Sephira, number, or perſon, Wiſdom, which anſwers to the Son of God.

Ver. 30. Moreover, whom he did predeſtinate, &c.] Not to ſufferings, which are not expreſſed nor deſigned, but to grace and glory after mentioned. This predeſtination is of particular perſons, who in conſequence of it, are called, juſtified, and glorified; it is the effect of divine grace, and entirely owing to it; it is the ſource of all the other bleſſings of grace, and is therefore placed at the head of them, and ſecures them all: them he alſo called; not to afflictions: many may be called to afflictions, and endure them, who are neither juſtified nor glorified; beſides, the people of God, though they meet with many afflictions, between their call to eternal glory, and their enjoyment of it, yet they are not ſo much called to afflictions, as to patience under them: their call is of grace, by ſpecial grace, to peculiar bleſſings of grace, and to a kingdom and glory; and this their calling is ſecured by predeſtination, and connected with glorification: and whom he called, them he alſo juſtified; the meaning of which is, not that he approved of them as ſincere and faithful, on account of their faith and patience in ſufferings; for neither of their ſufferings, nor of their faith and patience in them, is there the leaſt mention in the paſſage; nor can any inſtance be produced, of the uſe of the word juſtified, in this epiſtle, or elſewhere, in this ſenſe: but the meaning is, that ſuch perſons whom God predeſtinates and calls, he makes them righteous, by the imputation of the righteouſneſs of his Son unto them; which is unto all, and upon all them that believe; by which they are juſtified before God, and in their own conſciences, from all ſin, and ſo ſecured from all wrath and condemnation; wherefore glorification ſtands inſeparably connected with it: and whom he juſtified, them he alſo glorified; which is not meant of being made glorious under ſufferings; nor of being made glorious by the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit; for the word is never uſed in this ſenſe, nor is God ever ſaid to glorify his people in this way; and the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of the ſaints in general, and not of particular ones: if this was the ſenſe, none would be predeſtinated, called, and juſtified, but ſuch who have the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit; and none would have the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, but ſuch perſons; whereas many have had theſe, and yet no intereſt in the grace of God, and everlaſting happineſs; but eternal glory is here meant, which is what the Apoſtle had been ſpeaking of in the context; is what the elect are predeſtinated and called unto; and which their juſtification gives them a right and title to; and will conſiſt in a likeneſs to Chriſt, in communion with him, in an everlaſting viſion of him, and in a freedom from all that is evil, and in an enjoyment of all that is good; and ſo the great end of predeſtinating grace will be anſwered in them, mentioned in the foregoing verſe: now this glorification may be ſaid to be already done, with reſpect to that part of God's elect, who are in heaven, inheriting the promiſes; and is in ſome ſenſe true alſo, of that part of them which is on earth, who are called and juſtified; being made glorious within by the grace of Chriſt, and arrayed and adorned with the glorious robe of his righteouſneſs; by the one they have a meetneſs, and by the other a right to eternal glory; of which this grace they have received, is the beginning, pledge, and earneſt: beſides, they are already glorified in Chriſt their head and repreſentative, and in the view of God, and with reſpect to the certainty of it, it being prepared and made ready for them, is in the hands of Chriſt for them, and is inſured to their faith and hope. It is an obſervation of a Jewiſh writer[n], "that a thing, שנגזר להיות, which is decreed to be, is ſpoken of in the paſt tenſe:" this is the ſcripture ſtile concerning things decreed, and ſuch is the glorification of all God's elect.

Ver. 31. What ſhall we then ſay to theſe things? &c.] Either to theſe afflictions, ſhall we murmur and repine at them? no, ſince they work together for our good, and are not to be compared with our future glory, which is certain; for if we ſuffer with, and for Chriſt, we ſhall be glorified together: or to theſe bleſſings juſt now mentioned, as the foreknowledge of God, divine predeſtination, effectual calling, free juſtification, and eternal glorification, what can be ſaid to theſe? nothing can be added to them, they are a compleat ſett of bleſſings, wanting nothing; nor can the greatneſs of them be fully expreſſed, or the freeneſs of God's grace diſplayed in them, ſufficiently declared: what remains for us to do, but to be thankful for them, and glory in them? or what can be ſaid againſt them? nothing at all, they can't be contradicted or gainſayed; they are true and faithful ſayings; they can never be made void and of no effect, by hell or earth; nor ought our unbelieving hearts, to have any thing to ſay againſt intereſt in them: or what is to be ſaid, or inferred from them? why, the free, ſovereign, unchangeable, and everlaſting love of God, in providing and beſtowing ſuch benefits; and the certainty of ſalvation, which is infallibly ſecured hereby: if God be for us; or ſeeing he is for us, has an affection for us, which appears from the gift of himſelf, Son, and Spirit, and all the bleſſings of grace and glory; and is on our ſide: as that he is on the ſide of his people, is evident from his preſervation of them, from the evil of the world, and their own corruptions; from the ſupports he gives them under afflictions and temptations; from his carrying on the work of grace upon them, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition made unto it; and from their ſafety and ſecurity they enjoy by him, notwithſtanding the power of their enemies; he is ſo for them, and on their ſide, as that he will certainly ſave them. This he has determined to do, he has ſent his Son to obtain ſalvation for them, his Spirit to apply it to them, and keeps them by his power to the full enjoyment of it: and ſince this is the caſe, who can be againſt us? none can be againſt them. There are ſome that can't poſſibly be againſt them; if Jehovah the Father is not againſt them, the Son can't be againſt them, nor the Spirit; good angels can't be againſt them, ſo far from it, that they rejoice at their good, miniſter to them, and are a guard about them; the law can't be againſt them, becauſe it is fulfilled in them; nor juſtice, becauſe it is ſatisfied, and all its demands anſwered: and though there may be ſome who may be againſt them, and oppoſe themſelves to them, yet their oppoſition is to no purpoſe; they will never prevail over them to their ruin and deſtruction; as neither ſin, nor ſatan, nor the world, nor death itſelf.

[n] Aben Ezra, in Jon. ii. 2.

Ver. 32. He that ſpared not his own Son, &c.] 'Tis ſaid that God ſpared not the angels that ſinned, nor the old world, which was full of violence, nor Sodom and Gomorrah, whoſe wickedneſs was great, nor the Egyptians and their firſt-born, refuſing to let Iſrael go, nor the Iſraelites themſelves, when they tranſgreſſed his laws, nor wicked men hardened in ſin; all which is not to be wondered at; but that he ſhould not ſpare his own Son, his proper Son, of the ſame nature with him, and equal to him, the Son of his love, and who never ſinned againſt him, is very amazing: he ſpares many of the ſons of men in a providential way, and in a way of grace, but he did not ſpare his own Son, or abate him any thing in any reſpect, what was agreed upon between them, with regard to the ſalvation of his people; as appears by his aſſuming human nature, with all its weakneſſes and infirmities; by his having laid on him all the iniquities of his people, and all the puniſhment due unto them, he inflicted on him, without the leaſt abatement; and by his ſufferings not being deferred at all, beyond the appointed time; when full ſatisfaction for all their ſins were demanded, the whole payment of their debts to the uttermoſt farthing inſiſted on, and all done according to the utmoſt ſtrictneſs of divine juſtice: and which was not out of any diſaffection to him; nor becauſe he himſelf deſerved ſuch treatment; but becauſe of the counſel, purpoſe, and promiſe of God, that his law and juſtice might be fully ſatisfied, and his people compleatly ſaved: moreover, the ſenſe of the phraſe may be learnt from the uſe of it in the Septuagint verſion of Gen. xxii. 12. thou haſt not witheld thy ſon, thine only ſon from me, which that renders ȣκ εφεισω, thou haſt not ſpared thy beloved ſon for me; ſo God did not ſpare his Son, becauſe he did not withold him: but delivered him up for us all. That is, God the Father delivered him according to his determinate counſel and foreknowledge, into the hands of wicked men, into the hands of juſtice, and to death itſelf; not for all men, for to all men he does not give Chriſt, and all things freely with him, nor are all delivered from condemnation and death by him; wherefore if he was delivered up for all men, he muſt be delivered up in vain for ſome; but for us all, or all us, whom he foreknew, predeſtinated, called, juſtified, and glorified; and not merely as a martyr, or by way of example only, and for their good, but as their ſurety and ſubſtitute, in their room and ſtead: wherefore how ſhall he not with him freely give us all things? Chriſt is God's free gift to his elect; he is given to be a covenant to them, an head over them, a ſaviour of them, and as the bread of life for them to live upon: he's freely given; God could never have been compelled to have given him; Chriſt could never have been merited by them; nothing that they could give or do, could have laid him under obligation to have beſtowed him on them; yea, ſuch were the perſons, and ſuch their characters, for whom he delivered him up, that he might have juſtly ſtirred up all his wrath againſt them; and yet ſuch was his grace, that he has given his own Son unto them; and not him alone, but all things with him: all temporal good things, needful and convenient; all ſpiritual bleſſings, a juſtifying righteouſneſs, pardon of ſin, ſanctifying grace, adoption, and eternal life: and all freely, in a ſovereign way, according to his own good will and pleaſure, without any obligation or compulſion; not grudgingly nor niggardly, but chearfully and bountifully, abſolutely, and without any conditions; for he is not moved thereunto by any thing in them, or performed by them.

Ver. 33. Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? &c.] The elect of God, are a certain ſelect number of perſons, whom he has ſo loved, as of his ſovereign good will and pleaſure, to chuſe in Chriſt before the foundation of the world, unto eternal life and ſalvation, by certain ways and means of his own appointing, as ſanctification and faith, ſo that they are peculiarly his: but are theſe perſons chargeable with nothing criminal? yes, with Adam's ſin; with a want of original righteouſneſs; with multitudes of ſins before converſion, ſome of them with very great ones; and all even after converſion, with frequent infirmities and backſlidings: and will none riſe up and exhibit charges of this nature againſt them? yes, enow; they very often bring charges againſt themſelves; they are very apt to charge one another; ſatan, the accuſer of the brethren, lays many things to their charge very frequently, and ſo do the men of the world; but all theſe charges avail nothing, ſince none of the divine perſons, Father, Son, and Spirit, lay any thing againſt them: not God the Father, for it is God that juſtifieth; he againſt whom ſin is committed, who is the lawgiver, and the righteous judge, juſtifies them from every charge; not by teaching them the way of juſtification, nor by infuſing rigteouſneſs into them, or on account of any works of righteouſneſs done by them, but by pronouncing them righteous, through the imputation of the righteouſneſs of his Son unto them: obſerve, that God's elect, as ſuch, are the objects of juſtification; which proves the eternity of it; the ſpecialty of it, as belonging to particular perſons, and the everlaſting ſecurity and continuance of it.

Ver. 34. Who is he that condemneth, &c.] That is, the elect of God: all mankind are deſerving of condemnation, and are under the ſentence of it, as in Adam; ſome are fore-ordained to condemnation; all in final impenitence and unbelief, are condemned already; and the whole world of the ungodly will be condemned at the laſt day; but none of God's elect are, or ſhall be condemned: for they are loved with an everlaſting love; they are choſen unto ſalvation; they are in Chriſt, where there's no condemnation; they are brought to believe in him, and by him are juſtified from all ſin, and ſo are ſecure from condemnation. They are indeed deſerving of it as others, conſidered in themſelves; and are under the ſentence of it, as in Adam, with the reſt of mankind; and in their own apprehenſions, when convinced of ſin, righteouſneſs, and judgment. And are there none that will condemn them? yes, their own hearts often condemn them; they are very forward to condemn one another; the world condemns them, and ſo does the god of it: but neither Father, Son, nor Spirit, will condemn them; not the Father, for he juſtifies; nor the Son, for it is Chriſt that died: that he died is certain; the death he died was the death of the croſs; the perſons he died for were God's elect; the reaſon of his dying for them, was to make atonement for their ſins; this came to paſs, through his ſubſtitution in their room and ſtead; this death of his was but once, yet of an eternal efficacy; and ſo a full ſecurity of them, from all condemnation: for ſin, the cauſe of condemnation, was removed by it; the condemnation itſelf was bore by Chriſt in their ſtead; the law and juſtice of God were ſatiſfied by it; pardon of ſin was procured by his blood; and compleat juſtification obtained by his active and paſſive obedience; all which is confirmed by his reſurrection, ſeſſion at God's right-hand, and interceſſion: wherefore 'tis added, yea, rather that is riſen again. As the death, ſo the reſurrection of Chriſt, is the ſecurity of God's elect from condemnation; inaſmuch as Chriſt roſe again, as a conqueror over death, and over ſin, the ſting of death, and over ſatan, who had the power of death; and alſo as a ſurety, having given ſatisfaction to law and juſtice: he engaged as a ſurety for his people; God in juſtice, and according to his righteous law, dealt with him, and by him as ſuch; he ſatisfied both, and therefore was ſet free by them; hence neither law nor juſtice can condemn; beſides, he roſe again as a common perſon, head and repreſentative of his people, and for their juſtification: he firſt ſtood charged with all their ſins, which by his Father, and with his own conſent, were imputed to him; he was condemned and ſuffered death for them; when he roſe from the dead, he was juſtified and acquitted from them all; and all his people were juſtified in him, and with him: yea, the reſurrection of Chriſt, is rather a greater ſecurity from condemnation, than his death; Chriſt's death expiated ſin, but his reſurrection brought in the everlaſting righteouſneſs; notwithſtanding Chriſt's death, had he not riſen again, we ſhould have been in our ſins, and ſo liable to condemnation; Chriſt's dying ſhewed, that he was arreſted and condemned, but his reſurrection ſhews that he is diſcharged, and we in him: who is even at the right-hand of God. The aſcenſion of Chriſt, his entrance into heaven, and ſeſſion at the right-hand of God, are alſo a very conſiderable ſecurity of God's elect from condemnation; for when he aſcended from earth to heaven in human nature, accompanied by angels, of which they and his diſciples were witneſſes, he led captivity captive, or triumphed over thoſe that led his people captive, as ſin, ſatan, the law, death, and every other enemy of theirs; he entered into heaven to prepare it for them, to take poſſeſſion of it in their name, to appear in the preſence of God for them, and as having obtained the eternal redemption of them; where he was received with a welcome, as the ſurety and head of the choſen ones, and then ſat down at the right-hand of God; which ſhews that he had done his work, and to ſatisfaction, is advanced above all, power is given to him, all things are put under him, and he is head over all things to the church: and ſince he is at the right-hand of God, as an advocate and interceſſor for his people, it will be to no purpoſe, and of no avail, that ſatan, or any other enemy, is at their right-hand to reſiſt them: who alſo maketh interceſſion for us; which is done, not by vocal prayer, as in the days of his fleſh on earth; or as ſupplicating an angry judge; or as controverting a point in the court of heaven; but by the appearance of his perſon for us, by the preſentation of his ſacrifice, by offering up the prayers and praiſes of his people, by declaring it as his will, that ſuch and ſuch bleſſings be beſtowed upon them, and by ſeeing to it, that the benefits of his death are applied to thoſe, for whom they were deſigned; which interceſſion of Chriſt, proceeds upon the foot of a ſatisfaction made; it always continues, and is ever prevalent, and ſo has a conſiderable influence to ſecure from condemnation. The Apoſtle in this verſe, ſeems to have in view a paſſage in Job xxxiv. 29. which the Septuagint render, and he gives peace, and who is he that condemneth?

Ver. 35. Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? &c.] By the love of Chriſt, is not meant the ſaints love to Chriſt, but his love to them; he is indeed the object of their love, and ſo ſtrong is their love to him, that it can never be deſtroyed; for though there may be an abatement in the fervour of it, it can never be loſt; yet this is never called the love of Chriſt: beſides, the Apoſtle is ſpeaking not of their love to Chriſt, but of the love of God and Chriſt to them, throughout the context; and his deſign is, to ſtrengthen the faith of God's people, and comfort their ſouls, under their various afflictions: now nothing more effectually ſerves ſuch purpoſes, than the love of Chriſt; and the things here inſtanced in are ſuch, as are apt to inject doubts and fears, about intereſt in the love of Chriſt, and of the love of God in Chriſt, as it is interpreted in ſome following verſes: moreover, the ſeparation here interrogated, is not of Chriſt from us, but of us from him; whereas was it our love to Chriſt, which is here meant, it ſhould rather have been put, who ſhall ſeparate him from us, and not us from the love of Chriſt? That Chriſt does love the elect of God, who are the perſons here ſpoken of, is evident from his undertaking for them, eſpouſing their perſons, aſſuming their nature, dying in their room and ſtead, paying off their debts, and redeeming their perſons, by going to prepare a place for them, by interceding for them, by ſupplying them with all grace, and uſing them in the moſt free and familiar manner; which love of his is wonderful, matchleſs, and unconceivable, ſpecial and peculiar, free and undeſerved, exceeding affectionate, unchangeable, durable, and for ever. This is the bond of union to Chriſt; and the union which is made by it, is exceeding near and cloſe; it is real, perfect, and indiſſoluble, nothing can ſeparate from it: not tribulation; or affliction, which ſprings from his love, and is the fruit of it; and notwithſtanding that, he reſts in his love; this is not taken away, but is often ſenſibly enjoyed, in the midſt of afflictions: or diſtreſs; whether of body or mind; ſtraitneſs in the affairs and circumſtances of life, or ſtraitneſs of mind, in the exerciſe of grace, and diſcharge of duty; for though we believe not, yet he abides faithful, to his covenant and promiſes: or perſecution; from the world; for this is rather an evidence that Chriſt has loved them, choſen and called them, becauſe the world hates them: or famine; want of the neceſſaries of life, as food and drink; being expoſed to great hunger and thirſt, which has ſometimes been the lot of the dear children of God: or nakedneſs; want of proper cloathing, or the uſe of common apparel; wandering about in ſheep-ſkins and goats-ſkins, which has been the caſe of ſome, of whom the world was not worthy, and ſo no proof of ſeparation from the love of Chriſt: or peril; dangers from different quarters, by different perſons and ways; ſuch as the Apoſtle Paul had trial of, who was highly in the love of Chriſt, 2 Cor. xi. 26. Or ſword; that is, death by the ſword; which death James the brother of John died: now, though this may ſeparate the head from the body, and ſeparate ſoul and body, yet can't ſeparate from the love of Chriſt.

Ver. 36. As it is written, for thy ſake we are killed, &c.] This paſſage is a citation out of Pſal. xliv. 22. and the meaning is, that for the ſake of God, and his pure worſhip, Old Teſtament ſaints were frequently put to death, or expoſed to the perſecutions of men, which often iſſued in death; as New Teſtament ſaints have been, for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel, even all the day long; that is, they were liable to death all the day long; or every day, one or other of them was put to death: we are accounted as ſheep for the ſlaughter; they were reckoned as fit for nothing elſe, and were continually expoſed unto it; were uſed as ſheep are, as if they were made for no other uſe and ſervice, but to be ſlaughtered: hence they are called, the flock of ſlaughter; and as this expreſſes the brutality of their perſecutors, ſo their harmleſſneſs, meekneſs, humility, and patience in ſufferings, being under them like lambs or ſheep. This teſtimony is produced, to ſhow that ſuffering death has been the common lot of the ſaints in all ages; and is deſigned to animate the people of God under the Goſpel diſpenſation, to ſuffer with chearfulneſs: the alluſion may be to the lambs and ſheep daily ſlain for ſacrifice; either to the lambs of the ſacrifice ſlain morning and evening; or to others that were ſlain in any part of the day from morning to night, for other ſacrifices, in the court of the tabernacle and temple.

Ver. 37. Nay, in all theſe things, &c.] The former words being inſerted in a parentheſis, theſe are an anſwer to the queſtion in ver. 35. who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? ſhall tribulation? &c. nay; it ſhall not, nor any of the other things mentioned: in all theſe things; afflictions, diſtreſſes, perſecutions, famine, nakedneſs, ſword, or any other thing of the ſame kind: we are more than conquerors; not only over ſin and ſatan, but the world, the reproaches, afflictions and perſecutions of it; which they chearfully and couragiouſly undergo, inſomuch that they are not only conquerors, but more than conquerors; they have above overcome, they have exceedingly the better of it; for they not only patiently bear afflictions and perſecutions, but they glory in them; their experience, faith, and joy, are often increaſed by them; they have ſometimes ſolicited, and even wearied their perſecutors; they have got the victory with eaſe, over ſatan and his helliſh emiſſaries, by the blood of the Lamb, and the word of their teſtimony: but this is not owing to themſelves, or through their own ſtrength, but through him that loved us; meaning either God the Father, whoſe love is mentioned in the following verſes, or rather the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and ſo ſome copies expreſs it, through Chriſt that loved us: through him, who has got the victory over all his and his people's enemies, and makes them ſharers in his conqueſts; through him, who is able to help them, and has ſtrength ſufficient to carry them through, and brings them off more than conquerors; who has loved them, ſtill loves them, and whoſe love engages his power to ſtand by them and protect them, againſt all their enemies.

Ver. 38. For I am perſuaded, that neither death, &c.] Theſe words with the following, expreſs the ſtrong perſuaſion, and full aſſurance of faith the Apoſtle had, that nothing whatever could ſeparate him and the reſt of God's people, from his love towards them in Chriſt Jeſus. This perſuaſion not only regards himſelf, but others; and is not conjectural, but certain; and which did not ariſe from any ſpecial and extraordinary revelation, but is founded upon the nature of the love of God itſelf, the ſecurity of it in Chriſt, and of the perſons of God's elect in him; upon eternal predeſtination, and the unalterable purpoſes of God; upon the promiſe and oath of God; upon adoption, and the gracious witneſſings, aſſiſtances, and inhabitation of the Spirit; and is greatly increaſed, by the conſideration of the death, reſurrection, and interceſſion of Chriſt. The things enumerated, which are not able to ſeparate from the love of God, are as follow: death; death ſeparates men from the world, their worldly habitations and ſubſtance; it ſeparates the ſoul from the body, and one friend from another; and in proceſs of time, may take off all thoughts and affections for departed friends, but it is not able to ſeparate from the love of God; it is ſo far from it, that it lets the ſoul into the fulleſt enjoyment of it: and as corporal death, ſo no other kind of death can do it; for if the death of the body can't, the death of afflictions never can; and as for a moral or ſpiritual death, and an eternal one, theſe ſhall never befal the children of God: nor life; this natural and temporal life, which is frail and mortal; the love of God is better than this life, and this itſelf is the effect of divine favour; wherefore this can never ſeparate from the love of God, nor any thing in it: the life of believers is indeed filled up with troubles and exerciſes, and attended with much imperfection and ſin; but nothing does, or can alienate the affections of God from his children; for though he exerciſes them with the trials of life, and chaſtizes them for their ſins, yet his loving kindneſs he does not take away from them: nor angels; by whom are meant, evil angels, the devils; for as for good angels, they never attempt to ſeparate God and his people; they rejoice at their good, miniſter to them, are their guardians whilſt here, at death they carry their ſouls to heaven, and at the laſt day will gather all the elect together: but evil angels do endeavour it, by temptations to ſin, and accuſations for it; by ſtirring up hereſies and perſecutions, in order to deſtroy them, but cannot ſucceed; for the ſaints are upon God's heart, are in Chriſt's hands, and on him the rock; and the Spirit of God is in them, who is greater than he that is in the world: nor principalities; civil magiſtrates; who though they may ſeparate them from their company, and caſt them out as evil; may ſeparate them in priſons one from another; and ſeparate ſoul and body, by killing the latter, which is all they can do; yet they can't ſeparate neither ſoul nor body from the love of God: the Jews often ſay, that if all the nations of the world were gathered together, they could not extinguiſh [n] or cauſe to ceaſe [o], or take away the love which is between God and his people Iſrael [p]: nor powers; either the ſame with the former; or falſe teachers who had a power of working miracles in confirmation of their doctrines, by which they deceived many; and if it had been poſſible, would have deceived the elect of God, but that was impoſſible: nor things preſent; preſent evils, the afflictions of the preſent life; God does not ceaſe to love when he afflicts his people; yea, afflictions ſpring from his love, and in them he afreſh manifeſts his love to them; they are over-ruled for their good, and iſſue in eternal glory. Preſent temptations alſo may be meant. The beſt of ſaints have been expoſed unto them; Chriſt himſelf was not exempted from them; theſe don't, nor can't ſeparate from the love of God; which is manifeſt from the regard which God and Chriſt have to tempted ones, by ſympathizing with them, ſupporting and ſuccouring of them, rebuking the tempter, and delivering from them. Preſent deſertions, or the hidings of God's face, which often is the caſe of his dear children, can have no ſuch effect; their relation to God ſtill continues; they have great nearneſs unto him, are engraven on the palms of his hands, are ſet as a ſeal on his heart, and he bears a ſtrong affection to them; tho' for wiſe reaſons, he is pleaſed for a moment to hide himſelf from them: yea, the preſent body of ſin and death ſaints carry about with them in this life, can't ſeparate them; ſin has ſeparated the angels from God, who rebelled againſt him; it drove Adam out of the garden of Eden, and will exclude the wicked from the divine preſence to all eternity; and it often ſeparates between God and his own people, with reſpect to communion, but never with reſpect to union to him, or intereſt in him; for he knew what they would be when he ſet his love upon them; his love broke thro' all the corruptions of nature and ſins of life in their converſion; and appears to continue the ſame from the ſtrong expreſſions of his grace to them, notwithſtanding all their backſlidings; could ſin ſeparate in this ſenſe, no one would remain the object of his love. Now this does not ſuppoſe that God loves ſin, nor does it give any encouragement to it; for tho' it cannot ſeparate from intereſt in God, yet it often does from the enjoyment of him. Again, preſent good things may be deſigned, the good things of this life, temporal enjoyments; theſe are given in love; and tho' they may be but few, they are in mercy, and with a bleſſing; and the great mercy of all is, that theſe are not their all, nor do they take off their value and eſteem for the love of God, which is better to them than all the things of life; and tho' the proſperity of fools ſhall deſtroy them, the proſperity of the ſaints ſhall never be their ruine: nor things to come; whether good or bad, proſperous or adverſe; more afflictions, freſh difficulties with the body of ſin; an hour of temptation, and time of diſtreſs that is to come upon all the earth; or the evil days of old age; God will never leave, nor forſake his people, or cauſe his loving kindneſs to depart from them, in whatſoever ſtate or condition they may come into: the Vulgate Latin verſion adds, nor fortitude; and the Ethiopic verſion, nor powers; and one copy adds it in the beginning of the next verſe, nor power.

Ver. 39. Nor height, nor depth, &c.] Neither heaven, earth, nor hell, nor any of the inhabitants of either, or any thing in either; no high or low place, to be caſt down from the one, or into the other; nor the height of honour and proſperity, or the depth of meanneſs and adverſity; nor the height of power, or depth of policy in men or devils: nor any other creature. This takes in the whole compaſs of created beings in heaven, earth, and ſea; and moſt ſtrongly expreſſes the inſeparableneſs of the ſaints from the love of God, by any thing or creature whatever; nothing in the whole univerſe ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God, which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord: by the love of God, is not meant the ſaints love to God; for tho' this is ſometimes called the love of God, it is from him, as the author of it, and to him, as the object of it, and may be ſaid to be in Chriſt, or by him, and can never be loſt; yet the Apoſtle would not have expreſſed ſuch a ſtrong confidence and full perſuaſion about this, and would rather have ſaid, had this been his meaning, that nothing ſhall be able to ſeparate our love from God, or God from our love, and not us from the love of God; beſides, he is ſpeaking of that love by which we are more than conquerors, and manifeſtly intends the love with which God loves his people, particularly the love of God the Father: and this is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord; he has expreſſed it in and thro' Chriſt, in chuſing and bleſſing them in him, and in ſending him to die for them; and it ſtill continues in him, and is in him as their Lord, head, huſband, and redeemer; and is a reaſon why nothing can ſeparate them from it: which is to be underſtood, not of the effects of love, and the application of it, which may be ſuſpended for a time; nor of the manifeſtation and ſenſe of it, which believers may be without for a while; nor of any ſort of ſeparation from God, for ſaints themſelves may be ſeparated from him, with reſpect to intimate ſenſible communion and fellowſhip; but the ſenſe of this paſſage is, that they can never be ſeparated from the love of God, ſo as that that union which is made by it between God and them can ever be diſſolved, or they ceaſe to have any ſhare or intereſt in his love. This the Apoſtle was perſuaded could never be.

CHAP. IX.

THE Apoſtle having diſcourſed of juſtification and ſanctification, and of the privileges of juſtified and ſanctified ones, proceeds to treat of predeſtination, the ſource and ſpring of all the bleſſings of grace; and to obſerve how this diſtinguiſhing act of God's ſovereign will has taken place, both among Jews and Gentiles; in treating of which, he knew he ſhould go contrary to the ſenſe of his countrymen the Jews, who have a notion that all Iſrael ſhall have a part in, or inherit the world to come [q]; and that the Gentiles will be for ever miſerable; and nothing were more diſagreeable to them, than to talk of their rejection of God, and the calling of the Gentiles; wherefore that it might be manifeſt, that it was not out of pique and ill will to them, that the Apoſtle ſaid the things hereafter related; he expreſſes the moſt cordial affection to them imaginable, and which he introduces in ver. 1. by way of appeal to Chriſt, who knew the truth of what he was about to ſay, and who could, together with the Spirit of God and his own conſcience, teſtify for him that it was no lye: the thing he appeals for the truth of, is in ver. 2. that the ſalvation of the Jews lay near his heart; that it was no pleaſure to him to think or ſpeak of their rejection, but was what gave him continual pain and uneaſineſs: and his great deſire for their good is expreſſed in a very ſtrong and uncommon manner, ver. 3. the reaſons of it are partly the relation they ſtood in to him, being his brethren and kinſmen; and partly the many privileges they had been favoured with of God; an enumeration of which is given, ver. 4, 5. and foreſeeing an objection, he prevents it, which might be made, that if the Jews were caſt off, the promiſe of God to that people that he would be their God, would become void, and the preaching the Goſpel of Chriſt to them of no effect; to which he anſwers, by diſtinguiſhing between Iſrael and Iſrael, or the elect of God among them, and thoſe that were not; wherefore tho' the latter were rejected according to the purpoſe of God, the promiſe and preaching of the word had their effect in the former, ver. 6. and that there was ſuch a diſtinction, he proves from the two ſons of Abraham, Iſaac and Iſhmael, who were both Abraham's ſeed; yet one was a child of promiſe, and the other a child of the fleſh, and were emblematical of the children of the promiſe, and the children of the fleſh among that people; ver. 7, 8, 9, 10. and further confirms this by the inſtance of Jacob and Eſau, who were born of the ſame parents, and were twins; and yet one was in the favour of God, and the other not; and that this was owing not to works, but to the ſovereign will of God in election, he proves by obſerving that this was before good or evil were done by either of them, ver. 11. and that this was notified to Rebekah before, ver. 12. as appears from a paſſage in Gen. xxv. 23. and by another paſſage in Mal. i. 2, 3. which is cited, ver. 13. then an objection is ſtarted, ver. 14. that if God loves one, and hates another, both being in equal circumſtances, as Jacob and Eſau were, he muſt be guilty of unrighteouſneſs; which he anſwers and removes, firſt by a deteſtation of ſuch a charge againſt God, and then by producing teſtimonies out of the books of Moſes, proving both election and reprobation, as being not of the works of men, but of the will of God; the former of theſe he proves, ver. 15. from Exod. xxxiii. 19. by which it appears, that the choice of men to ſalvation is not according to the will of man, but according to the grace and love of God, ver. 16. the latter he proves by the caſe of Pharaoh, ver. 17. and the ſcripture relating to that, Exod. ix. 16. and from both teſtimonies concludes, ver. 18. that God's having mercy on one, and hardening another, are according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure: then another objection riſes up, if ſo, God has no reaſon to find fault with men that are hardened in ſin, ſince they are according to his will, and in ſinning do but fulfil it, and which no man reſiſts; and this objection is formed in a very pert and ſneering manner, and inſinuates that God is cruel and acts unreaſonably, ver. 19. to which he anſwers, by putting the objector in mind that he was a man, a mere creature that ſtarted it, and that it was God, againſt whom it was made; and by obſerving the folly and madneſs of replying againſt God, and the abſurdity of ſuch a procedure, taken from the conſideration of the one being a creature, and the other the creator, ver. 20. and by inſtancing in the caſe of the potter, who has power over his clay, to form it in what ſhape, and for what uſe he pleaſes, ver. 21. and accommodates this, both to the affair of election and reprobation, and to the buſineſs of the latter firſt, ver. 22. where he obſerves the end of God in it to ſhew forth his power and wrath, and deſcribes the ſubjects of it, which clears him from injuſtice, and points at the patience of God towards them, which frees him from the charge of cruelty, ver. 22. and then proceeds to apply the metaphor before uſed, to the objects of election ſtiled veſſels of mercy, and the end of the Lord to manifeſt the riches of his glory in them, and the method he takes to bring them to eternal happineſs, by preparing them for it by grace, ver. 23. which is done in effectual vocation, the objects of which are both Jews and Gentiles, ver. 24. That it is the will of God that the Gentiles ſhould be called, he proves, ver. 25, 26. from ſome paſſages in Hoſea, chap. ii. 23. and i. 10. and that God had choſen, and ſo would call ſome among the Jews, he clearly makes appear, ver. 27, 28, 29. from ſome prophecies of Iſaiah, chap. x. 22, 23. and i. 10. and then he concludes the chapter by obſerving the free and diſtinguiſhing grace of God, in the calling of the Gentiles, and the juſtification of them by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; that ſuch who were far off from it, and ſought not after it, ſhould enjoy it, ver. 30. when the Iſraelites, who were diligent and zealous in ſeeking after a righteouſneſs to juſtify them before God, yet did not arrive to one, ver. 31. the reaſons of which are given, ver. 32. becauſe it was not the righteouſneſs of faith, or the righteouſneſs of Chriſt received by faith they ſought; but a legal one, and by works which can never be attained by ſinful men: they ſought after a wrong righteouſneſs, and in a wrong way, becauſe they ſtumbled at Chriſt, and rejected him and his righteouſneſs; and this removes an objection which is ſuggeſted in the two preceding verſes, that God is unrighteous in calling the Gentiles, who never ſought after righteouſneſs, and in rejecting the Jews that followed after one: and that they did ſtumble at Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, is no other than what was foretold in Iſ. viii. 14. and that whoever believes in Chriſt, whether Jew or Gentile ſhall be ſaved, he ſuggeſts is a doctrine agreeable to Iſ. xxviii. 16. which paſſages are referred to, ver. 33.

Ver. 1. I ſay the truth in Chriſt, I lye not, &c.] The Apoſtle being about to diſcourſe concerning predeſtination, which he had mentioned in the preceding chapter, and to open the ſprings and cauſes of it, and alſo concerning the induration and rejection of the Jewiſh nation; he thought it neceſſary to preface his account of theſe things, with ſome ſtrong aſſurances of his great attachment to that people, and his affection for them, leſt it ſhould be thought he ſpoke out of prejudice to them; and well knowing in what ſituation he ſtood in with them, on account of his preaching up the abrogation of the ceremonial law, and how difficult it might be for him to obtain their belief in what he ſhould ſay, he introduces it with a ſolemn oath, I ſay the truth in Chriſt, I lye not: which refers not to what he had ſaid in the foregoing chapter, but to what he was going to ſay; and is all one as if he had ſaid, as I am in Chriſt, a converted perſon, one born again, and renewed in the ſpirit of my mind, what I am about to ſpeak is truth, and no lye; or I ſwear by Chriſt the God of truth, who is truth itſelf, and I appeal to him as the true God, the ſearcher of hearts, that what I now deliver is truth, and nothing but truth, and has no falſhood in it. This both ſhews that the taking of an oath is lawful, and that Chriſt is truly God, by whom only perſons ought to ſwear: my conſcience bearing me witneſs. The Apoſtle, beſides his appeal to Chriſt, calls his conſcience to witneſs to the truth of his words; and this is as a thouſand witneſſes; there is in every man a conſcience, which unleſs ſeared as with a red hot iron, will accuſe or excuſe, and bear a faithful teſtimony to words and actions; and eſpecially a conſcience enlightened, cleanſed, and ſanctified by the Spirit of God, as was the Apoſtle's: hence he adds, in the Holy Ghoſt; meaning either that his conſcience was influenced and directed by the Holy Ghoſt in what he was about to ſay; or it bore witneſs in and with the Holy Ghoſt, and the Holy Ghoſt with that; ſo that here are three witneſſes called in, Chriſt, conſcience and the Holy Ghoſt; and by three ſuch witneſſes, his words muſt be thought to be well eſtabliſhed.

Ver. 2. That I have great heavineſs and continual ſorrow in my heart.] This is the thing he appeals to Chriſt for the truth of, and calls in his conſcience and the Holy Ghoſt to bear witneſs to. Theſe two words, heavineſs and ſorrow, the one ſignifies grief, which had brought on heavineſs on his ſpirits; and the other ſuch pain as a woman in travail feels: and the trouble of his mind expreſſed by both, is deſcribed by its quantity great, it was not a little, but much; by its quality it was internal, it was in his heart, it did not lie merely in outward ſhow, in a few words or tears, but was in his heart, it was a heart ſorrow; and by its duration continual, it was not a ſudden emotion or paſſion, but what had been long in him, and had deeply affected and greatly depreſſed him: and what was the reaſon of all this? it is not expreſſed, but may pretty eaſily be underſtood; it was becauſe of the obſtinacy of his countrymen the Jews, the hardneſs of their hearts, and their wilful rejection of the Meſſiah; their truſting to their own righteouſneſs, to the neglect and contempt of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which he knew muſt unavoidably iſſue in their eternal deſtruction; alſo what greatly affected his mind was the utter rejection of them, as the people of God, and the judicial blindneſs, and hardneſs of heart, he full well knew was coming upon them, and which he was about to break unto them.

Ver. 3. For I could wiſh that myſelf were accurſed from Chriſt, &c.] Some conſider this as the reaſon of the Apoſtle's great heavineſs, and continual ſorrow of heart, becauſe he had made ſuch a wiſh as this, and read the words, for I have wiſhed, or did wiſh; that is, in my unregenerate ſtate, whilſt I was a perſecutor of Chriſt, and a blaſphemer of his name, I wiſhed to be for ever ſeparated from him, and to have nothing to do with him; for then I thought I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jeſus, and this I did out of reſpect to the Jewiſh nation, and becauſe I would not relinquiſh the Jewiſh religion; but oh! what a trouble of mind is it to me? what uneaſineſs does it give me when I think of it, and reflect upon it? But this can never be the Apoſtle's meaning, for he would never have appealed to Chriſt in ſo ſolemn a manner, and took an oath upon it, for the truth of his enmity to Chriſt, and alienation from him before converſion, which every body knew; nor was it any thing ſtrange, that whilſt he was an unbelieving Jew, he ſhould wiſh himſelf ſeparated from Jeſus of Nazareth, and always to remain ſo; and his having done this before his embracing of Chriſtianity, could be no evidence of his preſent affection for the Jewiſh nation, eſpecially ſince he repented of it, and was ſorry for it. But this wiſh, whatever is meant by it, is mentioned as an inſtance of his great love to his countrymen the Jews. Many have thought that his meaning is, that he had ſo great a value for them, that he could even wiſh himſelf, and be content to be eternally ſeparated from Chriſt, everlaſtingly baniſhed from his preſence, never to enjoy communion more with him, or in other words, to be eternally damned, that they might be ſaved. But this is what could never be, and which he knew was impoſſible to be done, and was contrary to that ſtrong perſuaſion, he had juſt expreſſed in the cloſe of the foregoing chapter. Nor is it conſiſtent with his love to Chriſt, to wiſh any thing of this kind; it would make him to love the Jews much better than Chriſt; ſince, according to this ſenſe, he muſt wiſh to be parted from him, that they might be ſaved, and conſequently muſt love them more than Chriſt: nor is it conſiſtent with, but even contrary both to the principles of nature and grace; it is contrary to the principles of nature, for a man to deſire his own damnation upon any conſideration whatever; and it is contrary to the principle of grace, which always ſtrongly inclines to be with Chriſt, and not ſeparated from him; in a word, to be accurſed from Chriſt in this ſenſe, could be no proper means of the ſalvation of the Jews, and therefore it cannot be thought to be deſireable, or wiſhed for. Some things are ſaid indeed for the qualifying of this ſenſe of the words, as that the Apoſtle ſaid this inconſiderately, when he was ſcarcely himſelf, thro' an extaſy of mind, and intemperate zeal, and an overflow of affection for his nation; but this is highly to reflect upon the Apoſtle, and to repreſent him in a very unworthy manner, when tis certain he ſaid this with the greateſt deliberation and ſeriouſneſs; he introduces it in the moſt ſolemn manner, with an appeal to Chriſt, the holy Spirit, and his own conſcience, and therefore it could never drop from him thro' incogitancy, and an overheated affection. Again, tis ſaid, that this wiſh was made with a condition, if it was the will of God, but that he knew was not; or if it could be for the good of theſe people, this alſo he knew it could never be: the beſt qualification of it is to ſay tis an hyperbolical expreſſion; and ſo if it is, it muſt be with a witneſs, being ſuch an hyperbole, as is not to be matched in ſacred or prophane writings. The words of Moſes are thought to be a parallel one, blot me I pray thee out of the book which thou haſt written, Exod. xxxii. 32. but that is not to be underſtood of the book of eternal life; but either of the book of the law, as R. Sol. Jarchi expounds it, which God had ordered him to write, and his deſire is, that his name might not ſtand there; or rather of the book of this temporal life, that he might die and not live. It remains then that theſe words muſt have another meaning. Now let it be obſerved, that the word ἀνάθεμα, here tranſlated accurſed, anſwers to the Hebrew word חרם, which with the Jewiſh writers, is one ſort of excommunication in uſe among them, and the greater ſort; the form of it, as given by them, is very horrible, and ſhocking [r]; ſee the note on John ix. 22. and ſo we may obſerve the word anathema here uſed, is mentioned as a form of excommunication in 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Gal. i. 8, 9. of all ſuch as love not Chriſt and his Goſpel, and make it appear by their principles or practices, or both, that they do not, and ſo ought to be removed from the communion of churches. Now, taking the word in this ſenſe, the Apoſtle's meaning is, that he could wiſh to be excommunicated from Chriſt; that is, from the body of Chriſt, from the church of Chriſt, Chriſt myſtical, as the word Chriſt is uſed, uſed, 1 Cor. xii. 12. to be deprived of the ordinance of Chriſt's houſe, to be degraded from his office in it, and not to be ſo much as a member in it. He ſaw that theſe branches, the people of the Jews, were going to be cut off, and no longer to be of the church of God; and ſuch was his affection to them, that he could have wiſhed rather to be cut off himſelf, that they might be ſpared; and this was an inſtance of great love to them, ſince, next to Chriſt, the church and the ordinances of it were exceeding dear unto, and highly valued by the Apoſtle. Again, tis worthy of obſervation, that the Hebrew word חרם, which the Septuagint render by αναθεμα, the word in the text, is uſed for any thing devoted to God, and which could not be alienated to any other uſe or ſervice; and if it was a man, or any among men that was devoted, it was not to be redeemed, but was ſurely to be put to death, Lev. xxvii. 29. Some have thought that Jepthah's daughter was put to death upon this law; but be that as it will, the Apoſtle here may reaſonably be thought to allude unto it, and his ſenſe be this, that he could wiſh himſelf αναθεμα ειναι απο τȣ Χριςȣ, to be devoted unto death, not from Chriſt, but by Chriſt; and ſome copies read υπο, by: I could wiſh that my dear Lord and maſter, as if he ſhould ſay, would appoint and order me to die, might this nation of mine but eſcape that ruine and deſtruction, I ſee is coming upon them, as a nation and a church; I could be content to die the moſt accurſed death, and be treated in the moſt ignominious manner, might they but be ſaved; a like expreſſion is that of R. Iſhmael[s], בני ישראל אני כפרתן, may I be an expiatory ſacrifice for the children of Iſrael; "which, ſays one commentator[t], he ſaid, מתוך חבתן, "becauſe of his love to them; and it is as if he "ſhould ſay, all the puniſhment which is right to "come upon them, I will take it on myſelf, in "order to atone for them;" and ſays another[u], the "ſenſe is, he took upon him their redemption, and "this he ſaid, לרוב אהבתו, becauſe of the greatneſs "of his love:" now for a man to die for his country, that a whole nation periſh not, was agreeable to the ſentiments both of Jews and Gentiles, and was the higheſt inſtance of love among men; greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends; and this is carrying the ſenſe of the Apoſtle's wiſh high enough, and not too far. The perſons on whoſe account he could have expreſſed this wiſh, are deſcribed by their natural relation to him, my brethren, my kinſmen, according to the fleſh: he calls them his brethren, not in a ſpiritual ſenſe, nor in a ſtrict natural ſenſe, but in a general way, as being of the ſame nation: it is a ſaying with the Jews[w], כל ישראל אחים, all the Iſraelites are brethren; for the ſame reaſon he calls them kinſmen; and theſe appellations he uſes to remove that ill-will and prejudice they had conceived in their minds againſt him, and to ſignify the ground of his affection for them: and he adds, according to the fleſh, to diſtinguiſh them from his ſpiritual brethren and relations; for tho' they were brethren in a national ſenſe, they were not all ſo in a ſpiritual relation.

Ver. 4. Who are Iſraelites, &c.] Which were their national name, as deſcended from Jacob, whoſe name was Iſrael; and it was accounted a very honourable one; ſee Phil. iii. 5. 2 Cor. xi. 22. and the very name they bore, gave the Apoſtle ſome concern that they ſhould be cut off; and then he proceeds to enumerate the ſeveral diſtinguiſhing favours and priviledges they had been partakers of: to whom pertaineth the adoption; not that ſpecial adoption, which ſprings from eternal predeſtination, is a bleſſing of the covenant of grace, comes thro' the redemption of Chriſt, and is received and enjoyed only by believers in him; for all that were Iſraelites, were not in this ſenſe the children of God; but national adoption is here meant, by which the whole body of that people, as a nation, were the ſons of God, his firſt-born: and the glory; either the ark of the covenant, which is ſo called in Pſal. lxiii. 2. according to Kimchi; or the clouds in the tabernacle and temple, which were called the glory of the Lord, and were ſymbols of his preſence, the ſame with the Shechinah; and ſo Aben Ezra interprets power, the ark, and glory, the Shechinah, Pſal. lxiii. 2. and the covenants; not the two Teſtaments, Old and New, but the covenant of circumciſion, made with Abraham their father, and the covenant at Sinai they entred into with the Lord; ſome copies, and the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions read, the covenant: and the giving of the law; מתן תורה, a way of ſpeaking the[x] Jews make uſe of when they take notice of this privilege; for it was peculiarly given to them with great ſolemnity by God himſelf, thro' the diſpoſition of angels into the hands of Moſes the mediator, and by him to them; and on account of this, they reckoned themſelves more beloved of God than the reſt of mankind[y]: and the ſervice of God; or the ſervice, as in the Greek text. So the Jews[z] are uſed to call it עבודה, the ſervice; and falſe worſhip is called by them עבודה זרה, ſtrange ſervice, which is the title of one of their Miſnic tracts; and here it ſignifies the whole worſhip of God, in the whole compaſs of it, ſacrifices, prayer, praiſe, &c. daily, weekly, monthly, and yearly: and the promiſes; both temporal and ſpiritual, eſpecially ſuch as related to the Meſſiah, and which now had their accompliſhment.

Ver. 5. Whoſe are the fathers, &c.] Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob; for according to the[a] Jewiſh writers, "they call none in Iſrael אבות, fathers, "but three, and they are Abraham, Iſaac, and "Jacob; and they call none mothers but four, and "they are, Sarah, Rebeccah, Rachel, and Leah:" their deſcent from theſe fathers was a priviledge, tho' they valued themſelves too highly upon it; but what was the crown and glory of all, and which they took the leaſt, tho' the Apoſtle took the moſt notice of, is, and of whom as concerning the fleſh, Chriſt came; that is, either of the fathers, or of the Iſraelites, from whom Chriſt, according to his human nature, ſprung; being a ſon of Abraham, of the tribe of Judah, of the ſeed of David, and the ſon of Mary; hence the Meſſiah is called משיחא דישראל, the Meſſiah or Chriſt of Iſrael[b]: who is deſcribed as over all, angels and men, being the creator, upholder, and governor of them; and as having another nature, a divine one, being God, truly and properly God, bleſſed for evermore; in himſelf, and to be bleſſed and praiſed by all creatures. The Apoſtle alludes to that well-known periphraſtic name of God, ſo much uſed by the Jews הקדוש ברוך הוא, the holy, bleſſed God; to which by way of aſſent and confirmation, the Apoſtle puts his Amen. Now all theſe particular priviledges are mentioned by him, as what heightened his concern for theſe people; it filled him with heavineſs and ſorrow of heart, when he

Ver. 6. Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect, &c.] Or it is not poſſible indeed that the word of God ſhould fall; ſee 1 Sam. iii. 10. This the Apoſtle ſays, partly to relieve his own mind preſſed with ſorrow, and partly to obviate an objection ſome might make, or prevent any miſtake any might be ready to go into; as though from what he ſuggeſted, that what God had ſaid concerning the people of the Jews, was made void and without effect: for whether by the word of God are meant, the ſcriptures in general, the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, theſe were now about to have their accompliſhment, in the rejection of the Jews, and in the converſion of the Gentiles; or whether by it is deſigned the Goſpel, this, as preached both by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, had had its effect upon God's choſen ones among that people; it was become the power of God unto ſalvation, to the Jew firſt: or rather by it may be intended, God's word of promiſe to Abraham, that he would be a God to him, and to his ſeed after him; and that he and they ſhould be heirs of the world, of this and of that which is to come; particularly the heavenly inheritance, which he gave to him by promiſe; this was not made void, or had taken none effect: for this was made only to Abraham and his ſpiritual ſeed; and therefore though his carnal ſeed believed not, and for their unbelief ſhould be cut off, this did not make the faith, or faithfulneſs of God of none effect: for they are not all Iſrael, which are of Iſrael; that is, they which are the deſcendants of the patriarch Jacob, whoſe name was Iſrael; or who are of the Iſraelitiſh nation, of the ſtock of Iſrael, belonging to that people; they are not all, את ישראל, the Iſrael, by way of emphaſis, as in Pſal. xxv. 22. or the Iſrael of God, Gal. vi. 16. the Iſrael whom Jehovah the Father has choſen, for a peculiar people; which Chriſt has redeemed from all their iniquities; which the Spirit of God calls with an holy calling, by ſpecial grace, to ſpecial privileges; the ſeed of Iſrael who are juſtified in Chriſt, whoſe iniquities are ſo pardoned and done away, that when they are ſought for they ſhall not be found, and who are ſaved in the Lord with an everlaſting ſalvation: or in other words, though they are Iſrael after the fleſh, yet not after the Spirit; though they are by nation Iſraelites, they are not Iſraelites indeed, as Nathaniel was; they are Jews outwardly, not inwardly; they have not all principles of grace, uprightneſs, and ſincerity in them: now to theſe ſpiritual Iſraelites, or ſeed of Abraham, were the word of God, the promiſes of God concerning ſpiritual and eternal things made, and upon theſe they had their effect; and therefore it could not be ſaid, that the word of God had taken none effect; though the whole body of Iſrael after the fleſh were cut off and rejected. Some copies, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, who are Iſraelites; and the Ethiopic verſion, they are not all Iſrael who came out of Egypt.

Ver. 7. Neither becauſe they are the ſeed of Abraham, &c.] The Jews highly valued themſelves, upon being the natural ſeed of Abraham; and fancied upon this account, that they were children, which the Apoſtle here denies: neither are they all children; as in the former verſe, he explains in what ſenſe they were Iſraelites, which he had mentioned among their high characters and privileges, as deſcending from Jacob, and in what ſenſe they were not; ſo in this he ſhews, in what manner the adoption belonged to them, and it did not; being Abraham's ſeed, they were his natural children, and the children of God by national adoption; but they were not all the ſpiritual children of Abraham, nor the children of God by the ſpecial grace of adoption; theſe characters only belonged to ſome of them, and which are equally true of Gentile believers; who being of the ſame faith with Abraham, are his children, his ſeed, and alſo the children of God: natural deſcent from Abraham avails nothing in this caſe, as is clear from the inſtance of Iſhmael and Iſaac. Iſhmael was the natural ſeed of Abraham, as well as Iſaac; but he was not a ſon of Abraham in a ſpiritual ſenſe, nor a child of God; he was not a child of promiſe, this was peculiar to Iſaac: but in Iſaac ſhall thy ſeed be called; ſee Gen. xxi. 12. The meaning of which is, either that the progeny of Abraham in the line of Iſaac, ſhould only be called, accounted, and eſteemed, in an eminent ſenſe, the ſeed of Abraham, and not his poſterity in the line of Iſhmael: agreeable to which the Jews ſay [c], that "Iſhmael is not, בכלל זרעו של אברהם, "in the general account of the ſeed of Abraham; "for it is ſaid, in Iſaac ſhall thy ſeed be called; nor "is Eſau in the general account of the ſeed of "Iſaac; hence ſays R. Joden bar Shalom, in Iſaac, "that is, in part of Iſaac." So another [d] of their writers, on mentioning this paſſage, obſerves, "that "it is ſaid in Iſaac, ולא כל יצחק, but not all "Iſaac;" or all that ſprung from him. Or this has reſpect to the moſt eminent and famous ſeed of Abraham, the Meſſiah, in whom all nations of the earth were to be bleſſed; who was to ſpring from him by Iſaac, in the line of Jacob; and may likewiſe have a perſonal reſpect to Iſaac himſelf, the ſon of the promiſe, a child of Abraham in a ſpiritual ſenſe, when Iſhmael was not; and to whom belonged the ſpiritual promiſes and bleſſings, and who was to be, and was effectually called by the grace of God; and may include alſo his whole ſeed and poſterity, who both natural and ſpiritual, were children of the typical promiſe, the land of Canaan, and the enjoyment of temporal good things; and the latter alſo children of the antitypical promiſe, or of thoſe ſpiritual and eternal things, which God has promiſed to Abraham's ſpiritual ſeed, whether among Jews or Gentiles; and which always have their effect, and had, even when, though Abraham's natural ſeed had a lo ammi written upon them.

Ver. 8. That is, they which are the children of the fleſh, &c.] This is an explanation of the foregoing verſe, and ſhews, that by the ſeed of Abraham are meant, the natural ſeed of Abraham, who are born after the fleſh, or deſcend from him by carnal generation: theſe are not the children of God; that is, not all of them, nor any of them, on account of their being children of the fleſh, or Abraham's natural ſeed; for adoption does not come this way; men don't commence children of God by their fleſhly deſcent; they are not born of blood, but of God, who are the ſons of God: but the children of the promiſe are counted for the ſeed; בני ברית, children of the covenant, is a common phraſe with the Jews; who reckoned themſelves as ſuch, becauſe they were the ſeed of Abraham: thus in their prayers they ſay [e] to God, "we are thy people, "בריתך

"בני בריתך, the children of thy covenant, the "children of Abraham thy friend." And ſo they were the children of the covenant, or promiſe, which God made with Abraham and his natural ſeed, reſpecting the land of Canaan, and their enjoyment of temporal good things in it; but they were not all of them the children of the promiſe, which God made to Abraham and his ſpiritual ſeed, whether Jews or Gentiles, reſpecting ſpiritual and eternal things; to whom alone the promiſes of God, being their God in a ſpiritual ſenſe, of ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation by Chriſt, and of the grace of the Spirit of God, and of eternal life belong; and who are the ſeed which were promiſed to Abraham by God, ſaying, thou ſhalt be a father of many nations; for which reaſons, becauſe theſe ſpiritual promiſes belong to them, and becauſe they themſelves were promiſed to Abraham, as his children, therefore they are called children of the promiſe: or rather, becauſe as Iſaac was a child of promiſe, being born after the Spirit, by virtue of the promiſe of God, through his divine power and goodneſs, when there were no ground or foundation in nature, for Abraham and Sarah to hope for a ſon; ſo theſe are called children of promiſe, becauſe they are born again, not through the power of nature, and ſtrength of their own free-will; they are not born of the will of the fleſh, nor of the will of man, but of God, according to the will of God and his abundant mercy, by the word of truth, through his power, Spirit, and grace; and by faith receive the promiſes made unto them; and are counted and reckoned as Abraham's ſeed, and heirs according to the promiſe, whether they be Jews, or whether they be Gentiles: and ſince now the promiſes of God are all made good to theſe perſons, the word of God is not without effect, or is not made void, by the caſting off the children of the fleſh, or the carnal ſeed of Abraham, who were not children of the promiſe in the ſenſe now given.

Ver. 9. For this is the word of promiſe, &c.] The following paſſage is the ſcripture, which contains the promiſe concerning the birth of Iſaac; which was the produce, not of nature, but of divine grace and power; and was typical of the regeneration of God' elect, who as Iſaac was, are the children of promiſe, Gal. iv. 28. for as Iſhmael was a type of them that are born after the fleſh, and are carnal men, ſo Iſaac was a type of thoſe, who are born after the Spirit, and are ſpiritual men: the promiſe is, at this time will I come, and Sarah ſhall have a ſon; the paſſage referred to, is in Gen. xviii. 10. which there ſtands thus, I will certainly return unto thee, according to the time of life, and lo, Sarah thy wife ſhall have a ſon: ſome difference there is between the words as cited by the Apoſtle, and as they ſtand in the original text; the word lo, is omitted by the Apoſtle, nor was there any neceſſity to repeat it, ſince it was uſed only to excite Abraham's faith, attention, and wonder; alſo the phraſe thy wife, is neglected, the reaſon is, becauſe the words in Geneſis are an addreſs to Abraham, here, the ſubſtance of the promiſe to him is produced; beſides, it was not only well known in the Apoſtle's time, that Sarah was the wife of Abraham, but that as ſuch ſhe brought forth Iſaac, wherefore it was not ſo very neceſſary it ſhould be mentioned here; add to this, that it is not repeated in Gen. xviii. 14. which will juſtify our Apoſtle in the omiſſion of it: but the greater ſeeming difference is, that what in Geneſis is rendered, according to the time of life, is by the Apoſtle, at this time; ſome think, that there may be an emendation of the preſent original text, and ſuppoſe a various reading, and that the Apoſtle inſtead of חיה life, read הזה this; but there is no occaſion for ſuch a ſuppoſition, or to make this amendment: for the phraſe the time of life, ſignifies the preſent time, the nunc ſtans; ſo R. Levi ben Gerſom[f], underſtands this phraſe, according to the time of life, כעת הזאת שהיא קיימת ועומדת עתה, according to this time which is now ſtanding and abiding; and adds, rightly is this ſaid, becauſe neither time paſt nor to come, are to be found, only the preſent time, the nunc ſtans; and afterwards more than once explains it, of this preſent time, the next year: and ſo both R. Solomon Jarchi, and R. Aben Ezra , expound it, כעת הזאת, according to this time, the year following; that is, exactly according to this preſent time next year, or this time twelvemonth; beſides, in Gen. xvii. 21. 'tis ſaid, at this ſet time; and in ch. xviii. 14. at the appointed time; all which ſupport the Apoſtle in his verſion.

Ver. 10. And not only this, &c.] This inſtance of Iſhmael and Iſaac, is not the only one, proving that Abraham's natural ſeed, the children of the fleſh, are not all children, the children of God: but when Rebecca alſo had conceived by one, even by our father Iſaac, it was ſaid unto her, the next verſe being in a parentheſis, the elder ſhall ſerve the younger. The Apoſtle was aware, that the Jews would be ready to ſay, that the inſtance of Iſhmael and Iſaac, was not a pertinent one; ſince Iſhmael was not born of Sarah, the lawful wife of Abraham, but of a bond woman, which was the reaſon of his rejection, when Iſaac was the ſon of promiſe, by the lawful wife; and that they were children of Abraham in the line of Iſaac, and ſo children of the promiſe, as he was: wherefore he proceeds to mention the caſe of Jacob and Eſau, which was not liable to any ſuch exception; ſeeing they not only had the ſame father, but the ſame mother, Iſaac's lawful wife; they were conceived by Rebecca at once, were in the ſame womb together, were twins, and if any had the preference and advantage, Eſau had it, being born firſt; and yet a difference was made between theſe two by God himſelf, and which was notified by him to the mother of them, before either were born.

Ver. 11. For the children being not yet born, &c.] So ſays[h] the Chaldee paraphraſt, "the prophet ſaid unto "them, was it not ſaid of Jacob, עד דלא אתיליד, "when he was not yet born, that he ſhould be "greater than his brother?" the Syriac verſion ſupplies, his children, that is, Iſaac's; and the Arabic verſion, his two children. This ſhews, that the Apoſtle deſigns not the poſterity, but the very perſons of Jacob and Eſau; ſince as he ſpeaks of their conception in the verſe preceding, ſo of their birth in this: and though in the words of God to Rebecca, and which are urged in favour of the other ſenſe, it is ſaid, two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people ſhall be ſeparated from thy bowels, and the one people ſhall be ſtronger than the other people; yet this primarily reſpects the perſons of Jacob and Eſau, as the roots of their reſpective offspring; and only ſecondarily their poſterity, as branches that ſhould ſprout from them; it properly regards their perſons, and only in an improper, figurative, and metonymical ſenſe, their ſeed; for in no other ſenſe could two nations, or two manner of people be in Rebecca's womb, than as there were two perſons there, who would be the authors of two nations and people; and whatever may be ſaid for their reſpective poſterity, taking their riſe from one common father Iſaac, or for their being choſen or rejected as nations, before they were in being as ſuch, yet it can't be ſaid with any propriety, that Rebecca conceived their ſeveral offspring by one, even by our father Iſaac: which ſenſe well agrees with the ſcope of the Apoſtle, which is to prove, that all were not Iſrael which were of Iſrael, and that all Abraham's natural ſeed were not the children of God; which he could not better exemplify, than in the perſons of Jacob and Eſau; for to have inſtanced in the poſterity of Eſau, would have been foreign to his purpoſe, and not accord with the continuation of his diſcourſe in the following verſes, which entirely proceeds upon the ſubject of perſonal election and rejection, and with the ſcriptural account of the perſonal characters of Jacob and Eſau; and from hence, as from many other paſſages, it may be concluded, that predeſtination, whether to life or death, is a perſonal thing, concerns particular perſons, and not nations, or collective bodies of men: neither having done any good or evil; Jacob and Eſau, were under all conſiderations upon an equal foot, were juſt in the ſame ſituation and condition, when the one was loved and the other hated; or in other words, when the one was choſen, and the other rejected; they were neither of them as yet born, and had they been born, their birth and parentage could have been no reaſon, why one was choſe and the other not, becauſe in both the ſame; nor had the one performed a good action, or the other an evil one; ſo that Jacob was not loved for his good works, nor Eſau hated for his evil ones; which confirms the truth of this doctrine, that the objects of predeſtination, whether to life or death, are alike, are in the ſame ſituation and condition: whether they are conſidered in the corrupt maſs, or as fallen, they are all equally ſuch, ſo that there could not be any reaſon in them, why ſome ſhould be choſen and others left; or whether in the pure maſs, antecedent to the fall, and without any conſideration of it, which is clearly ſignified in this paſſage, there could be nothing in the one, which was not in the other, that could be the cauſe of ſuch a difference made: ſo that it follows, that works neither good nor evil, are the cauſes moving God to predeſtinate, whether to life or death; good works are not the cauſe of election to eternal life, for not only this act of diſtinguiſhing grace, paſſed before any were done, but alſo theſe are fruits, effects, and conſequents of it, and ſo cannot be the cauſes thereof; God does not proceed in other branches of ſalvation, as in vocation, juſtification, &c. according to them, and therefore it can't be thought he ſhould proceed upon this foot in the firſt ſtep to it; and which is aſcribed to his free grace, in oppoſition to works. Evil works are not the cauſe of the decree of rejection, for this alſo being as early as the decree of election, as it muſt unavoidably be, was before any evil works were done; ſin is not the cauſe of God's decree, but of the thing decreed, eternal death; otherwiſe all the individuals in the world being equally in ſin, muſt have been rejected: it remains, then, that not any works of men, good or bad, are the cauſe of predeſtination in either of its branches, but the ſovereign will and ſecret counſel of God: that the purpoſe of God according to election might ſtand; the decree of God, which is entirely free, and depends upon his own will and choice, ſtands firm and immutable, and is not to be diſannulled, by earth or hell, for it ſtands not on the precarious foot of works: not of works; did it, it would not ſtand ſure, for nothing is more variable and uncertain, than the actions of men: but of him that calleth; who is the unchangeable Jehovah; it ſtands upon his invariable will and immutable grace, whoſe gifts and calling are without repentance.

[h] Targum in Hoſ. xii. 3.

Ver. 12. It was ſaid unto her, &c.] To Rebecca, Gen. xxv. 23. the elder ſhall ſerve the younger, or the greater ſhall ſerve the leſſer, an Hebrew way of ſpeaking; ſo Japhet is called, הגדול, the great, or as we render it, the elder, Gen. x. 21. and the evil imagination is ſaid [i] to be, גדול, greater, that is, elder than the good, thirteen years; ſee the note on Luke xxii. 26. The ſenſe is, Eſau ſhall be a ſervant to Jacob; which is to be underſtood, not of temporal ſervitude; for in this ſenſe he never was a ſervant to him; ſo far from it, that as ſoon as Jacob had got the birth-right and bleſſing, he was obliged to flee from the face and fury of Eſau; and upon his return after many years, he ſent meſſengers to Eſau in a very ſubmiſſive manner, charging them after this manner, thus ſhall ye ſay to my lord Eſau, thy ſervant Jacob ſaith thus, &c. and when he found that his brother was coming to meet him, which threw him into a pannic fear, leſt he ſhould ſmite him, and the mother with the children, he prepares preſents for him; and when he came to him, bowed himſelf ſeven times, and his wives and children bowed likewiſe; and the language in which he addreſſed his brother Eſau, all the while they were together, was that of my lord: now if this oracle was to be underſtood of outward temporal ſervitude, it is ſtrange it ſhould have no appearance, nor any ſhadow of an accompliſhment in the perſons of Jacob and Eſau, ſuppoſing it was to have one in their poſterity; and indeed the completion of it in this ſenſe, is not very evident in their offſpring. It is certain, there was a long train of dukes and kings in Eſau's family, before there was any king in Iſrael; the poſterity of Eſau were in lordly grandeur and ſplendor, when the children of Iſrael were grievouſly oppreſſed with hard bondage in Egypt. The ſingle inſtance uſually referred to, when the Edomites became tributaries to David, was near a thouſand years after the giving out of this oracle; and this ſhew of ſervitude did not laſt long, for in Joram's time they revolted, and ſo continued; and it is evident, that at the time of the Babyloniſh captivity, the children of Edom were proſperous and triumphant, and ſaid concerning Jeruſalem, Raze it, raze it, even to the foundation thereof: this ſervitude therefore is to be underſtood in a ſpiritual ſenſe, of Eſau's excluſion from the favour of God, and bleſſings of grace, ſignified by his being rejected from inheriting the bleſſing, which was given to Jacob; and it appeared that he was not a ſon, but a ſervant, by his departure, and pitching his dwelling elſewhere; which ſhewed he had no intereſt in ſpiritual adoption, no right to the covenant of grace, nor was he an heir of heaven, all which were peculiar to Jacob: Eſau was a ſervant of ſin, under the dominion of it, and in bondage to it; whilſt Jacob was the Lord's freeman, and as a prince, had power with God and with men, and prevailed: Eſau was ſerviceable to Jacob, both in things temporal and ſpiritual; as reprobates are to the elect, for all things are for their ſakes, and work together for their good; Jacob's being obliged to flee from his brother, was for his good; by this means he got him a ſuitable wife, and large ſubſtance: his brother's meeting him on his return, which gave him ſo much pain and uneaſineſs, iſſued in his ſpiritual good; this ſent him to the throne of grace, to humble himſelf before God, acknowledge his mercies, and his dependance on him, to implore his help, and plead his promiſes; and thus the oracle was verified in the perſons of Jacob and Eſau.

[i] Midraſh Kohelet, fol. 80. 1.

Ver. 13. As it is written, &c.] In Mal. i. 2, 3. Jacob have I loved, but Eſau have I hated. Theſe words are explanative of the former; they are of like import, and the one interpret the other; and ſhew, that the former are to be underſtood in a ſpiritual, and not in a temporal ſenſe, and of the perſons, and not the poſterity of Jacob and Eſau; for though Malachi propheſied long after Jacob and Eſau were perſonally dead, yet the Lord in that prophecy manifeſtly directs the murmuring Jews, to the perſonal regard he had had to Jacob and Eſau, and which had continued in numberleſs inſtances to their reſpective poſterities, in order to ſtop their mouths, and reprove their ingratitude; and though he ſpeaks of the nation of the Edomites, and to the poſterity of Iſrael, yet it is evident, that he has a reſpect to the perſons of Jacob and Eſau, from whence they ſprung, when he ſays, was not Eſau Jacob's brother? now though an Edomite may be ſaid to be brother to an Iſraelite, yet Eſau is never ſaid, nor can he with any propriety be ſaid to be the brother of Jacob's poſterity: it remains, that theſe words regard their perſons, and expreſs the true ſpring and ſource of the choice of the one, and the rejection of the other; and which holds true of all the inſtances of either kind: everlaſting and unchangeable love, is the true cauſe and ſpring, of the choice of particular perſons to eternal ſalvation; and hatred is the cauſe of rejection, by which is meant not poſitive hatred, which can only have for its object ſin and ſinners, or perſons ſo conſidered; but negative hatred, which is God's will, not to give eternal life to ſome perſons; and ſhews itſelf by a neglect of them, taking no notice of them, paſſing them by, when he choſe others; ſo the word hate is uſed for neglect, taking no notice, where poſitive hatred can't be thought to take place, in Luke xiv. 26.

Ver. 14. What ſhall we ſay then? &c.] A form of expreſſion the Apoſtle frequently uſes, when he is about to introduce an objection, as is what follows: is there unrighteouſneſs with God? This is not an objection of his own, but of an adverſary, which he takes up and returns an anſwer to; and which itſelf greatly ſerves to ſettle and confirm the true ſenſe and meaning of the Apoſtle in this place; as that it could not be, that election and rejection of men, ſhould proceed according to their merits; or that God chooſes ſome for their good works, and rejects others for their wicked works, becauſe no man could ever pretend to charge God with unrighteouſneſs on this account; nor could it be that God choſe and rejected men, upon a foreſight of their good and evil works, for this alſo would not be liable to ſuch an objection; nor that the Jews, having made the law of none effect by their traditions, deſpiſed the Goſpel, crucified Chriſt, and perſecuted his diſciples, are therefore caſt off, and the Gentiles being obedient both in word and deed, are received into favour, for this likewiſe would not be chargeable with unrighteouſneſs by men; but that two perſons, as Jacob and Eſau, and the ſame may be ſaid of all mankind, being upon an equal foot, not being yet born, nor having done either good or evil, an inequality, a difference is made between them, by God himſelf; the one is choſe, the other paſſed by: now in this is ſome ſhew, ſome pretence at leaſt, for ſuch an objection; nor is it any wonder, to meet with it from the carnal reaſon of men; wherefore we may be ſure that the latter, and not either of the former, is the true ſenſe of the Apoſtle; ſince only this, and not either of them, is liable to ſuch an exception: let us attend to the Apoſtle's anſwer, which is firſt in his uſual manner, by way of deteſtation and abhorrence, God forbid; God is not unrighteous in his nature; nor in any of his ways and works; nor in this, in chuſing ſome and rejecting others. There's no unrighteouſneſs with God in that part of predeſtination, commonly called election; for this is neither an act of juſtice, nor injuſtice; not of juſtice, but of grace and mercy; of undue and undeſerved grace and mercy, of mere ſovereign grace and mercy; and is what God was not obliged to do; wherefore to chuſe ſome and not others, is no act of injuſtice; for injuſtice is a violation of juſtice, which has no place in this affair: if it is an act of injuſtice, it muſt be either to them that are choſen, or to them that are not; not to them that are choſen, to them it is an act of favour and good-will, they are choſen to grace and glory, to holineſs here, and happineſs hereafter; not to them that are paſſed by, becauſe they had no right nor claim to the grace and glory, which by this act are denied them, and therefore no injuſtice is done them. Every prince may chuſe his own miniſters and favourites, and who he will have of his privy council, without doing any injuſtice to thoſe he takes no notice of; every man may chuſe his own company, who he will converſe with, without doing any wrong to ſuch he does not think fit to admit to an intimacy with him; and yet men are not willing to allow the Moſt High that liberty, which every man daily takes, and may lawfully make uſe of: nor is there any unrighteouſneſs with God in the other branch of predeſtination, commonly called reprobation, which is either negative or poſitive; negative reprobation, is the act of preterition, or God's paſſing by, leaving, taking no notice of ſome, while he choſe others: now the objects of this act are to be conſidered either in the pure, or in the corrupt maſs; if in the pure maſs, i. e. of creatureſhip, which ſeems to be the Apoſtle's meaning, as being not yet created, made, or born, and having done neither good nor evil; no injuſtice is done by this act, for as it found them, it left them; it put nothing into them, no evil in them, nor appointed them to any, of any kind; man after, and notwithſtanding this act, came into the world an upright creature, and became ſinful, not by virtue of this act, but by their own inventions: or if conſidered as in the corrupt maſs, as fallen creatures, ſunk into ſin and miſery, which is the caſe of all mankind; ſince God was not obliged to ſave any of the ſinful race of men, whoſe deſtruction was of themſelves, it could be no injuſtice to paſs by ſome of them in this condition, when he choſe others; for if it would have been no injuſtice to have condemned all, as he did the angels that ſinned, whom he ſpared not, it can be no act of injuſtice in him, to leave ſome of them in that condition, which ſin had brought them into, whilſt he has mercy on others; unleſs to have mercy on any, can be thought to be an act of injuſtice: what unrighteouſneſs can there be in this procedure, any more than in drowning the world of the ungodly, whilſt Noah and his family were ſaved in the ark? or in raining ſhowers of fire and brimſtone on Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities of the plain, whilſt Lot, his wife, and two daughters, were delivered from the ſame? Poſitive reprobation is the decree, or appointment to damnation: now as God damns no man but for ſin, ſo he has decreed to damn no man but for ſin; and if it is no unrighteouſneſs in him to damn men for ſin, as to be ſure it is not, ſo it can be no unrighteouſneſs in him, to decree to damn any for it: upon the whole it appears, that whatever ſhew upon firſt ſight, there may be for a charge of unrighteouſneſs, againſt ſuch a procedure of the divine being, there's no real foundation for it. The objection is to be treated with abhorrence and indignation.

Ver. 15. For he ſaith to Moſes, &c.] That is, God ſaid to Moſes. The Apoſtle goes on to anſwer to the above objections, by producing ſome teſtimonies out of the writings of Moſes, in favour of both branches of predeſtination; ſhewing, that the doctrine he had advanced, was no other than what God himſelf had delivered to Moſes, whoſe name and writings were in great eſteem with the Jews, whereby the Apoſtle might hope to give full ſatisfaction in this point. The firſt paſſage he cites, is in Exod. xxxiii. 19. And will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will ſhew mercy on whom I will ſhew mercy. This is produced, in favour of ſpecial, particular, and perſonal election, and to clear it from any charge of unrighteouſneſs; and by it it appears, that God beſtows his grace and mercy in time, on ſuch perſons he has willed and determined from all eternity to beſtow it; this is clear from hence, for ſince all this is dependant on his will, it muſt be as this was his will from eternity, ſeeing no new will can poſſibly ariſe in God, God wills nothing in time, but what he willed before time; that this grace and mercy are ſhewn only to ſome perſons, and that the only reaſon of this is his ſovereign will and pleaſure, and not the works and merits of men; wherefore ſince this grace and mercy riſe out of his own free good-will and pleaſure, and are by no means the creatures due, it moſt clearly follows, that God in determining to beſtow his grace and mercy, and in the actual doing of it, whilſt he determines to deny it, and does deny it to others, cannot poſſibly be chargeable with any unrighteouſneſs.

Ver. 16. So then it is not of him that willeth, &c.] This is not a conſequence drawn by an adverſary, ſhewing that if this be the caſe, it ſignifies nothing for men to will or do, they may even ſit ſtill and do nothing, but depend on the mercy of God; but this is a concluſion of the Apoſtle's from the above cited teſtimony, inferring from thence, that election, which is what he is diſcourſing of, is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth: that is, is not owing to the will or works of men, to the deſires, inclinations, and affections of their minds, or to the actions of their lives; theſe are not the motives, conditions, or cauſes of this act: but of God that ſheweth mercy; in a free ſovereign way and manner, which he is not obliged to by any thing the creature wills or works; he is at full liberty, notwithſtanding whatever they will or do, to give his grace and mercy, when, where, and to whom he pleaſes; and therefore to give it to ſome, and deny it to others, can never be accounted an act of injuſtice, ſince he is not bound to give it to any. Some make the it to be the bleſſing of Iſaac, which was not of the will of any of the parties concerned; not of Iſaac who willed it to Eſau; nor of Eſau who willed it to himſelf, but had it not; nor of the will of the perſons who had their deſires, not of the will of Rebecca, who was deſirous of it for her ſon Jacob, nor of the will of Jacob who deſired it for himſelf, though he had it; nor of either of them that ran, not of Eſau, who made haſte to hunt for, and prepare veniſon for his father, nor of Jacob who ran to the flock, for two kids of the goats; but of God that ſhewed mercy to him, who according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure, had ſignified before to Rebecca, that the elder ſhould ſerve the younger: as the Apoſtle had mentioned this ſo lately, it might ſtill be in his thoughts, and he may allude to it; but election being what he is diſcourſing of in the context, that is the it here deſigned; and what is true of that, is true of ſalvation in all its parts, and therefore ſome underſtand it in the large ſenſe of ſalvation; though by others ſo qualified and limited, as to ſpoil the glory of the text: ſome ſaying that the ſenſe is, it is not of him that willeth and runneth wrong, but of the grace and mercy of God; but as no man would ever aſſert, that ſalvation is of him that wills and runs wrong, ſo the Apoſtle had no occaſion to deny it: others ſay, that it is not only of him that wills, and only of him that runs, but alſo of God that ſheweth mercy; making man's will and works joint cauſes with the mercy of God in man's ſalvation; and beſides, as Auſtin[k] long ago obſerves, according to this ſenſe, the words might as well be read, it is not only of God that ſheweth mercy, but of him that willeth, and of him that runneth, which no chriſtian would dare to ſay: the true ſenſe is, that as election, which is the leading ſtep to ſalvation, is not owing at all to the will of men, but to the good pleaſure and will of God; and not at all to the works of men, that being done before them, and they being the fruits and effects of that, but to the free love, grace, and good-will of God; ſo ſalvation in all its parts and branches, as redemption, juſtification, regeneration, vocation, and converſion, faith, repentance, hope, love, &c. and eternal life, is not to be aſcribed at all to the will of men, nor at all to the works of men, but entirely and alone to the love, grace, and mercy of God through Chriſt.

Ver. 17. For the ſcripture ſaith unto Pharaoh, &c.] אמר קרא, The ſcripture ſaith, is a Talmudic[l] way of ſpeaking, uſed when any point is proved from ſcripture; and is of the ſame ſignification with, אמר רחמנא, the merciful God ſays; and ſo the ſenſe of it here is, God ſaid to Pharaoh; the teſtimony here cited, ſtands in Exod. ix. 16. where it is read thus, for this cauſe have I raiſed thee up, העמדתיך, or made thee ſtand, for to ſhew in thee my power, and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth; and is produced by the Apoſtle, in proof of the other branch of predeſtination, called reprobation, and to vindicate it from the charge of unrighteouſneſs: in which may be obſerved, that the act of raiſing up of Pharaoh, is God's act, I raiſed thee up; which may be underſtood in every ſenſe that is put upon that phraſe, unleſs that which ſome Jewiſh[m] writers have annexed to it, namely, that God raiſed Pharaoh from the dead; otherwiſe, I ſay, all the reſt may well enough be thought to be comprized in it; as that God ordained and appointed him from eternity, by certain means to this end; that he made him to exiſt in time, or brought him into being; that he raiſed him to the throne, promoted him to that high honour and dignity; that he preſerved him, and did not cut him off as yet; that he ſtrengthened and hardened his heart, irritated, tated, provoked, and ſtirred him up againſt his people Iſrael; and ſuffered him to go all the lengths he did, in his obſtinacy and rebellion: all which was done, for to ſhew in him his power; his ſuperior power to him, his almighty power in deſtroying him and his hoſt in the Red-ſea, when the Iſraelites were ſaved: and the ultimate end which God had in view in this was, that his name might be declared throughout all the earth; that he himſelf might be glorified, and that the glory of his perfections, particularly of his wiſdom, power, and juſtice, might be celebrated throughout the world. The ſum of it is, that this man was raiſed up by God in every ſenſe, for God to ſhew his power in his deſtruction, that he might be glorified; from whence the Apoſtle deduces the following concluſion.

Ver. 18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will, &c.] Theſe are the expreſs words of the former teſtimony: it follows, and whom he will he hardeneth; which is the juſt and natural conſequence of what is contained in the latter; for if God could, or he did, without any injuſtice, raiſe up Pharaoh, and harden his heart againſt him and his people, that he might riſe up againſt him and deſtroy him by his power for his own glory, then he may harden any other perſon, and even whom he will: now this hardening of mens hearts, may be underſtood in perfect agreement with the juſtice and holineſs of God: men firſt harden their own hearts by ſinning, as Pharaoh did; what God does, is by leaving them to the hardneſs of their hearts, denying them that grace which only can ſoften them, and which he is not obliged to give, and therefore does them no injuſtice in witholding it from them; by ſending them both mercies and judgments, which through the corruption of their hearts, are the means of the greater hardening of them; ſo judgments in the caſe of Pharaoh, and mercies in the caſe of others; ſee Iſa. vi. 10. Rom. xi. 8, 9, 10. by delivering them up into the hands of ſatan, and to their own luſts, which they themſelves approve of; and by giving them up to a judicial blindneſs and hardneſs of heart, as a juſt puniſhment for their impieties.

Ver. 19. Thou wilt ſay then unto me, &c.] That is, thou wilt object to me; for this is another objection of the adverſary, againſt the doctrine the Apoſtle was advancing: and 'tis an objection of a mere natural man, of one given up to a reprobate mind, of an inſolent hardened ſinner; it diſcovers the enmity of the carnal mind to God; it is one of the high things that exalts itſelf againſt the knowledge of him; 'tis with a witneſs a ſtretching out of the hand againſt God, and ſtrengthening a man's ſelf againſt the Almighty; 'tis a running upon him, even upon the thick boſſes of his bucklers; it carries in it the marks of ill-nature, ſurlineſs, and rudeneſs, to the laſt degree: why doth he yet find fault? The objector does not think fit to name the name of God, or the Lord, but calls him he; and a conſiderable emphaſis lies upon the word yet; what as if he ſhould ſay, is he not content with the injuſtice he has already exerciſed, in paſſing by ſome, when he choſe others; in leaving them to themſelves, and hardening their hearts againſt him, and to go on in their own ways, which muſt unavoidably end in deſtruction; but after all this, is angry with them, finds fault with them, blames, accuſes, and condemns them, for that which they can't help; nay, for that which he himſelf wills? this is downright cruelty and tyranny. The objector ſeems to have a particular regard to the caſe of Pharaoh, the Apoſtle had inſtanced in, when after God had declared that he had raiſed him up for this very purpoſe, to make known his power, and ſhew forth his glory in all the world, ſtill finds fault with him and ſays, as yet exalteſt thou thyſelf againſt my people, that thou wilt not let them go? and yet he himſelf had hardened his heart, and continued to harden his heart, that he might not let them go as yet; and when he had let them go, hardened his heart again to purſue after them, when he drowned him and his hoſt in the Red-ſea; all which in this objection, is repreſented as unparalleled cruelty and unmercifulneſs; though it is not reſtrained to this particular caſe, but is deſigned to be applied to all other hardened perſons; and to expoſe the unreaſonableneſs of the divine proceedings, in hardening men at his pleaſure; and then blaming them for acting as hardened ones, when he himſelf has made them ſo, and wills they ſhould act in this manner: for who hath reſiſted his will? This is ſaid in ſupport of the former, and means not God's will of command, which is always reſiſted more or leſs, by wicked men and devils; but his will of purpoſe, his counſels and decrees, which ſtand firm and ſure, and can never be reſiſted, ſo as to be fruſtrated and made void. This the objector takes up, and improves againſt God; that ſince he hardens whom he will, and there's no reſiſting his will, the fault then can never lie in them who are hardened, and who act as ſuch, but in God; and therefore it muſt be unreaſonable in him to be angry with, blame, accuſe, and condemn perſons for being and doing that, which he himſelf wills them to be and do. Let the diſputers of this world, the reaſoners of the preſent age, come and ſee their own faces, and read the whole ſtrength of their objections, in this wicked man's; and from whence we may be aſſured, that ſince the objections are the ſame, the doctrine muſt be the ſame that is objected to: and this we gain however by it, that the doctrines of particular and perſonal election and reprobation, were the doctrines of the Apoſtle; ſince againſt no other, with any face, or under any pretence, could ſuch an objection be formed: next follows the Apoſtle's anſwer.

Ver. 20. Nay, but O man, who art thou that replieſt againſt God? &c.] Or anſwereſt again to God: ſome have been ſo weak and wicked as to ſuggeſt, that the Apoſtle met with an objection he could not anſwer, or give a fair ſolution of, and therefore takes the method he does: but when the ſeveral things returned in anſwer by the Apoſtle, are conſidered, it will appear that he has taken the wiſeſt method to ſilence ſuch an audacious objector, and that he abundantly clears God from the charge of cruelty and unmercifulneſs. And he anſwers firſt, by putting the inſolent creature in mind of what he was; nay, but O man, who art thou? &c. Thou art man, and not God; a creature, and not the Creator; and muſt not expect that he thy Creator, will give an account of his matters to thee, or a reaſon why he does this or the other thing. Thou art but a man, who in his beſt eſtate was vanity, being mutable; thou art a fallen ſinful creature, and obnoxious to the wrath and diſpleaſure of God for thy ſins, and dareſt thou to open thy mouth againſt him? thou art a poor, fooliſh and ignorant man, born like a wild aſs's colt, without underſtanding, and wilt thou take upon thee to confront, direct, or counſel the Moſt High, or tell him what is fitting to be done, or not done? next the Apoſtle anſwers, by pointing out his folly and madneſs, in replying to God. To ſpeak to God in behalf of a man's ſelf at the throne of grace, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, for any mercy or favour wanted, is an high privilege, and 'tis a wonderful condeſcenſion in God to admit of; and when a man, a good man takes upon him to plead with God on the behalf of others, of a wicked people, a ſinful nation, he ought to ſet before him the example and conduct of Abraham, who in a like caſe acknowledged himſelf to be but duſt and aſhes, and more than once intreated, that the Lord would not be angry at his importunity; but for a man to anſwer again to God, which a ſervant ought not to do to his maſter, to litigate a point with God, to diſpute a matter with him, is the higheſt inſtance of arrogance and impudence: wo unto him that ſtriveth with his maker, let the potſherd ſtrive with the potſherds of the earth; with their equals, with men like themſelves, but let no man dare to contend with God; if he ſhould, he cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand; for he is wiſe in heart, in forming all his counſels, purpoſes, and decrees; and mighty in ſtrength, to execute them; who hath hardened himſelf againſt him and hath proſpered? Another way the Apoſtle takes in anſwering the objection is, by ſhewing the abſurdity of a creature's wrangling with God about his make, and the circumſtances in which he is made: ſhall the thing formed, ſay unto him that formed it, why haſt thou made me thus? reference is had to Iſa. xlv. 9, 10. Now as it would be a moſt abſurd thing for the clay, was it capable of ſpeaking, to ſay to the faſhioner of it, why doſt thou put me into ſuch or ſuch a ſhape and form? or for any piece of workmanſhip to ſay to the maker of it, he has no hands, no head, no judgment and ſkill? or for a child to ſay to its parents, what begetteſt thou, or what haſt thou brought forth? ſo abſurd and unreaſonable is it, for any to ſay to God, why haſt thou appointed me to ſuch and ſuch ends and purpoſes, and has brought me into being in ſuch a manner, and under ſuch circumſtances? There's a ſtory in the Talmud[a], which may be pertinently produced here; "it happened " to R. Eleazar ben Simeon, of Migdal Gedur, that " he went from his maſter's houſe, and he was " riding on an aſs, and travelling by the ſea-ſide,

" and as he rejoiced exceedingly, and his heart was " lifted up becauſe he had learnt much of the law,
" there was joined to him a certain man that was " very much deformed, and ſays to him, peace be " upon thee Rabbi; but he did not return the ſalu-
" tation to him, but ſays to him Raca, how de-
" formed is that man! perhaps all thy townſmen
" are as deformed as thee; he replied to him, I " don't know, but go and ſay, לאומן שעשאני, to
" the workman that made me, how ugly is this veſ-
" ſel thou haſt made, when he knew in himſelf
" that he has ſinned; upon this the Rabbi diſ-
" mounted his aſs, and fell down before him, and
" ſaid unto him, I intreat of thee forgive me;
" he ſaid unto him, I can't forgive thee, till thou
" goeſt to the workman that made me, and ſay, how
" ugly is this veſſel which thou haſt made."

Ver. 21. Hath not the potter power over the clay, &c.] By the power the potter has over the clay, to ſhape it in what form he pleaſes, and out of it to make what veſſels he pleaſes, and for what purpoſes he thinks fit, which will be moſt to his own advantage, the Apoſtle expreſſes the ſovereign and unlimited power which God has over his creatures; the paſſages referred to, are Iſa. lxiv. 8. Jer. xviii. 1—6. in which God is repreſented as the potter, and men as clay in his hands; now if the potter has ſuch power over the clay which he did not make, only has made a purchaſe of, or has it in his poſſeſſion, much more has God a power, who has created the clay, to appoint out of it perſons to different uſes and purpoſes, for his own glory, as he ſees fit; even of the ſame lump, to make one veſſel to honour, and another unto diſhonour. The Apoſtle ſeems to deſign hereby, to point out to us the object of predeſtination to be man, as yet not made, but as lying in the mere maſs of creatureſhip, ſignified by the unformed clay, before put into any ſhape; and is an alluſion to the firſt creation of man, out of the clay, or duſt of the earth; for ſuch a conſideration of man, beſt agrees with the clay, lump, or maſs, not yet formed, than as already made, and much leſs as fallen and corrupted: for if men in predeſtination, were conſidered in the corrupt maſs, or as fallen creatures, they could not be ſo well ſaid to be made out of it, both to honour and diſhonour; but rather ſince they were all diſhonourable, that ſome were left in that diſhonour, and others removed from it unto honour: beſides, if this is not the caſe, God muſt create man without an end, which is contrary to the principle of reaſon and wiſdom; the end is the cauſe, for which a thing is what it is; and it is a known rule, that what is firſt in intention, is laſt in execution, and vice verſa; the end is firſt fixed, and then the means; for God to create man, and then to fix the end of his creation, is to do what no wiſe potter would do, firſt make his pots, and then think of the end of making them, and the uſe they are to be put unto. To make one veſſel to honour, and another to diſhonour, is for God to appoint creatures, which are to be made out of the ſame maſs and lump, for his own glory; which end, his own glory, he determines to bring about by different means, as theſe following: with reſpect to the veſſels of honour, whom he appoints for his glory, he determines to create them; to ſuffer them to fall into ſin, whereby they become polluted and guilty; to raiſe and recover them, by the obedience, ſufferings, and death of his Son; to regenerate, renew, and ſanctify them, by his Spirit and grace, and to bring them to eternal happineſs; and hereby compaſs the aforeſaid end, his own glory, the glorifying of his grace and mercy, in a way conſiſtent with juſtice and holineſs: with reſpect to the veſſels of diſhonour, whom he alſo appoints for the glorifying of himſelf, he determines to create them out of the ſame lump; to ſuffer them to fall into ſin; to leave them in their ſins, in the pollution and guilt of them, and to condemn them for them; and hereby gain his ultimate end, his own glory, glorifying the perfections of his power, juſtice, and holineſs, without the leaſt blemiſh to his goodneſs and mercy: now if a potter has power for his own advantage and ſecular intereſt, to make out of the ſame clay what veſſels he pleaſes; much more has God a power, out of the ſame maſs and lump of creatureſhip, to appoint creatures he determines to make, to his own glory; which he brings about by different methods, conſiſtent with the perfections of his nature.

Ver. 22. What if God, willing to ſhew his wrath, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds to clear God from any charge of cruelty and umercifulneſs, by obſerving his conduct in time, both towards thoſe he paſſes by, and towards thoſe he chuſes; for in this and the following verſe, nothing is ſaid relating to any act of God before time, every thing of that kind being conſidered already. In this verſe, the Apoſtle conſiders the conduct of God towards the veſſels of diſhonour; and let it be obſerved, that theſe are called veſſels of wrath fitted for deſtruction; they are ſaid to be veſſels, and ſo no longer conſidered in the clay, in the maſs and heap of creatureſhip, but as creatures formed and made, and brought into being; and ſo to be uſed as inſtruments in God's hands, to ſubſerve his ends and purpoſes, and therefore called veſſels; and not only ſo, but veſſels of wrath, fallen ſinful creatures, and ſo deſerving of the wrath of God and objects of his vindictive juſtice, in whom he may righteouſly diſplay his wrath and vengeance: hence they may be ſo called, being as veſſels filled with his wrath; as ſuch who are the inſtruments and executioners of his wrath are called, in Iſa. xiii. 5. כלי זעמו, veſſels of his wrath; and in Jer. l. 25. where the Septuagint uſe the ſame phraſe as here: and they are moreover ſaid to be fitted for deſtruction, as Haman is ſaid to be by the Jews[o]; whom they affirm to be the ſame with Memucan, and aſk why is his name called Memucan? and anſwer, שמוכן לפורענות, becauſe he was fitted for puniſhment: ſo theſe are ſaid to be fitted for deſtruction, that is, eternal damnation; not by God, for this does not reſpect God's act of ordination to puniſhment; but by ſatan, the god of this world, that blinds them, who works effectually in them, and leads them captive at his will; and by themſelves, by their own wickedneſs, hardneſs of heart, and impenitence, do they treaſure up to themſelves wrath, againſt the day of wrath, ſo that their deſtruction is of themſelves: a phraſe ſomewhat like this is uſed in Pſal. xxxi. 12. where the Pſalmiſt under ſome diſmal apprehenſions of himſelf ſays, that he was like, כלי אבד, a periſhing veſſel, or a veſſel of perdition; the Septuagint render it, σκευος απολωλος, a loſt veſſel. Now what is the method of the divine conduct towards ſuch perſons? he endures them with much long ſuffering; as he did the old world, before he deſtroyed it; and as he did Pharaoh, before he cut him off: God not only ſupports ſuch perſons in their beings, amidſt all their impieties and iniquities, but follows and fills them with his providential goodneſs, inſomuch that many of them have more than heart can wiſh; nay, to many he affords the outward means of grace, which they ſlight and deſpiſe; externally calls them, but they refuſe, loving darkneſs rather than light, and therefore are inexcuſable: now if after all this patience, indulgence, and forbearance, when he could in juſtice have ſent them to hell long ago, he is willing to ſhew his wrath; his diſplicency at ſin and ſinners, his vindictive juſtice, his righteous vengeance: and to make his power known; what it is he can do, by the utter deſtruction and damnation of ſuch perſons; what man in his ſenſes, can ever find fault with ſuch a procedure, or charge it with tyranny, cruelty, and unmercifulneſs?

[a] T. Bab. Taanith, fol. 20. 2. Maſſechet Derech Eretz, c. 4. fol. 18. 1.

Ver. 23. And that he might make known the riches of his glory, &c.] That is, his glorious riches, the perfections of his nature, his love, grace, and mercy, his wiſdom, power, faithfulneſs, juſtice, and holineſs; all which are moſt evidently diſplayed, in the ſalvation of his people, here called veſſels of mercy, which he hath afore prepared unto glory. They are ſaid to be veſſels, and ſo conſidered as creatures, made and brought into being; veſſels of mercy, and ſo fallen creatures, and by ſin become miſerable, for only ſuch are objects of mercy: they are not called ſo, becauſe deſerving of mercy more than others; they are in no wiſe better than others, and are by nature children of wrath, even as others; but becauſe God of his infinite goodneſs, fills them with his mercy, diſplays it in them, in the redemption of them by his Son, in the regeneration of them by his Spirit, and in their eternal ſalvation: and theſe are by him afore prepared unto glory; to everlaſting happineſs, which he has choſen them to before time, and calls them to in time; to this glory he does not take them, until he has prepared them for it; which act of preparation does not regard the eternal predeſtination of them to eternal life, but an act of his grace towards them in time; and which lies in putting upon them the righteouſneſs of his Son, and in putting his grace into them; or in other words, in juſtifying them by the imputation and application of the righteouſneſs of his Son unto them, and by the regeneration, renovation, and ſanctification of their hearts, by his Spirit. Now what if God willing to make known his glorious perfections, by diſplaying his mercy to ſuch ſinners, and by preparing them for heaven in a way conſiſtent with his holineſs and juſtice, what can any man that has the exerciſe of his reaſon, object to this? The whole of his conduct, is free from blame and cenſure; the veſſels of wrath he ſhews his wrath upon, are ſuch as fit themſelves for deſtruction, and whom he endures with much long ſuffering and patience, and therefore he cannot be chargeable with cruelty; the veſſels of mercy he brings to glory, none of them are taken thither, until they are prepared for it, in a way of righteouſneſs and holineſs, and therefore he can't be charged with acting contrary to the perfections of his nature.

Ver. 24. Even us whom he hath called, &c.] From election the Apoſtle proceeds to vocation, the fruit and evidence of it, taking the ſame method he did in ch. viii. 30. with a view to treat of the call of the Gentiles, of which he afterwards gives proof from prophecy; whence it appears to be according to divine predeſtination, upon which prophecy is founded; for God foretels that ſuch a thing will be, becauſe he has foreordained it ſhall be. Theſe words are explanative of the former, and ſhew who the veſſels of mercy are; they are ſuch whom God calls by his grace. Election may be known by vocation, as the cauſe by its effect, and that without an extraordinary revelation. This may as well be known, as man's adoption, juſtification, and the forgiveneſs of his ſins; for as all the choſen are, and ſhall be called in time, ſo all that are truly called by the grace of God, are manifeſtly, and to a demonſtration, the choſen veſſels of ſalvation: if a man is ſatisfied of his calling, he ought to be equally ſo of his election, the one being demonſtrable by the other; and for ſuch a one to doubt of it, is his ſin and crime. Moreover, the above phraſe afore prepared for glory, is here further explained; to be afore prepared for glory, is no other than to be called, ſanctified, and juſtified, in the name of the Lord Jeſus, and by the Spirit of our God; for this is the ſaints preparation for glory, before they come to it; and hereby the means are expreſſed, even ſanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth, through which God appoints his people unto ſalvation: now this calling is to be underſtood, not of a call to any office, as of Aaron to the prieſthood, of Saul to the kingdom, of the diſciples of Chriſt to Apoſtleſhip, or of miniſters to the work of the miniſtry; for perſons may be called to the higheſt office in church and ſtate, as Judas to Apoſtleſhip, and Pharaoh to the throne of Egypt, and yet have no ſhare in electing grace: nor of a call by the external miniſtry of the word, which is often ſlighted, deſpiſed, and of none effect; in this ſenſe many are called, who are not choſen: but of a call that is by the powerful, efficacious, and irreſiſtible grace of God; a call that is internal, that reaches the heart, and not the ear only; a ſpecial one that is peculiar to God's elect, is by ſpecial grace, and is to ſpecial bleſſings, as both grace and glory; it is an high, heavenly, and holy calling, and is without repentance; between which and glorification, as between it and eternal election, there is a cloſe and an inſeparable connexion. The objects of this grace follow, not of the Jews only, but alſo of the Gentiles; not all the Jews, nor all the Gentiles, but ſome of each; as all are not choſen, all are not redeemed, only ſome out of every kindred, tongue, nation, and people; ſo not all, but ſome only are called by grace: and this is not peculiar to the Jews, it reaches to the Gentiles alſo; and under the preſent diſpenſation, to the far greater number of them.

[o] T. Bab. Megilla, fol. 12. 2.

Ver. 25. As he alſo ſaith in Oſee, &c.] Ch. ii. 23. ſo Hoſea is called Oſee, as here, in the Septuagint in Neh. x. 23. Hoſ. i. 1, 2. That is, as God ſays in the prophecy of Hoſea, which was given by divine inſpiration; and ſpeaks of the calling of the Gentiles, as the ſpiritual Iſrael, after God had wrote a Lo ammi, and a Loruhamah, upon the people of the Jews; and ſhows, that he had appointed ſome from among the Gentiles, to obtain ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt; ſince he foretels their vocation, long before they were in being; which could have no other foundation, than his own eternal ſovereign will and pleaſure: I will call them my people, which were not my people; his people they were before he called them, in ſome ſenſe; inaſmuch as he had choſen them for his people, had promiſed in covenant they ſhould be, had given them to Chriſt as his people, and him to be a covenant to them; who as ſuch, made reconciliation for them, ſanctified them by his blood, redeemed and ſaved them: but then they were not known to be the people of God, neither by themſelves, who knew not God, and ſo could not know themſelves to be his people; nor by others, by the Jews, by whom they were called the uncircumciſion, ſinners of the Gentiles; looking upon the character of the people of God, as only belonging to themſelves: God had not as yet laid hold on them as his people, and claimed his right in them, and made known himſelf to them as their covenant God; he had not avouched them to be his people, nor had they avouched him to be their God; as yet they were not his willing people, nor a holy people, not being formed for himſelf, by his mighty grace; nor a people near unto him, with reſpect to worſhip and fellowſhip, but afar off from him. His calling them his people, is his acquainting them with their relation to him, which he had taken them in to himſelf, of his own grace; for ſo it is in Hoſ. ii. 23. And I will ſay unto them which were not my people, thou art my people; in effectual vocation, the Spirit of God is ſent down into the hearts of his people, to witneſs their relation to him, and to work faith in their ſouls, to receive the teſtimony; when they reply and ſay, thou art my God; and ſo they come to know themſelves to be the people of God, of which they were before ignorant; and to be known by others, by being made a willing people, in the day of God's power upon them, willing to be ſaved by him in his own way, and willing to ſerve and worſhip him in his own ordinances, and according to his own appointment; and by being holy and righteous, having the characters, and enjoying the privileges of the people of God: and her beloved, which was not beloved. In the text in Hoſ. ii. 23. it is, I will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy; hence the Vulgate Latin has added this clauſe to the text, though unſupported by any copy, or other verſion. The Apoſtle is to be juſtified in his verſion, by the Septuagint interpreters, who have rendered the paſſage in Hoſea, I will love her that was not beloved; and by the true ſenſe of the word רחם there uſed, which ſignifies to love in the moſt kind, tender, and endearing manner; ſee Pſal. xviii. 1. where the word is uſed and ſo rendered. The ſenſe is not, that God's choſen ones among the Gentiles, were not the objects of his love before calling; for their very calling is the fruit, effect, and ſo the evidence of love before. The love of God is from everlaſting to everlaſting, invariably and unchangeably the ſame; he had choſen them in his Son; he had made a covenant with them in Chriſt, had put them into his hands, and made them his care and charge; he had ſent him to die for them, and obtain eternal redemption for them; and all this before he called them, which abundantly proves his love to them: but this love was not manifeſted to their ſouls; it had not been ſhed abroad in their hearts; they had no ſenſation of it in their breaſts; the ſtreams of that river of God had not as yet flowed into their ſouls; nor were they partakers of the effects of it in themſelves; but being called by grace, they feel, they experience, and enjoy that, and all the happy fruits and effects of it; the loving kindneſs of God is let down into their hearts in effectual vocation, and with it he draws them to himſelf, as a fruit and evidence of his everlaſting and unchangeable love to them.

Ver. 26. And it ſhall come to paſs that in the place, &c.] This is another citation out of Hoſea, and is to be ſeen in ch. i. 10. and the meaning is, that in thoſe countries, as here in Great-Britain, in the very ſelf-ſame place, or ſpot of ground, where it was ſaid unto them ye are not my people; where were nothing but idolatry and idolatrous worſhippers, and whoſe worſhip, works, and actions, declared them not to be the people of God: there ſhall they be called the children of the living God; not only children of God, but of the living God; in oppoſition to their idol gods, their lifeleſs deities, and ſenſeleſs ſtatues of gold, ſilver, braſs, wood, or ſtone, they fell down to and worſhipped. The choſen of God among the Gentiles, were from all eternity predeſtinated to the adoption of children; this bleſſing was provided, laid up, and ſecured for them, in the covenant of grace; in this relation of children were they given to Chriſt, and under this conſideration of them, did he partake of the ſame fleſh and blood with them, and died, to gather them together, who were ſcattered abroad in the ſeveral parts of the world; and becauſe they were antecedently ſons by adopting grace, therefore the Spirit of God in effectual calling, is ſent down into their hearts, to bear witneſs to their ſpirits, that they are the children of the living God, and to work faith in their ſouls to believe it; by which grace they receive this bleſſing, as all others, even the right and privilege of being the children of God; by this they claim it, and enjoy the comfort of it; and ſo are manifeſtatively, both to themſelves and others, the children of God by faith in Chriſt Jeſus; though this will more clearly appear another day, than it does now.

Ver. 27. Eſaias alſo crieth concerning Iſrael, &c.] The Apoſtle having produced proper teſtimonies in proof of the calling of the Gentiles, proceeds to mention others; ſhewing, that ſome few of the Jews

Jews alſo were to be called according to prophecy, founded upon divine predeſtination; which though they are full proofs of the calling of ſome from among the Jews, yet at the ſame time ſuggeſt the caſting off of the far greater number of them; and which is the Apoſtle's view in citing them, as appears from what he ſays both here and in the two following chapters. The firſt teſtimony is taken out of Iſa. x. 22, 23. and is prefaced or introduced with theſe words; which either expreſs the great concern of mind and ſorrow of heart, with which the prophet ſpoke them, even with ſtrong crying and tears, ſeeing a remnant of them only was to be ſaved; or they ſhew his heart's deſire and prayer to God, for Iſrael, as the words may be rendered, how that he cried to the Lord for them, intreated him with earneſtneſs and importunity, and wreſtled with him on their behalf; or they declare the preſence of mind, the freedom of expreſſion, the boldneſs and intrepidity with which he delivered this meſſage to the Jews, which he knew muſt be ungrateful to them; in doing which, he run the riſk of loſing his intereſt in their affections, if not his life; and inaſmuch very probably they did not chuſe to hear it, but turned away from him, he cried aloud, he ſpared not, he lift up his voice like a trumpet, as he is bid to do elſewhere, reſolving they ſhould hear what he had to ſay, from the Lord of hoſts. This is a form of ſpeech uſed by the Jews, in citing ſcripture; thus, הנביא צוח, the prophet cries [p], namely in Iſa. xxvi. which is ſpoken of the ſame prophet as here; and again [q], the holy Spirit, צוחת, cries, and ſays, in ſome certain paſſage of ſcripture; and in another place [r] the holy Spirit cried, ſaying as in Joel iii. 3. they have caſt lots for my people. Though the number of the children of Iſrael be as the ſand of the ſea; this part of the teſtimony, ſeems rather to be taken from Hoſ. i. 10. which may eaſily be accounted for; ſince the Apoſtle had juſt cited the words in Hoſea, and ſo carrying them in his mind, tranſcribes this ſentence from thence; it perfectly agreeing in ſenſe, with the paſſage in Iſaiah he had in view, where it ſtands thus, though thy people Iſrael be as the ſand of the ſea; that is, though the number of them be ſuch as to be compared thereunto; though they are many as the ſand of the ſea, as the Targum, Kimchi, and Aben Ezra explain it. This was promiſed unto Abraham, and had its accompliſhment in the days of Solomon, and in after times; they were for quantity, for number, as the ſand of the ſea, even innumerable; and for quality, being barren and unfruitful, a people laden with iniquity, a ſeed of evil doers: a remnant ſhall be ſaved; that is, a few perſons only; המעט יקרא שאר, few are called a remnant, as Kimchi on the place obſerves; theſe are the remnant among the Jews, according to the election of grace; the few that were choſen, though many were called by the external miniſtry of Chriſt and his Apoſtles; the little city, and few men in it; even the eſcaped of Iſrael, he that was left in Zion, and that remained in Jeruſalem; the little flock among them, which were as ſheep among wolves; the few that entered in at the ſtrait gate, and found the way to eternal life; the few that ſhall be ſaved, and theſe ſhall certainly be ſaved, with a ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation. Theſe, according to the prophecy, were to return to the mighty God, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the promiſed Meſſiah; be converted to him, and ſo ſaved by him with an everlaſting ſalvation: God had reſolved upon it, whoſe counſel ſhall ſtand; he had promiſed it in covenant, which is ordered in all things and ſure; he ſent his Son to ſave theſe his people from their ſins, who is become the author of eternal ſalvation to them; the grace of God is efficacious and powerful enough, to make them willing to be ſaved by Chriſt, and to bring them to him, to venture upon him, and commit their ſouls to him, to be ſaved by him; and almighty power is concerned, to keep them through faith unto ſalvation: ſo that this little remnant, through the Father's everlaſting and unchangeable love, the Son's purchaſe, prayers, and preparations, and the Spirit's grace, which works them up for this ſelf-ſame thing, ſhall be certainly and compleatly ſaved; though with reſpect to the difficulties attending it, which could have been ſurmounted by none but Chriſt, and by reaſon of their diſcouragements ariſing from ſin, temptations, and perſecutions, they may be ſaid to be ſcarcely ſaved.

Ver. 28. For he will finiſh the work, &c.] This paſſage has ſome difficulty in it: ſome inſtead of work, read account, and ſuppoſe it is an alluſion to the ballancing of accounts, when the remainder is cut off, which commonly is but little; and ſo regards the ſmall number of the Jews that ſhall be called and ſaved, as before: others read it the word, and differently explain it; ſome underſtanding it of the incarnate Word, of his being emptied, and made of no reputation, of his being cut off in a very ſhort time, a few years after he had entered upon his publick miniſtry, and of the few perſons converted under it; others of the law, of the cutting off, or aboliſhing the ceremonial law, perfecting or compleating the moral law, and abbreviating it, or reducing it into a ſhort compendium; others of the Goſpel, bringing in and revealing a perfect righteouſneſs, for the juſtification of ſinners, which the law could not do; all foreign to the Apoſtle's purpoſe. Thoſe who think God's work, his ſtrange work is meant, his work of punitive juſtice he will finiſh, and cut it ſhort in righteouſneſs, becauſe a ſhort work will the Lord make upon the earth, when he cut off and deſtroyed the greater part of the people of the Jews, and ſaved a remnant, ſeem to come nearer the mind of the Prophet and the Apoſtle's deſign, in citing this paſſage. The words as in Iſaiah, I would chuſe to render and explain thus; כליון חרוץ, the abſolute, or preciſe decree, ſo Aben Ezra interprets it, גזור מהשם, that which is decreed by God, the decree concerning the ſalvation of the remnant, שוטף צדקה, he, i. e. God ſhall cauſe to overflow in righteouſneſs, as an overflowing river; that is, he ſhall abundantly execute it, he ſhall compleatly fulfil it, to finiſh and cut it ſhort in the moſt righteous manner, conſiſtent with all his divine perfections; כי כלה ונחרצה, for the decree and that determined; ſo Aben Ezra, גזרה נגזרת, the decree decreed by God, the Lord God of hoſts, עשה, ſhall execute, accompliſh, make ſhort and full work of it, in the midſt of all the land, that is, of Judea: ſo that the words contain a moſt ſtrong and invincible reaſon, why the remnant ſhall be ſaved; becauſe God has made an abſolute decree, concerning the ſalvation of it, which he will accompliſh in the fulleſt manner, agreeable to his juſtice and holineſs: the λογος, or word, the Apoſtle from the Prophet ſpeaks of, that ſhould be finiſhed, and cut ſhort and accompliſhed in righteouſneſs, is the ſentence, counſel, or decree, conceived in the divine mind, concerning this matter: hence as the decree of election ſtands firm and ſure, not upon the works of men, but upon the abſolute, ſovereign, and efficacious will of God; ſo the ſalvation of his choſen people, is no precarious, but a moſt ſure and certain thing.

Ver. 29. And as Eſaias ſaid before, &c.] In the beginning of his prophecy, in ch. i. 9. Except the Lord of ſabaoth had left us a ſeed; the title and character the great God goes by here, is Lord of ſabaoth, that is, of hoſts, or armies; the Septuagint often leave the word untranſlated, as here and elſewhere, as in 1 Sam. i. 11. and xvii. 45. He is Lord of the hoſts of heaven, the ſun, moon, and ſtars, whom he brings forth by number, calls by their names, and them to praiſe him; of the angels, the multitude of the heavenly hoſt, that do his pleaſure, fight under him, and for him; and of the hoſts of nations, of the ſeveral kingdoms of the world, who are all under his government, and among whom he acts according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure. Kimchi on the place ſays, he is called ſo, " becauſe of the hoſts above, and becauſe " of the hoſts below, who are the Iſraelites, that " are called hoſts; wherefore he would not con" ſume us all, as we deſerved:" no, according to the counſel of his own will, he left them a ſeed; or as it is in Iſaiah, a very ſmall remnant; and ſo the Syriac here, סרידא, a remnant; both ſignify one and the ſame, namely, a few perſons only: a remnant ſignifies a few, which remain out of a large number; and ſo does ſeed, which is reſerved for ſowing again, after the whole ſtock is ſold off, or conſumed: and the leaving of this ſmall number, deſigns God's gracious acts of reſerving in election, a people for himſelf; the calling them by his grace in time, and preſerving them from general corruption; which if he had not done among the Jews, as Jarchi on the text ſays, " of himſelf, and by his " mercies, and not for our righteouſneſſes," we had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrha; the cities which God deſtroyed with fire and brimſtone from heaven, for their iniquities: had it not been for electing grace, they would have been like the inhabitants of theſe cities for wickedneſs; and the caſe would have been the ſame with us and with the whole world, had it not been for God's act of election, chuſing ſome to holineſs here, and happineſs hereafter. The decree of election is ſo far from being a door to licentiouſneſs, that it is the true ſpring and ſource of all real holineſs, that has been, or is in the world; and had it not been for this, there would have been no ſuch thing as holineſs in the world; and conſequently not only Judea, but the whole world, were it not for this, muſt have been long before now, like Sodom and Gomorrah in their puniſhment.

Ver. 30. What ſhall we ſay then? &c.] To God's calling of a large number of the Gentiles, and only a very few of the Jews, according to his eternal purpoſes and decrees; what can be objected to it? is he chargeable with any unrighteouſneſs? muſt it not be referred to his ſovereign will and pleaſure? is it not an inſtance of his grace and goodneſs, that he calls and ſaves ſome, when they were all ſo wicked, that he might in juſtice have deſtroyed every individual of them? or what is further to be ſaid, concerning both Jews and Gentiles? or what can be objected to what may be further obſerved concerning them? as that the Gentiles which followed not after righteouſneſs; the very ſame perſons among them, who are called by grace, and are veſſels of mercy, before their calling were without a righteouſneſs, ſtout-hearted, and far from one; being without Chriſt, and deſtitute of his Spirit, they were ignorant of righteouſneſs, of the righteouſneſs of God, and of his law, and conſequently of what true righteouſneſs is; they were unconcerned about it, and did not labour after it, as the Jews did. They did not purſue and improve the light of nature, about God and things of a moral kind, as they might have done; but held the light and truth they had in unrighteouſneſs, and indeed were filled with nothing elſe: and yet theſe perſons have attained to righteouſneſs, even the righteouſneſs which is of faith. The righteouſneſs they attained unto, was not a righteouſneſs of their own, not the righteouſneſs of works, or a righteouſneſs by the deeds of the law, to which the righteouſneſs which is of faith is always oppoſed; nor faith itſelf, which is diſtinguiſhed from it; but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, ſo called, not becauſe that faith is the cauſe or condition of it, but becauſe the diſcovery of it is made to faith; that receives it, lays hold on it, and exerciſes itſelf on it; by it the ſoul renounces its own righteouſneſs, looks to, and depends on Chriſt's, and rejoices in it. Theſe Gentiles being called by grace, attained, comprehended, or apprehended this righteouſneſs; not by the light of nature, which makes no diſcovery, nor gives the leaſt hint of it; but by the light of faith they apprehended it, as revealed in the Goſpel; which faith they had not of themſelves, but of God; ſo that the whole of this account, is a wonderful inſtance of the grace of God, and abundantly confirms the obſervation made before by the Apoſtle, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that ſheweth mercy; ſince theſe perſons had nothing in them, diſpoſing and qualifying them for a juſtifying righteouſneſs, and yet attained one; and the grace appears to be the more diſtinguiſhing, by what follows.

Ver. 31. But Iſrael, which followed after the law of righteouſneſs, &c.] The Iſraelites, the far greater part of the Jews, who were not called by the grace of God, were all very zealous of the law, called the law of righteouſneſs; becauſe the matter of it was righteous, it was ſo in its own nature; and becauſe perfect obedience to it is righteouſneſs; as alſo becauſe they ſought for righteouſneſs by the deeds of it. They very violently and eagerly purſued after it, they tugged and toiled, and laboured with all their might, as perſons in running a race, to get up to the law, and the righteouſneſs of it; and yet Iſrael, with all the pains and labour taken, hath not attained to the law of righteouſneſs: ſome of them fancied they had, ſuppoſing an external conformity to it, to be all that it inſiſted upon; not knowing the ſpirituality of it, that it required truth and holineſs in the inward parts; and that he that offended in one point of it, was guilty of all, and therefore could not be juſtified by it.

Ver. 32. Wherefore? becauſe they ſought it not by faith, &c.] The queſtion is aſked, why they did not attain to that, which with ſo much diligence they preſſed after? the anſwer is, becauſe, as they did not ſeek for righteouſneſs in a right place, or object, they ſought for it in the law, and the works of it, where it is never to be found by a ſinful creature, and not in Chriſt, in whom only are righteouſneſs and ſtrength; ſo they did not ſeek for it in a right way, by faith in Chriſt, without which it is impoſſible to pleaſe God, and by which only true righteouſneſs is diſcerned and received: but as it were by the works of the law; not by works which looked like works of the law, and were not; but they ſought it as if they expected their juſtification before God, was to be by works of righteouſneſs done by them; or as if it was partly by their own works, and partly by the goodneſs of God, accepting of them for a juſtifying righteouſneſs. The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others read only, as it were by works; and ſo does the Vulgate Latin verſion: another reaſon, or elſe a reaſon of the former is, for they ſtumbled at that ſtumbling-ſtone; meaning the word of the Goſpel, at which Peter ſays they ſtumbled, and particularly the doctrine of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; or rather Chriſt himſelf, who was to the Jews a ſtumbling-block, and to the Greeks fooliſhneſs.

Ver. 33. As it is written, &c.] In Iſ. viii. 14. and xxviii. 16. for the beginning and end of this citation, are out of the latter, and the middle of it, out of the former. This is an inſtance of מדלג, ſkipping, from place to place, concerning which the rules with the Jews were [s], that the reader "might ſkip from text to text, but he "might not ſkip from prophet to prophet, except "only in the twelve prophets, only he might not "ſkip from the end of the book to the beginning; "alſo they might ſkip in the prophets, but not in "the law;" which rules are exactly complied with by the Apoſtle. The beginning of this citation is out of Iſ. xxviii. 16. behold I lay in Zion. The ſtone ſaid to be laid in Zion, is by the Chaldee paraphraſt, interpreted of a king; by R. David Kimchi of king Hezekiah, and by Jarchi of the king Meſſiah; and is truly applied by the Apoſtle to Jeſus Chriſt: the layer of this ſtone is God the Father, who laid him as the foundation ſtone, in his eternal purpoſes and decrees, in his counſels and covenant, in promiſe and in prophecy, in the miſſion of him into this world, and in the preaching of the everlaſting Goſpel: the place where he is laid is Zion, meaning either literally Judea or Jeruſalem, where the Meſſiah was to appear, whither he came, and from whence his Goſpel went forth; or myſtically the church, where he is laid as the foundation of it, and of the ſalvation of all the members thereof; tho' thro' the ſin and unbelief of others, he proves to be a ſtumbling-ſtone, and rock of offence; which phraſes are to be ſeen in Iſ. viii. 14. and are ſpoken of, and aſcribed to a divine perſon, even to the Lord of hoſts; and are by the Targumiſt thus paraphraſed, and if ye obey not, מימריה his word ſhall be for revenge, and for a ſtone ſmiting, and a rock of offence; and in the Talmud [t], it is ſaid, that "the Son of David, (the Meſſiah) ſhall not "come until the two houſes of the fathers are de"ſtroyed out of Iſrael; and theſe are the head of "the captivity which is in Babylon, and the prince "in the land of Iſrael, as it is ſaid, Iſ. viii. 14." So that according to the ancient Jews, this paſſage belongs to the Meſſiah, and is properly made uſe of for this purpoſe by the Apoſtle, who had ſeen the accompliſhment of it in the Jews; who ſtumbled at the outward meanneſs of Jeſus of Nazareth, at his parentage, the manner of his birth, his education, the mean appearance of himſelf and followers; at his company and audience, his miniſtry, miracles, death, and the manner of it; and ſo believed not in him, for righteouſneſs, life, and ſalvation; and thus it came about that they did not attain, or come up to the law of righteouſneſs, or the righteouſneſs of the law: but whoſoever believeth on him ſhall not be aſhamed; that is, who believes in Chriſt unto righteouſneſs, who builds his faith, and hope of eternal ſalvation on him, the foundation God has laid in Zion, and at which the unbelieving Jews ſtumbled and fell; he ſhall neither be aſhamed here nor hereafter: he ſhall not be aſhamed of his faith and hope in Chriſt; nor of Chriſt, as the Lord his righteouſneſs; nor ſhall he be aſhamed or confounded at his appearing, but ſhall be juſtified before men and angels, and be received into his kingdom and glory. There is ſome difference between the paſſage as here cited, and as it ſtands in Iſ. xxviii. 16. where it is read, he that believeth ſhall not make haſte; either to lay any other foundation, being fully ſatisfied with this, which is laid by God; or ſhall not make haſte to flee away, thro' fear of any enemy, or of any danger, being ſafe as built on this foundation; and ſo ſhall never fall, be moved, or aſhamed and confounded. Some have fancied a various reading, but without any reaſon. A very learned Oriental critic [u] of our own nation has obſerved, that the Arabic words Hauſh and Hiſh, anſwer to the Hebrew word יחיש, the prophet uſes, and which have three ſignifications in them, to haſten, to fear, and be aſhamed; the firſt of theſe is retained here by the Jewiſh commentators and modern verſions; the ſecond by the Chaldee paraphraſt, and Syriac tranſlation; and the third by the Septuagint, and the Apoſtle; and they may be all taken into one ſenſe, for he that is afraid, runs about here and there, and at length is put to ſhame and confuſion.

CHAP. X.

IN this chapter are contained an account of the two righteouſneſſes of faith and works, a ſummary of the Goſpel of Chriſt, a deſcription of the grace of faith, in the nature, uſe, and means of it, and ſeveral teſtimonies concerning the calling of the Gentiles; and whereas the Apoſtle knew that this, as well as what he had ſaid in the latter part of the preceding chapter, that the Jews had not attained to the law of righteouſneſs, but ſtumbled at the ſtumbling ſtone, would be offenſive to his countrymen the Jews; wherefore that it might appear, that he ſaid this not out of diſaffection and ill will to them, he declares his ſincere regard unto them, and the great reſpect he had for them, by calling them brethren, by expreſſing his good will to them, by praying for the ſalvation of them, ver. 1. by bearing teſtimony of their zeal for God, ver. 2. tho' he faithfully obſerves to them, that it was an ignorant zeal, of which ignorance he gives an inſtance, ver. 3. particularly in the attribute of God's righteouſneſs; from which ignorance, aroſe all their miſconduct in religious things, eſpecially in the article of juſtification; hence they ſought to be juſtified by their own righteouſneſs, and rejected the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and then points out to them the true end of the law, for righteouſneſs which is Chriſt, ver. 4. which if they had known would have ſet them right, and which is another inſtance of their ignorant and miſguided zeal: this leads him on to what he had in view, which was to give an account of the two righteouſneſſes he had ſuggeſted in the latter part of the former chapter, the righteouſneſs of the law, which the Jews ſought for and found not, and the righteouſneſs of faith, which the Gentiles without ſeeking for enjoyed; and this account he gives in the words of Moſes, for whom they had the greateſt regard: the deſcription of the former is given in his words, in ver. 5. which ſuggeſt the impoſſibility of keeping the law, and obtaining life by it, and therefore it is a vain thing to ſeek for righteouſneſs by the works of it; the latter is deſcribed, ver. 6, 7. by the certainty of it, being wrought out by Chriſt, who came down from heaven, fulfilled the law, and died, and roſe again from the dead; and by the plainneſs and evidence of it, as revealed in the Goſpel, ver. 8. the ſum of which Goſpel is, that whoever believes in Chriſt and confeſſes him ſhall be ſaved, ver. 9. which faith and confeſſion, when genuine, are with the heart and mouth agreeing together; the conſequences of which, are righteouſneſs and ſalvation, comfortably apprehended and enjoyed, ver. 10. and that the above is the ſum of the Goſpel, and that there is ſuch a connexion between faith and righteouſneſs, and between confeſſion and ſalvation, is confirmed, ver. 11. by a teſtimony from the prophet, Iſ. chap. xxviii. 16. which being expreſſed in ſuch a general manner, as to extend to every believer, whether Jew or Gentile, reaſons are given, ver. 12. in ſupport of ſuch an explanation of that paſſage, taken from the equal condition of all, there being no difference between them naturally, from the univerſal dominion of God over them, and from his liberal communication of grace and goodneſs to all that call upon him; which laſt reaſon is confirmed, ver. 13. by a paſſage of ſcripture in Joel ii. 32. on occaſion of which, the Apoſtle proceeds to treat of the calling of the Gentiles, and of the means of it, the preaching of the Goſpel, which was neceſſary to it, which is made out by a train of reaſoning after this manner; that ſeeing ſalvation is only of ſuch that call upon the name of the Lord, and there could be no calling upon him without believing in him, and no believing without hearing, and no hearing without preaching, and no preaching without miſſion, which is proved by a citation out of, Iſ. lii. 7. and no ſucceſs in preaching, when ſent, without the exertions of efficacious grace, as appears from the caſe of the Jews, who had the miniſtration of the Goſpel to them by Iſaiah, and yet all did not believe it; as is evident from Iſ. liii. 1. and ſeeing the concluſion of which is, that faith comes by preaching, and preaching by the order and command of God, ver. 14, 15, 16, 17. it follows, that it was proper that miniſters ſhould be ſent, and the Goſpel preached to the Gentiles, and that attended with power, in order that they ſhould believe in the Lord, and call upon his name and be ſaved; and which method God had taken, and which he had foretold he would take, in the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and which were now fulfilling: that the Goſpel was preached to them, and they heard it, were matters of fact, and were no other than what ſhould be, or might be concluded, from Pſal. xix. 4. cited, ver. 18. and that the Jews could not be ignorant of the calling of the Gentiles is clear, firſt from the words of Moſes, Deut. xxxii. 21. which the Apoſtle produces, ver. 19. and from a paſſage in the prophecy of Iſaiah, chap. lxv. 1. So that this was no other than what Moſes and the prophets ſaid ſhould be, ver. 20. and the chapter is cloſed, ver. 21. with another paſſage out of the ſame prophet in the next verſe, ſhewing the rejection of Chriſt and his Goſpel by the Jews, and which juſtifies their being caſt off by him, of which the Apoſtle treats largely in the next chapter.

Ver. 1. Brethren, my hearts deſire, &c.] The Apoſtle having ſuggeſted, that a few of the Jews only ſhould be called and ſaved; that the far greater part ſhould be rejected; that the Iſraelites who ſought for righteouſneſs, did not attain it when the Gentiles did, but ſtumbled and fell at Chriſt, and would be aſhamed and confounded; and knowing the prejudices of that people againſt him, therefore leſt what he had ſaid, or ſhould ſay upon this ſubject, ſhould be thought to ariſe from hatred and ill-will to them, he judged it proper, as before, to expreſs his trouble and ſorrow on their account; ſo now his great love and affection to them, and which he ſignifies by calling them brethren: for not the Roman believers are here addreſſed, as if he was telling them how much he loved his own nation; but either the Jews in general, whom he looked upon and loved as his brethren, according to the fleſh; and whatever they thought of him, he conſidered them in ſuch a relation to him, which obliged him to a concern for their good and welfare; or rather the believing Jews, that were members of the church at Rome, whom, beſides uſing the common ſtile of the Jewiſh nation, who were wont to call all of their country brethren; he could ſpeak to, as being ſuch in a ſpiritual relation, being children of the ſame father, partakers of the ſame grace and priviledges, and heirs of the ſame glory. Now he declares to theſe perſons, that the deſire of his heart was towards Iſrael, he bore a good will to them, his mind was well diſpoſed and affected towards them, he had a cordial, ſincere, and hearty reſpect for them; and ſo far was he from being their enemy, that he continually bore them upon his mind at the throne of grace: and his prayer to God for Iſrael was, that they might be ſaved; not only that they might be ſaved in a temporal ſenſe, from theſe grievous calamities, and ſore judgments he ſaw were coming upon them, which he had reaſon to believe would iſſue in the deſtruction of them, as a nation and church; but that they might be ſpiritually converted, turned from their evil ways, and brought to believe in Chriſt, whom they had deſpiſed and rejected, and ſo be ſaved in the Lord with an everlaſting ſalvation: this he might deſire not only from a natural affection for them, but as a miniſter of the Goſpel, who can't but wiſh that all that hear him might be converted and ſaved; and as a believer in Chriſt he might pray for this in ſubmiſſion to the will of God; and eſpecially as he knew there was a ſeed, a remnant according to the election of grace, at that preſent time among them that ſhould be ſaved, tho' the larger number of them were caſt off. The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others read for them, inſtead of for Iſrael; not naming them, being eaſily underſtood; and ſo the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions.

Ver. 2. For I bear them record, that they have a zeal of God, &c.] A zeal for God; for the being and unity of God, againſt the polytheiſm and idolatry of the Gentiles; for the word of God, the writings of the Old Teſtament, of which they were zealous defenders and preſervers, and which they diligently read and heard explained, and whereby they thought to obtain eternal life; for the law of God, moral and ceremonial, eſpecially for the rituals of the Moſaic œconomy; and for the ſervice and worſhip of God, they ſpared no pains, but compaſſed ſea and land to bring in proſelytes to their religion; all which the Apoſtle could teſtify from his own knowledge, and by his own experience, who had been as great a zealot as any of them all. But now whilſt the Apoſtle is expreſſing his ſtrong affection for this people, he is careful to act the faithful part to them, and points out their miſtakes, and ſhews them their faults; which he does in this and the following verſe, by obſerving, that they had a zeal of God indeed, but not according to knowledge: it was not well regulated, it proceeded on miſtaken principles, and moved in a wrong way, in perſecuting the church of God, in doing things contrary to the name of Chriſt, in putting to death his miniſters and members, thinking that hereby they did God good ſervice; which aroſe from their ignorance of the Father, and of the Son: tho' they had a zeal of God, they knew neither God nor Chriſt aright; they did not know God in Chriſt, nor Jeſus to be the true Meſſiah; they underſtood neither law nor Goſpel truly, and fancied the Goſpel was contrary to the law, and an enemy to it; and therefore in their great zeal oppoſed it, and the profeſſors of it; they were zealous of the law, and of doing the commands of it, but knew not the true nature, uſe, and end of the law; as appears by what follows.

Ver. 3. For they being ignorant of God's righteouſneſs, &c.] Either of the righteouſneſs of God revealed in the Goſpel, which is no other than the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and which they knew nothing of, the whole Goſpel being a ſealed book, and wholly hidden from them; or of the righteouſneſs of God required in the law, they imagining that only an external conformity to the commands of the law, was all that was neceſſary to attain to a juſtifying righteouſneſs by it, not knowing the ſpirituality of it, and that it required conformity of heart and nature, as well as life and converſation; or rather of the attribute of God's righteouſneſs, the ſtrictneſs of his juſtice, the purity and holineſs of his nature: for tho' they knew that he was holy, juſt, and righteous, yet did not think he was ſo ſtrict as to inſiſt upon every punctilio, and to take notice of every little default and defect in obedience; and eſpecially that he had any regard to the heart and the thoughts of it, and required perfect purity there; or that he would accept of nothing leſs than an abſolutely perfect and compleat righteouſneſs; nor juſtify any without full ſatisfaction to his juſtice: hence they were going about to eſtabliſh their own righteouſneſs; which they would never have done, had they known the righteouſneſs of God, in either of the above ſenſes; the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, omit the word righteouſneſs, and only read, their own, leaving it to be underſtood, and which is eaſily done; and ſo reads the Vulgate Latin verſion: by their own righteouſneſs, as oppoſed to God's, is meant the righteouſneſs of works, their obedience to the law, an outward conformity to it, an obſervance of the rituals of it, and a little negative holineſs. This they endeavoured to eſtabliſh or make to ſtand in the ſight of God, as their juſtifying righteouſneſs, which is all one as ſetting chaff and ſtubble, briars and thorns, to a conſuming fire; as the attempt expreſſes madneſs in them, the phraſe ſuggeſts weakneſs in their righteouſneſs, which they would fain make to ſtand, but could not, it being like a ſpider's web before the beſom, or like a dead carcaſs, which men would ſet upon its feet to ſtand alone, but it cannot; than which nothing can be a greater inſtance of egregious folly: their going about or ſeeking to do this, ſhews their ignorant zeal, and the toil, the pains, the labour they uſed to effect it, but all in vain, and to no purpoſe; as appears by their hearing, reading, faſting, praying, giving alms to the poor, and tithes of all they poſſeſſed; all which they were very careful and ſtudious of, and eſpecially to have them done in the ſight of men: and ſo it was that they have not ſubmitted themſelves to the righteouſneſs of God; that is, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, ſo called, becauſe approved and accepted of by God, imputed by him to his people, and given them by him as a free gift, and which only juſtifies in his ſight; and becauſe it is wrought by Chriſt, who is truly and properly God, and revealed and applied by the Spirit of God. This the Jews ſubmitted not to, becauſe they had no true humble ſenſe of themſelves as ſinners, nor did they care to acknowledge themſelves as ſuch; which ſubmiſſion to Chriſt's righteouſneſs requires and neceſſarily involves in it; no man will ever be ſubject to it, till he is made ſenſible of the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin, and brought to an humble acknowledgment of it; the Spirit of God firſt convinces of ſin and then of righteouſneſs; and becauſe they had an over-weaning opinion of their own righteouſneſs, which they truſted to, and depended upon, imagining it to be blameleſs, and to contain all that the law required, and therefore they ſtood in no need of any other; and as for the righteouſneſs of Chriſt they had it in contempt, their carnal minds being enmity to him, were not ſubject to his righteouſneſs, nor could they, nor can any be, without the powerful efficacious grace of God, making them willing in the day of his power. This phraſe denotes the rebellion of their wills, againſt Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, they acting as rebellious ſubjects againſt their ſovereign prince.

Ver. 4. For Chriſt is the end of the law, &c.] The Apoſtle here obſerves that to them which had they known, would have regulated their zeal, removed their ignorance and ſet them right, in that which they ſtumbled at, and fell. By the law here, is not meant the ceremonial law, of which indeed, they were all very zealous, and of which Chriſt alſo was the end in many reſpects; he was the final cauſe of it, or that for the ſake of which it was; it had not been given had it not been for him; all its inſtitutions, ordinances, and ſacrifices were on his account; they were all ſhadows of him, and he the body and ſubſtance of them; he was the end or mark and ſcope at which they all aimed; every type looked to him, and every offering directed the worſhipper to him; he was the terminus of it, to whom it was to reach, and beyond whom it was not to go; it was a ſchool-maſter for inſtruction and direction until Chriſt came, and no longer. He was the fulfilling end of it, every thing in it had its accompliſhment in him; and then laſtly, he put an end to it, he diſanulled it becauſe of its after weakneſs and unprofitableneſs; he blotted out this hand-writing of ordinances, and entirely aboliſhed this law of commandments; but then Chriſt was not the end of this law for righteouſneſs; Chriſt's obedience to it is no part of juſtifying righteouſneſs, eſpecially not to every one that believes, not to the Gentiles who never were under any obligation to obſerve it: the moral law is here deſigned, and when Chriſt is ſaid to be the end of it, the meaning is not that he was the end of its being given; for that was to be a rule of righteouſneſs and life to men, and a miniſtration of death in caſe of diſobedience: or that he was the ſcope of this law, tho' the Syriac verſion renders it, סכה. the ſcope of the law is the Meſſiah, the mark at which it aimed, or which it directs perſons to; for the law does not direct to Chriſt at all, in any way; it requires and inſiſts upon a perfect righteouſneſs, but gives not the leaſt hint of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, nor does it in any form direct unto it; by it is the knowledge of ſin, but no knowledge of a Saviour from ſin; not the law, but the Goſpel directs and encourages ſenſible ſinners to believe in Chriſt and be ſaved; on the contrary, the law is a killing letter, and the miniſtration of condemnation and death; but Chriſt is either the conſuming or conſummating, the deſtroying or fulfilling end of the law. He is the deſtroying end of the law, not as to the nature, being, matter and ſubſtance of it, which is invariable and eternal, and is not, and cannot be made void by the doctrine of faith; nor as to the true uſe of it; but as a covenant of works, as to the miniſtry of it by Moſes, and as to its curſe and condemnation. Tho' I rather think the latter is here meant, namely, that Chriſt is the fulfilling end of the law, ſince it is added, for righteouſneſs; for the bringing in an everlaſting righteouſneſs; a righteouſneſs juſtifying in the ſight of God; a righteouſneſs ſinners wanted, and could not obtain of themſelves, and could never be obtained but by a perfect fulfilling of the law: this Chriſt has done partly by the conformity of his nature, being exactly like that, and what it requires holy, juſt, and good; and partly by perfect obedience of his life to all its precepts; and alſo by ſuffering the penalty of it, death, in the room and ſtead of all his people; and ſo the whole righteouſneſs of the law is fulfilled by him, and he becomes the end of it, for a juſtifying righteouſneſs before God, to every one that believes: not to him that works for life, and in order to obtain a righteouſneſs of his own; nor to the Jew only, but alſo to the Gentile, even to every one, be who he will, that has faith in Chriſt; not that faith is either the matter, cauſe, or condition of righteouſneſs, but this righteouſneſs is only revealed unto, and received by the believer, and can only be pleaded by him, as his juſtifying righteouſneſs. Moreover, this phraſe is deſcriptive of the perſons to whom Chriſt is the end of the law for righteouſneſs, and ſuggeſts that for whomſoever he has fulfilled the law, in order to bring in for them a juſtifying righteouſneſs, faith in conſequence is given to them, to receive and embrace it, and enjoy all the comfort and priviledges of it.

Ver. 5. For Moſes deſcribeth the righteouſneſs which is of the law, &c.] In this, and ſome following verſes, an account is given of the two righteouſneſſes before-mentioned, called their own and the righteouſneſs of God; and that chiefly in the words of Moſes, which is wiſely done by the Apoſtle, he and his writings being in great eſteem among the Jews. The deſcription he gives of the righteouſneſs of the law, that is, of that righteouſneſs which the law requires, and is done in obedience to its commands, is, that the man which doth thoſe things, ſhall live by them, or in them; and which is to be ſeen in Lev. xviii. 5. ye ſhall therefore keep my ſtatutes and my judgments, which if a man do, he ſhall live in them; from whence it appears, that by thoſe things a man is to do, are meant the ſtatutes and judgments of God, not the ordinances of the ceremonial, but the precepts of the moral law; and that the righteouſneſs of the law lies in doing and keeping thoſe ſtatutes, not merely externally, but internally, with all the heart, and ſoul, and ſtrength; the law requires love to God, fear of him, and faith in him, and an inward diſpoſition of the mind towards him, and a conformity of heart and nature to his law, as well as outward obedience; and all this is to be done perfectly and compleatly, in every punctilio the law requires, otherwiſe no life is to be expected, nor any righteouſneſs to be had by it. The Jewiſh writers underſtand the life promiſed by the law, to be eternal life. The two Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uzziel, paraphraſe the words thus, he ſhall live in them, בחיי עלמא, in eternal life; in like manner Jarchi explains them, he ſhall live, לעולם הבא, in the world to come; to which agrees the note of R. Aben Ezra, who interprets it of life in both worlds; he ſays the ſtatutes of the law are life to them that do them in both worlds, for if a man underſtands the ſecret of them, he ſhall live for ever, and ſhall never die. The life which the law promiſed to Adam in his ſtate of perfection, who was the only mere man that ever was capable of perfectly fulfilling it, was the continuance of the happy life he enjoyed; the life it promiſed to the Iſraelites, at the renewing of it on mount Sinai, was a long and proſperous life in the land of Canaan; as for the promiſe of eternal life, that was made before the world began, in the covenant of grace, and is a peculiar promiſe and bleſſing of that covenant, is an entire gift of God's grace, and never was deſigned to be enjoyed thro' mens obedience to the law of works, but thro' the righteouſneſs and death of Chriſt, who is the fulfilling end of the law: hence it appears, that as the righteouſneſs of the law is a righteouſneſs of works done by men, it cannot be the righteouſneſs God imputes, for that is without works, and by which a man can be juſtified before God; and ſince the law requires internal and perfect obedience to it, tis certain that it cannot be yielded by fallen creatures; hence it follows, that there can be no life, and ſo no righteouſneſs by it, the conſequence of which when obſerved by ſinful men, is horror, terror, and gloomy deſpair; the very reverſe of which, is the language of the righteouſneſs of faith.

Ver. 6, 7. But the righteouſneſs which is of faith, &c.] Or with reſpect to the righteouſneſs of faith; the other righteouſneſs before called the righteouſneſs of God, becauſe God is the author of it, here the righteouſneſs of faith, becauſe that receives it, ſpeaketh on this wiſe; the ſelf-ſame writer who deſcribes the righteouſneſs of the law in ſuch a manner, that it gives no room to a fallen creature ever to expect life and ſalvation by it, gives ſuch an account of the righteouſneſs of faith, as forbids all doubting and deſpair: ſay not in thine heart; let not ſuch a thought enter into thy mind, much leſs expreſs it with thy lips; who ſhall aſcend into heaven? that is, to bring Chriſt down from above, or who ſhall deſcend into the deep? that is, to bring up Chriſt again from the dead. Theſe words are not properly a citation of Deut. xxx. 12, 13. but the Apoſtle makes uſe of ſome phraſes which are there, with his own explications of them; tho' the difference between them ſtript of theſe explications is not very material: in the firſt clauſe, who ſhall aſcend into heaven? the Apoſtle leaves out the phraſe, for us; which as to the ſenſe, was not abſolutely neceſſary to retain; the difficulty indeed, ſeems greater in the latter clauſe, who ſhall deſcend into the deep? which in the text of Moſes is, who ſhall go over the ſea for us? but when it is conſidered that the ſea is often called the deep, and that ſailing on it and over it, is expreſſed by going down to the ſea in ſhips, Pſal. cvii. 23. and moreover, when tis obſerved that the Jeruſalem Targum paraphraſes it thus, "the law is not in "heaven that it ſhould be ſaid, oh that we had one "of us, as Moſes the prophet, who could go up to "heaven and bring it to us! nor is it beyond the great "ſea, that it ſhould be ſaid, oh that we had one of "us, as Jonah the prophet, דייחות לעומקי ימא רבא, "who could deſcend into the depths of the great ſea,

“ and bring it to us;” the Apoſtle is to be juſtified in his expreſſions. His ſenſe, indeed, may ſeem to be different from that of Moſes, and of the common interpretations ef the Jewiſh writers, as in the above paraphraſe, and in the following account of them from the Talmud, underſtanding them of the law[w]; “ ſays Abdimo bar Chama bar Douſa, what “ is the meaning of that ſcripture, neither is it in “ heaven, nor is it beyond the ſea? it is not in “ heaven, for if it was in heaven you muſt needs “ go up after it, and if it was beyond the ſea, you “ muſt needs go over after it; Rabba ſays, not in “ heaven is it, you won't find it in him that exalts “ his knowledge in himſelf as the heavens, nor will “ you find it in him that enlarges his knowledge “ in himſelf, as the ſea; R. Jochanan ſays, not in “ heaven is it, you won't find it in thoſe that are “ of a haughty ſpirit, nor beyond the ſea is it, you “ won't find it among traders abroad, or merchants.” Tho' the Apoſtle's ſenſe may be brought pretty near to this, after this manner; who ſhall go up to heaven, or down to the deep, either to bring us the knowledge of the law, and yield an obedience to it which that requires of us, or to give us a full account of the Goſpel of the grace of God? there is no room, nor reaſon, for men to ſay this in their hearts, or to make a doubt of them, as if they were not done already; to do ſo, is to deny that Chriſt is come in the fleſh, and riſen from the dead, who has given the true ſenſe and knowledge of the law, and has perfectly fulfilled it, in the room and ſtead of his people, and by whom the doctrine of grace and truth is come, particularly the doctrine of a ſinner's juſtification before God; this is brought nigh in the miniſtration of the word, ſo that there is no need of ſuch enquiries as theſe. Moreover, for the illuſtration of theſe words, let it be obſerved, that theſe phraſes are proverbial, and often uſed to expreſs things impoſſible, of which take the following inſtances; “ it is a tradition of the Rabbins[x], “ if a man ſays to his wife, lo, this is thy divorce, “ on condition that thou aſcendeſt to the firmament, “ on condition that thou deſcendeſt into the deep; on “ condition that thou paſſeſt over the great ſea “ on foot, this is no divorce;” the reaſon is, שאי איפשר, becauſe it is impoſſible. Again[y], “ if “ a man ſays to a woman, if thou wilt aſcend into “ the firmament, or if thou wilt deſcend into the deep, “ lo, thou art eſpouſed to me by this penny; but “ if thou wilt not go up into the firmament, nor “ go down into the deep, thou ſhalt not be eſpouſed; and after that he puts the penny into her “ hand, lo, the condition becomes void, and behold ſhe is eſpouſed immediately, for the thing “ is known שאי איפשר, that it is impoſſible for her “ to fulfil the condition.” So here are forbidden all ſuch thoughts, words, or expreſſions which carry ſuch a ſenſe as this; who will go down to the deep to fetch ſuch a wretch as I am, out of the loweſt hell, to deliver me from the curſes of the law, and the wrath of God, and bring me out of this wretched miſerable condition in which I am? or go up to heaven and carry me there, and put me in the poſſeſſion of the undefiled inheritance? all this is as impoſſible to be done, as for a man to aſcend to heaven, or go down into the deep: now tho' the righteouſneſs of the law, encourages ſuch deſpondency and black deſpair, the righteouſneſs of faith, or the doctrine of juſtification by faith in Chriſt's righteouſneſs, forbids every thing of this kind; aſſuring the ſinner, that Chriſt is come down from heaven in human nature, that he has fulfilled all the righteouſneſs of the law by his obedience in life, and has bore the penalty of it in his ſufferings and death, and is riſen again for juſtification; ſo that ſuch queſtions ſhould not be put, nor ſuch deſpairing thoughts encouraged: beſides, to think and ſpeak in this manner, is to ſet aſide the whole ſcheme of the Goſpel, and ſuppoſes the perſon to doubt whether Chriſt is come down from heaven; and therefore aſks, who ſhall go up to bring him down? and that he is not riſen from the dead; and therefore puts the queſtion, who will go down to the deep to fetch him up? whereas he is already come, has obeyed, ſuffered, and died, and roſe again, and is become the end of the law, for righteouſneſs to every one that believes.

Ver. 8. But what ſaith it, &c.] The ſcripture; ſo ſome copies, and the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions read, what ſaith the ſcripture? the Arabic verſion, what doſt thou ſay? or what ſaith he, Moſes? for what follow are manifeſtly his words, in Deut. xxx. 14. the word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart; which is to be underſtood not of the law, for Moſes himſelf is not ſpeaking of the law only, but either of the whole word of God, both law and Goſpel; or particularly of the Goſpel, which holds forth thoſe ſpecial bleſſings and promiſes of grace, pardon of ſin, and circumciſion of the heart, which are mentioned in the context, as what ſhould be beſtowed upon the people of the Jews in the latter days; and ſo is rightly applied by the Apoſtle to the then diſpenſation, and is to be underſtood of the Goſpel; which was nigh both in the miniſtration of it, by the Apoſtles, to Jews and Gentiles, and in the application and experience of it; it was not only in the mouth of the preachers, but alſo of the hearers of it, by a hearty and ſincere confeſſion; and in their hearts, being attended with the power of God, and received in the love of it, was truly believed in, and cordially embraced; that is, the word of faith. This phraſe, מלה דמהימנותא, the word of faith, may be ſeen in the Jewiſh writings[z]; and this ſhews what word is here meant, even the Goſpel ſo called, becauſe it contains doctrines which are to be believed upon the teſtimony of God, and particularly the doctrine of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt received by faith; and becauſe it propoſes Chriſt as the object of faith, and encourages ſouls to believe in him for life and ſalvation; and is alſo the means of begetting and implanting faith in the heart, and without it the preaching of it is of no avail: and it is further deſcribed by the miniſtration of it, which we preach; being ſent commiſſioned, qualified, and aſſiſted by Chriſt thereunto; which ſhews the agreement between Moſes and the Apoſtles of Chriſt; for the word which he ſpoke of, they preached, and indeed, ſaid no other things than what the prophets and Moſes ſaid ſhould come, that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer in the ſtead of his people, and riſe again for their juſtification; the ſum of which is delivered in the following verſe.

Ver. 9. That if thou ſhalt confeſs with thy mouth the Lord Jeſus, &c.] That is, if a man ſhall make a good, ſincere and hearty confeſſion to God, before the church and people of God, and before the world, that Chriſt is his Lord and Saviour, whom he deſires to ſerve, and to be ſaved by; and this as ariſing from a comfortable experience of the grace of God in his ſoul, and from a true faith in Chriſt in his heart, wherefore it follows, and ſhall believe in thine heart, that God hath raiſed him from the dead, thou ſhalt be ſaved; for this article of Chriſt's reſurrection, includes the ſeveral other articles of faith: it ſuppoſes his death, and that ſuppoſes his life, and the obedience of it; and his life implies his being here on earth, and that his coming down from heaven to do the will of his Father; and this is the rather mentioned, which is here aſcribed to God the Father, tho' not to the excluſion of the Son and Spirit, becauſe that Chriſt is riſen again for our juſtification, with which true faith is principally concerned; for ſuch a faith is intended, not which lies in a mere aſſent to the truth of this, or any other article of the chriſtian religion; but which is concerned with Chriſt for righteouſneſs, life, and glory; and with ſuch a faith ſalvation is certainly and inſeparably connected.

Ver. 10. For with the heart man believeth unto righteouſneſs, &c.] The Apoſtle here explains the nature and uſe, both of faith and confeſſion; as true faith does not lie in the bare aſſent of the mind to the Goſpel, or any truth contained in it, reſpecting the perſon and office of Chriſt, ſo neither does it lie, as not in the brain, ſo not in the tongue, but in the heart; it is not a notional knowledge of things to be believed; nor is it ſaying that a man believes; but it is heart-work, a believing with all the heart; ſuch a faith in which all the powers of the ſoul, the underſtanding, will, and affections are concerned, it is a ſeeing of the Son, a beholding of the glory, fulneſs, ſuitableneſs, ability, and willingneſs of Chriſt as a ſaviour, with the eye of the underſtanding ſpiritually enlightened; it is a going out of the ſoul to Chriſt, in various acts, ſuch as venturing into his preſence, proſtrating itſelf at his feet, reſolving if it periſhes it will periſh there; a giving up itſelf unto him, determining it will have no other Saviour, leaning and relying on him, and living upon him; which faith works by love to Chriſt, moves the affections, ſtirs up the deſires of the ſoul to his name, and endears him and all that belong to him to it. The uſe of this grace is, unto righteouſneſs; it is not inſtead of one, for faith is not our righteouſneſs; nor is it in order to work out one, for this grace puts a ſoul on renouncing its own righteouſneſs; but its uſe is to receive one, even the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which when it ſpies, it admires, receives, lays hold on, and rejoices in looking on itſelf as righteous thro' this righteouſneſs, and ſo has peace with God thro' Chriſt: and with the mouth confeſſion is made unto ſalvation. This is to be underſtood not of confeſſion of ſin, tho' that is proper and requiſite to be made, both with reſpect to the participation, and enjoyment of ſalvation, particularly pardoning grace and mercy, and to an admiſſion to Goſpel-ordinances; but of confeſſion of Chriſt, as appears from the preceding verſe, which lies in a frank and open acknowledgment of what Chriſt is in himſelf, as that he is truly and properly God, the Son of God, the true Meſſiah, the Mediator between God and man, and the only Saviour of loſt ſinners, and of our faith in him, with reſpect to ourſelves, to our pardon, juſtification, acceptance and ſalvation in him and thro' him; in aſcribing the whole of our ſalvation to him, and giving him the glory of it; in declaring to the churches of Chriſt what he has done for our ſouls, and in ſubjecting ourſelves to his ordinances. This confeſſion muſt be made both by words and facts, muſt be open, viſible, and before men; and alſo real, hearty, and ſincere, the words of the mouth agreeing with the experience of the heart; and ſuch a good profeſſion made before God, angels, and men, highly becomes all that believe with the heart. This was the practice of the primitive ſaints; yea, all nations own, acknowledge and profeſs the God they worſhip; and ſhould not we confeſs our God, Saviour and Redeemer? Chriſt himſelf confeſſed a good confeſſion before Pontius Pilate, and is the Apoſtle and high-prieſt of our profeſſion. So to do, makes both for the glory of God, and for our own real good and advantage. Yea, it is unto ſalvation; not as a cauſe of it, for Chriſt alone is the author of eternal ſalvation; but a ſincere and well made confeſſion of Chriſt, points out to all that know us, where and from whom we expect to have ſalvation; it is what lies in the way, and is to be taken up by all that believe in Chriſt, and to be held faſt without wavering until we receive the end of our faith, even the ſalvation of our ſouls.

Ver. 11. For the ſcripture ſaith, &c.] Of this form of expreſſion, or mode of ſpeaking, ſee the note on chap. ix. 17. The paſſage referred to is, Iſ. xxviii. 16. cited before in chap. ix. 33. the view with which it is produced, is to prove the certain connexion between faith and righteouſneſs, and confeſſion and ſalvation; or in other words, to obſerve that ſuch who cordially believe in Chriſt, and make a ſincere profeſſion of their faith in him, ſhall be ſaved. There are ſome things ſomewhat different from, tho' agreeing in ſenſe with, the words as they ſtand in the prophet; there it is indefinitely ſaid, he that believeth, here an univerſal is made uſe of, whoſoever, or every one that believeth; which phraſes are equipollent, and a certain truth it is, that whoſoever believes in Chriſt, whether Jew or Gentile, be he who he will, ſhall ſurely be ſaved: here the object believed in, is expreſſed in him, which is there implied, and may eaſily be underſtood of the ſtone laid in Zion, for a foundation which is Chriſt; for other foundation can no man lay, and whoever by faith builds on this foundation is ſafe: and ſhall not be aſhamed; neither in this world, nor in that to come; in the Hebrew text it is, ſhall not make haſte; how this may be reconciled, ſee the note on chap. ix. 33.

Ver. 12. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek, &c.] Some reaſons are here aſſigned, confirming the Apoſtle's ſenſe of the prophet's words, that every one that believes in Chriſt ſhall be ſaved; for there is no diſtinction of nations, no ſuperiority on account of carnal deſcent, or fleſhly priviledges, no preheminence on the ſcore of the laws and ordinances of the former diſpenſation, all which are now aboliſhed; nor is there any difference in their ſtate Godward, all being under ſin, and without a righteouſneſs, and all ſtanding in need of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; to which is added another reaſon, for the ſame Lord over all, or is over all: by whom is meant, either God the Father, who is the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews, chap. iii. 29, 30. or rather the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who is Lord of all; and is to be underſtood, not of his being ſo merely by creation, but redemption, he having bought with his blood all the elect of God, both among the Jews and among the Gentiles; ſo that he has the ſame equal propriety in one as another, and they the ſame claim to him, and the ſame encouragement to believe in him, for righteouſneſs and life: and moreover, he is rich unto all that call upon him; he is not only rich as God, being poſſeſſed of all divine perfections and glory, but as mediator, having the riches of grace and glory in him; and is rich, beneficent, liberal and free in diſpenſing, pardoning, juſtifying, and ſanctifying grace to all that come unto him, throw themſelves at his feet, implore his grace and righteouſneſs, and call upon him with faith and fervency. Such as theſe are here deſigned, and not all that make mention of his name, or are called by it; but who are the true worſhippers of him in faith and fear; for the invocation of his name includes all worſhip of him, and exerciſe of grace upon him; hence this paſſage is no inconſiderable proof of his proper deity.

Ver. 13. For whoſoever ſhall call upon the name of the Lord, &c.] This teſtimony is taken out of Joel ii. 32. and is brought to prove the truth of what the Apoſtle had juſt ſuggeſted, that all that call upon the name of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, will find him rich and plenteous in mercy, and ready to diſpenſe his grace and ſalvation to them: ſuch ſhall be ſaved; be they who they will, whether Jews or Gentiles; not with a temporal ſalvation only, but with a ſpiritual and eternal one; for the words of the prophet refer to Goſpel-times, as the context ſhows, and is cited and applied thereunto by the Apoſtle Peter, Acts ii. 16—21. beſides, the deliverance and ſalvation Joel ſpeaks of, is of a remnant whom the Lord ſhall call; and deſigns the remnant according to the election of grace, whether among Jews or Gentiles, whom God calls by his efficacious grace; between which call and eternal glory, there is a certain and inſeparable connexion.

Ver. 14. How then ſhall they call on him in whom they have not believed? &c.] The Apoſtle having obſerved, that whoever, Jew or Gentile, believe in the Lord and call upon his name, ſhall be ſaved; and that the ſame Lord was ready, and willing to diſpenſe his grace, without any difference to them; ſuggeſts, that it was therefore abſolutely neceſſary, that the Goſpel ſhould be preached to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews; that it was the will of God it ſhould be; that what he and others did, was by a divine commiſſion; that they were ſent by the Lord to preach the Goſpel to them; that hearing they might believe, and ſo call upon the name of the Lord, and be ſaved; and therefore the Jews ought not to blame them for ſo doing, for there was a real neceſſity for it, ſince there can be no true calling upon God without faith, no faith without hearing, no hearing without preaching, and no preaching without a divine miſſion. The firſt of theſe is ſignified by this interrogation. Every man calls upon the God he believes in, and him only; this has been the practice of all men, in all nations; ſuch as have not believed in God and Chriſt, do not call upon them; tis true indeed, there may be an external invocation of them, where there is no true faith; but then this is not calling upon them in truth and ſincerity; as is their faith, ſo is their calling upon them; as the one is hiſtorical, the other is only external; for there is no true invocation without faith, or any that is acceptable to God, or of any avail to men; for calling on the name of the Lord, as it ought to be practiſed in all religious worſhip, ſo it includes faith, and every part of worſhip as done in faith: and how ſhall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? the meaning is, that there is no faith in Chriſt without hearing of him; as it is in human, ſo in divine faith, there may be believing without ſeeing, but not without hearing; ſo we believe that there were ſuch men as Alexander and Julius Cæſar, and other perſons now in being, tho' we never ſaw them, having heard of them, or had a report made of them, which we have reaſon to give credit to; ſo there may be, and is faith in Chriſt without ſeeing him with our bodily eyes, tho' not without hearing of him; for of an unheard of perſon, there can be no faith in him, becauſe no exerciſe of thought about him. This is to be underſtood of outward hearing of the word, and of adult perſons only; for that infants may have the grace of regeneration, and ſo faith wrought in them by the Spirit of God, without hearing the word, is not to be denied; ſince as they are capable of the principles of corruption, why not of grace? and alſo of ſuch perſons as have the right and free exerciſe of the faculties of hearing, and ſpeaking, and not of ſuch who never could hear, and ſpeak; for as the Spirit works where, and how he pleaſes, ſo he can work faith in the hearts of ſuch perſons who never heard the word, and enable them to exerciſe it on the proper object, and cauſe them ſecretly to call upon the name of the Lord, with groans which cannot be uttered. Moreover, this is to be underſtood of the ordinary way and means of believing; for tho' God can, and ſometimes does work by other means, and even without any, yet his uſual way and method is, to bring men to faith and repentance by the hearing of the word: and how ſhall they hear without a preacher? or there's no hearing without preaching; there may be reading without it, and this ought to be where there is preaching, to ſee that what is preached is agreeable to the ſcriptures; but there is no hearing the word explained without preaching; explaining the word is preaching. There is no hearing of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him, without the preaching of the Goſpel; the uſual and ordinary way of hearing from God, and of Chriſt, is by the miniſtry of the word: this ſhews not only the neceſſity and uſefulneſs of the Goſpel-miniſtry, but alſo points out the ſubject matter of it, which is Chriſt, and him crucified. They that preach ought to preach concerning the perſon of Chriſt, his offices, grace, righteouſneſs, blood, ſacrifice and ſatisfaction, otherwiſe men may hear the preacher, and not hear Chriſt.

Ver. 15. And how ſhall they preach, except they be ſent, &c.] There's no proper, rightful, regular, and lawful preaching of the word without a miſſion, which is either extraordinary, or ordinary; extraordinary miſſion, was ſuch as the Apoſtles themſelves had; who as they were called to extraordinary ſervice, had extraordinary qualifications, and were ſent forth in an extraordinary manner, with a power of doing miracles, and immediately by Chriſt himſelf. Ordinary miſſion is of men to be paſtors and teachers, which includes qualifications for the miniſterial work; for whom Chriſt ſends forth into ſuch ſervice, he beſtows gifts on them, fitting them for it, ſome more, ſome leſs, but all have ſome; and it alſo includes a call unto it, which is either internal, and by the Spirit of God, and lies partly in the furniture he gives, and the inclination of the heart to this good work which he forms; and which ariſes not from a vanity of mind, and a deſire of popular applauſe, and worldly views, and ſiniſter ends; but from a real concern for the good of ſouls, and the glory of Chriſt, being willing to deny themſelves, and forſake all for Chriſt, to ſuffer reproach for his name ſake, and to forego all worldly intereſt, and ſecular views: or is external, which is given by the churches of Chriſt, after due trial and examination of gifts, and a ſerious conſideration of the matter, and that in the moſt ſolemn manner; and this is what may be properly called a preacher's miſſion, and none but ſuch who are in this way ſent out, ought to preach the Goſpel: and to ſuch well agrees, and may be applied, that paſſage in Iſa. lii. 7. where it is written, how beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Goſpel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things; which words are not to be underſtood of the meſſengers that brought the tidings of deliverance from the Babyloniſh captivity, but of the miniſters of the Goſpel. In the text in Iſaiah it is expreſſed in the ſingular number, how beautiful are the feet of him, &c. and is by ſome underſtood of Chriſt, as it is alſo by many Jewiſh writers: thus interpreting the turtle's voice in Cant. ii. 12. "this, "ſay they [a], is the voice of the king Meſſiah, pro-"claiming and ſaying, how beautiful on the moun-"tains, &c." And elſewhere [b] it is obſerved, that the "Rabbins ſay, great is peace for when "the king Meſſiah comes, he does not open but "with peace, as it is ſaid, how beautiful upon the "mountains, &c." And ſays [c] another, "one "verſe ſays, how beautiful upon the mountains are "the feet of him, that bringeth good tidings, "פירש המלך המשיח, the explanation, or meaning "is, the king Meſſiah:" and ſome of the more modern ones [d] of them, own theſe words are, מענין הגאולה וביאת המשיח, concerning the redemption, and the coming of the Meſſiah: and ſo the words, however they may principally regard the Meſſiah and his miniſtry, are properly applied to the Apoſtles of Chriſt; and may be rightly underſtood of any miniſter of the Goſpel, whoſe buſineſs it is to preach the Goſpel of peace: which is ſo called, from the ſubject matter of it, peace made by the blood of Chriſt, which it proclaims; from the effect of it, producing peace and tranquillity in diſtreſſed minds, and making men of peaceable diſpoſitions; and from the uſe of it, which is to direct men to the way of peace, to guide their feet in it, and lead them to eternal peace: their work is alſo to bring glad tidings of good things; ſuch as reconciliation, righteouſneſs, pardon, life, and eternal ſalvation, by a crucified Chriſt; and the preaching of ſuch a Goſpel, and bringing ſuch news, make their feet beautiful: one ſhould have thought, rather their lips than their feet, would be took notice of; the reaſon of this is, partly becauſe of the agreeableneſs of their walk and converſation to the doctrine they preach; and partly becauſe of their readineſs to preach it every where, though they run the utmoſt riſque in ſo doing; and alſo becauſe of their ſwiftneſs, particularly of the Apoſtles, in going through the cities of Iſrael, and running over the Gentile world with the Goſpel of peace, in ſo ſhort a time they did; and more eſpecially becauſe of the acceptableneſs of their meſſage, with which they were ſent and ran; ſee 2 Sam. xviii. 27. And ſo this paſſage is pertinently alledged to prove, that miſſion is neceſſary to preaching; ſince theſe words declare the character of Goſpel miniſters, as publiſhers of peace, and meſſengers of good tidings; and expreſs the meſſage itſelf, and the nature of it; both which ſuppoſe them to be ſent by another, even the Lord, under whoſe authority, and by whoſe warrant they act; juſt as ambaſſadors, heralds, and meſſengers do, by virtue of a commiſſion they receive from their prince.

Ver. 16. But they have not all obeyed the Goſpel, &c.] Who hear it, and to whom it is preached; for though miniſters may be regularly ſent forth, and rightly preach the Goſpel in the purity of it, yet there's no ſucceſs, without the power of God attending it: miniſters may preach, and men may hear, and yet not obey the Goſpel; that is, cordially embrace the doctrines, and ſincerely ſubmit to the ordinances of it: for Eſaias ſaith, Lord, who hath believed our report; or our hearing, agreeable to the Hebrew word in Iſa. liii. 1. שמועתנו, and which deſigns not the hearing with which the Apoſtles heard Chriſt, though what they heard from him, they made known to men; but the hearing, or the word heard, which others had from them, namely, the report they made in their miniſtry, of the perſon and grace of Chriſt, which was diſregarded, when the arm and power of the Lord were not revealed and exerted: this was the caſe of the Jews in Iſaiah's time, and the ſame in the times of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and is always the caſe, when divine power does not attend the preaching of the Goſpel.

Ver. 17. So then faith comes by hearing, &c.] That is, by preaching; for the word hearing, is uſed in the ſame ſenſe, as in the preceding verſe; and deſigns the report of the Goſpel, or the preaching of the word, which is the means God makes uſe of, to convey faith into the hearts of his people; for preachers are miniſters, or inſtruments, by whom others believe: and hearing by the word of God; or of Chriſt, as ſome copies read, and ſo do the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions; and intends either the holy ſcriptures, which have God for their author, and Chriſt for the ſubject of them; and which furniſh the men of God, or miniſters of the Goſpel, with proper materials to preach; and ſo hearing or preaching, is by them: or elſe the command of God or Chriſt, which ρημα more properly ſignifies; and the ſenſe is, that men preach the Goſpel, is in obedience to the commandment of the everlaſting God, and according to the orders, miſſion, and commiſſion, warrant, and authority, of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt: and ſo theſe words are the concluſion, and ſum of the whole; that as invocation is owing to faith, ſo faith to hearing, hearing to preaching, preaching to a miſſion; whence it follows, that it is the original will of God, to ſend forth his Apoſtles and miniſters, to preach the Goſpel to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews; that they hearing might believe, and believing call upon the Lord, and ſo be ſaved by him: it is a ſaying of the Jews, שמיעה בדבור תליא, hearing depends upon the word [e].

Ver. 18. But I ſay, have they not heard? &c.] ואני אומר, but I ſay, is a phraſe frequently uſed by the Jewiſh doctors in diſputation, either in forming or anſwering objections. The Ethiopic verſion confines theſe words to Iſrael, and reads, have not Iſrael heard? whereas they are to be underſtood both of Jews and Gentiles; the queſtion refers to each, and the anſwer is, yes, verily: which the Arabic renders juſt the reverſe, no, or not at all, notwithſtanding their ſound went into all the earth; and ſo makes this an aggravation of their ſtupidity, and obſtinate rejection of the Goſpel, that they would not hear it, though its ſound reached every place; but the anſwer is in the affirmative, they did hear. The Jews heard the Goſpel in the times of Iſaiah, and other prophets, though they diſbelieved the report of it; they heard it from John the Baptiſt, and were pleaſed with his miniſtry for a while; yea, they heard Chriſt himſelf preach it, who ſpake as never man did, with power and authority, as the Scribes did not, and wondered at his gracious words; they heard the Apoſtles of Chriſt, who for ſome time were limited in their miniſtry to them only, and after their commiſſion was enlarged, were ordered to preach firſt to them; ſo that they could not ſay they had not heard it, and they were left entirely inexcuſable. The Gentiles alſo had heard it; the Apoſtles were bid to go into all the world, and preach the Goſpel to every creature; and at a proper opportunity, they did as the Lord commanded them, and the Gentiles heard the Goſpel with joy and pleaſure; multitudes were converted every where, and churches raiſed through their miniſtry, according to the will of God: thus their ſound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world; the paſſage referred to, is Pſal. xix. 4. which ſome here, as there, underſtand literally of the works of nature, the heavens, the firmament, the ſun, moon, and ſtars, proclaiming every where the being of God, his perfections, eſpecially his wiſdom, power, and goodneſs; ſo that the Gentiles were not without hearing of God, even whilſt they were deſtitute of a divine revelation; which was a ſort of a prelude of the after extenſive ſpread of the Goſpel among them: a voice, or ſound, is aſcribed to the inanimate creatures; and which is ſo loud, that it reaches to the end of the earth. There are three voices the Jews ſay[f], which go from one end of the world to the other; and one of them is, קול גלגל חמה, the voice of the orb of the ſun: others underſtand theſe words of the law, of which many encomiums are given in the Pſalm, from whence this paſſage is taken; and though it was delivered peculiarly to the people of the Jews, yet the fame of it reached the nations of the world, as Moſes ſuggeſts it would, Deut. iv. 6. and the Jews ſay[g], "that when the law was given "to Iſrael, קולו הולך מסוף העולם ועד סופו, its "voice went from one end of the world to the other." Or as it is better expreſſed by Philo[h], and almoſt in the words of this text, "the fame of the laws "which Moſes left, is gone throughout all the "world, unto the ends of the earth." But certain it is, that the Apoſtle is ſpeaking neither of the light of nature, nor of the law of Moſes, but of the preaching of the Goſpel; and what the Pſalmiſt literally underſtood, ſays of the heavens, that the Apoſtle in an allegorical and myſtical ſenſe, or by an argument from the leſſer to the greater, or by way of alluſion, applies to the Apoſtles and miniſters of the Goſpel, the luminaries of the world, and ſtars of heaven; whoſe miniſtry by this time, had reached the then known parts of the habitable world; as it was to do, before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, according to Chriſt's prediction, Matt. xxiv. 14. and as the Apoſtle Paul teſtifies it had, Col. i. 6. and in which he himſelf had a very conſiderable ſhare, having preached the Goſpel from Jeruſalem, round about unto Illyricum. There is ſome little difference between the paſſage in the Pſalms, and as cited or referred to by the Apoſtle, who inſtead of their line, reads their ſound; which have made ſome ſuſpect a corruption of the preſent Hebrew text, or a various reading; and that the Septuagint followed by the Apoſtle, uſed a copy which had not, קום, their line, but קולם, their voice, and which was the true reading; but then how came the Chaldee paraphraſe to render it by, מתח, extenſion, and Aquila by κανων, a canon, or rule? and beſides, the Maſora obſerves, that this word is no where elſe read, which is not true of, קולם, for that often occurs; to which may be added, had this been the reading, the Septuagint would have rendered it moſt probably, as they do elſewhere, by voice, and not ſound: but for the reconciliation of this let it be obſerved, that the Hebrew word ſignifies a rule, or plummet, or ſuch a line as builders uſe in their work, as a direction to them, hence Kimchi[i] explains it by, בניינם, their building; and ſo it may ſignify any rule, or direction, whether given by writing, and ſo Aben Ezra[k] interprets it by, מכתב, writing, or by word of mouth; beſides, the carpenter's line when ſtretched out, and remitted upon the timber, makes a ſound, and hence the word might be uſed for one: all this agrees with the miniſtry of the Apoſtles, who were builders; and as they worked by a line and rule themſelves, ſo they gave out rules and directions to others, both by writing and preaching, both which reached far and near; this the Apoſtle ſeems to allude to, in 2 Cor. x. 13, 14, 15, 16. where he ſpeaks of the meaſure, line, and rule, of their miniſtry, which reached to Corinth and further, without going into another man's line: moreover, that great Oriental critick, and our countryman, Mr. Pocock[l], has ſhewn from the uſe of the word קוה, in the Arabic language, that the word in the Pſalms may ſignify a loud cry, or noiſe, as well as a line, or rule; ſo that the Pſalmiſt and the Apoſtle may be eaſily reconciled.

Ver. 19. But I ſay, did not Iſrael know? &c.] Some ſupply the word God, did not Iſrael know God? verily, they did; they knew the being and perfections of God, the unity of God, and the trinity of perſons in the divine eſſence; they knew the will of God, and the right way of worſhipping him; for they were favoured with a divine revelation; to them were committed the oracles of God, and to them belonged the giving of the law, and the ſervice of God: others ſupply the word Goſpel, did not Iſrael know the Goſpel? yes, they did; they not only heard it, but knew it; not ſpiritually and experimentally, but notionally and ſpeculatively, and againſt the light and conviction of their own minds, obſtinately rejected it with contempt: but I rather think this queſtion refers to the calling of the Gentiles, and their own rejection; and the ſenſe is, did not Iſrael know, that the Gentiles were to be called by the grace of God, and that they themſelves were to be caſt off? they did know this, at leaſt ſomething of it, though not ſo clearly as it is now revealed to the holy Apoſtles and Prophets, by the Spirit; but in ſome meaſure they could not but know it, ſince there were ſuch ſtrong hints of it in the writings of the Old Teſtament, ſome of which are hereafter produced: firſt Moſes ſaith; not Moſes the firſt, as if there was another, or a ſecond Moſes, but either Moſes, who is the firſt of the inſpired writers, and chief of the Prophets; or rather this regards order of time, Moſes in the firſt place ſays ſo and ſo, for other teſtimonies are after cited; the paſſage in Moſes referred to, is Deut. xxxii. 21. I will provoke you to jealouſy by them that are no people, and by a fooliſh nation I will anger you. The Gentiles are here deſigned, by them that are no people; who before God, and in his ſight, as all nations are, were as a drop of the bucket, as the ſmall duſt of the balance; nay, even as nothing, yea, leſs than nothing and vanity: likewiſe they were no people of any account, of any name; they were mean and contemptible, neglected and overlooked by God himſelf, ſelf, and treated with contempt by the Jews, his profeſſing people: and beſides, they were not as yet openly and viſibly the people of God; they neither called upon his name, nor were they called by his name; he had not as yet taken from among them a people for his name: theſe are alſo meant, by the fooliſh nation; Jarchi[m] ſays, the Cuthites, or Samaritans, are intended; who were neighbours to the Jews, and greatly hated by them: but it may more rightly be applied to all the Gentiles in general, who notwithſtanding their large pretenſions to natural, civil, and moral wiſdom, yet being without the true knowledge of God, Chriſt, and the Goſpel, were a fooliſh people; and in nothing more did their folly appear, than in their idolatry and ſuperſtition. Now the Lord threatened by theſe people, to provoke the Jews to jealouſy, and to anger them; and this was but juſt, and by way of retaliation; for ſince they provoked him to jealouſy and anger, by worſhipping ſtrange gods, which plainly declared their want of faith in him, affection for him, and their departure from him; it was a righteous thing in him, to provoke them to jealouſy of him, as if he had no affection for them, who had been ſo long in ſome ſenſe, an huſband to them all; and as about to caſt them off; and to anger them, by ſending his Goſpel among the Gentiles, and calling them by his grace, and making them partakers of his ſpecial favours; whereby this prophecy had its full accompliſhment: for though the Jews rejected and deſpiſed the Goſpel themſelves, yet nothing more provoked them, than that it ſhould be carried among the Gentiles; ſee Acts xxii. 21, 22. 1 Theſſ. ii. 16. Now from theſe words of Moſes, the Iſraelites muſt needs know, they could not but know that it was the will of God to call the Gentiles, and reject them.

Ver. 20. But Eſaias is very bold, and ſaith, &c.] The Apoſtle here produces another teſtimony in proof of this, that the Iſraelites muſt needs have ſome knowledge of this truth, the calling of the Gentiles; ſince a famous prophet of theirs, Iſaiah, alſo ſpake it out with great freedom; he did not mince the matter, or cover it with dark ſayings, but with all plainneſs and perſpicuity, and with great courage and intrepidity declared it; though he knew he run the riſque, not only of his fame and credit among the Jews, but of his life alſo, for ſo doing: the citation is made from Iſa. lxv. 1. I was found of them that ſought me not, I was made manifeſt unto them that aſked not after me; here alſo the Gentiles are meant, by them that ſought me not, and aſked not after me; the Meſſiah; and ſo R. Moſes the prieſt ſays[n], that theſe words are to be underſtood, על אומות העולם, concerning the nations of the world. The common people among them, ſought after the things of the world; their philoſophers ſought after the wiſdom of it; and the more devout and religious among them, ſought the obſervance of ſuperſtitious rites and ceremonies, and at beſt and moſt, a little morality and external righteouſneſs; but none ſought after Chriſt, for they knew nothing of him, and therefore did not ſo much as aſk after him; they did not aſk counſel of him, nor aſk concerning him, nor aſk for him; not for his coming into the world, as the Jews did, nor for the preaching of the Goſpel among them, for it came among them unaſked for, unexpected, and undeſired, as well as undeſerved by them, nor for any bleſſing of his; and yet ſuch was his grace and goodneſs, that he was found of theſe perſons, in the preaching of the Goſpel; which by his kind providence was brought among them, and they were brought under the hearing of it; and by the Spirit of God directed to him in it, in whom they found life, peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, food, and reſt, and every valuable bleſſing; a pearl of great price they found, a finding which can never be loſt: he is alſo ſaid to be made manifeſt unto them, not in the fleſh, but in the miniſtry of the word; in which his perſon, blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice, are evidently ſet forth, and clearly manifeſted; and beſides the outward manifeſtation of Chriſt to them by the Goſpel, they had an internal revelation of him in their hearts by his Spirit, ſetting forth to them his grace and fulneſs, and ſhewing them their intereſt therein: from this prophecy alſo, the Jews could not but have ſome knowledge of this myſtery of grace.

Ver. 21. But to Iſrael he ſaith, &c.] Or againſt Iſrael, or concerning Iſrael, he ſaith in the ſame prophecy in the next verſe, ver. 2. All day long I have ſtretched forth my hands, unto a diſobedient and gainſaying people; very rightly does the Apoſtle apply theſe words to Iſrael, as he does the former to the Gentiles; and juſt in like manner does the abovementioned Jewiſh writer, R. Moſes the prieſt, interpret them. The Lord's ſtretching out his hands all the day long to them, deſigns the miniſtry of the prophets one after another to them, the preaching of John the Baptiſt, of Chriſt and his Apoſtles among them: but they were a ſtiff necked and rebellious people, uncircumciſed in heart and ears; would have none of his counſel, and deſpiſed his reproof; contradicted and blaſphemed the word; rejected the Meſſiah and his Goſpel; killed the prince of life, and perſecuted his Apoſtles; ſo that it was juſt with God to write a lo ammi upon them, and caſt them off; and to pave the way for the account of the rejection of theſe people in the next chapter, is all this ſaid, and theſe teſtimonies produced.

CHAP. XI.

THE Apoſtle having ſpoken of the calling of the Gentiles, and given a hint of the perverſeneſs of the Jews in ſlighting the Goſpel, proceeds in this chapter to treat of their rejection; in which he ſhews, that it was not univerſal, though of the greater part in his time; and which he confirms by ſome paſſages out of the Old Teſtament, and then points at the end and deſign of God in the caſting them off; and exhorts the Gentiles not to inſult them, but to learn to be humble and cautious by what was done to them; and foretels the converſion of the Jews in the latter day which will be general, ſo that their rejection is not final; and reſolves the whole diſpenſation of God, both with reſpect to Jews and Gentiles, into the unſearchable wiſdom and ſovereign will of God: he begins with an objection he ſaw would be made upon what he had ſaid, concerning the calling of the Gentiles, and the unbelief of the Jews, that then God had wholly caſt off his people, ver. 1. to which he anſwers, with a God forbid, by way of deteſtation; and by inſtancing in himſelf, who was of the people of the Jews, and yet was called; and by diſtinguiſhing between ſome and others among them; there were

ſome who were foreknown, loved, and choſen of God from everlaſting; theſe were not caſt off, but others who were not foreknown, ver. 2. and then he illuſtrates the preſent caſe of the Jews by obſerving, how it was with them in the times of Elias; who though he complained of their apoſtacy and cruelty, and imagined that there were none left but himſelf, that worſhipped the true God, yet there were then ſeven thouſand, which were preſerved from the idolatry of Baal, ver. 2, 3, 4. and ſo the Apoſtle obſerves it was now, ver. 5. there was a ſmall number whom God of his free grace had choſen, and reſerved for himſelf, and ſo were not all caſt away, as the objection ſuggeſted; and having called this choice an election of grace, he argues the contrariety and inconſiſtency of grace and works in this affair, ver. 6. and ſince it appeared that there were two ſorts of people among them, one that were choſen and the other not, hence it was that though Iſrael did not obtain righteouſneſs they ſought for, yet they that were choſen obtained it, and ſo were not caſt away, when the reſt were, ver. 7. and that ſo it ſhould be, or that this ſhould be the caſe of the greater part of the Jews, that they ſhould be given up to blindneſs and hardneſs of heart, the Apoſtle proves by ſome teſtimonies of Iſaiah and David, which he produces, ver. 8, 9, 10. hence follows an objection, that if this be the caſe, then God had appointed them to ſtumble, that they might fall, even all of them, and always continue fallen; to which the Apoſtle anſwers with a God forbid, as uſual, when any thing is objected which is abhorred; and by obſerving the view, event, and order of things; ſhewing, that the fall of the Jews, iſſued in the ſalvation of the Gentiles; and the ſalvation of the Gentiles, was to provoke the Jews to ſeek the ſame mercy, ver. 11. and then follows an improvement and illuſtration of this end, or event of their fall, ver. 12. that if the fall and leſſening of the Jews, were the means of enriching the Gentiles with the riches of Chriſt and his grace, what a glory muſt be brought to them, when they ſhould all of them be converted and join them! and that the rejection of the Jews, was neither total or final, the Apoſtle argues from his office, even as an Apoſtle of the Gentiles, whom he addreſſes as ſuch, ver. 13. and from his view and end in executing that office, which was to provoke the Jews to emulate the Gentiles, and ſo ſave ſome of them, ver. 14. and then he repeats in other words, ver. 15. the argument he had uſed in ver. 12. and proves the future converſion of the Jews, from the inſtances of converſion and ſanctification, which had been, and were then among them; which were as the firſt-fruits to the lump, and the root to the branches; and were pledges and tokens, of a general converſion and ſanctification of them hereafter, ver. 16. and by occaſion of the metaphor of the root and branches before uſed, he expreſſes the rejection of the Jews, by the breaking off ſome of the branches, and the reception of the Gentiles, by their engrafture into a Goſpel church-ſtate, among the converted Jews, enjoying the ſame privileges with them, ver. 17. and ſince they were originally of a wild olive-tree, and merely of grace partook of the root and fatneſs of the good olive of the Goſpel church-ſtate, as conſiſting firſt of the Jews, they ought not to be haughty and inſolent, and boaſt and brag over the Jews, ſince they were beholden to them, and not the Jews to them, ver. 18. and whereas an objection might be made, that the Jews were caſt off, to make room for the Gentiles, ver. 19. and therefore the one muſt be more deſerving than the other; the Apoſtle replies to it, ver. 20. by granting, that the one were broken off, or rejected, that the other might be engraſted, or taken in; but then as it was owing to unbelief in the Jews that they were caſt off, in which the Gentiles were before converſion as well as they, ſo it was by faith they ſtood in their church-relation, which was the gift of God, and owing to his grace; ſo that their engraſture and continuance in a Goſpel church-ſtate, were not the effect of merit in them; wherefore he gives them this good advice, not to be proud and lifted up with their privileges, as though they were of their own deſerving, but to fear the Lord and his goodneſs, from whence they ſprung; and ſuggeſts, that they ſhould be ſo far from making ſuch an uſe of the rejection of the Jews, that it ought rather to engage them to caution, care, and fear; for they were the natural branches in the olive-tree, and if theſe were not ſpared when behaving diſagreeably, they muſt not expect to fare otherwiſe, who were originally of the wild olive-tree, ſhould they act unworthy of the privileges they enjoyed, ver. 21. wherefore the Apoſtle recommends to their ſerious conſideration, the ſeverity of God, in the caſting off of the Jews, and his goodneſs in taking in them the Gentiles; and threatens them with cutting off, ſhould they ſlight, neglect, or miſuſe the goodneſs of God to them in his houſe and ordinances, ver. 22. and on the other hand, an intimation is given, that the Jews, though broken off, ſhall be grafted in again, ſhould their unbelief diſcontinue, and faith in Chriſt be given them, which was not impoſſible with God; he is able both to remove their unbelief, give them faith, and re-inſtate them in a church-relation, ver. 23. and as it is without doubt he can do it, it looks very likely that he will; which may be argued from the engraſture of the Gentiles, who were like the olive-tree, wild by nature; were cut out from thence, and contrary to nature, grafted into the good olive-tree; wherefore by an argument from the leſſer to the greater, much more may it be thought, that the Jews, the natural branches, will in God's own time, be grafted in their former church-ſtate, ſome of their anceſtors were in, ver. 24. yea, the Apoſtle argues the certainty of their converſion, and re-inſtatement into the Goſpel church, from the deſign of providence in ſuffering blindneſs in part to happen to them; which was not intended always to continue, only until all the elect of God are gathered in among the Gentiles; and this myſtery of providence and grace, he thought fit to acquaint the Gentiles with, leſt they ſhould be conceited of themſelves, as if they only ſhared the favour of God, and were deſerving of it, to the contempt of the Jews, ver. 25. Moreover, the Apoſtle affirms that all Iſrael ſhall be ſaved, ver. 26. which is conſequentially deduced from what he had ſaid, and which he proves by a paſſage out of Iſa. lix. 20. and by its being a principal part of the covenant, which God has made with them, which he will not break, but ſhall be fulfilled; when he ſhall make them ſenſible of their ſins, and take them away by the application of his pardoning grace, ver. 27. and whereas the implacable enmity of the Jews to Chriſt and his Goſpel, might be objected to ſuch a gracious procedure of God towards them, the Apoſtle removes the objection, by granting that they were enemies to the Goſpel on account of the Gentiles, to whom it was preached; but then there was a choſen people among them, who were beloved of God; which would be made manifeſt, becauſe of the oath and promiſe made unto their fathers, ver. 28. wherefore as the purpoſes, promiſes, and covenant of God are immutable, ſo the gifts of his grace, and the calling of his people included in them, are things certain and irrevocable, ver. 29. and ſo the calling of the Jews, and the gifts of his grace deſigned for them, which is another proof of their vocation and converſion; and which is further argued, and made both more probable and certain, by comparing the caſe of the Jews and Gentiles together; as for the Gentiles, they were formerly infidels and obtained mercy, through the unbelief of the Jews, ver. 30. wherefore arguing from the leſs probable to that which is more ſo, the Jews, though for the preſent unbelievers, yet it may be thought, that through the mercy the Gentiles had received, they would ſome time or other be provoked to ſeek for, and ſo obtain the ſame mercy, ver. 31. and the rather this may be given into and received, not only becauſe they both have been in a ſtate of unbelief, but the end and deſign of God in concluding them in it, were to have mercy on each of them, ver. 32. which diſpenſation of God both to one and to the other by turns, in different ways, was ſo amazing and unaccountable to the Apoſtle, that he breaks out into admiration at the wiſdom and knowledge of God; which were ſo abundant, that they could not be ſearched out, conceived of, and expreſſed, ver. 33. the reaſons of which lay in his own breaſt, and are only known to himſelf, no one having known his mind, or been his counſellor, ver. 34. nor is he obliged to give an account of his matters, and the reaſons of his proceedings, to any of his creatures; he is not indebted to them for any thing, nor does he any injuſtice to any of them, by whatſoever ſteps he takes in providence and grace; let that appear, and recompence will be made, ver. 35. every thing muſt be reſolved into his ſovereign will and pleaſure, and ſo this of chuſing ſome, and leaving others, of rejecting the Jews, and receiving the Gentiles, and alſo that of calling the Jews again; as it is reaſonable every thing ſhould, ſince all things are from him, through him, and to him, ver. 36. and ſo all glory is due unto him, and here ends the doctrinal part of this epiſtle.

Ver. 1. I ſay then, hath God caſt away his people? &c.] The Alexandrian copy adds here, whom he foreknew, as in the next verſe: upon the citation of the above paſſages out of Moſes and Iſaiah, relating to the calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews, the Apoſtle ſaw an objection would ariſe, which he here takes up from the mouth of an adverſary, and propoſes it; in which is ſuggeſted, that God has caſt away all his people the Jews, according to this account; and if ſo, where's his covenant with Abraham? what's become of his promiſes? and how is his faithfulneſs to be accounted for? and what hope can any Iſraelite have, of ever obtaining ſalvation? than which, nothing can be thought more injurious to God, and abſurd in itſelf. This was an old prejudice of the Jewiſh nation, and ſtill continues, that God never would, nor has he caſt them away, even in their preſent condition; it is one of the articles of their creed, received by the Karaites[*], a ſect among them, that "the bleſſed God, לא מאס לאנשי הגלות, hath "not caſt away the men of the captivity, though "they are under the chaſtizements of God; but "it is fit that they ſhould every day obtain ſalva"tion by the hands of Meſſiah, the ſon of David." Now to this objection the Apoſtle makes anſwer; firſt, in his uſual way, God forbid, when any thing was objected which was diſpleaſing to him, abhorred by him, which was not agreeable to the perfections of God, to the truth of his word, and promiſes, and could by no means be admitted of; and next by obſerving his own caſe, which was a ſtanding inſtance to the contrary; for God had choſen him unto eternal ſalvation, Chriſt had redeemed him by his blood, and he was effectually called by grace; and as to his eternal ſtate, he had no doubt or ſcruple about it; and beſides, the Lord had made him a miniſter of the Goſpel, had greatly qualified him for that work, had raiſed him to the high office of an Apoſtle, and had made him very uſeful to the ſouls of many, both Jews and Gentiles; and yet he was one of the nation of the Jews, and therefore God had not caſt them all away, as the objection inſinuates: for I alſo am an Iſraelite; according to the fleſh, by lineal deſcent from Jacob or Iſrael; ſee 2 Cor. xi. 22. Phil. iii. 5. as well as in a ſpiritual ſenſe: of the ſeed of Abraham; the grandfather of Iſrael; the head of the Jewiſh nation he was, both of his natural and of his ſpiritual ſeed, who is the father of us all: of the tribe of Benjamin; a very little tribe, which in the time of the Judges was near being deſtroyed, and upon the return from the captivity of Babylon, was very ſmall, as it was at this time; and yet God had not caſt away this, much leſs all the tribes of Iſrael.

Ver. 2. God hath not caſt away his people which he foreknew, &c.] The Apoſtle goes on with his anſwer to the objection, by diſtinguiſhing and explaining, who he meant by the people God had not caſt away, namely, which were foreknown by him; for all mankind are in a ſenſe his people, being made, maintained, and ſupported in their beings by him, yet they are not all foreknown; for were they, they would be all predeſtinated, called, conformed to the image of Chriſt, juſtified and glorified; but ſome of them will be caſt away, being bad and wicked, and will be ſent into everlaſting puniſhment: and though the people of the Jews in general, were the people of God, being in a ſenſe choſe, known, and diſtinguiſhed by him from the reſt of the world, yet they were not all a foreknown people, in the ſenſe the Apoſtle uſes the word; wherefore a great number of them were caſt away, of which afterwards the Apoſtle ſpeaks largely in this chapter; but then there were a people among them, that were the people of God in a more ſpecial ſenſe; they were choſen by him from everlaſting to be his people; they were taken into the covenant of his grace as ſuch; they were given to Chriſt as his people, and were redeemed and ſaved by him on that account; and were, or were to be called, with an holy calling, when they are openly declared to be the people of God, whom he foreknew: he not merely knew them before, by his general preſcience and foreknowledge, which extends to all perſons and things; or foreſaw their faith, holineſs, and good works, and ſo choſe them for himſelf; for faith, holineſs, and good works, are fruits and effects of electing grace; but he ſo knew them before, even from all eternity, as that he approved of them, liked them, loved them, and took delight and complacency in them: now theſe his people he never did, nor never will caſt away. Their numbers may be but very ſmall in ſome periods of time, yet none of them are caſt away; God may not immediately ariſe to their help and aſſiſtance in time of diſtreſs, or ſo ſoon as they deſire and expect; he may withdraw his preſence, hide himſelf, and ſtand at a diſtance from them; he may afflict them in a fatherly way, when they may think he has caſt them off, or caſt them away; whereas he never caſts any of them away, not out of his heart's love, nor out of his ſight, nor out of the covenant of his grace, nor out of the hands of his Son, nor out of his family, or ſo as that any of them ſhall periſh eternally; ſo far from it, that he takes the utmoſt delight in them, grants them the greateſt nearneſs to himſelf, bears the ſtrongeſt affection for them, and takes the moſt diligent care of them; whoever caſts them out of their affection and company, he will not; the reaſons are, becauſe his love to them is unchangeable, his purpoſe concerning their ſalvation ſtands firm and ſure, his word and oath are unalterable, his gifts and calling are without repentance; and they are his jewels, portion, and inheritance; they are as the apple of his eye, and continually held by his right-hand. The Apoſtle next replies to this objection, by putting them in mind of the caſe and ſtate of the church of God, in the times of Elijah; and what judgment that prophet formed of it, and in which he appeared to be miſtaken: wot ye not what the ſcripture ſaith of Elias? do ye not know? ye cannot be ignorant who have, and read the ſcripture, what it ſays of Elias, or in Elias; that is, as the Arabic verſion renders it, in the hiſtory of Elias; in the account it gives of his life and times: how he maketh interceſſion to God againſt Iſrael, ſaying; that is, how he ſpoke to God in prayer, concerning Iſrael; and inſtead of praying for them, as the prophets were wont to do, he was obliged to bring a complaint againſt them for their idolatry, contempt of the worſhip of God, and violent perſecution of his true followers. The Apoſtle choſe to mention this inſtance, becauſe there was ſome likeneſs between his caſe and Elijah's; and the ſtate of the people of Iſrael at the then preſent time, and as in the times of Elijah; for as the Jews in his time killed and perſecuted the prophets of the Lord, ſo in the preſent time, they had killed the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and perſecuted his Apoſtles; and as Elijah, though one of their own prophets, was obliged to make interceſſion againſt them, ſo the Apoſtle, though one of their own countrymen, could not but ſpeak againſt them, and of their juſt rejection by God: and this he obſerves, to ſoften their reſentments againſt him, when ſo great a prophet had done ſo before him: and this the Jews themſelves own [p], for they ſay that Elijah, מדבר קטיגורייא על ישראל, brought an accuſation againſt Iſrael: and it is obſerved by another [q], that "coals are ſaid of Iſaiah and Elijah, becauſe they delivered an accuſation againſt Iſrael; one called them a people of unclean lips, "and the other ſaid, for they have forſaken thy "covenant:" which is the Apoſtle's ſenſe.

[*] Apud Trigland. de Sect. Karæorum, c. 10. p. 151.

Ver. 3. Lord, they have killed thy prophets, &c.] By the order of Jezebel, wife of Ahab king of Iſrael, 1 Kings xviii. 4. This ſin of ſlaying the prophets of the Lord, is charged upon the Jews by Chriſt, Matt. xxiii. 31, 37. and by the Apoſtle, 1 Theſſ. ii. 15. In the text in 1 Kings xix. 14. 'tis added, with the ſword; which expreſſes the manner of death they were put to; and this clauſe is there put after the following, according to a rule of tranſpoſition among the Jews; ſee it in the note on Matt. xxvii. 10. And digged down thine altars; either the altars which the patriarchs had formerly built, and were ſtill in being; and though not uſed, yet were kept and had in great veneration; wherefore the pulling of them down, was done in contempt of them, and of the worſhip of God, which had been formerly performed there; or elſe ſuch altars, which the religious among the ten tribes built, ſince the times of Jeroboam, who forbad them to go up to Jeruſalem, but ordered them to go to Dan or Bethel; which they not chuſing to do, erected altars in different places for divine ſervice, and which the Jews [r] ſay were allowed; for from that time, the prohibition of altars at other places then at Jeruſalem ceaſed: and I am left alone; meaning either as a prophet, not knowing that Obadiah had hid an hundred prophets by fifty in a cave, 1 Kings xviii. 4. or elſe as a worſhipper of the true God, imagining that he was the only perſon in Iſrael, that had a true zeal for the Lord of hoſts: and they ſeek my life; lay in wait for it, Jezebel by her emiſſaries being in queſt of him; 'tis added in 1 Kings xix. 14. to take it away; for ſhe had ſwore by her gods, that by the morrow about that time, his life ſhould be as the life of one of the prophets of Baal he had ſlain; and in one copy it is added here.

Ver. 4. But what ſaith the anſwer of God unto him? &c.] The divine reſponſe, or oracle; the בת קול, Bath Kol, or voice from heaven; the ſtill ſmall voice of the Lord, which Elijah heard: I have reſerved to myſelf; for his worſhip and ſervice, to be partakers of his grace, inheritors of his kingdom, to ſhew forth his praiſe, and for his name's ſake, for his honour and glory: theſe he reſerved in eternal election, in the council and covenant of peace; ſeparated them in time from others by his grace, and preſerved them from the general defection and apoſtacy: even ſeven thouſand men; meaning either that preciſe and exact number, which was but ſmall in compariſon of the very large multitude of perſons that were in the ten tribes, or elſe a certain number for an uncertain: who have not bowed the knee; a ſign of reverence and adoration: to the image of Baal; Jezebel's god, the god of the Zidonians; a name common to many of the deities of the Gentiles, and ſignifies lord, or maſter; we read of Baalim in the plural number, for there were lords many of this name: in the Greek text the article is of the feminine gender, wherefore our tranſlators have ſupplied the word image. This word has in the Septuagint verſion, ſometimes a feminine article as here; ſee 2 Kings xxi. 3. Jer. ii. 8, 23, 28. and vii. 9. and xi. 13. and xii. 16. and xix. 5. and xxiii. 27. and xxxii. 29, 35. Hoſ. ii. 8. and xiii. 1. but in 1 Kings xix. 18. from whence this paſſage is taken, the article is maſculine, as it is alſo in Judg. ii. 11, 13. and in other places. This deity being either of both ſexes, or of no diſtinguiſhed ſex; or it may be, the reaſon it has ſo often a feminine article is, becauſe it was a young heifer, or in the form of one; ſo in the hiſtory of Tobias, ch. i. 5. it is ſaid, that all the tribes which apoſtatized together, ſacrificed τη Βααλ τη δαμαλει, to Baal the heifer. The Apoſtle's view in mentioning this inſtance is to ſhew, that when the church and cauſe of God are at the loweſt, God has always ſome true worſhippers of him; and that he never caſts away his foreknown people, whoſe numbers are generally more than they are thought to be, by the ſaints themſelves; good men, as Elijah, may be miſtaken in this matter; all which he accommodates to the then preſent ſtate of God's people, in the following verſe.

Ver. 5. Even ſo then at this preſent time alſo, &c.] In which the Apoſtle lived, the time of preaching the Goſpel, the accepted time, the day of ſalvation, which then was, and alſo now is; at that time when the Goſpel was ſent unto the Gentiles, and God took out of them a people for his name; when multitudes of them were converted, and embraced the faith of Chriſt; and when the Jews in general had rejected the Meſſiah, killed the Lord Jeſus, perſecuted his Apoſtles, and contradicted and blaſphemed the Goſpel; yet ſtill God had made a reſerve of ſome among them, for himſelf: there is a remnant; alluding either to Iſa. x. 21, 22. or to the oracle delivered to Elijah ſaying, I have reſerved, or left, &c. that as God had reſerved for himſelf in Elijah's time, a number of perſons, who had not gone into the idolatrous worſhip of Baal, when the greater part of the Iſraelites did, ſo he had taken care to make a like reſerve in the Apoſtle's time, when the bulk of the Jewiſh nation had refuſed the Meſſiah, and deſpiſed his Goſpel. This is a further proof, that God had not caſt away all the people of the Jews; and that as Elijah was not the only worſhipper of the true God in his time, ſo the Apoſtle was not the only inſtance of grace, among that people now: there was a number of them; the number of the diſciples after our Lord's aſcenſion, was an hundred and twenty; upon the firſt ſermon preached by Peter, three thouſand were converted, and added to them; after that, they are ſaid to be about five thouſand, and ſtill multitudes were added, both of men and women, and a great company of the prieſts were obedient to the faith; ſo that before the diſperſion of the church at Jeruſalem by a perſecution, there might be at leaſt ſuch a number called by grace, as God had reſerved in Elijah's time; though theſe, when compared with the generality of the nation, which remained in unbelief, were but a few, and therefore called a remnant, or a reſerve, as the word may be rendered; for theſe were a ſett of men, whom God had reſerved and preſerved in his Son, and in the covenant of his grace, from everlaſting; and had kept a watchful eye over them in time, reſerved them in his providence, and ſaved them to be called; and by calling them, had reſerved them by his grace, and preſerved them by his power, from the general unbelief, impenitence, blindneſs, and ignorance, which prevailed over the people of the Jews: which reſerve, was not owing to their ſuperior goodneſs, they being in no wiſe with reſpect to nature, birth, and privileges, better than thoſe who were not reſerved; nor to the diſpoſition of their minds and wills, their minds and conſciences being defiled, and their wills naturally as obſtinate and perverſe as others; nor to any good works done by them, ſince works before calling are not properly good, and thoſe after, are the fruits of that grace: but this reſerve was made, according to the election of grace; God's choice of theſe perſons before the world was, which is the ſource and ſpring of all the bleſſings of grace, both in time and eternity: hence theſe perſons were put into the hands of Chriſt, ſecured in an everlaſting covenant, took ſpecial care of by divine providence, were effectually called by grace, juſtified, ſanctified, and at laſt glorified: and this choice is owing to grace, for not mens choice of God's grace, but God's choice, owing to his own grace, is here meant. The Pelagians would have it, that this election is the choice which man makes of the grace of God; whereas ſuch is the enmity of man's nature and will againſt God and his grace, that he would never make choice of that, if the grace of God did not firſt make choice of him, and lay hold upon him: grace here, does not deſign the object of the choice, but the cauſe, ſpring, and motive of it, which is not any habit or quality in men, as faith and holineſs, for theſe are fruits and effects of electing grace, and ſo not cauſes, motives, or conditions of it, but the free love and favour of God in his own heart; and ſhews the ſovereignty and freeneſs of election, which is no ways depending on the will and works of men, but upon the ſovereign good-will and pleaſure of God.

Ver. 6. And if by grace, then is it no more of works, &c.] Upon election, being called the election of grace, the Apoſtle forms an argument, ſhewing the contrariety and inconſiſtency of grace and works, in that affair; proving, that it muſt be by the one or the other; and if by the one, then not by the other; and that theſe two cannot be mixed and blended together in this matter. If election is by grace, as it certainly is; for no other reaſon can be given, why God has choſe one, and not another, but his own ſovereign pleaſure, or that free favour and unmerited love, with which he loves one and not another; and not becauſe they are better, or had done, or would do, better things than others; then it is no more, or not at all, for it never was of works; was not influenced by them, does not ariſe from them; for it paſſed before ever any were done; and thoſe that are done aright, ſpring from it, and therefore could never be the rule and meaſure, cauſes, motives, and conditions of it: otherwiſe grace is no more grace; for "grace, "as Auſtin has long ago obſerved, is not grace, "unleſs it is altogether free:" it will loſe its nature, and ought to change its name, and be no more called or reckoned grace, but a due debt; and a choice of perſons to ſalvation, ſhould be thought, not to be what God is free to make or not, but what he is obliged to, as a reward of debt to mens works: but if it be of works, then it is no more grace; if election ſprings from, and depends upon the works of men, let no man aſcribe it to the grace of God; for there is nothing of grace in it, if this be the caſe: otherwiſe work is no more work; that will loſe its nature, and ought to loſe its name too, and not be called a debt, but a free gift: but theſe things are contrary to one another; and ſo unalienable and unalterable in their natures, that the one cannot paſs into the other, or the one be joined with the other, in this or any other part of man's ſalvation; for what is here ſaid of election, holds true of juſtification, pardon of ſin, and the whole of ſalvation. The Ethiopic verſion applies it to juſtification.

Ver. 7. What then? &c.] What can be ſaid to the point the Apoſtle is upon? 'tis as clear as the ſun, 'tis out of all queſtion, that God has not caſt away all the people of the Jews, nor any whom he foreknew, in any age or period of time; neither in the time of Elijah, nor in the Apoſtle's, he always having a reſerve of ſome for himſelf; which reſerve is owing to a previous choice of them, and that previous choice to be aſcribed not to any works of theirs, but to his free grace and ſovereign pleaſure. Indeed Iſrael hath not obtained that which he ſeeketh for; that is, carnal Iſrael, the body and bulk of that people; who ſought for life and righteouſneſs by their obedience to the law, and which they in general were in queſt of, and purſuit after, but did not obtain, though ſome of them might imagine they did; for the thing was impracticable and impoſſible, no life nor righteouſneſs, are ever to be had by the law of works; they did not obtain life and righteouſneſs, becauſe they ſought them in a wrong place, and in a wrong way; they ſought them not by faith in Chriſt Jeſus, where they are only to be had, but by their own works, which fall abundantly ſhort of procuring them for them: but the election hath obtained it. The Apoſtle divides Iſrael into two parts, the election and the reſt: by the election he means, elect men, the remnant among them, whom God had reſerved for himſelf; juſt as circumciſion deſigns circumciſed perſons, and uncircumciſion uncircumciſed perſons, and calling called ones, and righteouſneſs righteous men and women; ſee Rom. iii. 30. 1 Cor. i. 26. 2 Pet. iii. 13. Now theſe choſen ones obtained mercy, grace, life, and righteouſneſs in Chriſt, as the Apoſtle himſelf did, who was one of them; and that by virtue, and in conſequence of their election, for which reaſon the word is here uſed; hence mercy was ſhewn them, grace was beſtowed upon them, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt was imputed to them, faith was given them, holineſs was wrought in them, and they entitled to, and made meet for eternal life: theſe among Iſrael then obtained ſuch favours and bleſſings; and ſo God's elect, in all ages and nations, obtain the ſame things, and will obtain; for the purpoſe of God according to election ſtands ſure, his word and oath are immutable, his covenant inviolable, his grace unalienable, and his power omnipotent: and the reſt were blinded; the non-election, or thoſe who were not choſen and reſerved, to whom Chriſt was a ſtone of ſtumbling, and a rock of offence; and who ſtumbled at the word of the Goſpel, being diſobedient to the divine revelation, whereunto they were appointed, 1 Pet. ii. 8. hence they obtained no mercy, grace, faith, life, righteouſneſs, and eternal ſalvation, but were blinded; left in that native blindneſs and ignorance, in which they were born and brought up; were blinded by themſelves wilfully more and more; as they knew not the Meſſiah, ſo neither would they underſtand; they ſinned wilfully againſt light and knowledge; they ſhut their eyes againſt all that evidence and demonſtration given, of Jeſus of Nazareth being the Meſſiah, by his doctrines and miracles; and they were blinded by ſatan, the god of this world, by whom they were led captive; who wrought effectually in them, and ſtirred up the malice and enmity of their minds, againſt Chriſt and his Goſpel; for they were of their father the devil, and his luſts they would do; and they were alſo blinded by God himſelf, ſo that they could not believe; for after all this, it was but juſt with God to give them up to judicial blindneſs and hardneſs of heart.

Ver. 8. According as it is written, &c.] In Iſa. xxix. 10. and vi. 10.. which paſſages the Apoſtle ſeems to refer to, though it is not exactly word for word as here, yet the ſenſe is the ſame: God hath given them the ſpirit of ſlumber; of ſtupidity and inſenſibility, ſo that they were as perſons in a deep ſleep; their ſenſes locked up, without any knowledge of, or concern about, the danger they were in; having no ſenſe of ſin, or of the need of a Saviour; or of their being upon the borders of eternal ruin and damnation, or of any ways and means to eſcape it; but careleſs and ſecure, as perſons faſt aſleep in the midſt of the ſea, or upon the top of a maſt, who when ſtricken and beaten, feel it not; but if by jogging are awaked at all, immediately return to ſleep again, and ſo ſleep the ſleep of eternal death: eyes that they ſhould not ſee; which being cloſed by the deep ſleep and ſtupidity of mind they were judicially given up to, could ſee no beauty in Chriſt, wherefore they ſhould deſire him; none of the glories and excellencies of his perſon, blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice; nothing amiable and agreeable in his Goſpel, and the truths of it; nor had they any light in the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, which were ſo remarkably fulfilled in him; their minds were blinded, a vail was upon their hearts, and which remains to this day: and ears that they ſhould not hear; for perſons in a ſleep, as their eyes are cloſed that they cannot ſee, ſo their ears are ſtopped that they cannot hear: and thus it was with theſe Jews, the awful judgment being upon them; they were uncircumciſed in heart and ears; they were like the deaf adder, ſtopping their ears to the charming voice of Chriſt in the Goſpel; and being given up in a judicial way, could neither underſtand his ſpeech, nor hear his word: and this ſpirit of ſtupidity and inſenſibility, as it appeared in the times of Iſaiah, ſo it continued unto this day; the then preſent time, in which the Apoſtle lived; and has continued ever ſince, at leaſt in part, and will until the fulneſs of the Gentiles is brought in. Theſe paſſages, with ſome others following, are produced by the Apoſtle out of their own prophets, to take off their reſentment againſt him; and leſt he ſhould be thought to be ſevere upon them, when he ſaid no more of them, but what had been propheſied long before concerning them. So Jarchi on Iſa. xxix. 10. ſays, that Iſaiah propheſies, על פושעי ישראל, concerning the tranſgreſſors of Iſrael.

Ver. 9. And David ſaith, &c.] That is, Chriſt by the mouth of David, or David in the perſon of Chriſt; for the Pſalm out of which the following words are taken, is a prophecy of the Meſſiah, as appears from ſome paſſages cited out of it in the New Teſtament, and applied to Chriſt; compare ver. 4. with John xv. 25. and ver. 9. with John ii. 17. Rom. xv. 3. and ver. 21. with John xix. 28, 29. and what are here cited, are not ſo much imprecations, as predictions of what ſhould befal the Jews, by way of recompence for their ill uſage of the Meſſiah, in giving him gall for meat, and vinegar for drink: let their table be made a ſnare, and a trap and a ſtumbling-block. By their table may be meant, the altar; ſee Mal. i. 7, 12. and the ſacrifices offered up upon it, their meat-offerings and drink-offerings, and all others; likewiſe the laws concerning the difference of meats, and indeed the whole ceremonial law may be intended, which lay in meats and drinks, and ſuch like things: now the Jews placing their juſtifying righteouſneſs before God, in the obſervance of theſe rites and ceremonies, and imagining that by theſe ſacrifices their ſins were really expiated and atoned for, they neglected and ſubmitted not to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, but went about to eſtabliſh their own; ſo that that which ſhould have led them to Chriſt, became an hand-writing of ordinances againſt them, and rendered Chriſt of no effect to them: moreover, the ſacred writings, which are full of ſpiritual food and divine refreſhment, the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, which clearly pointed out Chriſt, not being underſtood, but miſapplied by them, proved a trap, a ſnare, and a ſtumbling-block to them; ſo that they rejected the true Meſſiah, which iſſued in their utter ruin and deſtruction; yea, the preaching of the Goſpel, the ſalutary truths and wholeſome words of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, were a ſtumbling-block to the Jews, nay, even the ſavour of death unto death. Though theſe words may be literally underſtood of their table mercies, the neceſſary proviſions of life, their common food and drink, of which they had great ſcarcity in their laſt wars; ſo that they not only by wicked methods ſtole it from one another, but eat what was forbidden by their law, and what was abhorrent to nature, as one is ſaid to eat her own child: nor is it to be overlooked, what is ſuggeſted by ſome, that the paſſover may be meant by their table; which was their grand yearly feaſt, and which they were eating [*], when they were ſurrounded and taken by the Roman army, like birds in a net, or beaſts in a trap: and all this as a recompence to them; a juſt judgment upon them, by way of retaliation for their ill treatment of Chriſt when on the croſs, giving him gall and vinegar, for his meat and drink.

Ver. 10. Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not ſee, &c.] Which is to be underſtood not literally of their being ſtruck with blindneſs, as the men of Sodom were by the angels, and as Elymas the ſorcerer was by the Apoſtle Paul; but myſtically, of the eyes of their underſtandings being darkened, as they were by themſelves and by ſatan, and judicially by God; ſo that they could not ſee into the true ſenſe of the prophecies and promiſes concerning Chriſt; and how all the characters of the Meſſiah, met in Jeſus of Nazareth; their eyes were ſo blinded, that they could ſee no beauty nor comelineſs in him; no excellency in his perſon, nothing wonderful in his works, nor amiable in his doctrine; nay, not only ſpiritual things, the things of the Goſpel, were hid from the moſt wiſe and prudent among them, from their doctors and Rabbins, but alſo the things which regarded their temporal peace and happineſs, were hid from their eyes; their eyes were not only darkened with reſpect to things ſpiritual and evangelical, but even with regard to things natural and civil: never did a people act more imprudently for their temporal ſafety and welfare, or appear ſo infatuated in all their conduct, as they did, as the hiſtory of their wars does abundantly declare: and bow down their back alway; which may denote their ſubjection and bondage to the Romans, when taken and carried captive by them; who laid very heavy burdens on them, which bowed down their backs indeed, multitudes of them being condemned to the mines; or this may deſign the general diſpoſition of the minds of theſe people, which are bowed to the earth, for they mind nothing but earth and earthly things; the acquiring of which they are bent upon at any rate, and are infamous for their earthly mindedneſs, covetouſneſs, extortion, uſury, tricking, and overreaching: or this phraſe may be expreſſive of that trembling, diſtreſs, horror, and deſpair, which ſhall ſeize them; eſpecially when the Son of man comes in the clouds of heaven, and they that have pierced him ſhall behold him, and wail becauſe of him; for in the Pſalms the words are, make their loins continually to ſhake.

Ver. 11. I ſay then, have they ſtumbled that they ſhould fall? &c.] This is an objection, which the Apoſtle takes from the mouth of an adverſary; and the purport of it is, you ſay that the people of the Jews being blind, have ſtumbled at Chriſt and his Goſpel, as was propheſied of them, and to which they were appointed; pray what were God's view and end in this? was it, that they ſhould fall and periſh eternally? if it be ſo, is not this doing himſelf, what he forbids others, namely, to put a ſtumbling-block before the blind? and can he be excuſed from cruelty, and rejoicing at the miſery of others? or is their ſtumbling permitted, that they ſhould all fall through unbelief, and be caſt away? and ſo it is an objection of the ſame kind with ver. 1. or ſince they have ſtumbled, and have thereby fell into a forlorn and miſerable condition, are they always to continue in it, as the laſt clauſe in the above-cited paſſage ſuggeſts? To which the Apoſtle anſwers, God forbid; neither of theſe are to be admitted of. The end which God had in view, in ſuffering the Jews to ſtumble and fall, was not their deſtruction, but rather the ſalvation of the Gentiles; and eſpecially not the deſtruction of all of them, blindneſs had only happened in part to them; for there was a remnant among them according to the election of grace, which ſhould be ſaved; a choſen number, which obtained life and righteouſneſs by Chriſt; yea, a fulneſs of them, how ſmall ſoever their number might be now, which ſhould be brought in; and ſtill leſs that they ſhould always continue in this ſad condition, their unbelief had brought them into; for the time would come, when there would be a receiving of them as life from the dead, when all Iſrael ſhould be ſaved. And at preſent there appeared nothing ill in view, but rather through their fall, ſalvation is come unto the Gentiles. That is, the Goſpel; which is ſometimes called ſalvation, the Goſpel of our ſalvation, the word of ſalvation; becauſe it is a declaration of ſalvation by Chriſt, and is the power of God unto it; or a means made effectual by the power of God to convince perſons, both of their need, and of the worth of it, and alſo a means of the application of it to them, by the Spirit of God: now this came to the Gentiles by the miniſtry of the Apoſtles, according to the orders and command of Chriſt; and, that through the fall of the Jews, their unbelief and rejection of the Meſſiah; for the Goſpel was firſt preached to them, but they contradicting and blaſpheming it, the Apoſtles turned to the Gentiles, and preached it to them, as the Lord had commanded them: and thus they came to be acquainted with the doctrine of ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt, and to have it powerfully applied to their ſouls by the Spirit of God; when ſalvation might be ſaid to come to them, in ſuch ſenſe as our Lord ſays it did to Zaccheus and his houſe: and another end is to be anſwered hereby, which is for to provoke them to jealouſy; that is, to provoke the Jews to jealouſy; not in an ill ſenſe, as in ch. x. 19. and as they were provoked upon the firſt ſending of the Goſpel to the Gentiles, and the calling of them, when they diſcovered a great deal of envy, wrath, and bitterneſs; but in a good ſenſe, as will appear in the latter day, when being convinced of their ſin in rejecting the Meſſiah, and obſerving the many advantages the Gentiles have received by embracing him, and they have loſt by their contempt of him, will be provoked to an holy emulation of them, and be ſtirred up through their means to ſeek the Lord their God, and David their king; and thus things will wind about in providence. The fall of the Jews, makes way for the Goſpel among the Gentiles; and this having had its effect with them, will be a means of putting the Jews upon ſerious thoughts about, and a ſtudious enquiry after, the true Meſſiah, and ſalvation by him; all which is a full anſwer to the queſtion, and the objection contained in it.

Ver. 12. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, &c.] By the world, as is clear from the next clauſe, is meant the Gentiles; who were frequently called ſo by the Jews, who reckoned themſelves to be the church, and all the nations round about them, the world; which obſervation may ſerve to illuſtrate other paſſages of ſcripture; ſee John iii. 16. 2 Cor. v. 19. 1 John ii. 2. now the fall of the Jews, which was a leſſening of them, was the riches of the Gentiles; and the diminiſhing of them the riches of the Gentiles; the number of true believers in Chriſt among them were very few, the generality of them received him not, but ſtumbled at him, and fell thro' unbelief; but the few that did believe were the means of carrying and ſpreading the Goſpel, which is, the unſearchable riches of Chriſt, in the Gentile world: thus at firſt a perſecution being raiſed againſt the church at Jeruſalem, the miniſters of the Goſpel were ſcattered abroad, and went every where preaching the word; and afterwards the Jews behaving in a very indecent manner towards the Apoſtles of Chriſt, they turned in a manner wholly to the Gentiles; and thus by the means of a few, a diminutive company, of which the Apoſtle Paul was one, the Goſpel, the pearl of great price, treaſure hid in a field, and put into earthen veſſels, was carried into the heathen world, and by it they were enriched. This handful of men that went out of Judea, were the means of converting vaſt numbers, large multitudes of ſouls among the Gentiles, which may be alſo deſigned by riches; this word ſometimes ſignifying plenty, ſee chap. ii. 4. and alſo of enriching them with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, and of directing them to Chriſt, who has durable riches, treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge, riches of grace, and riches of glory. Now the Apoſtle argues, that if ſuch a ſmall number of the Jews who embraced Chriſt, were of ſo much advantage to the Gentiles, how much more their fulneſs? when converts to Chriſt among them, will be as the ſand of the ſea, a nation of them ſhall be born again at once, and all Iſrael be ſaved. This will be a great acceſſion to the Gentile church, bring much glory to it, contribute greatly to its welfare, and be a means of eſtabliſhing their faith, and of putting freſh life and vigour into them, and of inſpiring them with more zeal for Chriſt, and for his honour and glory.

[*] Joſephus de Bello Jud. l. 6. c. 9.

Ver. 13. For I ſpeak to you Gentiles, &c.] The church at Rome, as the primitive churches for the moſt part did, conſiſted of Jews and Gentiles; hence the Apoſtle ſometimes addreſſes the one, as in chap. ii, 17, 25. and vii. 1. and ſometimes the other, as here; and this he does to obſerve unto them the grace and goodneſs of God, in enriching them with the Goſpel of ſalvation; and that they might not deſpiſe the Jews, from whom it firſt came out, and thro' whoſe fall it came to them, and was preached among them by ſome of that nation: in as much as I am the Apoſtle of the Gentiles. He was ordained and ſet apart by God, in his eternal purpoſes, to be a teacher of the Gentiles; he was ſent immediately by Chriſt to bear his name among them, tho' not among them only, to the excluſion of the people of Iſrael; he chiefly preached the Goſpel to them, tho' ſometimes to the Jews alſo; and the ſucceſs of his miniſtry was moſtly among the uncircumciſion, tho' he ſought by all ways and means to gain both Jews and Gentiles: hence he addreſſes the Gentiles with greater freedom and boldneſs, becauſe he was their Apoſtle, and had been ſo uſeful among them; and is a reaſon why we Gentiles ſhould have a ſpecial regard to his writings; for tho' every word of God is pure, and all ſcripture is divinely inſpired, and is profitable on one account or another; nor is any part of it to be ſlighted and neglected; yet as Paul's epiſtles are written chiefly to the Gentile churches, excepting that to the Hebrews, and which ſome queſtion whether it is his, they ought eſpecially to be attended to by us; tho', alas, of all the inſpired writings they are had in the leaſt eſteem: I magnify mine office; not himſelf, for he was not of a ſelf-exalting ſpirit, but humble and lowly minded, ready at all times to own himſelf to be leſs than the leaſt of ſaints, and the chief of ſinners; but his office, which he had received from Chriſt, as an inſtance of his grace and favour. This was magnified partly by the miracles, ſigns, and wonders done by him, in proof, and for the confirmation of his Apoſtleſhip; and partly by his conſtant, diligent, and faithful preaching of the Goſpel; as alſo by the unwearied pains he took to ſpread it far and near; and likewiſe by the numbers of ſouls he was the means of bringing to the knowledge of Chriſt; and it was no ſmall acceſſion of glory to his office, as an Apoſtle of the Gentiles, that he was an inſtrument of the converſion of many among the Jews.

Ver. 14. If by any means I may provoke to emulation, &c.] What he had in view, even in diſcharging his office among the Gentiles with ſo much labour, aſſiduity, and indefatigableneſs was, that if poſſible he might ſtir up the Jews to emulate and imitate the Gentiles, in ſeeking after Chriſt; for theſe he means when he ſays, them which are my fleſh; they being his brethren and kinſmen according to the fleſh, for it was common with the eaſtern nations, to call ſuch perſons their fleſh; ſee Gen. xxix. 14. and xxxvii. 27. Iſ. lviii. 7. and carries in it a reaſon why he was ſo ſolicitous for their welfare, becauſe of the relation of them to him, and the natural affection he bore towards them; and his hope was, that they ſeeing the nations of the earth bleſſed in the promiſed ſeed, thro' his preaching the Goſpel to them, great gatherings of the people to Shiloh, and the Gentiles ſeeking to the root of Jeſſe, ſet up for an enſign to the people, might be provoked to an emulation of them; and likewiſe ſeek the Lord their God, and David their king, and thereby have his end he ſo much wiſhed for and deſired: and might ſave ſome of them; he ſays ſome, not all, for he knew the bulk of the people was rejected, only a ſeed was left among them, a remnant according to the election of grace that ſhould be ſaved, and which did obtain righteouſneſs and life, while the reſt were blinded. The miniſters of the Goſpel may be ſaid to ſave ſouls, not efficiently, for the author or efficient cauſe of ſalvation is God only; the Father has choſe unto it, the Son has effected it, and the Spirit applies it; but inſtrumentally, as the word preached by them is the means of regeneration, faith, and converſion, with which ſalvation is connected; and as they ſhew unto men the way of ſalvation, and encourage ſouls to believe in Chriſt, in whom alone it is. Now the Apoſtle argues from his office, and the uſefulneſs of it, to ſome among the Jews, to ſaving purpoſes, to prove that their rejection was not total.

Ver. 15. For if the caſting away of them, &c.] This argument, as before, in ver. 12. is from the leſſer to the greater, ſhewing that as the Gentiles received preſent advantage thro' the rejection of the Jews, they would receive far greater at their future recovery, and which proves that their rejection is not final; for by the caſting away of them, is meant the rejection of the Jews, and refers to God's writing a Lo ammi upon them, and his taking away the Goſpel from them, and which were the occaſion of the reconciling of the world, the Gentiles; not of God's drawing the ſcheme of their reconciliation in his Son; nor of the actual reconciliation of them by his ſufferings and death; but of the Goſpel, the word of reconciliation being carried among them upon the Jews diſbelief and contempt of it, which was made effectual by the power of divine grace, to the reconciling of them to God, to the way of ſalvation by Chriſt; to be willing to ſerve him, and be ſaved by him; to lay down their arms, ſurrender to his victorious grace, and become obedient to him both by word and deed; and if this was the caſe then, as it was, he aſks, what ſhall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? By the receiving of them, is meant the converſion of the Jews in the latter day, when they will be received by Chriſt, on whom they will look with an eye of faith, and mourn in an evangelical manner, for their ſins againſt him; who caſts out none that come unto him, but receives them into his arms in the moſt kind and tender manner; and when they will be alſo openly received into the houſe and family of God, into the viſible church of Chriſt; and as the Apoſtle afterwards ſays, be grafted into their own olive tree: and this their reſtoration will be as, life from the dead; which regards not ſo much the quickning of the Jews themſelves, tho' their converſion will be, as the converſion of every ſinner is, a reſurrection from the death of ſin, to a life of grace, and is ſo repreſented in Ezek. xxxvii. but rather the reviving the work of God among the Gentile churches, who having lain long in a dead, lifeleſs, lukewarm, and indifferent frame of ſpirit, will be arouſed and quickned, at this wonderful work of grace upon the Jews; and beſides it will be as unexpected by them, and as ſurprizing to them, as a perſon's being raiſed from the dead would be; yea as joyful, and as welcome to them, as if a man received his neareſt relation and friend from the dead; add to this, and which ſome of the ancients make to be the ſenſe of the place, quickly after the converſion of the Jews, the fulneſs of the Gentiles being brought in, and nothing more to be done in a way of grace, the firſt reſurrection from the dead will follow, and happy is he that will have part in it.

Ver. 16. For if the firſt-fruit be holy, &c.] Some by the firſt-fruit and root underſtand Chriſt, who is ſometimes called, the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept, and the root of Jeſſe and David, and indeed of all the righteous; and certain it is, that ſince he is holy, has all the holineſs of his people in him, and is ſanctification unto them, they ſhall be holy likewiſe; have it imparted to them in this life, and perfected in them in another: but this does not ſeem to agree with the Apoſtle's argument. Others think that by them are meant the Jewiſh anceſtors, and particularly Abraham, and dream of a holineſs derived from him to his natural ſeed; but if no ſuch holineſs was derived from him, to his immediate offſpring, Iſhmael, it can hardly be thought any ſhould be communicated by him, to his remote poſterity; and to theſe here deſigned at the diſtance of four or five thouſand years from him: but by them are intended the firſt converts among the Jews, under the Goſpel-diſpenſation; it being uſual with the Apoſtle to call thoſe perſons, that were firſt converted in any place, the firſt-fruits of it; ſee Rom. xvi. 5. 1 Cor. xvi. 15. Theſe were they who received the firſt-fruits of the Spirit in Judea, and who firſt among the Jews hoped and believed in Chriſt; theſe were but few in number, as the firſt-fruit is but ſmall in compariſon of the lump, and mean, abject, and deſpicable, as the root under, and in a dry ground is; but yet were pledges and preſages of a larger number of ſouls among that people, to be converted in the latter day: now the Apoſtle's argument is, if the firſt-fruit be holy, the lump is alſo holy, and if the root be holy, ſo are the branches; that is, that whereas thoſe perſons who were converted among the Jews, however few in number, and deſpicable in appearance they might be, yet were truly ſanctified by the Spirit of God; and as they were, ſo ſhould the whole body of that people be in the laſt days, when holineſs ſhall be upon the horſes bells, and every pot in Judah and Jeruſalem ſhall be holineſs unto the Lord of hoſts, Zech. xiv. 20, 21. by which metaphorical expreſſions is meant, that holineſs ſhould be common to the whole nation, and all the inhabitants of it, of which the call of ſome few among them was a pledge and preſage. The alluſion in the former clauſe is to the holy offering of firſt-fruits to the Lord, the two wave loaves, Lev. xxiii. 14, 17. whereby the whole lump was ſanctified, for after uſe throughout the year following; and that in the latter clauſe, to the holineſs of trees; that is to trees devoted to ſacred uſe, or that were planted in a field appropriated thereunto: hence we read [t], that the men of Jericho permitted, or as other exemplars read it, cut down גמז יות של הקדש, branches of holineſs, or holy branches; and eat fallen fruit on the ſabbath day. [u] Bartenora explains theſe branches, of ſuch that grow upon a tree devoted to holy uſes; and Maimonides [w] obſerves, that they thought it lawful to eat what grew in a holy field.

Ver. 17. And if ſome of the branches be broken off, &c.] This is to be underſtood, not of the excluſion of the Jews from their national church; for the perſons deſigned by the branches, were the principal members of it, as the civil and eccleſiaſtical rulers, the prieſts, Scribes and Phariſees, and the far greater part of the people; and on the other hand, the Apoſtles and followers of Chriſt were put out of their ſynagogues, and deemed by them hereticks and Apoſtates: nor of the deſtruction of the Jewiſh nation, city, and temple; for as yet they exiſted as a nation, their city of Jeruſalem was in being, and their temple ſtanding: but of their being left out of the Goſpel-church, gathered among them, they not believing in the Meſſiah, but rejected and crucified him; and tho' afterwards the Goſpel was preached to them, they deſpiſed, contradicted, and blaſphemed it; ſo that it pleaſed God to take it wholly away from them, when they might be truly ſaid to be, as branches broken off; which phraſe ſeems to be borrowed from Jer. xi. 16. they were withered, lifeleſs, and hopeleſs, being caſt off by God, and neglected by his miniſters, the Goſpel being removed from them, and they without the means of grace and ſalvation: and this was the caſe of the generality of the people; for tho' the Apoſtle only ſays ſome, making the beſt of it in their favour againſt the Gentiles, and ſpeaking in the ſofteſt terms; yet they were only a few, a ſeed, a remnant, that were taken into the Goſpel-church, and the reſt were blinded, hardened, rejected, and left out for their unbelief: and thou being a wild olive-tree; ſpeaking to the Gentiles, to ſome, not to all of them; for not a whole tree, but a part of one, what is cut out of it, a ſcion from it is grafted into another; and ſo they were a certain number which God took out from among the Gentiles, to be a people for his name and glory, and who before converſion were comparable to a wild olive-tree; for tho' they might have ſome ſhew of morality, religion, and worſhip, yet lived in groſs ignorance, ſuperſtition, idolatry, and prophaneſs; were deſtitute of a divine revelation, of all ſpiritual light and knowledge, of true righteouſneſs and the grace of God; were barren and unfruitful in good works, were without hope, God and Chriſt in the world. This metaphor rather regards their character, caſe, and manners, than their original; in reſpect of which they and the Jews were on a level, being by nature equally corrupt, and children of wrath; and yet tho' a wild olive-tree, were grafted in amongſt them; meaning either the broken branches, in whoſe ſtead they were grafted; the Syriac verſion favours this ſenſe, reading it, בדוכיתהין, in their place; as alſo in ver. 19. and ſo the Ethiopic verſion: or rather the believing Jews, of whom the firſt Goſpel-church and churches conſiſted; for the Jews firſt truſted in Chriſt, received the firſt-fruits of the Spirit, and were firſt incorporated into a Goſpel-church-ſtate; and then the Gentiles which believed, were received among them. The firſt coalition of Jews and Gentiles, or the engrafture of the Gentiles in among the Jews that believed, was at Antioch, when dropping their diſtinctive names of Jews and Gentiles, they took the common name of chriſtians, Acts xi. 19, 20, 21, 26. So that this is not to be underſtood of an engrafture into Chriſt, unleſs by a viſible profeſſion, but of being received into a Goſpel-church-ſtate; which is ſignified by the olive-tree in the next clauſe: and with them partakeſt of the root and fatneſs of the olive-tree; the Goſpel-church is ſo called for its excellency, the olive-tree being a choice tree, as they were a choſen generation, a royal prieſthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; for its fruitfulneſs, bringing forth berries that are wholeſome, delightful, and uſeful, ſo the ſaints are filled with the fruits of grace, and good works, which are by Chriſt to the praiſe and glory of God; for its beauty when laden with fruit, ſo a Goſpel-church is beautiful, maintaining the purity of Goſpel-doctrine, diſcipline, worſhip and converſation; His beauty ſhall be as the olive-tree, Hoſ. xiv. 6. ſee Jer. xi. 16. and for its verdure and durableneſs, and growing on the mountains, all which may denote the continuance and firmneſs of the church of Chriſt. Now the Gentiles being grafted into a Goſpel-church-ſtate with the believing Jews, partook of the ſame root and fatneſs as they did, being built upon the ſame foundation of the Apoſtles and prophets; rooted, grounded, and built up in the ſame church-ſtate, they enjoyed the ſame priviledges, had the doctrines of Chriſt and his Apoſtles preached to them, communicated with them in the ordinances of the Goſpel, and were ſatisfied with the goodneſs and fatneſs of the houſe of God; for they became fellow-heirs, and of the ſame body, and partakers of his promiſe in Chriſt by the Goſpel, Epheſ. iii. 5. the Apoſtle ſpeaks according to the nature of the olive-tree, which is unctuous, from whence an oil is taken, which makes the face of man to ſhine, the fruit of which fattens thoſe that are lean; and hence it loſes not its leaves, δια το θερμον και λιπαρον, becauſe of its heat and fatneſs, as Plutarch[x] ſays.

Ver. 18. Boaſt not againſt the branches, &c.] Thoſe that were broken off: the Apoſtle would not have them vaunt it over them, deſpiſe them, and trample upon them; but pity them, and pray for them, and be abundantly thankful and humbled before God, under a ſenſe of his ſovereign and diſtinguiſhing grace, who had ſettled them in a Goſpel-church-ſtate, who were before comparable to a wild olive-tree; and much leſs ſhould they glory over the believing Jews, among whom they were, there being no difference between them, for they were all one in Chriſt Jeſus: but if thou boaſt; but if ſuch a vain temper of mind ſhould prevail, he ſuggeſts they would do well to ſit down and conſider, what little reaſon they had on their ſide to glory; and that if ſuch glorying and boaſting, one againſt another was lawful, the Jews had the greateſt reaſon for it; for adds the Apoſtle, thou beareſt not the root, but the root thee. The Jews received no advantages from the Gentiles, but on the contrary the Gentiles from the Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God, and by whom they were faithfully kept and tranſmitted to the Gentiles; the Goſpel itſelf came out firſt from among them; the firſt preachers of it were Jews, who carried it into the Gentile world, where it was greatly ſucceeded to the converſion of many, who by this means were brought into a Goſpel-church-ſtate, and ſo enjoyed all the priviledges they did; yea, Chriſt himſelf, according to the fleſh, came of them, was ſent unto them, was the miniſter of them, lived and died among them, and wrought out the great ſalvation for his people; hence ſalvation itſelf is ſaid to be of the Jews, John iv. 22. ſo that the root and foundation of all their enjoyments were from the Jews, and not thoſe of the Jews from them; hence there was no room, nor reaſon, for boaſting againſt them, and vaunting it over them.

Ver. 19. Thou wilt ſay then, &c.] This is an objection which the Apoſtle foreſaw the Gentiles would make againſt what he had ſaid, and in favour of their boaſting; the branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. The ſenſe of which is, that the Jews were rejected and left out of the Goſpel-church, on purpoſe to make way for the Gentiles, that they might be put in their room; and conſequently the Jews muſt be more vile and unworthy, and the Gentiles more deſerving of ſuch favours and priviledges, or God would never have taken ſuch a ſtep, to leave out one to make room for the other.

20. Well, &c.] To this the Apoſtle anſwers, by approving and granting in part what was ſaid, that the unbelieving Jews were broken off and rejected, and that the Gentiles that believed in Chriſt were grafted in among the Jews that profeſſed his name; but then he tacitly denies that it was for their ſakes, and on their account they were broken off, but for their own incredulity: becauſe of unbelief they were broken off; becauſe of their diſbelief and contempt of the Meſſiah, they were rejected of God, and died in their ſins; that which excluded their forefathers from the land of Canaan, ſhut them out of the Goſpel-church-ſtate, and the kingdom of heaven: and thou ſtandeſt by faith; which is not of a man's ſelf, but the gift of God; ſo that it was not by their merits, and better deſervings, but by the grace of God, that they were in the ſituation they were; they were bleſſed with faith in Chriſt, and having made a profeſſion of it, were admitted to Goſpel-ordinances, and into a Goſpel-church; and being helped hitherto to hold the profeſſion of their faith in a becoming manner, they ſtood their ground, and continued in their church-relation; and therefore ought not to give way to a vain boaſting ſpirit, but to be humble, modeſt, and dependant; wherefore he gives them this proper, pertinent, and wholeſome advice, be not high-minded, but fear. The Apoſtle would have them not be elated with their gifts, priviledges, and enjoyments, and look over others, or down upon them with contempt and diſdain, conſidering that all they had and enjoyed were owing to the goodneſs of God, and not to any deſerts of theirs; and therefore ſhould fear the Lord and his goodneſs: for not a fear of hell and damnation, or a diſtruſt of the grace of God is here meant; but a fear of offending him, and that not from a dread of puniſhment, but from a ſenſe of his grace and goodneſs; and alſo deſigns humility of ſoul, in oppoſition to pride, haughtineſs, and elation of mind, a lowly carriage and behaviour to others, and an humble dependance on grace and ſtrength from above, to enable to perſevere and hold out to the end; for let him that thinks he ſtands take heed leſt he fall into ſin, 1 Cor. x. 12. ſo as to diſhonour God and Chriſt, grieve the holy Spirit, wound his own conſcience, and bring himſelf under the cenſure of the church, and to be cut off from the good olive-tree, the root and fatneſs of which he now partakes.

Ver. 21. For if God ſpared not the natural branches, &c.] That is, executed his righteous judgments, inflicted due puniſhment upon the Jews, unchurched them, and ſtript them of thoſe priviledges they enjoyed in a church-ſtate; who were the natural deſcendants of Abraham; were naturally, and as born into the world, in a national church-ſtate, and in that national covenant God made with that people; to whom belonged a national adoption, in which ſenſe they were the ſons of God, his firſt-born; they were choſen by him as a ſpecial and peculiar people, to very great favours and priviledges; they were Chriſt's own, he came of them according to the fleſh, and was particularly ſent unto them, and miniſtered among them; wherefore if at laſt, God did not ſpare this people, tho' he had for a long time done it, but ſtirred up all his wrath againſt them, they diſbelieving his ſon, rejecting and deſpiſing the Meſſiah, and ſalvation by him, this ſhould awaken the fear, care, and caution of the Gentiles in a church-ſtate, leſt if they behave not well, he ſhould deal in like manner with them: take heed leſt he alſo ſpare not thee; for whatever was done to the Jews in former or latter times, are written for the inſtruction and admonition of Gentiles; and the uſe they are to make thereof is, to be careful and cautious, leſt by imbibing principles derogatory from the grace of God and glory of Chriſt, or by an unbecoming walk and converſation, they provoke the Lord to unchurch them, as he has done the Jews before them; and which they may the rather fear, ſince the Jews were the natural branches, and they formerly ſtrangers and aliens.

Ver. 22. Behold therefore the goodneſs, and ſeverity of God, &c.] The conſideration of both the grace and kindneſs of God to ſome, and his ſeverity or ſtrict juſtice towards others, is recommended by the Apoſtle as very proper to abate pride, vain glory, and haughtineſs of ſpirit; and to engage to humility, fear, care, and caution: on them which fell ſeverity; the Jews, who ſtumbled at Chriſt and his Goſpel, and fell by unbelief, God in ſtrict juſtice and righteous judgment, not only deſtroyed, as afterwards, their nation, city, and temple, and ſcattered them abroad in the world to be a reproach, a proverb, a taunt, and a curſe in all places; but caſt them off as his people, broke his covenant with them, took away his Goſpel from them, left them out of a Goſpel-church-ſtate, except a few, and gave up the generality of them to blindneſs and hardneſs of heart; ſo that wrath is come upon them to the uttermoſt, both with reſpect to things civil and religious, and they continue as living, ſtanding monuments of God's ſeverity and juſtice, to be beheld by us Gentiles with pity and concern, and to excite in us the fear of God, and caution as to our conduct and behaviour in the world, and in the church: but towards thee, goodneſs; the Gentiles, who not only ſhare in the goodneſs and grace of God diſplayed in the election of many of them, to eternal life, in their redemption by Chriſt, and the effectual vocation of them by the grace of God; but in their church-ſtate, they being made fellow-citizens with the ſaints, fellow-heirs, and of the ſame body, and having a place and a name in God's houſe, better than that of ſons and daughters; and therefore under great obligation to fear the Lord, aud his goodneſs, and to walk worthy of the vocation wherein they are called, in all humility and lowlineſs of mind: if thou continue in his goodneſs; meaning not the love, grace, and free-favour of God, or the grace of the Spirit, a continuance in which no if is to be put upon; for ſuch who are intereſted in the love of God always continue in it, and nothing can ſeparate them from it; and ſuch as have the graces of the Spirit implanted in them, as faith, hope, and love, can never loſe them; theſe always remain in them, and they in the poſſeſſion of them, tho' not always in the exerciſe of them; but the goodneſs of God in a church-ſtate is here meant, as the means of grace and comfort, the miniſtration of the word and ordinances; and the ſenſe is, if thou doſt not deſpiſe the riches of divine goodneſs in a church-relation, if thou doſt not abuſe it, or walk unworthy of it, if thou abideſt by it, and retaineſt a value for it, thou wilt ſtill ſhare the advantages of it: otherwiſe thou alſo ſhalt be cut off; from the good olive tree, the Goſpel-church-ſtate, into which the Gentiles were taken; and which, with reſpect to particular perſons, may intend the act of excommunication by the church, expreſſed in ſcripture by purging the old leaven, putting away the wicked perſon, withdrawing from ſuch that are diſorderly, and rejecting hereticks, that is, from the communion of the church; and with reſpect to whole bodies and ſocieties, an entire unchurching of them by removing the Goſpel, and the ordinances of it; which threatning has been awfully fulfilled in many Gentile churches, in Aſia, Africa, and Europe; and therefore may ſerve to awaken our fear, care, and caution, leſt we ſhould be treated in like manner.

Ver. 23. And they alſo, if they abide not ſtill in unbelief, &c.] The Apoſtle ſuggeſts that the Jews alſo might be recovered and brought into a Goſpel-church-ſtate, provided they did not continue in infidelity; but inaſmuch as they ſeem to lie under invincible ignorance, obſtinacy and unbelief, and were ſuch bitter enemies to the Goſpel, and abhorrers of Goſpel-ordinances, and a Goſpel-church-ſtate; yea, that they muſt and will abide in unbelief, unleſs the Spirit of God convinces them of it, and it is given to them to believe in Chriſt, and they are powerfully drawn by the Father to come to the Son, there is no poſſibility or likelihood that they ſhall be grafted in, or taken into a Goſpel-church-ſtate; to which the Apoſtle anſwers, and argues for their engrafture, and the poſſibility of it from the power of God: for God is able to graft them in again; as many of them were in the times of the Apoſtles, and ſome ſince, for nothing is impoſſible with God; he can remove their unbelief, knock off the ſhackles and fetters in which they are held, and bring them out of the priſon of infidelity, in which they are ſhut up; he is able to take away the blindneſs of their minds, and the hardneſs of their hearts, the vail that is over them, and turn them to the Lord; he can by his mighty power work faith in them, and cauſe them to look on him whom they have pierced, and mourn in an evangelical manner; he can bring them to Chriſt, and into his churches, and among his people, and fold them with the reſt of his ſheep; ſo that there may be one fold of Jew and Gentile, under one ſhepherd, Jeſus Chriſt.

Ver. 24. For if thou wert cut out of the olive-tree, &c.] As the Apoſtle argues the poſſibility of bringing the Jews into a Goſpel-church-ſtate, from the power of God; ſo here the probability of it, or the eaſineſs and likelihood of its being performed, from the engrafture of the Gentiles; who were originally like an olive-tree, which is wild by nature, grows in the field, bears no fruit, and is uſeleſs and unprofitable; ſo they by nature were ſinners of the Gentiles, children of wrath, full of unrighteouſneſs, without any fruit of holineſs; being not within the pale of the Jewiſh church and common-wealth; but in the wide field of the world, worthleſs, and of no account; and yet many were cut out of this wild olive-tree; were thro' the miniſtration of the Goſpel, by the power of divine grace ſeparated from the reſt of the world; were effectually called and brought into a Goſpel-church-ſtate; God took out from among them a people for his name. This their being cut out of the wild olive, as it expreſſes the power and grace of God towards them, ſo it might teach them humility, as it led them to obſerve their original ſtate and condition: and wert grafted, contrary to nature, into a good olive-tree; for an olive-tree being full of fatneſs will not admit of engrafture; nor was it ever uſual to engraft upon olives; hence the Jews ſay[y], זתים אין בהן הרכבה, there is no engrafture on olives; beſides, tis contrary to nature, uſe, and cuſtom, to engraft wild ſcions, or grafts of any ſort into a good ſtock; but always good ſcions or grafts into a wild ſtock, for in wild hungry ſtocks, grafts grow beſt: but in the engrafture of the Gentiles into a Goſpel-church-ſtate, juſt ſuch a method was taken, as if a wild graft were let into a good ſtock; ſo that this engrafture was not of nature, it was contrary to it; but of pure grace, and ſovereign good will and pleaſure; and the Apoſtle's argument is this, that if the Gentiles who were originally as a wild olive-tree; if ſome as grafts were taken out from among them, and quite contrary to their own nature, and the nature of things, were by the goodneſs and grace of God, grafted into a good olive, the Goſpel-church-ſtate; how much more ſhall theſe which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive-tree? that is, there is a greater likelihood, and more eaſily may it be, according to all appearance of things, that the Jews, the natural branches or deſcendants of Abraham ſhould be brought into a Goſpel-church-ſtate, which firſt began among them, and which at firſt only conſiſted of ſome of their nation. The Goſpel-church is called their own olive-tree, in alluſion to Iſrael, or the Jewiſh church, which is often ſo called in their writings. "Says[z] "R. Joſhua ben Levi, to what are the Iſraelites "like? לזית, to an olive-tree; to teach them that "as the leaves of an olive-tree do not fall, neither "on ſun-ſhine days, nor on rainy days; ſo the "Iſraelites will never ceaſe, neither in this world, "nor in the world to come; and ſays R. Jochanan, "to what are the Iſraelites like? to an olive; to "teach thee that as an olive does not ſend forth its "oil, but by the means of preſſing, ſo the Iſraelites "don't return to do good, but by the means of "chaſtiſement:" and ſays another[a] of their writers, "as oil aſcendeth above all liquids, and is not "mixed with them; ſo the Iſraelites aſcend above "all nations, and are not mixed with them; and "there is an intimation that they are even like "לזית, to an olive, that is preſſed or ſqueezed; "for ſo the Iſraelites are bruiſed and afflicted, and "yet notwithſtanding all this, they aſcend by virtue "of the law, which is called oil olive." It is eaſy to ſee from whence this ſimile is borrowed.

Ver. 25. For I would not, brethren, &c.] The Apoſtle, in order to raiſe the attention of the Gentiles to what he was about to deliver to them, not only ſtiles them brethren, expreſſing his affection for them, and their relation to him and other believing Jews, and to one another, being all one in Chriſt Jeſus, partakers of the ſame grace, and heirs of the ſame glory; but alſo tells them that what he had to acquaint them with, was a myſtery, a thing ſecret and hidden, which had not been heard of and known, at leaſt not ſo fully and clearly, as he was about to reveal it; and becauſe of his great reſpect for them, he was unwilling, as he ſays, that ye ſhould be ignorant of this myſtery; he was deſirous that they ſhould abound and improve, in all ſpiritual knowledge and judgment, and among the reſt, be better informed of this particular article, the call of the Jews: and his view in apprizing them of it, is expreſſed in the following clauſe, leſt ye ſhould be wiſe in your own conceits; leſt they ſhould imagine that they were the only wiſe and knowing perſons, and be elated in their minds with their knowledge and underſtanding, and look with contempt upon the poor, blind, ignorant Jews, as if they were always to remain in ſuch a ſtate of darkneſs and infidelity. The thing he had to inform them of is, that blindneſs in part is happened to Iſrael, until the fulneſs of the Gentiles be come in; by Iſrael is meant the Jews, the deſcendants of Jacob, whoſe name was Iſrael. Philo the Jew obſerves[b], that this name ſignifies ὁρασιν Θεȣ, the viſion of God; indeed, Jacob had it given him when he wreſtled with the angel, and ſaw God face to face, tho' it does not ſeem to be for that reaſon; however, blindneſs had now befallen the Jews, who had been favoured with a divine revelation, with the knowledge of God, his will and worſhip; and none were more blind than thoſe who were called the ſervants and meſſengers of the Lord of hoſts, as the Scribes and Phariſees, the prieſts and princes of the Jewiſh world. This blindneſs deſigns their unbelief, the hardneſs of their hearts, and darkneſs of their underſtandings with reſpect to God himſelf, whom they knew not in Chriſt; not as the Father of Chriſt; nor even the perfections of his nature, particularly his righteouſneſs; which was the reaſon of their ſetting up their own righteouſneſs, and of their non-ſubmiſſion to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt: they were blind as to the Meſſiah; they knew him not, when he came; they ſaw no beauty and comelineſs in him; could not diſcern the characters of him in Jeſus, tho' they were ſo manifeſt; and rejected him notwithſtanding the clear evidence of his miniſtry and miracles. They were in the dark about the ſenſe of the prophecies of the Old Teſtament; a vail was upon their hearts when they read them, ſo that they underſtood them not, and could not ſee their accompliſhment in Chriſt; they were even ignorant of the law, the ſpiritual nature, true uſe, and right end and ſcope of it; and it is no wonder that the Goſpel ſhould be hidden from them. This blindneſs happened to them not by chance, but befel them by the decree, and according to the will of God, who hardens whom he pleaſes; and according to various predictions in the Old Teſtament, cited in Matt. xiii. 14, 15. John xii. 39, 40. Rom. xi. 8, 9, 10. and in righteous judgment, for ſince they liked not to retain God and his Chriſt in their knowledge, it was but juſt in God to give them up to reprobate minds, to judicial blindneſs, and hardneſs of heart: but then this blindneſs only happened to them in part; not that it was only in ſome meaſure or ſome degree, for it was total, they were darkneſs itſelf, and had no ſpiritual and evangelic light at all on whom it fell; but that this blindneſs was not general with reſpect to perſons, there were ſome few, a ſeed, a remnant, that were delivered from it, tho' the far greater part of the nation were involved in it, and continue in it to this day; and will do, until the fulneſs of the Gentiles be come in; that is, till the whole number of God's elect among them, be called and brought into the Goſpel-church-ſtate, which in the latter day will be very great; when the earth ſhall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the ſea; when the kingdoms of this world ſhall become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Chriſt; and the abundance of the ſea ſhall be converted, and the forces of the Gentiles ſhall come to the church, and multitudes of them ſhall flock thither, as doves to their windows: and ſince the blindneſs of the Jews is not yet removed, it ſeems plain that the full number of God's choſen ones among the Gentiles, is not yet compleated in regeneration; for as ſoon as ever they are all called and brought in, the vail will be taken away from the Jews, and they will be turned unto the Lord.

Ver. 26. And ſo all Iſrael ſhall be ſaved, &c.] Meaning not the myſtical, ſpiritual Iſrael of God, conſiſting both of Jews and Gentiles, who ſhall appear to be ſaved in the Lord with an everlaſting ſalvation, when all God's elect among the latter are gathered in, which is the ſenſe many give into; but the people of the Jews, the generality of them, the body of that nation, called the fulneſs of them, ver. 12. and relates to the latter day, when a nation of them ſhall be born again at once; when their number, being as the ſand of the ſea, they ſhall come up out of the lands where they are diſperſed, and appoint them one head, Chriſt, and great ſhall be the day of Jezreel; when they, as a body, even the far greater part of them that ſhall be in being, ſhall return and ſeek the Lord their God, and David their king; ſhall acknowledge Jeſus to be the true Meſſiah, and ſhall look to him, believe on him, and be ſaved by him from wrath to come. There is a common ſaying among them [c], כל ישראל יש להם חלק לעולם הבא, all Iſrael ſhall have a part, or portion in the world to come; and in ſupport of this they uſually produce the paſſage in Iſ. lx. 21. thy people alſo ſhall be all righteous: yea, they even go ſo far as to ſay [d], "that hell-fire "will have no power over the tranſgreſſors of "Iſrael;" fancying, that every individual perſon of their nation will be ſaved; tho' they ſometimes except ſuch who deny the reſurrection of the dead, and that the law is from heaven, or is an epicure, and he that reads foreign books, or is an enchanter, or pronounces the ineffable name: but the Apoſtle is not to be underſtood with ſuch a latitude; he refers to the laſt times, and to a very general converſion of them to the Meſſiah: as it is written, Iſ. lix. 20. there ſhall come out of Zion the deliverer: the words of the prophet are, and the redeemer ſhall come to Zion: by the redeemer, or deliverer, words of the ſame ſignification, is meant the Meſſiah, as the Jews [e] themſelves own, and apply this paſſage to him; who is the Goel, or near kinſman of his people, to whom the right of their redemption belongs as man; and who as God was able to effect it, and as God-man and mediator, was every way qualified for it, and has obtained it for them: and whereas, in the prophet Iſaiah, he is ſaid to come to, and by the Apoſtle, out of Zion, this may be reconciled by obſerving, that the ſervile letter ל ſometimes ſignifies from, as well as to, when it is put in the room of מ; of which inſtances may be given, as Exod. xvi. 1. and xix. 1. Numb. xxxiii. 38. Ezra iii. 8. 1 Kings xii. 24. compared with 2 Chron. xi. 4. Beſides, the Meſſiah was to come out of Zion, as well as to come to it, according to Pſ. xiv. 7. ſo that the Apoſtle fitly expreſſes the faith and expectation of the old Jewiſh church in this citation: and ſhall turn away ungodlineſs from Jacob; in the prophet it is, and unto them that turn from tranſgreſſion in Jacob. The Apoſtle follows the tranſlation of the Septuagint, and which is favoured by the Chaldee Paraphraſe, which runs thus; the redeemer ſhall come to Zion, and to turn the rebellious ones of the houſe of Jacob to the law; ſo that the Jew [f] has no reaſon to charge the Apoſtle with a perverſion of the prophet's words, when they are cited ſo agreeable to their own Targumiſt: and the ſenſe of them relates not to what Chriſt did on the croſs, when the iniquities of his people were laid on him, and he bore them, and removed them all in one day from them; but to what he will do to the Jews in the latter day, in conſequence thereof; he'll convince them of their ungodlineſs, give them repentance for it, and remiſſion of it.

Ver. 27. For this is my covenant unto them, &c.] This is what God has promiſed to them in covenant, and he'll be as good as his word; his covenant will never be broken, it will always remain ſure and inviolable; ſo that there is not only a poſſibility, and a probability, but even a certainty, of the call and converſion of the Jews; which promiſe and covenant will have their accompliſhment, when I, ſaith the Lord, ſhall take away their ſins: ſome think that the Apoſtle alludes to Jer. xxxi. 34. others, that he takes this paſſage out of Iſa. xxvii. 9. where in the Septuagint verſion, the ſelf-ſame phraſe is uſed; though it may be no citation, or reference, but the Apoſtle's own words, explaining what is meant by turning away ungodlineſs from Jacob; and as before, regards not the taking away of their ſins by the ſacrifice of Chriſt, which is done already, and is what the blood of bulls and goats could not do; but of the removing of their ſins from themſelves, from their conſciences, by the application of the blood of Chriſt, and the imputation of his righteouſneſs.

Ver. 28. As concerning the Goſpel, &c.] Whereas it might be objected to the call and converſion of the Jews, their implacable enmity to the Goſpel, the Apoſtle replies, by granting, that with reſpect to that, they were enemies to God and Chriſt, to the Goſpel, and the miniſters of it, and particularly to the Apoſtle: for your ſakes; the Gentiles, to whom it was preached, and by whom it was received, and which greatly irritated and provoked the Jews; or the ſenſe is, that they were ſuffered to reject the Goſpel, and treat it with hatred and virulence, lence, that by this means it might be taken away from them, and carried to the Gentiles; ſo that the preſent enmity of the Jews to the Goſpel, turned to the advantage of the Gentiles, and ſhould not hinder the future converſion of God's elect among them in the latter day: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers ſakes; as many of them as belong to the election of grace, are beloved of God; and will appear to be ſo, when they are called by grace, as they will be, for the confirming of the promiſes, concerning their future reſtoration made unto their fathers; not one of which ſhall ever fall to the ground, or they be deprived of any gifts and bleſſings of grace, which God has purpoſed for them, or promiſed to them, as is clear from what follows.

Ver. 29. For the gifts and calling of God, &c.] By gifts are meant, not the gifts of nature and providence, as life, health, ſtrength, riches, and honour, which God ſometimes gives, and repents of, and takes away; as he repented that he had made man upon earth, and Saul king of Iſrael; which muſt be underſtood by an Anthropopathy, after the manner of men, and that not of a change of the counſel of his mind, but of the courſe of his providence: nor do gifts here deſign external gifts of grace, or ſuch gifts of the Spirit, which qualify men for miniſterial work, for publick ſervice in the church; for theſe may be taken away, as the parable of the talents ſhews; ſee 1 Cor. xiii. 8. but the ſpecial and ſpiritual gifts of God's free grace, which relate to the ſpiritual and eternal welfare of the ſouls of men, even that grace which was given to God's elect in Chriſt before the world was, and all thoſe ſpiritual bleſſings wherewith they were then bleſs'd in him: theſe are without repentance; that is, they are immutable and unalterable; God never revokes them, or calls them in again, or takes them away from the perſons to whom he has made ſuch a previous donation: the reaſons are, becauſe that his love from whence they ſpring is always the ſame; it admits of no diſtinction, nor of any degrees, nor of any alteration; and electing grace, according to which theſe gifts are beſtowed, ſtands ſure and immoveable; not upon the foot of works, but of the ſovereign will of God, and always has its ſure and certain effect; and the covenant of grace, in which they are ſecured, remains firm and inviolable; and indeed, theſe gifts are no other than the promiſes of it, which are all yea and Amen in Chriſt, and the bleſſings of it, which are the ſure mercies of David. Whatever God purpoſes, or promiſes to give, or really does give to his people, whether into the hands of Chriſt for them, or into their own, he never repents of or reverſes. Agreeable to theſe words of the Apoſtle, the Jews ſay [g], "that the holy bleſſed God after, שנתן המתנה, that he hath given a gift, לא יקחנה המקבל, never takes it away from the receiver; and this is the Gemara, or doctrine of the Rabbins [h], דמיהב יהבי משקל לא שקלי, that giving they give, but taking away they do not take away; the Gloſs upon it is, בתר דיהבי, after it is given:" the meaning is, that what is once given to men from heaven, is never taken away from them up into heaven: and elſewhere [i] they aſk, "is there any ſervant to whom his maſter gives a gift, and returns and takes it away from him?" Moreover, the Apoſtle here ſays the ſame of the calling of God, as of gifts; by which is meant, not a bare external call by the miniſtry of the word, which oftentimes is without effect, and may be where perſons are neither choſen, nor converted, nor ſaved; but an internal effectual call, by ſpecial, powerful, and efficacious grace; and deſigns either actual vocation, to which are inſeparably annexed final perſeverance in grace, and eternal glorification; or rather the purpoſe of God from eternity, to call his people in time, and which is never repented of, or changed. The Apoſtle's argument here is this, that ſince there is a number of people among the Jews whom God has loved, and has choſen to everlaſting ſalvation, and has in covenant promiſed to them, and ſecured and laid up gifts for them, and has determined to call them by his grace; and ſince all theſe are unchangeable and irreverſible, the future call and converſion of theſe perſons, muſt be ſure and certain.

Ver. 30. For as ye in times paſt have not believed God, &c.] The times referred to, are the times of ignorance, idolatry, and ſuperſtition; when God ſuffered the Gentiles, for many hundreds of years, to walk in their own ways; while the Jews were his favourite people, were choſen by him above all people, ſeparated from them, and diſtinguiſhed by his goodneſs; had his word and oracles, his judgments and his ſtatutes to direct them, and many other valuable bleſſings: the times before the coming of the Meſſiah are here meant, when theſe people ſat in darkneſs, and in the region of the ſhadow of death; till Chriſt who came to lighten the Gentiles, ſent his Goſpel among them, and which has been attended with great ſucceſs; in theſe times they were in a ſtate of incredulity: they either, as ſome of them, did not believe there was a God, or that there was but one God, at leaſt but very few believed it; and theſe did not know who he was; nor did they glorify him as God, or perform any true ſpiritual worſhip to him; the far greater part believed there were more Gods, and did ſervice to them which by nature were no Gods, and fell down to idols of gold, and ſilver, and wood, and ſtone: and yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief; that is, they were regenerated, effectually called and converted, through the rich and abundant mercy of God; repentance unto life was granted to them; and faith in our Lord Jeſus, as a free-grace gift was beſtowed upon them; and they had an application of pardoning grace and mercy, through the blood of Chriſt made unto them; and all this through the unbelief of the Jews: not that their unbelief could be the cauſe of their obtaining mercy; but the Jews not believing in the Meſſiah, but rejecting him, and contradicting and blaſpheming his Goſpel, it was taken away from them, and carried to the Gentiles; which was the means of their believing in Chriſt, and obtaining mercy; ſo that the unbelief of the Jews, was the occaſion and means in providence, of bringing the Goſpel to the Gentiles, whereby faith came; ſee ver. 11. This mercy they are ſaid to enjoy now; for the preſent time of the Goſpel, is the diſpenſation of mercy to the Gentiles.

Ver. 31. Even ſo have theſe alſo now not believed, &c.] Now is the time of the Jews unbelief, blindneſs has happened to them, the vail is over their hearts; as the Gentiles formerly did not believe God, ſo the Jews do not now; though they believe there is a God, and that there is but one God, yet they don't believe God in Chriſt; nor that he is the Father of Chriſt; or that Chriſt is the Son of God, the true Meſſiah, and Saviour of the world; they do not believe, as ſome read the words, connecting them with the next clauſe, and ſo they ſtand in the original text, in your mercy; meaning either Chriſt, in whom the Gentiles obtained mercy; or the Goſpel, the means of it; or the ſenſe is, that they do not believe that mercy belongs to the Gentiles, having entertained a notion, that the Meſſiah, and the bleſſings of mercy and goodneſs by him, are peculiar to Iſrael: but our verſion after Beza, who follows Theophylact, connects the clauſe with the following, that through your mercy, they may obtain mercy; not through the mercy the Gentiles ſhew to others, but which they have received of God; and principally intends faith, which ſprings from the mercy of God, and is a gift of his pure, free, rich grace; and ſtands oppoſed to the unbelief of the Jews, through which the Gentiles are ſaid to obtain mercy; and the meaning is, that in time to come, the Jews obſerving the mercy obtained and enjoyed by the Gentiles, will be provoked to jealouſy, and ſtirred up to an emulation of them, to ſeek for the ſame mercy at the ſame hands, and in the ſame way, they have had it; ſee ver. 11. The Apoſtle's argument in favour of the call and converſion of the Jews, upon the whole is this, that ſince the unbelief of the Gentiles was no bar to their obtaining mercy, and that through the infidelity of the Jews; then it can't be thought, that the preſent blindneſs, hardneſs of heart, enmity, and unbelief, which now attend the Jews, can be any obſtacle to their obtaining mercy in the ſame way the Gentiles have; but as the one has been, the other alſo will be.

Ver. 32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, &c.] Both Jews and Gentiles, particularly God's elect among them: ſome think the metaphor is taken from the binding up of ſheaves in bands; and that Jews and Gentiles are the ſheaves, and unbelief the band, in which they are bound together; but the Apoſtle is not ſpeaking of their being together in unbelief, but as ſeparate, firſt the Gentiles, and now the Jews: rather it ſeems to be taken from a priſon, and Jews and Gentiles are repreſented as priſoners, and unbelief the priſon, in which they are ſhut up by God: not that God is the author of unbelief, or of any other ſin in men; he does not put it into them, or them into that, but finding them in unbelief, concludes them in it, or leaves them in ſuch a ſtate, and does not as yet however deliver out of it, or ſay to the priſoners go forth: moreover, to be concluded in unbelief, is the ſame as to be concluded under ſin, Gal. iii. 22. that is, to be thoroughly convinced of it; and to be held and bound down by ſuch a ſenſe of it in the conſcience, as to ſee no way to eſcape deſerved puniſhment, or to obtain ſalvation, but by fleeing to the mercy of God in Chriſt: that he might have mercy upon all; not upon all the individuals of Jews and Gentiles; for all are not concluded in, or convinced of the ſin of unbelief, but only ſuch who are eventually believers, as appears from the parallel text, Gal. iii. 22. and deſigns all God's elect among the Jews, called their fulneſs, ver. 12. and all God's elect among the Gentiles, called the fulneſs of the Gentiles, ver. 25. for whom he has mercy in ſtore, and will beſtow it on them; and in order to bring them to a ſenſe of their need of it, and that he may the more illuſtriouſly diſplay the riches of it, he leaves them for a while in a ſtate of unbelief, and then by his Spirit thoroughly convinces them of it, and gives them faith to look to, and believe in, the mercy of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, unto eternal life.

Ver. 33. O the depth of the riches, both of the wiſdom and knowledge of God! &c.] Theſe words are the epilogue, or concluſion of the doctrinal part of this epiſtle, and relate to what is ſaid throughout the whole of it hitherto; particularly to the doctrines of ſalvation by Chriſt, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, predeſtination, the calling of the Gentiles, the rejection of the Jews, and their reſtoration in the latter day; upon the whole of which, the Apoſtle breaks forth into this pathetic exclamation; the deſign of which is to ſhew, how much of the wiſdom and knowledge of God is diſplayed in theſe doctrines, and how ſmall a part of it is known by the beſt of men, and therefore ought not to be cavilled at and objected to, becauſe of ſome difficulties attending them, but to be received upon the teſtimony of divine revelation: and if there was a depth in theſe things unſearchable and paſt finding out, by ſo great a man as the Apoſtle, who had by revelation ſuch knowledge in the myſteries of grace, and who had been caught up into the third heaven, and heard things unutterable, how much leſs is it to be fathomed by others, and therefore ſhould be ſilent: by the wiſdom and knowledge of God, one and the ſame thing is meant; and deſign not ſo much the perfections of the divine nature, which are infinite and unſearchable, the underſtanding of which is too high for creatures, and not to be attained to by them; nor the diſplay of them in the works of creation and providence, in which there are moſt glorious and amazing inſtances; but rather the effects of them, the counſels and decrees of God; which are ſo wiſely formed and laid, as not to fail of their accompliſhment, or to be fruſtrated of their end; and the doctrines of grace relating to them, in which are treaſures, riches, that is, an abundance of wiſdom and knowledge; and a depth, not to be reached to the bottom of, in this imperfect ſtate, and in which the knowledge and wiſdom of God are wonderfully diſplayed: thus in the doctrine of redemption and ſalvation by Chriſt, wherein God has abounded in all wiſdom and prudence; in the perſon fixed upon to be the Saviour, his own Son; who by the aſſumption of human nature, being God and man in one perſon, was very fit and proper to be a mediator between God and man, to tranſact the affair of ſalvation; was every way qualified for it, and able to do it: ſo likewiſe in the manner in which it is accompliſhed, being done in a way which glorifies all the divine perfections; in which the rights of God's juſtice, and the honour of his holineſs are ſecured, as well as his love, grace, and mercy, diſplayed; in which ſatan is moſt mortified, ſin condemned, and the ſinner ſaved; and alſo in the perſons, the ſubjects of it, ungodly ſinners, enemies, the chief of ſinners, whereby the grace of God is the more illuſtrated, and all boaſting in the creature excluded. The wiſdom of God manifeſtly appears, in the doctrine of a ſinner's juſtification; which though it proceeds from grace, yet upon the foot of redemption and ſatisfaction, in a way of ſtrict juſtice; ſo that God is juſt, whilſt he is the juſtifier; it is of perſons ungodly, and without a righteouſneſs in themſelves, and yet by a perfect and compleat righteouſneſs, anſwerable to all the demands of law and juſtice; and the grace of faith, is wiſely made the recipient of this bleſſing, that it might appear to be of free-grace, and not of works, and that the juſtified ones might have ſolid peace, joy, and comfort, from it. The doctrine of predeſtination is full of the wiſdom and knowledge of God; his choice of ſome to everlaſting life in his Son, through ſanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth, for the glorifying of his grace and mercy, in a way of righteouſneſs; and his paſſing by others, leaving them to themſelves, and in their ſins, juſtly to periſh for them, for the glorifying of his juſtice, are acts of the higheſt wiſdom, and done according to the counſel of his will. The account juſt given of the call of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews, is an aſtoniſhing ſcheme of infinite wiſdom; that, on the one hand ſalvation ſhould come to the Gentiles, through the fall of the Jews, and they ſhould obtain mercy through their unbelief; and on the other hand, that the reſtoration of the Jews, ſhould be as life from the dead to the Gentiles; and the Jews, through their mercy, obtain mercy; and that both in their turns, ſhould be ſhut up in unbelief by God, that he might have mercy on them all, O the depth, &c. To which is added, how unſearchable are his judgments! which are not to be underſtood of his awful judgments on wicked men in particular, nor of the adminiſtrations of his providence in general; though theſe are a great deep, and in many inſtances are unſearchable, and can't be accounted for in the preſent ſtate, but will hereafter be made manifeſt; nor of the commands of God, ſometimes called his judgments, which are all plain, and may be eaſily ſearched out in his word; but rather of the counſels and purpoſes of God, and the doctrines of grace relating thereunto; which are the deep things of God, and are only ſearched out by the Spirit of God, who reveals them to us: and his ways paſt finding out! not the methods and courſe of his providence, though his way in this reſpect is often in the deep, his footſteps are not to be known, diſcerned, and traced, by finite creatures; but rather the goings forth and ſteps of his wiſdom from everlaſting, in his purpoſes and decrees, council and covenant, which are higher than the ways of men, even as the heavens are higher than the earth; and which are all mercy and truth to his choſen people, and ſtrict juſtice to others, and not to be found out by any; particularly his ways and methods, and dealings, with both Jews and Gentiles; that he ſhould for ſo many hundred years leave the Gentiles in blindneſs and unbelief; and now for as many years his favourite people the Jews in the ſame, and yet gather in his elect out of them both; theſe are things out of our reach and comprehenſion.

Ver. 34. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? &c.] The intentions of his mind, the thoughts of his heart, and the counſels of his will: theſe could never have been known, if he had not revealed them; nor can the doctrines relating to them, though externally revealed, be known by the natural man, or by the mere dint of nature, but only by the light of the Spirit of God; who ſearches them, and makes them known in a ſpiritual manner, to ſpiritual men, who have a ſpiritual diſcerning of them; and yet even by theſe they are not known perfectly, only in part, and are ſeen through a glaſs darkly: or who hath been his counſellor? or was of his council, when all things were fixed according to his ſovereign will: when the ſcheme of man's ſalvation was conſulted and agreed upon between the eternal Three, there was no creature, angel, or man there; no created angel, only the increated one, the counſellor, Iſa. ix. 6. or as the Septuagint there ſtile him, αγγελος μεγαλης βουλης, the angel of the great council; none but Father, Son, and Spirit were preſent, when the book of life was made, when the names of God's elect were put into it, and others left out; when all things relating to his choſen ones, both for time and eternity, whether among Jews or Gentiles, were determined, ordered, and ſettled; and as there was no creature that aſſiſted, or could give any advice about theſe matters, ſo there were none that were privy to the reſolutions, determinations, and counſels of his will; which were purpoſed in himſelf, and in his Son, and were known only to them and his Spirit, which is in him: from the whole it appears, that predeſtination is not according to mens works, or the foreſight of them; for then theſe things would be plain and eaſy, they would not be unſearchable and paſt finding out; there would not be an unfathomable depth in them; the mind and counſels of God, and the ſprings of them would be obvious; but it is according to his ſecret, ſovereign, and unchangeable will.

Ver. 35. Or who hath firſt given to him, &c.] See Job xli. 11. and xxxv. 7. no man can give God any thing, which he has not firſt given him, or which he has not a prior right to, or a claim upon him for; Adam in innocence, was not able to give God any thing, nor are the angels in heaven, much leſs ſinful men on earth; their bodies and ſouls, and all their enjoyments, all that is good in them, or done by them, are from the Lord; men by all their good works, beſt duties and ſervices, give nothing to God, nor lay him under any manner of obligation to them: hence no man can merit any thing at the hands of God, if he could, it ſhall be recompenſed to him again; but it is impoſſible there ſhould be merit in a creature, who has nothing but what he has from God, and does nothing but what he is obliged to do; and that not by his own ſtrength, but by the grace and ſtrength of God; and therefore there's no retribution made by God as of debt, but of grace: hence it follows, that God is indebted to, and obliged by none, and may do what he will with his own; love Jacob and hate Eſau; chuſe one and not another; reject the Jews, and call the Gentiles; ſave and juſtify ſome, and not others; none can call him to account, or ſay unto him what doſt thou? or why doſt thou thus?

Ver. 36. For of him, and through him, and to him are all things, &c.] Not only all things in nature and providence, he being the maker and efficient cauſe of all things, and the preſerver and ſupporter of them in their beings, and to whoſe glory they are all deſigned and directed; but all things in grace owe their original to him, as their firſt cauſe; they are produced by him, and make for his glory; they all ſpring from his ſovereign will, are brought about by his almighty power, and tend to the glory of his grace; as does every thing in election, redemption, and regeneration: particularly the counſels and purpoſes of God reſpecting men, may be here meant; which all riſe out of his own heart, without any motive or inducement to them in the creature; are accompliſhed by his divine power, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition of men and devils; and all iſſue in his glory, even ſuch of them as may ſeem to carry in them ſeverity to ſome of his creatures: and ſince this is the caſe, the following doxology, or aſcription of glory to God, is juſtly and pertinently made, to whom be glory for ever; and which will be given to him by angels and men to all eternity, for the perfections of his being, the counſels of his will, and the works of his hands, both of nature and grace: to which the Apoſtle annexes his Amen, ſo be it, aſſenting to it, wiſhing for it, and believing of it.

CHAP. XII.

THE doctrines concerning predeſtination, juſtification, &c. being eſtabliſhed, the duties of religion are built upon them, and enforced by them in this and the following chapters. The Apoſtle firſt exhorts all the members of the church in common, to a regard to the worſhip of God, in oppoſition to the things of the world; and then the officers of the church particularly, to the diſcharge of their duty; and next all of them, both officers and members, to the performance of various duties reſpecting God, themſelves, one another, and the men of the world. The duty of attending public worſhip is firſt mentioned, ſignified by a preſentation of their bodies to the Lord, ver. 1. to which they are moved, partly by the plenteous mercy and goodneſs of God to them; and partly by the acceptableneſs of it to God; as alſo by the reaſonableneſs of the thing: then follows a dehortation from conformity to the world, the men and manners of it, in ſuperſtition and will-worſhip, or in acts of immorality, ver. 2. and alſo an exhortation to a different courſe of life, in ſeeking to pleaſe God; which is propoſed upon a principle of grace in them, being renewed in the ſpirit of their mind; and with this end and view, that they might the better prove, try, and diſcern, and come at, a greater knowledge of the mind and will of God: and whereas gifts are apt to ſwell men with pride and vanity, ſuch as qualify men to bear any office in the church, the Apoſtle cautions againſt this ſpirit and conduct, and exhorts to ſobriety and humility; by obſerving, that what gifts they have, are ſuch that God has given them, and which they have not of themſelves; and what they have is only in part and in meaſure, ſome one and ſome another; and none have all gifts, ver. 3. this he illuſtrates, ver. 4. by an human body and the members of it, which being many, have not the ſame office, but ſome one and ſome another; which he accommodates to the body of Chriſt the church, ver. 5. which though but one in Chriſt, has many members; and theſe are members one of another, and are deſigned mutually to ſerve and help each other, for which the gifts among them were beſtowed: and then the Apoſtle proceeds to take notice of the particular officers in the church, and exhorts them to the function of their offices, according to their different gifts; as firſt, the preacher to preach according to the rule of faith, and the meaſure of gifts beſtowed, ver. 6. and then the deacon, the other officer, to attend to his deaconſhip, ver. 7. and inaſmuch as theſe officers, according to their different gifts, may be diſtinguiſhed, ſome having a talent for ſtating, explaining, and defending doctrines, and may be called doctors, or teachers, let them attend to the doctrinal part of the word; and others having a talent in the practical way of preaching, whether by way of exhortation or comfort, and may be called exhorters or comforters, let them attend to that branch of the miniſtry, ver. 8. and as for the deacon, the performance of his office, whether it be by diſtributing to the poor, let him do it impartially and faithfully; or by aſſiſting in the government of the church, let it be done with all diligence; or by ſhewing mercy to the poor in diſtreſs, beſides what they uſually receive, let it be done with a chearful countenance: next follow various duties which are mentioned, not in an exact order or method, but may be reduced to theſe heads; ſuch as concern God, an unfeigned love of him, abhorrence of all evil, and a cloſe attachment to whatſoever is good, ver. 9. and alſo the worſhip of him, which is to be performed with diligence and fervency, ver. 11. the exerciſe of the grace of hope with joy, patience in the midſt of tribulations, and perſeverance in prayer, ver. 12. then ſuch duties as concern one another, as chriſtians and brethren in a church-relation; as to exerciſe an affectionate brotherly love to each other, and to honour one another; and even to give each other the preference, who may be equal or ſuperior, both in ſpiritual gifts, and in temporal things, ver. 10. and with reſpect to poor ſaints, to communicate chearfully to their neceſſities; and with reſpect to ſtrangers, to entertain them hoſpitably, ver. 13. and as to every member, whether in proſperous or adverſe circumſtances, to bear a part with them, rejoicing with the one, weeping with the other, ver. 15. and to behave with humility, modeſty, and ſobriety, towards all, ver. 16. and next ſuch duties as concern the men of the world, particularly to bleſs, and not curſe perſecutors, ver. 14. not to retaliate evil for evil, but to do every thing that is of good report in the ſight of men, ver. 17. to ſtudy, if poſſible, to live peaceably with all men, ver. 18. to bridle paſſion and refrain from wrath, and not ſeek private revenge, but leave it with the Lord to take vengeance, ver. 19. on the other hand, to be kind and beneficent to enemies, by giving them food and drink when hungry and thirſty, expreſſed in the words of Solomon, Prov. xxv. 21, 22. the reaſons for which are, becauſe hereby an enemy may be wrought upon, and be brought either to ſhame or repentance, and become a friend, ver. 20. and becauſe by doing otherwiſe, reſenting and returning the evil, a man is conquered by it; whereas by the other method, the enemy is conquered by good, ver. 21. and it is much more commendable and honourable to be a conqueror, than to be conquered.

Ver. 1. I beſeech you therefore brethren, by the mercies of God, &c.] The Apoſtle having finiſhed the doctrinal part of this epiſtle, proceeds to that which is more practical; and enforces the ſeveral duties of religion, upon the principles he had before laid down, a method generally obſerved by him in all his epiſtles. The illative particle therefore, ſhews that the following exhortations, are ſo many concluſions, conſequences, and inferences, deduced from what had been ſaid in the latter part of the preceding chapter; that ſince all things are of God, and by him and to him, then the ſaints ought to preſent their bodies to him, and to know, approve, and do his will; and ſince they have nothing but what they have received from him, they ought not to think too highly of, or glory in their attainments. The introduction to theſe exhortations, is in a very kind and affectionate manner; the ſaints are addreſſed as brethren, and very appoſitely; ſince this expreſſes the relation they ſtood in to the Apoſtle, for whom he had an hearty love and concern; and therefore what he preſſed them to, was out of a ſincere regard to their good, as well as to the glory of God; alſo their relation to each other, and which ſeveral of the duties he urges, had a connexion with; likewiſe their relation to God, being of his family, having one and the ſame Father, and ſo under obligation to regard his will, honour and reverence him: moreover, theſe things are moved, not in an imperious way, in an authoritative manner, but by way of intreaty, I beſeech you; as an ambaſſador of Chriſt, and as though in his ſtead: nor are they enforced by terrors, threats, and menaces, but by the mercies of God; that is, the abundant mercy of God, diſplayed in their election, regeneration, and vocation; than which, nothing can have a greater influence on a believer, to engage him to holineſs of life and converſation; and ſhews, that the doctrines of grace are no licentious ones, nor do they render uſeleſs precepts, exhortations, intreaties, cautions, and advice, particularly ſuch as follow: that ye preſent your bodies; not barely that part of them commonly ſo called, for this is not to be underſtood of a mere preſentation of the body in publick worſhip; for though this ought to be, yet not without the heart engaged therein, otherwiſe bodily exerciſe will be of no avail; nor of a bare abſtinence from groſſer ſins done in the body, and againſt it, and which defile and diſhonour it; much leſs of a maceration, and keeping under the body, by watchings, faſting, &c. and ſtill leſs of an offering of the body at death in a way of martyrdom, though this ought to be chearfully complied with when called for: but by their bodies are meant, themſelves, their whole ſouls and bodies, all the powers and faculties of their ſouls, and members of their bodies; and the preſenting of them, deſigns a devoting of them, with all readineſs and willingneſs, to the ſervice of God, for his honour and glory, without putting any confidence in, or placing any dependance upon them; which would be ſacrificing to their own net, and burning incenſe to their drag; it includes the whole of their ſervice, converſation, and religion, internal and external. So the Jews [k] ſay, “worthy is the portion of the righteous, who “offer every day this offering before the Lord; “and what is it? גרמייהו ונפשייהו, their bodies “and their ſouls, which they offer before him.” The alluſion is to the rite of ſacrificing, to the bringing of the ſlain beaſt, and laying it on the altar, and there preſenting and offering it to the Lord. Under the Goſpel-diſpenſation all believers are prieſts; and the ſacrifices they bring are not the bodies of ſlain beaſts, but their own bodies, their whole ſelves; and theſe a living ſacrifice, in oppoſition to the bodies of ſlain beaſts offered under the legal diſpenſation, and to the dead works of ſuch as are deſtitute of faith in Chriſt, and to the lifeleſs performances of the ſaints themſelves at certain times; and deſigns ſuch a preſentation of themſelves in the performance of religious duties, as ſprings from a principle of life under the quickening influences of the Spirit of God, with faith and fervency; tho' without any view to obtain life hereby, for that is only by the offering up of the body of Chriſt once for all. Another epithet of this ſacrifice of our bodies to God is holy, in alluſion to the ſacrifices under the law, which were ſeparated from common uſe, and devoted to God, and were not to have the leaſt ſpot and blemiſh in them; and regards men ſanctified by the Spirit of God, and whoſe actions flow from a principle of holineſs, and are performed under the influence of the holy Spirit; and ſuch ſacrifices as are both living and holy, cannot but be acceptable to God thro' the mediation of his Son, by whom, as the perſons, the ſouls and bodies of his people, ſo their ſpiritual ſacrifices, whether of prayer or praiſe, are only acceptable to him: which is your reaſonable ſervice; it is agreeable to reaſon, and eſpecially as ſanctified, that men who have their beings from God, and are upheld in them by him, and are followed with the bounties of providence; and eſpecially who are made new creatures, and are bleſſed by him with all ſpiritual bleſſings in Chriſt, that they ſhould give up themſelves to him, and chearfully ſerve him in their day and generation: ſuch ſervice is alſo agreeable to the ſcriptures of truth, the ſtandard of faith and practice, and contain and enforce nothing but what is highly reaſonable to be complied with; 'tis ſuch ſervice as lies not in the ſlaying of irrational creatures, but in the preſenting of men endued with rational powers unto God; and is of a ſpiritual nature, performed by ſpiritual men, under the influence of the Spirit of God; and is ſuitable to the nature and perfections of God, and ſtands oppoſed to the corporal and carnal ſervice of the Jews.

Ver. 2. And be not conformed to this world, &c.] By this world is meant, either the Moſaic diſpenſation, and Jewiſh church-ſtate, ſo called in oppoſition to עולם הבא, the world to come, the Goſpel-diſpenſation; in which there were a worldly ſanctuary, and the rites and ceremonies of which are ſtiled the rudiments and elements of the world; to which believers in the preſent ſtate are by no means to conform, there being ſacrifices and ordinances of another nature, it is the will of God they ſhould obſerve and attend unto: or elſe the men of the world are deſigned, carnal and unregenerate men, among whom they formerly had their converſation, from among whom they were choſen, called, and ſeparated, and who lie and live in wickedneſs, and therefore ſhould not be conformed unto them: which is to be underſtood, not in a civil ſenſe of conformity to them in garb and apparel, provided that pride and luxury are guarded againſt, and decency and ſobriety obſerved, and the different abilities of perſons and ſtations in life are attended to; or to any other civil uſages and cuſtoms which are not contrary to natural and revealed religion; but of a conformity in a moral ſenſe to the evil manners of men, to walk vainly, as other Gentiles do, to go into the ſame exceſs of riot with them; for this is contrary both to the principle and doctrine of grace, which teach men to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts; and of a compliance with the men of the world in a religious ſenſe, by joining with them in acts of idolatry, ſuperſtition, and will-worſhip, and in any thing that is contrary to the order, ordinances, and truths of the Goſpel. But be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind; which regards not the firſt work of converſion and renovation; for in this ſenſe theſe perſons were transformed, metamorphoſed, changed, and renewed already; but the after-progreſs and carrying on of the work of renovation, the renewing of them day by day in the Spirit of their minds; ſee Eph. iv. 23. 2 Cor iv. 16. which believers ſhould be deſirous of, and pray for, and make uſe of thoſe means which the Spirit of God owns for this purpoſe, attending to the ſpiritual exerciſes of religion, as reading, meditation, prayer, conference, the miniſtration of the word and ordinances, which is the reverſe of conformity to the world: and the end to be attained hereby is, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God; by which is meant not the ſecret will of God, which can't be ſearched into, proved, and known, till time and facts diſcover it; but the revealed will of God, both in the law, as in the hands of [k] Zohar in Lev. fol. 4. 2.

Chriſt, which contains nothing but what is good; and which when done in faith, from a principle of love, and to the glory of God, is acceptable thro' Chriſt; and is perfect as a law of liberty, and rule of walk and converſation; and which is to be proved and approved of by all the ſaints, who delight in it after the inward man: and alſo that which is contained in the Goſpel; as that all that the Father hath given to Chriſt ſhould be redeemed by him, that theſe ſhould be ſanctified and perſevere to the end, and be glorified; all which is the good will of God, an acceptable ſaying to ſenſible ſinners, and ſuch a ſcheme of ſalvation as is perfect and complete, and needs nothing to be added to it; and is by ſuch who are daily renewed in the ſpirit of their minds, more and more proved, tried, diſcerned, and approved of, even by all ſuch who have their ſpiritual ſenſes exerciſed to diſcern things that differ.

Ver. 3. For I ſay, through the grace given unto me, &c.] The Ethiopic verſion reads, the grace of God; and ſo two of Stephens's copies. By which the Apoſtle intends, not that internal grace which was wrought in his ſoul; nor the Goſpel of the grace of God, which he preached; nor the gifts of grace which qualified him for that ſervice; but the grace of Apoſtleſhip, or that authoritative power which he, as an Apoſtle, received from Chriſt to ſay, command, give orders and inſtructions to churches, and particular perſons: to every man that is among you; every member of the church, in whatſoever ſtate or condition, whether in office or not; of whatſoever abilities and capacity, having gifts, whether more or leſs; the manifeſtation of the Spirit being given to every one to profit with, for his own and the good of others: not to think of himſelf more highly than he ought to think; that is, either not to arrogate to himſelf what does not belong to him, and detract from others, who may have equal, if not ſuperior abilities to him; or not to glory in what he has, as if he had not received it, and as if it was altogether owing to his own ſagacity, penetration, diligence, and induſtry; or not to ſearch into things too high for him, that are out of his reach, and beyond his capacity; tho' this is not to be underſtood as diſcouraging a ſearch into the ſcriptures of truth, the more difficult parts of it, and the more knotty points of controverſy; but as forbidding enquiry into things not lawful to be ſearched into, or if lawful, as requiring ſuch a ſcrutiny to be made with modeſty, and an humble dependance on ſuperior light and aſſiſtance, and a diſcovery of it with humility and lowlineſs of mind: but to think ſoberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the meaſure of faith; ſuch ought to conſider that what gifts, abilities, light, and knowledge they have, they have them not of themſelves but from God; that they have not all faith, and all knowledge, or don't know the whole of the faith of the Goſpel, only a meaſure of it, which is dealt out, divided, and parted to every man, ſome having a greater degree of evangelical light than others; and that all have ſome, but none all. The Syriac verſion renders it, faith in meaſure; one of Stephens's copies read, the meaſure of grace; ſee Eph. iv. 7.

Ver. 4. For as we have many members in one body, &c.] The Apoſtle illuſtrates what he ſaid laſt concerning God's dealing to every man the meaſure of faith, by comparing the church of Chriſt to an human body, which is but one, and has many members in union with it, and one another; and which are placed in an exact ſymmetry and proportion, and in proper ſubſerviency to each other, and for the good of the whole: and all members have not the ſame office, or action; they don't exerciſe the ſame function, and perform the ſame operation, but each that which is peculiar to itſelf: the eye only ſees, but does not hear, nor taſte, nor ſmell; the ear only hears, but neither ſees, or does any of the foreſaid things; the palate taſtes, the noſe ſmells, the hand handles, the foot walks, and the ſame may be obſerved of the other members of the body, which have not the ſame, but their particular offices, and all and each of them their uſefulneſs.

Ver. 5. So we being many are one body in Chriſt, &c.] This is the application of the above ſimile. The choſen of God, the redeemed of Chriſt, and thoſe that are juſtified by his righteouſneſs, and ſanctified by his Spirit; tho' they are but few in compariſon of the men of the world, but conſidered in themſelves are many, and yet make up but one body the church, of which Chriſt is the head: and tho' this general aſſembly, or church univerſal, may be diſtinguiſhed into ſeveral congregational churches and diſtinct communities, yet each community, conſiſting of divers perſons, is but one body in Chriſt, united and knit togther by joints and bands, under him their head, Lord, and king; in him, and not in Cæſar, or any earthly monarch, to diſtinguiſh this body from bodies politic, or any civil community among men: and every one members one of another; as in union with Chriſt their head, ſo to one another in love, walking in holy fellowſhip together, ſympathizing with, and ſerving each other.

Ver. 6. Having then gifts, differing, &c.] As in a natural body, the various members of it have not the ſame office, and do not perform the ſame actions, thus they have not the ſame, but different faculties; one has one faculty, another another; the eye has the faculty of ſeeing, the ear of hearing, &c. thus in the ſpiritual body the church, as there are different members, theſe members have not the ſame work and buſineſs aſſigned them; ſome are employed one way, and ſome another; alſo they have diverſities of gifts for their different adminiſtrations and operations, and all from Chriſt their head, by the ſame ſpirit, and for the ſervice of the whole body: according to the grace that is given unto us; for all theſe gifts are not the effects of nature, the fruits of human power, diligence, and induſtry, but flow from the grace of God, who diſpenſes them when, where, and to whom he pleaſes in a free and ſovereign manner; and therefore to be acknowledged as ſuch, and uſed to his glory, and for the good of his church and people. Wherefore whether propheſy, let us propheſy, according to the proportion of faith. The offices here, and hereafter mentioned, are not of an extraordinary, but ordinary kind, ſuch as are laſting, and will continue in the church unto the end of time; and are divided into two parts, which are after ſubdivided into other branches. The diviſion is into propheſying and miniſtring. By propheſying is meant, not foretelling things to come, tho' this gift was beſtowed upon ſome, as Agabus, and others in the chriſtian church; but this, as it is of an extraordinary nature, ſo it is not ſtinted and limited according to the proportion of faith; but preaching the Goſpel is here deſigned, which is the ſenſe of the word in many places of ſcripture, particularly in 1 Cor. xiii. and xiv. Now ſuch who have this gift of prophecy, or of opening and explaining the ſcriptures, ought to make uſe of it, and conſtantly attend to it: let us propheſy, diligently prepare for it by prayer, reading, and meditation, and continually exerciſe it as opportunity offers; nor ſhould any difficulty and diſcouragement deter from it: or whereas this laſt clauſe is not in the original text, it may be ſupplied from ver. 3. thus, let us think ſoberly, who have this gift, and not be elated with it, or carry it haughtily to thoſe who attend on the exerciſe of it; but behave with ſobriety, modeſty, and humility in the diſcharge thereof: according to the proportion of faith. There muſt be faith, or no propheſying; a man muſt believe, and therefore ſpeak, or ſpeak not at all; a Goſpel-miniſter ought not to be a ſceptick, or in doubt about the main principles of religion; ſuch as concern the three divine perſons, the office, grace, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and the way of ſalvation by him: he ſhould be at a point in theſe things, ſhould firmly believe, and with aſſurance aſſert them, nor fear to be called dogmatical on that account: he is to preach according to his faith, the proportion of it, which may be the ſame with the meaſure of it, ver. 3. And ſo the Syriac verſion reads it, איך משוחתא דהימנותה, according to the meaſure of his faith; to which the Arabic verſion agrees; that is, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt he has received; according to the abilities beſtowed on him; according to that light, knowledge, faith, and experience he has; he ought to preach up unto it, and not in the leaſt come ſhort of it: or by the proportion, or analogy of faith, may be meant a ſcheme of Goſpel truths, a form of ſound words, a ſett of principles upon the plan of the ſcriptures, deduced from them, and agreeable to them; and which are all of a piece, and conſiſtent with themſelves, from which the propheſier or preacher ſhould never ſwerve: or the ſcriptures themſelves, the ſure word of prophecy, the rule and ſtandard of faith and practice: the ſcope of the text is to be attended to, its connexion with the preceding, or following verſes, or both; and it is to be compared with other paſſages of ſcripture, and accordingly to be explained; and this is to follow the rule directed to.

Ver. 7. Or miniſtry, let us wait on our miniſtry, &c.] The word διακονια ſometimes ſignifies the whole eccleſiaſtical miniſtry, even the office of apoſtleſhip, as well as the ordinary miniſtration of the Goſpel; ſee Acts i. 17. and vi. 4. but here deaconſhip, or the office of miniſtring to the poor ſaints, as in Acts vi. 1. 1 Cor. xvi. 15. being a diſtinct office from propheſying or preaching the word, and ſhould be uſed, exerciſed, and attended to with diligence, care and conſtancy; for ſuch who are appointed to this office, are choſen not only to a place of honour, but of ſervice and buſineſs, in which they ſhould behave with prudence, ſobriety, and humility: or he that teacheth, on teaching. The gift of propheſying or preaching is ſub-divided into teaching and exhorting; the one belongs to teachers or doctors, the other to paſtors; as the diſtinction is in Epheſ. iv. 11. not that different officers and offices are intended, but different branches of the ſame office; and one man's talent may lie more in the one, and another man's in the other; and accordingly each ſhould in his preaching attend to the gift, which is moſt peculiar to him; if his gift lies in teaching, let him conſtantly employ himſelf in that with all ſobriety and humility: teaching does not deſign an office in the ſchool, but in the church; it is not teaching divinity as men teach Logic, Rhetoric, and other arts and ſciences, in the ſchools; but an inſtructing of churches and the members thereof, in the doctrines of the Goſpel, in order to eſtabliſh and build them up in their moſt holy faith; ſee 1 Cor. xii. 28. Epheſ. iv. 11, 12. it chiefly lies in a doctrinal way of preaching, in opening, explaining, and defending the doctrines of Chriſt, as diſtinct from the practical part of the miniſtry of the word, and the adminiſtration of ordinances, in which the paſtor is employed as well as in this.

Ver. 8. Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation, &c.] This is the other branch of propheſying or preaching, and which is more practical, and lies in giving a word of exhortation to the ſaints, as their particular caſes call for; for as prophets were teachers, Acts xiii. 1. ſo alſo exhorters, Acts xv. 32. and one conſiderable branch of the miniſtry, and which is more principally the paſtor's work, as well as to teach, is to exhort all ſorts of perſons young and old, rich and poor, high and low, bond and free, under his care, with all long-ſuffering and doctrine. The words will bear to be read, he that comforteth on conſolation; and ſo the Syriac verſion renders them, ואית דמביאנא הו בבויאה, and another who is a comforter, in his conſolation. Tho' all the miniſters of the Goſpel are to ſpeak comfortably to the ſaints, by preaching the doctrines of free juſtification by Chriſt's righteouſneſs, and remiſſion of ſins by his blood, by bringing the good news of ſalvation by him, and by opening the exceeding great and precious promiſes of the Goſpel; yet ſome have a greater talent this way than others; ſome are Boanergeſes's, ſons of thunder, and others Barnabas's, ſons of conſolation; and each ſhould attend to that with all diligence and humility, he is beſt qualified for. He that giveth, let him do it with ſimplicity. Here begins the ſub-diviſion of the deacon's office into its ſeveral branches, giving, ruling, and ſhewing mercy: by giving is meant, not giving of his own, or performing acts of charity, which is common to all the members of the church, who ought liberally to contribute to the relief of the poor; but imparting or diſtributing the church's money to proper objects, which is to be done with ſimplicity; with all faithfulneſs and integrity, without fraud or embezzling the church's ſtock, with impartiality, and without reſpect of perſons, and liberally and bountifully, as the word here uſed ſignifies; ſee 2 Cor. viii. 2. and ix. 13. he that ruleth, with diligence; deacons are the helps, governments, mentioned in 1 Cor. xii. 28. who are aſſiſting to the paſtor in the government of the church; their buſineſs is, to obſerve the converſations of the members of the church, and to warn them that are unruly and walk diſorderly, to compoſe differences, and prepare matters to lay before the church; a deacon is προιςαμενος, one that goes before, and leads on others by way of example in his conduct and converſation; or as the Syriac renders it, דקאםברישא that ſtands at the head of affairs in the church; in the management of which he ought to uſe all ſtudy, thoughtfulneſs, care and diligence: he that ſheweth mercy with chearfulneſs; which is not to be underſtood of ſhewing compaſſion to miſerable objects in common, or of giving alms to neceſſitous perſons, and which ought to be done according to the Jewiſh[1] canons, בסבר פנים יפות, with a chearful countenance; and is what is highly pleaſing to God, who loves a chearful giver; but of a branch of the deacon's office, whoſe work among other things is to viſit the ſick and diſtreſſed, and communicate to them as their wants require; all which ſhould be done, not in a moroſe and frowning manner, but with a pleaſant look and chearful countenance, which makes the viſit and the gift more welcome, acceptable, and uſeful.

[1] Maimon. Hilch. Mattanot Anayim, c. 10. §. 4. 13.

Ver. 9. Let love be without diſſimulation, &c.] The Apoſtle having given out ſuitable exhortations to the officers of this church, miniſters and deacons, proceeds to ſtir up to the exerciſe of grace, and the diſcharge of ſuch duties as were common to all the members of the church; and begins with love, which is the cement of ſaints, and the bond of perfectneſs, without which all the gifts that men have, the profeſſion they make, and works they do, are of no avail, and they themſelves nothing. Here it is to be taken in the largeſt and moſt comprehenſive ſenſe, for love to God, Chriſt, the ſaints, and fellow-creatures, and ought with reſpect to each, to be without diſſimulation; or hypocriſy: love to God ſhould be with all the heart, ſoul, and mind, otherwiſe the fear of him, and obedience to him, will be only outward, formal, cuſtomary, and hypocritical; love to Chriſt ſhould be with ſincerity, and ſo it is where 'tis right, hearty and genuine, ſuch can appeal to him as the ſearcher of hearts, that from the heart they love him; and love to one another ſhould be not in word, and in tongue only, but in deed and in truth; yea, the love profeſſed to fellow-creatures, ought never to be thro' fear of men or mercenary views, but honeſt, upright and ſincere. Abhor that which is evil; ſin, both in its principle and in its actings; it being hateful to God, Father, Son, and Spirit, contrary to the nature, being, and perfections of God, a tranſgreſſion of his righteous law, exceeding ſinful in itſelf, and pernicious in its effects and conſequences; for all which it is to be abhorred by the ſaints: the word αποςυγουντες, here uſed, deſigns the greateſt averſation imaginable, a turning away from it, as what is the moſt loathſome, deteſtable, and abominable; and ſuch an hatred of it with horror, as of the Stygian lake, or hell itſelf: cleave to that which is good; to God, who is originally, infinitely, and immutably good; who is good in his nature, and works, and to all his creatures, and eſpecially his choſen people, and therefore ſhould be cleaved unto; to his will, his ways and worſhip; and to Chriſt the good ſhepherd of the ſheep, the lamb that is to be followed and cleaved unto, whitherſoever he goes; and to the good Spirit of God, after whom we ſhould walk, and not after the fleſh; and to the good people of God, aſſembling with whom ſhould not be forſaken; and to the good Goſpel of Chriſt, and the truths of it, which ſhould be held faſt; and to the ordinances of the Goſpel, which ought to be conſtantly attended on; and to every good work, to which we ſhould be ready, careful to maintain, and ever follow, both among ourſelves and all men: they ſhould even be glued unto it, as the word here ſignifies.

Ver. 10. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love, &c.] This is one branch of that love, before adviſed to, which ſhould be unfeigned, and without guile and deceit. The objects of this grace are brethren, not in ſuch ſenſe as all the deſcendants of Adam are, or men of the ſame country be, or as ſuch who are born of the ſame parents in a natural ſenſe are; to each of whom love is due under their reſpective characters and relations: but ſuch who are ſo in a ſpiritual ſenſe, who are born of God, are of his houſhold, belong to his family, are the brethren of Chriſt, and one another; and are either members of the ſame church, incorporated together in the ſame church-ſtate, or at leaſt members of Chriſt, and of the church univerſal. Now love to theſe ſhould be kind, tender, and affectionate, reciprocal and mutual; ſuch ſhould love one another; there ſhould be no love wanting on either ſide; and it ought to be univerſal, and reach to all the ſaints, tho' of different gifts, light, knowledge and experience, or whether high or low, rich or poor; and ſhould ſhew itſelf by bearing one another's burdens, bearing with, and forbearing each other, forgiving one another, and by edifying one another in their moſt holy faith, and praying with, and for one another. In honour preferring one another; ſaints ſhould think honourably of one another, and entertain an honourable eſteem of each other; yea, ſhould eſteem each other better than themſelves; and not indulge evil ſurmiſes, and groundleſs jealouſies of one another, which is contrary to that love that thinks no evil. They ſhould ſpeak honourably of each other in chriſtian company, and diſcourage that evil practice of whiſperings, backbitings, and innuendo's; they ſhould treat each other with honour and reſpect in their common converſation, and eſpecially when met together as a church of Chriſt. They ſhould go before each other in giving honour, and ſhewing reſpect, as the word προηγουμενοι ſignifies: they ſhould ſet each other an example; and which alſo may be taken into the ſenſe of the word, ſhould prevent one another, not waiting until reſpect is ſhewn on one ſide to return it again. Nor does this rule at all break in upon that order that ſhould ſubſiſt, and be maintained in bodies civil and eccleſiaſtical, which requires ſuperior honour to be given to perſons according to their character, office, and ſtation in which they are.

Ver. 11. Not ſlothful in buſineſs, &c.] Meaning not worldly buſineſs, or the affairs of life; though ſlothfulneſs in this reſpect is ſcandalous to human nature, and eſpecially in perſons under a profeſſion of religion; men ſhould diligently purſue their lawful callings for the ſupport of themſelves and families, and the intereſt of Chriſt: but ſpiritual buſineſs, the affairs of piety and religion, the ſervice of God, private and public, to which we ſhould not be backward, nor ſlothful in the performance of; ſuch as preaching, hearing, reading, praying, and other ordinances of God; yea, we ſhould be ready and forward to every good work, and particularly, and which may be here greatly deſigned, miniſtring to the poor ſaints in their neceſſity; in doing which we ſhew that kind, tender, affectionate, brotherly love, and give that honour and reſpect, at leaſt that part of it, which is relief, required in the foregoing verſe; ſee Heb. vi. 10, 11, 12. Remarkable is that ſaying of R. Tarphon[m]: "The day is ſhort, and the work great, "והפועלים עצלים, and workmen ſlothful, and the "reward much, and the maſter of the houſe is urgent." Fervent in ſpirit; in their own ſpirits, for the glory of God, the honour of Chriſt, and the cauſe of religion, in imitation of Chriſt himſelf, and as Phinehas and Elijah were: which fervency of ſpirit is oppoſed to that lukewarmneſs of ſoul, that coldneſs of affection, and leaving of the firſt love, ſo much complained of, and reſented by Chriſt in his people: or elſe in the Spirit of God; for there may be fervency in mens ſpirits, which comes not from the Spirit of God, as in the Jews, and particularly Saul, before his converſion, who had a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge: but when the love of God is ſhed abroad in the heart by the Spirit of God, this will make a man's ſpirit fervent in the ſervice of God, for which the Apoſtle would have theſe believers concerned. A diſciple of the wiſe men among the Jews is [n] ſaid to be רתח, fervent, becauſe the law is as a boiling pot unto him; much more ſhould a diſciple of Chriſt be fervent, who has the Goſpel of Chriſt, the love of God, and the grace of the Spirit to inflame his ſoul with true zeal and fervour. Serving the Lord; ſome copies read, ſerving time: the likeneſs of the words, καιρος and κυριος, eſpecially in an abbreviation, may have occaſioned this different reading; which ſhould it be followed, is not to be underſtood in an ill ſenſe, of temporizing, or time-ſerving, of mens accommodating themſelves, their ſentiments and conduct, according to the times in which they live, in order to eſcape reproach and perſecution; but of redeeming the time, improving every ſeaſon to do good, and taking every opportunity of ſerving God. But as the reading our verſion follows, is confirmed by authentic copies, and by the Syriac, and other Oriental verſions, 'tis beſt to adhere to it: by the Lord is here meant either God, Father, Son, and Spirit, who are the alone object of divine ſervice and religious worſhip; or the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who moſt frequently goes by the name of Lord in the New Teſtament; and who is the one Lord, whoſe we are, and whom we ſhould continually ſerve, being under the greateſt obligations to him, not only as our creator, but as our head, huſband, and redeemer. Very rightly does the Apoſtle premiſe fervency in ſpirit to ſerving the Lord; for without the Spirit of God there's no true worſhipping and ſerving of him, and which ought to be done with fervency as well as with conſtancy. The Syriac verſion renders it, ſerve your Lord.

[m] Pirke Abot, c. 2. §. 15.

Ver. 12. Rejoicing in hope, &c.] Of the glory of God, than the hope of which nothing can make a believer more chearful in this world; the ſaints joy is therefore called the rejoicing of the hope, Heb. iii. 6. This is placed between ſerving the Lord, and being patient in tribulation; for nothing tends more to animate the people of God to a chearful ſerving of him, or to make them more patient under afflictions than a hope of being for ever with the Lord: patient in tribulation; whilſt the ſaints are in this world they muſt expect tribulation; their way to heaven lies thro' it; and it becomes them to be patient under it, not murmuring againſt God, on the one hand, nor reviling of men, on the other. Continuing inſtant in prayer; prayer is needful at all times, but eſpecially in a time of tribulation and diſtreſs, whether inward or outward. This ſhould be made without ceaſing; ſaints ſhould watch unto it with all perſeverance; men ſhould pray always, and not faint; never give out and over, or be diſcouraged. This advice is rightly given and placed here, to teach us that we are to go to the throne of grace continually for freſh ſupplies of grace, and ſtrength to enable us to exerciſe the grace, and perform the duties exhorted to both in the preceding and following verſes.

Ver. 13. Diſtributing to the neceſſity of ſaints, &c.] Or communicating, as many verſions render the word; diſtributing more properly belongs to the officers of the church, the deacons, and communicating to the members of it in common. All men in general are to be relieved that are in want, even our very enemies, and particularly ſuch as are our own fleſh and blood, nearly related to us, aged parents, &c. and eſpecially they that are of the houſhold of faith, here called ſaints; and indeed, ſuch only come under the care and notice of a church: and they are ſuch, whom God has ſet apart for himſelf, has choſen in his Son, that they ſhould be holy; whom Chriſt has ſanctified, or whoſe ſins he has expiated by his blood; and to whom he is made ſanctification; and in whoſe hearts a work of grace and holineſs is wrought by the Spirit of God, which is the ſanctification of the Spirit they are choſen through, as a mean to eternal ſalvation by Chriſt; and in conſequence of this, they live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly, and have their converſations as become the Goſpel of Chriſt: and ſuch as theſe, being in neceſſitous circumſtances, are to be communicated to; for not all, or any of the ſaints, but only ſuch as are in neceſſity, are here pointed at; it is not communicating to the ſaints, but to their neceſſity, which is recommended. It is the will and pleaſure of God, that ſome of his dear children ſhould be in ſtrait circumſtances of life, be reduced to want and diſtreſs, partly to try their own graces, their faith and truſt in God, and dependance on him; and partly the graces of others, the charity, liberality, and beneficence of thoſe who have of this world's goods; and who are the perſons that are to communicate, not words only, ſaying, be warmed and filled, and give nothing; but their ſubſtance, they are to deal their bread to the hungry, cloath the naked, and give a portion to as many as are in need: and theſe acts of giving and receiving, are one way by which the ſaints have communication with each other, and which is ſuggeſted by the word communicating here uſed; for fellowſhip does not lie merely in private converſation, and in ſitting down together at the Lord's table, but in communicating to one another ſuch things as are needful, as for the ſoul, ſo for the body. Some copies read, communicating to the memories of the ſaints; not making images of them, and praying to them, but ſpeaking well and honourably of them, and imitating them in what they did well; ſee Prov. x. 7. Given to hoſpitality; or, as it may be rendered, purſuing, or following after love to ſtrangers; which is properly hoſpitality: reſpect is to be ſhown not to ſuch only who are members of the ſame community with us, but alſo to ſuch of the people of God, that may be of another country, or of ſome diſtant parts of our own, not before known by us; who by perſecution, and diſtreſs of ſome ſort or another, or by ſome providence or another, are obliged to remove from their native place. Theſe we are to love, and ſhew our love to, not only by directing and adviſing, but, if need be, by giving them food, and raiment, and lodging them: this is a duty incumbent on miniſters of the Goſpel, and on private members, and on all who are in any capacity to perform it; and which ſhould be done chearfully, and without grudging; and what perſons ſhould uſe, inure, and give themſelves to, yea, ſhould ſeek after, and call to objects of it; as Abraham and Lot did, who thereby entertained angels unawares, and is what the Apoſtle here means by purſuing and following after it.

Ver. 14. Bleſs them which perſecute you, &c.] It is the lot of God's people in this world to be perſecuted by the men of it, in ſome ſhape or another, either by words or deeds; either by reviling and reproaching them, and ſpeaking all manner of evil of them; or by hindering them the free exerciſe of religious worſhip, by confiſcation of their goods, impriſonment of their perſons, by violently torturing their bodies, and taking away their lives; under all which circumſtances they are taught to bleſs them; that is to pray for them, that God would ſhew them their evil, give repentance to them, and the remiſſion of their ſins; which is the order Chriſt gave to his diſciples, Matt. v. 44. and encouraged to an obſervance of, by his own example, Luke xxiii. 34. and has been followed herein by his diſciples and Apoſtles, Acts vii. 60. 1 Cor. iv. 12, 13. Moreover, by bleſſing may be meant, giving them good words, mild and ſoft anſwers, not rendring evil for evil, railing for railing; but on the contrary, bleſſing, in imitation of Chriſt, who when he was reviled, reviled not again: bleſs and curſe not; to have a mouth full of curſing and bitterneſs, is the character of an unregenerate man, and what by no means ſuits one who names the name of Chriſt; for bleſſing and curſing to proceed out of the ſame mouth, is as abſurd and unnatural, as if it ſhould be ſuppoſed that a fountain ſhould ſend forth ſweet water and bitter, or ſalt and freſh. The imprecations upon wicked men, uſed by David and other good men, are no contradictions to this rule; ſince they were made under the inſpiration of the Spirit of God, and were predictions of God's vengeance, which in righteous judgment ſhould fall on them, and are not to be drawn into an example by us.

---

Ver. 15. Rejoice with them that do rejoice, &c.] Not in any thing ſinful and criminal, in a thing of nought, in mens own boaſtings; all ſuch rejoicing is evil, and not to be joined in; but in things good and laudable, as in outward proſperity; and to rejoice with ſuch, is a very difficult taſk; for unleſs perſons have a near concern in the proſperity of others, they are very apt to envy it, or to murmur and repine, that they are not in equal, or ſuperior circumſtances; and alſo in things ſpiritual, with ſuch who rejoice in the diſcoveries of God's love to their ſouls, in the views of intereſt in Chriſt, and of peace, pardon, and righteouſneſs by him, and in hope of the glory of God; when ſuch ſouls make their boaſt in the Lord, the humble hearing thereof will be glad, and will, as they ought to do, join with them in magnifying the Lord, and will exalt his name together: and weep with them that weep; ſo Chriſt, as he rejoiced with them that rejoiced, at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, wept with them that wept, with Mary at the grave of Lazarus. The deſign of theſe rules, is to excite and encourage ſympathy in the ſaints with each other, in all conditions inward and outward, and with reſpect to things temporal and ſpiritual; in imitation of Chriſt their great high-prieſt, who cannot but be touched with the infirmities of his people; and as founded upon, and ariſing from, their relation to each other, as members of the ſame body; ſee 1 Cor. xii. 26.

Ver. 16. Be of the ſame mind one towards another, &c.] Which is not to be underſtood of the ſameneſs of their judgment, or of their agreement in ſentiments, eſpouſing the ſame doctrines, obſerving the ſame ordinances, and in the ſame manner, and attending to the ſame form of diſcipline; but of their having the ſame love, and being of the ſame accord and affection to one another, entertaining the ſame good opinion, or a better of others, than of themſelves; and ſo the Syriac verſion renders the paſſage, what ye think of yourſelves, think alſo of your brethren: think of one another, as equally intereſted in the love of God, redeemed by the blood of Chriſt, bleſſed with the ſame ſpiritual bleſſings in him, and called in the ſame hope of your calling; and don't think of one another, as being one richer or wiſer than another, don't value yourſelves upon that: mind not high things; be not high minded, don't think too highly of yourſelves, and deſpiſe others; meddle not with, nor graſp at things too high for you, that are out of your reach, and beyond your capacity; nor ſeek great things for yourſelves, as riches, honours, &c. nor covet great company: but condeſcend to men of low eſtate; or to low things; be content with mean and low things in life, and diſdain not to take notice of, and converſe with, men in a low condition, whether in things temporal or ſpiritual; who may be poor in this world, be very ignorant and illiterate, as to general knowledge and learning; be men of mean parts and abilities, of very ſmall gifts, and be weak in faith and experience; condeſcend to their weakneſſes, bear their infirmities, and become all things to them for their good, and God's glory: conſider the Apoſtle is writing to citizens of Rome, who might be tempted to look upon themſelves above others, and to look diſdainfully upon others, as citizens too often do on country people, as if they were below them, as perſons of low life to them: be not wiſe in your own conceits; ſee Prov. iii. 7. This is attended with bad conſequences, ſpoils a man's uſefulneſs, prevents his improvement in knowledge, tempts him to reject all counſel and advice given him, and to treat his fellow creatures and chriſtians, with haughtineſs and inſolence, and expoſes him to the ſcorn and contempt of men: or be not wiſe by, or with yourſelves; imagining you have all the wiſdom, and others have none; or keeping it to yourſelves, what wiſdom you have communicate it to others; the Ethiopic verſion reads, ſay not, we are wiſe; ſee Job xii. 2, 3.

Ver. 17. Recompenſe to no man evil for evil, &c.] Neither evil words for evil words, railing for railing; nor evil deeds for evil deeds, one ill turn for another; nor the evil of puniſhment for the evil of fault, unleſs it be by perſons, who under God have an authority to inflict it; as the civil magiſtrate, who is the miniſter of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doth evil; but private revenge, is what is here forbidden: providing things honeſt in the ſight of all men. The Vulgate Latin reads, not only in the ſight of God, but alſo in the ſight of all men; and the Alexandrian copy reads, in the ſight of God and in the ſight of men; which clauſe ſeems to have crept in here, out of 2 Cor. viii. 21. The words are not to be underſtood of a man's providing things honeſt, decent, and commendable, as ſuitable food and raiment for his family, in the ſight of all men, to the honour of religion, and the credit of his profeſſion, which is right to be done; but of a provident, thoughtful, and ſtudious concern, to do every thing that is laudable and of good report among men. The Syriac verſion renders the words after this manner, אלא נתבטל לכון דתעבדון טבתא, but be careful to do well, or exerciſe beneficence before all men; either reſtraining it to acts of beneficence, even to them that do us ill, in oppoſition to rendering evil to them; or applying it to all offices of humanity, and every good work, which are to be done in the ſight of men; not merely to be ſeen of them, and in a vain-glorious way, in order to obtain their eſteem and applauſe, as did the Phariſees; but to avoid offence; to put to ſilence by well-doing, the ignorance of wicked men; and to ſhame them, that falſly accuſe the good converſation of the ſaints; and to recommend the Goſpel and true religion, and win men over to it thereby, and give an occaſion to them of glorifying God.

Ver. 18. If it be poſſible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably, &c.] Or be at peace, ſeek after peace, purſue it, and cultivate it: with all men; with thoſe that we are immediately concerned with, in a natural relation; ſo huſbands ſhould live peaceably with their wives, and wives with their huſbands; parents with their children, and children with their parents; maſters with their ſervants, and ſervants with their maſters; and one brother, relation, and friend with another: and ſo with all we are concerned with in a ſpiritual relation, as members of Chriſt, and in the ſame church-ſtate; ſuch ſhould be at peace among themſelves; peace ſhould rule in their hearts, and they ſhould ſtudy to keep the unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace: yea, with all we are concerned in a civil ſenſe; ſaints ſhould live peaceably in the neighbourhood, towns, cities, and countries, where they dwell, and ſhew themſelves to be the quiet in the land; ſhould pray for the peace of the place where they are; and do all that in them lies, to promote it, by living themſelves peaceably and quietly, in all godlineſs and honeſty; yea, they ſhould live peaceably with their very enemies, if it be poſſible; which is rightly put, for there are ſome perſons of ſuch tempers and diſpoſitions, that it is impoſſible to live peaceably with; for when others are for peace, they are for war; and in ſome caſes it is not only impracticable, but would be unlawful; as when it can't be done conſiſtent with holineſs of life and converſation, with the edification of others, the truths of the Goſpel, the intereſt of religion, and the glory of God; theſe are things that are never to be ſacrificed, for the ſake of peace with men: the Apoſtle adds another limitation of this rule, as much as lieth in you; for more than this, is not required of us; nothing ſhould be wanting on our parts; every ſtep ſhould be taken, to cultivate and maintain peace; the blame ſhould lie wholly on the other ſide; it becomes the ſaints to live peaceably themſelves, if others will not with them.

Ver. 19. Dearly beloved, &c.] This affectionate appellation the Apoſtle makes uſe of, expreſſing his great love to them, the rather to work upon them, and move them to an attention to what he is about to ſay; which they might aſſure themſelves was in great tenderneſs to them, and for their good, as well as the glory of God: moreover, he may hereby ſuggeſt to them, not only that they were dear to him, but that they were greatly beloved of God, that they were high in his favour and affection; and this he might hint unto them, in order to melt them into love to their fellow chriſtians and fellow creatures, and even to their enemies, and never think of private revenge: avenge not yourſelves; this is no ways contrary to that revenge, a believer has upon ſin, and the actings of it, which follows on true evangelical repentance for it, 2 Cor. vii. 11. and lies in a diſplicency at it, and himſelf for it, and in abſtaining from it, and fighting againſt it; nor to that revenge a church may take, of the diſobedience of impenitent and incorrigible offenders, by laying cenſures on them, withdrawing from them, and rejecting them from their communion; nor to that revenge, which civil magiſtrates may execute upon them that do evil; but this only forbids and condemns private revenge in private perſons, for private injuries done, and affronts given: but rather give place to wrath; either to a man's own wrath, ſtirred up by the provocations given him; let him not ruſh upon revenge immediately; let him ſit down and breath upon it; let him give, אתרא, ſpace unto it, as the Syriac, which may ſignify time as well as place; and by taking time his wrath will ſubſide, he'll cool and come to himſelf, and think better on't: or to the wrath of the injurious perſon, by declining him, as Jacob did Eſau, till his wrath was over; or by patiently bearing without reſiſtance the evil done, according to the advice of Chriſt, Matt. v. 39, 40. or to the wrath of God, leave all with him, and to the day of his wrath and righteous judgment, who will render to every man according to his works; commit yourſelves to him that judgeth righteouſly, and never think of avenging your own wrongs: and this ſenſe the following words incline to, for it is written, Deut. xxxii. 35. vengeance is mine, I will repay, ſaith the Lord; vengeance belongs to God, and to him only; it is proper and peculiar to him, not to heathen deities, one of which they call δικη, vengeance; ſee Acts xxviii. 4. nor to ſatan, who is of a revengeful ſpirit, and is ſtiled the enemy and the avenger; nor to men, unleſs to magiſtrates under God, who are revengers and executioners of his wrath on wicked men; otherwiſe it ſolely belongs to God the lawgiver, whoſe law is broken, and againſt whom ſin is committed: and there is reaſon to believe he will repay it, from the holineſs of his nature, the ſtrictneſs of his juſtice, his power and faithfulneſs, his conduct towards his own people, even to his Son, as their ſurety; nor will he neglect, but in his own time will avenge his elect, which cry unto him day and night; and who therefore ſhould never once think of avenging themſelves, but leave it with their God, to whom it belongs.

Ver. 20. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him, &c.] Theſe words are taken from Prov. xxv. 21, 22. and to be underſtood, as a Jewiſh [o] writer obſerves, כמשמעו, according to their literal ſenſe; though ſome of the Rabbins explain them in an allegorical way, of the corruption of nature. The Alexandrian copy and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, but if; ſo far ſhould the ſaints be from meditating revenge upon their enemies, that they ſhould do good unto them, as Chriſt directs, Matt. v. 44. by feeding them when hungry, and giving drink unto them when thirſty: if he thirſt give him drink; which includes all offices of humanity and beneficence to be performed unto them: the reaſon, or argument inducing hereunto is, for in ſo doing, thou ſhalt heap coals of fire on his head; not to do him hurt, not to aggravate his condemnation, as if this would be a means of bringing down the wrath of God the more fiercely on him, which is a ſenſe given by ſome; as if this would be an inducement to the ſaints, to do ſuch acts of kindneſs; which is juſt the reverſe of the ſpirit and temper of mind the Apoſtle is here cultivating; but rather the ſenſe is, that by ſo doing, his conſcience would be ſtung with a ſenſe of former injuries done to his benefactor, and he be filled with ſhame on account of them, and be brought to repentance for them, and to love the perſon he before hated, and be careful of doing him any wrong for the future; all which may be conſidered as a prevailing motive to God's people, to act the generous part they are here moved to: in the paſſage referred to, Prov. xxv. 21, 22. Bread and water are mentioned as to be given, which include all the neceſſaries of life; and it is added for encouragement, and the Lord ſhall reward thee. The ſenſe given of this paſſage by ſome of the Jewiſh commentators on it, agrees with what has been obſerved in ſome meaſure; ſays one [p] of them, "when he remembers the food and drink "thou haſt given him, thou ſhalt burn him, as if "thou putteſt coals upon his head to burn him, "וישמור מעשות לך רע, and he'll take care of doing thee any ill;" that is, for the time to come: and another of them obſerves [q], that "this matter "will be hard unto him, as if thou heapeſt coals "on his head to burn him, מרוב בשתו, becauſe of "the greatneſs of his ſhame, on account of the good "that he ſhall receive from thee, for the evil which "he hath rendered to thee." This advice of ſhewing kindneſs to enemies, and againſt private revenge, is very contrary to the dictates of human nature, as corrupted by ſin. The former of theſe, Julian the emperor repreſents [r] as a paradox, though he owns it to be lawful, and a good action, to give cloaths and food to enemies in war; and the latter, to revenge an injury, he ſays [s], is a law common to all men, Greeks and Barbarians; but the Goſpel and the grace of God, teach us another leſſon.

[o] Jarchi in Prov. xxv. 21.

Ver. 21. Be not overcome of evil, &c.] Neither of the evil one ſatan, who is very buſy to ſtir up the corruption of nature to an hatred of enemies, and to ſeek revenge; but give no place nor heed unto him, reſiſt him, and he'll flee from you; put on the whole armour of God, whereby you may defend yourſelves, that he cannot touch you: nor of the evil of ſin that dwells in you; for of whom a man is overcome, of the ſame is he brought in bondage; nor of the evil of the man that has done you an injury, as you will be, if you return evil for evil, or take any ſteps and meaſures to avenge yourſelves; for then not you, but he that has done you the wrong, will be the conqueror: but overcome evil with good; overcome the evil man, and the evil he has done you, by doing good to him, by feeding him when hungry, by giving him drink when thirſty, by cloathing him when naked, and by doing other offices of kindneſs and humanity to him; which is moſt likely to win upon him, and of an enemy to make him your friend: and if not, however it will ſhew that you are conquerors, yea, more than conquerors, through the grace and ſtrength of him that has loved you, over ſatan, over the corruptions of your own hearts, and over the malice and wickedneſs of your enemies.

CHAP. XIII.

THE principal things contained in this chapter, enjoined the ſaints, are the duties of ſubjection to magiſtrates, love to one another, and to all men, and temperance and chaſtity in themſelves: it begins with duties relating to the civil magiſtrates, requiring obedience of every one unto them, ver. 1. and that for theſe reaſons, becauſe the civil magiſtracy, or government, is by divine appointment; wherefore to obey them in things of a civil nature, is to obey God; and to reſiſt them, is to reſiſt God; and alſo becauſe of the pernicious conſequence of ſuch reſiſtance, damnation to themſelves, ver. 2. for the magiſtrate not only cauſes terror by penal laws, but he inflicts puniſhment on delinquents, and is the executioner of God's wrath and vengeance on ſuch, ver. 3, 4. and likewiſe becauſe of the profit and advantage to obedient ſubjects; ſuch not only have the good-will and eſteem of their rulers, and are commended by them, but are defended and protected in their perſons and properties, ver. 3, 4. moreover, the Apoſtle enforces the neceſſity of ſubjection to them, not only in order to avoid puniſhment, but to anſwer a good conſcience; this duty being according to the light of nature, and the dictates of a natural conſcience; which if awake, muſt be uneaſy with a contrary behaviour, ver. 5. and for the ſame reaſon he urges the payment of tribute to them, as well as on account of the reaſonableneſs of it, taken from magiſtrates ſpending their time, and uſing their talents, in an attendance on the ſervice of the public, ver. 6. and which is further confirmed, by the general rule of juſtice and equity, or of doing that which is juſt and right, to every one, of which particulars are given, ver. 7. and then after a general exhortation to pay all ſorts of debts owing to ſuperiors, inferiors, or equals, the Apoſtle paſſes to the debt of love owing to one another, and to all mankind; which is exhorted to on this conſideration, that the performance of it is a fulfilling the law, ver. 8. which is proved, by ſhewing that the ſeveral precepts of the law, of which an enumeration is given, are reducible to, and are included in love to our neighbours as ourſelves, ver. 9. and ſince it is the nature of love not to work ill, but to do good to the neighbour, the concluſion follows, that it muſt be as aſſerted, that love is the fulfilment of the law, and ought by all means to be attended to, as a principal duty of religion, ver. 10. next the Apoſtle proceeds to exhort the ſaints, to a watchful, chaſte, ſober, and temperate courſe of life; as being perfectly agreeable to the privileges they enjoyed, to the preſent condition they were in, and to that future ſtate of happineſs they were in expectation of: he exhorts to be watchful and ſober, and not indulge ſleep and ſlothfulneſs, in conſideration of the time in which they were, and with which they were acquainted, it being not night, but day; at leaſt the one was wearing off, and the other coming on; the time of life being ſhort, and the day of ſalvation approaching nearer and nearer, ver. 11, 12. wherefore ſuch actions ſhould be done, as are agreeable to the day, and not the night, to light, and not darkneſs; and particularly ſuch works of darkneſs are diſſuaded from, which are contrary to temperance and ſobriety, as rioting, and drunkenneſs; and to chaſtity, as chambering and wantonneſs; and to peace and concord, as ſtrife and envying, which frequently follow upon the former: and the chapter is concluded with an exhortation to faith in Chriſt, and an imitation of him, expreſſed in a figurative way by a metaphor, taken from the putting on of garments; and with a dehortation from an immoderate proviſion for the fleſh, ſo as to promote, excite, and cheriſh, the luſts of it, ver. 13.

Ver. 1. Let every ſoul be ſubject unto the higher powers, &c.] The Apoſtle having finiſhed his exhortations to this church, in relation to the ſeveral duties incumbent upon both officers and private chriſtians, as members of a church, and with reference to each other, and their moral conduct in the world; proceeds to adviſe, direct, and exhort them to ſuch duties as were relative to them as members of a civil ſociety; the former chapter contains his chriſtian Ethicks, and this his chriſtian Politicks.

Politicks. There was the greater reaſon to inſiſt upon the latter, as well as on the former, ſince the primitive ſaints greatly lay under the imputation of being ſeditious perſons and enemies to the commonwealth; which might ariſe from a very great number of them being Jews, who ſcrupled ſubjection to Heathen magiſtrates, becauſe they were the ſeed of Abraham, and by a law were not to ſet one as king over them, that was a ſtranger, and not their own brother, and very unwillingly bore the Roman yoke, and paid tribute to Cæſar: hence the chriſtians in common were ſuſpected to be of the ſame principles; and of all the Jews none were more averſe to the payment of taxes to the Roman magiſtrates than the Galileans; ſee Acts v. 37. Luke xiii. 1. And this being the name by which Chriſt and his followers were commonly called, might ſerve to ſtrengthen the above ſuſpicion of them, and charge againſt them. Moreover, ſome chriſtians might be tempted to think that they ſhould not be ſubject to Heathen magiſtrates; ſince they were generally wicked men, and violent perſecutors of them; and that it was one branch of their chriſtian liberty to be freed from ſubjection to them: and certain it is, that there were a ſett of looſe and licentious perſons, who bore the name of chriſtians, that deſpiſed dominion, and ſpoke evil of dignities; wherefore the Apoſtle judged it adviſeable, eſpecially to exhort the church of Rome, and the members who dwelt there, where was the ſeat of power and civil government, ſo to behave towards their ſuperiors, that they might ſet a good example to the chriſtians in the ſeveral parts of the empire, and wipe off the aſperſion that was caſt upon them, as if they were enemies to magiſtracy and civil power. By the higher powers, he means not angels, ſometimes called principalities and powers; for unto theſe God hath not put in ſubjection his people under the Goſpel-diſpenſation; nor eccleſiaſtical officers, or thoſe who are in church-power and authority; for they don't bear the temporal ſword, nor have any power to inflict corporal puniſhment: but civil magiſtrates are intended, ſee Tit. iii. 1. and theſe not only ſupreme magiſtrates, as emperors and kings, but all inferior and ſubordinate ones, acting in commiſſion under them, as appears from 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14. which are called powers, becauſe they are inveſted with power and authority over others, and have a right to exerciſe it in a proper way, and in proper caſes; and the higher or ſupereminent ones, becauſe they are ſet in high places, and have ſuperior dignity and authority to others. The perſons that are to be ſubject to them are every ſoul; not that the ſouls of men, diſtinct from their bodies, are under ſubjection to civil magiſtrates; for of all things they have the leaſt to do with them, their power and juriſdiction not reaching to the ſouls, the hearts, and conſciences of men, eſpecially in matters of religion, but chiefly to their bodies, and outward civil concerns of life: but the meaning is, that every man that has a ſoul, every rational creature ought to be ſubject to civil government. This is but his reaſonable ſervice, and which he ſhould from his heart, and with all his ſoul, chearfully perform. In ſhort, the ſenſe is, that every man ſhould be ſubject: this is an Hebraiſm, a common way of ſpeaking among the Jews, who ſometimes denominate men from one part, and ſometimes from another; ſometimes from the body or fleſh, thus all fleſh is graſs, that is, all men are frail; and ſometimes from the ſoul, all ſouls are mine, all belong to me; as here, every ſoul, that is, every man, all the individuals of mankind, of whatſoever ſex, age, ſtate, or condition, eccleſiaſticks not excepted: the pope, and his clergy, are not exempted from civil juriſdiction; nor any of the true miniſters of the Goſpel; the prieſts under the law were under the civil government; and ſo was Chriſt himſelf, and his Apoſtles, who paid tribute to Cæſar; yea, even Peter particularly, whoſe ſucceſſor the pope of Rome pretends to be. Subjection to the civil magiſtrates deſigns and includes all duties relative to them; ſuch as ſhewing them reſpect, honour, and reverence ſuitable to their ſtations; ſpeaking well of them, and their adminiſtration; uſing them with candour, not bearing hard upon them for little matters, and allowing for ignorance of the ſecret ſprings of many of their actions and conduct, which if known might greatly juſtify them; wiſhing well to them, and praying conſtantly, earneſtly, and heartily for them; obſerving their laws and injunctions; obeying their lawful commands, which do not contradict the laws of God, nature, and right reaſon; and paying them their juſt dues and lawful tribute, to ſupport them in their office and dignity: for there is no power but of God; God is the fountain of all power and authority; the ſtreams of power among creatures flow from him; the power that man has over all the creatures, the fowls of the air, the beaſts of the field, and the fiſhes of the ſea, is originally of God, and by a grant from him; the leſſer powers, and the exerciſes of them, in the ſeveral relations men ſtand in to one another, are of God, as the power the huſband has over the wife, parents over their children, and maſters over their ſervants; and ſo the higher power that princes have over their ſubjects: for it is the God of heaven that ſets up kings, as well as pulls them down; he is the king of kings, from whom they derive their power and authority, from whom they have the right of government, and all the qualifications for it; it is by him that kings reign, and princes decree juſtice. The powers that be are ordained of God. The order of magiſtracy is of God; it is of his ordination and appointment, and of his ordering, diſpoſing, and fixing in its proper bounds and limits. The ſeveral forms of government are of human will and pleaſure; but government it ſelf is an order of God. There may be men in power who aſſume it of themſelves, and are of themſelves, and not of God; and others that abuſe the power that is lodged in them; who, tho' they are by divine permiſſion, yet not of God's approbation and good-will. And it is obſervable, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks of powers, and not perſons, at leaſt not of perſons, but under the name of powers, to ſhew that he means not this, or the other particular prince or magiſtrate, but the thing itſelf, the office and dignity of magiſtracy itſelf; for there may be ſome perſons, who may of themſelves uſurp this office, or exerciſe it in a very illegal way, who are not of God, nor to be ſubject to by men. The Apoſtle here both uſes the language, and ſpeaks the ſentiments of his countrymen the Jews, who are wont to call magiſtrates, powers: hence thoſe ſayings were uſed among them; ſays Shemaiah[t], "אל תתודע לרשות, be not too familiar with the power;" that is, with a magiſtrate, which oftentimes is dangerous. Again, " ſays[u] Rabban Gamaliel, היו זהירין ברשות, take heed of the power, (i. e. of magiſtrates) for they don't ſuffer a man to come near them, but in neceſſity, and then they appear as friends for their own advantage, but won't ſtand by a man "in the time of diſtreſs." Moreover, after this manner they explain [w] Prov. v. 8. "remove thy way far from her, this is hereſy; and come not nigh the door of her houſe, זו הרשות, this is the power. The gloſs on it is, magiſtrates, becauſe they ſet their eyes upon rich men to kill them, and take away their ſubſtance." And a little after 'tis obſerved, that "the horſe-leach hath two daughters crying give, give: 'tis aſked, what is the meaning of give, give? Says Mar Ukba, there are two daughters which cry out of hell, and ſay in this world, give, give, and they are hereſy, והרשות, and the civil power." The gloſs on the place is, "hereſy cries, bring a ſacrifice to the idol; civil power cries bring money, and gifts, and revenues, and tribute to the king." Nevertheleſs, they look upon civil government to be of divine appointment. They ſay [x], that "no man is made a governor below, except they proclaim him above;" i. e. unleſs he is ordained of God: yea, they allow [y] the Roman empire to be of God, than which no government was more diſagreeable to them. "When R. Joſe ben Kiſma was ſick, R. Chanina ben Tradion went to viſit him; he ſaid unto him, Chanina, my brother, my brother, knoweſt thou not that this nation, (the Romans) מן השמים המליכוה, have received their empire from God; for it hath laid waſte his houſe, and hath burnt his temple, and has ſlain his ſaints, and deſtroyed his good men, and yet it endures." Nay, they frequently affirm [z], that the meaneſt office of power among men was of divine appointment. This is the Apoſtle's firſt argument for ſubjection to the civil magiſtrate.

Ver. 2. Whoſoever therefore reſiſteth the power, &c.] The office of magiſtracy, and ſuch as are lawfully placed in it, and rightly exerciſe it; who denies that there is, or ought to be any ſuch order among men, deſpiſes it, and oppoſes it, and withdraws himſelf from it, and will not be ſubject to it in any form: reſiſteth the ordinance of God; the will and appointment of God, whoſe pleaſure it is, that there ſhould be ſuch an office, and that men ſhould be ſubject to it. This is not to be underſtood, as if magiſtrates were above the laws, and had a lawleſs power to do as they will without oppoſition; for they are under the law, and liable to the penalty of it, in caſe of diſobedience, as others; and when they make their own will a law, or exerciſe a lawleſs tyrannical power, in defiance of the laws of God, and of the land, to the endangering of the lives, liberties, and properties of ſubjects, they may be reſiſted, as Saul was by the people of Iſrael, when he would have took away the life of Jonathan for the breach of an arbitrary law of his own, and that too without the knowledge of it, 1 Sam. xiv. 45. but the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of reſiſting magiſtrates in the right diſcharge of their office, and in the exerciſe of legal power and authority: and they that reſiſt them, in this ſenſe, ſhall receive to themſelves damnation; that is, puniſhment; either temporal, and that either by the hand of the magiſtrate himſelf, who has it in his power to puniſh mutiny, ſedition, and inſurrection, and any oppoſition to him in the juſt diſcharge of his duty; or at the hand of God, in righteous judgment, for their diſobedience to an ordinance of his; as in the caſe of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who oppoſed themſelves both to the civil and ſacred government of the people of Iſrael; and were ſwallowed up alive in the earth: or eternal puniſhment, unleſs the grace of God prevents; for the blackneſs of darkneſs is reſerved for ever, for ſuch perſons, who among other of their characters, are ſaid to deſpiſe dominion, and ſpeak evil of dignities, Jude v. 8, 13. This is another argument perſuading to ſubjection to magiſtrates.

Ver. 3. For rulers are not a terror to good works, &c.] That is, to them that do good works in a civil ſenſe; who behave well in the neighbourhoods, towns, cities, and countries where they dwell. The Apoſtle ſeems to anticipate an objection made againſt governours, as if there was ſomething very terrible and formidable in them; and which might be taken up from the laſt clauſe of the preceding verſe; and which he removes by obſerving, that governours neither do, nor ought to inject terror into men that conduct well, obey the laws, and keep a good decorum among their fellow-ſubjects, not doing any injury to any man's perſon, property, and eſtate. The Jews [a] have a ſaying, "that a governour that injects more fear into the people, than is for the honour of God, ſhall be puniſhed, and ſhall not ſee his ſon a diſciple of a wiſe man." But to the evil; to wicked men, who make no conſcience of doing hurt to their fellow creatures, by abuſing their perſons, defrauding them of their ſubſtance, and by various illicit methods doing damage to them; to ſuch, rulers are, and ought to be terrors; ſuch are to be menaced, and threatned with inflicting upon them the penalty of the laws they break; and which ought to be inflicted on them by way of puniſhment to them, and for the terror of others. R. Chanina, the Sagan of the prieſts [b], uſed to ſay, "pray for the peace of the kingdom, for if there was no מוראה, fear, (i. e. a magiſtrate to inject fear) one man would devour another alive." Wilt thou not then be afraid of the power? of the civil magiſtrate, in power and authority, to oppoſe him, to refuſe ſubjection to him, to break the laws, which, according to his office, he is to put in execution. Do that which is good; in a civil ſenſe, between man and man, by complying with the laws of the land, which are not contrary to the laws of God; for of doing good in a ſpiritual and religious ſenſe he is no judge: and thou ſhalt have praiſe of the ſame; ſhall be commended as a good neighbour, a good citizen, and a good common-wealth's man; an honeſt, quiet, peaceable man, that does not diſturb the peace of civil ſociety, but ſtrengthens and increaſes it.

Ver. 4. For he is the miniſter of God to thee for good, &c.] He is a miniſter of God's appointing and commiſſioning, that acts under him, and for him, is a kind of a vicegerent of his, and in ſome ſenſe repreſents him; and which is another reaſon why men ought to be ſubject to him; and eſpecially ſince he is appointed for their good, natural, moral, civil, and ſpiritual, as Pareus obſerves: for natural good, for the protection of mens natural lives, which otherwiſe would be in continual danger from wicked men; for moral good, for the reſtraining of vice, and encouragement of virtue; prophaneſs abounds exceedingly, as the caſe is, but what would it do, if there were no laws to forbid it, or civil magiſtrates to put them in execution? for civil good, for the preſervation of mens properties, eſtates, rights, and liberties, which would be continually invaded, and made a prey of by others; and for ſpiritual and religious good, as many princes and magiſtrates have been; a ſenſible experience of which we have under the preſent government of theſe kingdoms, allowing us a liberty to worſhip God according to our conſciences, none making us afraid, and is a reaſon why we ſhould yield a chearful ſubjection to it: but if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; of the puniſhment of ſuch evil threatned by law, and to be inflicted by the civil magiſtrate; for he beareth not the ſword in vain. The ſword is an emblem of the power of life and death, the civil magiſtrate is inveſted with, and includes all ſorts of puniſhment he has a right to inflict; and this power is not lodged in him in vain; he may and ought to make uſe of it at proper times, and upon proper perſons: for he is the miniſter of God; as is ſaid before, he has his miſſion, commiſſion, power and authority from him; and is a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil; he is a defender of the laws, a vindicator of divine juſtice, an avenger of the wrongs of men; and his buſineſs is to inflict proper puniſhment, which is meant by wrath, upon delinquents.

Ver. 5. Wherefore ye muſt needs be ſubject, &c.] To the higher powers, to the civil magiſtrates; there is a neceſſity of it, becauſe magiſtracy is God's ordinance, it is for the good of men; and ſuch that oppoſe it will ſeverely ſmart for it: but ſubjection to it from chriſtians ſhould be, not only for wrath; through fear of puniſhment, and for the ſake of eſcaping it; either the wrath of men or of God, in this or the other world: but alſo for conſcience ſake; to keep conſcience clear, to exerciſe a good one void of offence towards God and men; for natural reaſon, conſcience itſelf, dictates that there ought to be ſuch order among men, that civil government ſhould take place, and ought to be ſubmitted to.

Ver. 6. For, for this cauſe pay you tribute alſo, &c.] To ſhew that we are ſubject to the higher powers, and as a proof and evidence of our ſubjection to them, we do and ought to pay tribute to them, to ſupport them in their office and dignity; and this is done not for fear of trouble, of diſtreſs on goods and eſtate, or impriſonment of perſon, but for conſcience ſake: payment of taxes is not a mere matter of prudence, and done to avoid dangerous conſequences, but is and ought to be a caſe of conſcience; whatever is any ones due, and of right belongs to him, conſcience dictates it ought to be paid him; as therefore it tells a man, that whatever is God's ſhould be rendered to him, ſo whatever is Cæſar's ſhould be given him; and indeed to do otherwiſe, to refuſe to pay tribute, or by any fraudulent means to deprive the civil magiſtrate of his due, is not only to do an injury to him, but to the whole body politic, which has a greater concern therein than he himſelf; and ſuch a perſon forfeits all right and claim to his protection: for they are God's miniſters. This is another reaſon why tribute ſhould be paid them, not only to teſtify ſubjection to them, and keep conſcience clear, but becauſe they are called unto, and put into this high office by God; for promotion to ſuch honour and high places, comes not from eaſt, weſt, north or ſouth; but is by the providence of God, who puts down, and ſets up at pleaſure; they are his vicegerents, they act under him, are in his ſtead, and repreſent his majeſty; and therefore in ſome ſort, what is done to them, is done to him: attending continually upon this very thing; not of laying, collecting, and receiving tribute, but of ſervice and miniſtry under God, for the welfare of their ſubjects; for rightly to adminiſter the office of magiſtracy requires great pains, care, diligence, and aſſiduity; and as great wiſdom and thoughtfulneſs in making laws for the good of the body, ſo a diligent conſtant concern to put them in execution, to ſecure the lives of ſubjects from cut-throats and murderers, and their properties and eſtates from thieves and robbers; and they are not only obliged diligently to attend to ſuch ſervice at home, but to keep a good look-out abroad, and penetrate into, and watch the deſigns of foreign enemies, to defend from their invaſions, and fight for their country; that the inhabitants thereof may live peaceable and quiet lives, enjoying their reſpective rights and priviledges; and ſince therefore civil government is a buſineſs of ſo much care, and ſince our rulers are ſo ſolicitous, and conſtantly concerned for our good, and which can't be done without great expence, as well as diligence, we ought chearfully to pay tribute to them.

Ver. 7. Render therefore to all their dues, &c.] To all princes, magiſtrates, and officers, that are placed over us, from the ſupreme governor to the loweſt officer under him, ſhould we render as a due debt, and not as a mere gift, whatever belongs to them, or is proper for them for the due diſcharge of their office, to encourage in it, and ſupport the dignity of it, whether external or internal: tribute to whom tribute is due, cuſtom to whom cuſtom. Theſe two words include all ſorts of levies, taxes, ſubſidies, &c. and the former may particularly deſign what is laid on mens perſons and eſtates, as poll-money, land-tax, &c. and the latter, what ariſes from the exportation and importation of goods, to and from foreign parts: fear to whom fear; not of puniſhment; for a good ſubject has no reaſon to fear the civil magiſtrate in this ſenſe, only the man that does evil, the malefactor; as for the good neighbour, citizen, and ſubject, he loves the magiſtrate the more, the more diligent he is in putting the laws in execution againſt wicked men; but this is to be underſtood of a fear of offending, and eſpecially of a reverence bore in the mind, and expreſſed by outward actions, and ſuch as has going with it, a chearful obedience to all lawful commands: honour to whom honour; there's an honour due to all men, according to their reſpective rank and ſtation, and the relation they ſtand in to each other; ſo ſervants are to honour their maſters, children their parents, wives their huſbands, and ſubjects their princes; all inferior magiſtrates are to be honoured in their place, and more eſpecially the king as ſupreme, in thought, word, and geſture; ſee 1 Peter ii. 17.

Ver. 8. Owe no man any thing, &c.] From the payment of dues to magiſtrates the Apoſtle proceeds to a general exhortation to diſcharge all ſorts of debts; as not to owe the civil magiſtrate any thing, but render to him his dues, ſo to owe nothing to any other man, but make good all obligations whatever, as of a civil, ſo of a natural kind. There are debts ariſing from the natural and civil relations ſubſiſting among men, which ſhould be diſcharged; as of the huſband to the wife, the wife to the huſband; parents to their children, children to their parents; maſters to their ſervants, ſervants to their maſters; one brother, friend, and neighbour to another. Moreover, pecuniary debts may be here intended, ſuch as are come into by borrowing, buying, commerce, and contracts; which tho' they can't be avoided in carrying on worldly buſineſs, yet men ought to make conſcience of paying them as ſoon as they are able: many an honeſt man may be in debt, and by one providence or another be diſabled from payment, which is a grief of mind to him; but for men induſtriouſly to run into debt, and take no care to pay, but live upon the property and ſubſtance of others, is ſcandalous to them as men, and greatly unbecoming profeſſors of religion, and brings great reproach upon the Goſpel of Chriſt. But to love one another. This is the only debt never to be wholly diſcharged; for though it ſhould be always paying, yet ought always to be looked upon as owing. Saints ought to love one another as ſuch; to this they are obliged by the new commandment of Chriſt, by the love of God, and Chriſt unto them, by the relations they ſtand in to one another, as the children of God, brethren, and members of the ſame body; and which is neceſſary to keep them and the churches of Chriſt together, it being the bond of perfectneſs by which they are knit to one another; and for their comfort and honour, as well as to ſhew the truth and reality of their profeſſion. This debt ſhould be always paying; ſaints ſhould be continually ſerving one another in love, praying for each other, bearing one another's burdens, forbearing each other, and doing all good offices in things temporal and ſpiritual that lie in their power, and yet always owing; the obligation to it always remains. Chriſt's commandment is a new one, always new, and will never be antiquated; his and his father's love always continue, and the relations believers ſtand in to each other, are ever the ſame; and therefore love will be always paying, and always owing in heaven to all eternity. But what the Apoſtle ſeems chiefly to reſpect, is love to one another as men, love to another, to the neighbour, as the following verſes ſhew. Love is a debt we owe to every man, as a man, being all made of one blood, and in the image of God; ſo that not only ſuch as are of the ſame family, live in the ſame neighbourhood, and belong to the ſame nation, but even all the individuals of mankind, yea, our very enemies are to ſhare in our love; and as we have an opportunity and ability, are to ſhew it by doing them good. For he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law; that is, not who loves ſome one particular perſon, but every other perſon beſides himſelf, even his neighbour, in the largeſt ſenſe of the word, including all mankind, and that as himſelf; ſuch an one has fulfilled the law, the law of the decalogue; that part of it particularly which relates to the neighbour; the ſecond table of the law, as the next verſe ſhews: tho' ſince there is no true love of our neighbour without the love of God, nor no true love of God without the love of our neighbour; and ſince theſe two involve each other, and include the whole law, it may be underſtood of fulfilling every part of it, that is, of doing it; for fulfilling the law means doing it, or acting according to it; and ſo far as a man loves, ſo far he fulfils, that is, does it: but this is not, nor can it be done perfectly, which is evident, partly from the impotency of man, who is weak and ſtrengthleſs, yea, dead in ſin, and unable to do any thing of himſelf; and partly from the extenſiveneſs of the law, which reaches to the thoughts and deſires of the heart, as well as to words and actions; as alſo from the imperfection of love, for neither love to God, nor love to one another, either as men or chriſtians, is perfect; and conſequently the fulfilling of the law by it is not perfect: hence this paſſage yields nothing in favour of the doctrine of juſtification by works; ſince the beſt works are imperfect, even thoſe that ſpring from love, for love itſelf is imperfect; and are not done as they are, in a man's own ſtrength, and without the Spirit and grace of God. Chriſt only has fulfilled the law perfectly, both as to parts and degrees; and to him only ſhould we look for a juſtifying righteouſneſs.

Ver. 9. For this, thou ſhalt not commit adultery, &c.] The Apoſtle here reckons up the ſeveral laws of the ſecond table, with this view, that it might appear that ſo far as a man loves his neighbour, whether more near or diſtantly related, he fulfils the law, or acts according to it. He omits the firſt of theſe, the fifth commandment, either becauſe he had urged this before, ſo far as it may be thought to regard magiſtrates; or becauſe, according to the diviſion of the Jews, who reckon five commands to each table, this belonged to the firſt; and he puts the ſeventh before the ſixth, which is of no great moment; the order of things being frequently changed in the ſcripture, and which is often done by Jewiſh writers, in alledging and citing paſſages of ſcripture; and with whom this is a maxim, אין מוקדם ומאוחר בתורה, that there's no firſt nor laſt in the law [c]; that is, it is of no importance which ſtands firſt or laſt in it: it follows, thou ſhalt not kill, thou ſhalt not ſteal, thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs, thou ſhalt not covet; which are the ſixth, eighth, ninth, and tenth commands of the decalogue: and if there be any other commandment; of God, reſpecting the neighbour, either in the decalogue, as there was the fifth, or elſewhere, the Apoſtle repeating this by memory: it is briefly comprehended in this ſaying, namely, thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf; this is the ſummary and epitome of them; ſo Chriſt reduces the laws of the firſt table, to the head of love to God, and thoſe of the ſecond, to the head of love to the neighbour, Matt. xxii. 37, 38, 39. as the Apoſtle does here, and in Gal. v. 14. and the Apoſtle James, in ch. ii. 8.

Ver. 10. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour, &c.] That is, the man that truly loves his neighbour, will contrive no ill againſt him, nor do any to him; he'll not injure his perſon, nor defile his bed, nor deprive or defraud him of his ſubſtance; or do hurt to his character, bear falſe teſtimony againſt him, or covet with an evil covetouſneſs, any thing that is his; but on the contrary, will do him all the good he is capable of: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law; ſo far as a man loves his neighbour, he acts agreeably to the law, and the particular precepts of it above-mentioned: what the Apoſtle ſays of love to the neighbour, the Jews frequently ſay of love to God; "he that loveth "God, they ſay [d], מקיים עשר אמירן, hath fulfilled the decalogue, both above and below." And again [e], "there's no ſervice like the love of God, "R. Aba ſaith it is, כללא דאורייתא, the ſum of "of the law; for the ten words of the law, "הכא אתכלילו, are herein comprehended, or fulfilled:" and elſewhere [f] they obſerve, that, "כל התורה כלולה באהבת, the whole law is comprehended, or fulfilled in love."

Ver. 11. And that knowing the time, &c.] That it is day and not night, the Goſpel day, the day of ſalvation; in which the grace of God ſhines forth, like the ſun in its meridian glory; life and immortality are brought to light, righteouſneſs and ſalvation are revealed; and ſo a time not for ſloth and ſleep, but buſineſs; in which the ſaints ſhould be active in the exerciſe of grace, and diſcharge of duty; owing no man any thing, but the debt of love; and that the dawn of grace, and day of ſpiritual light, had broke in upon their ſouls, and diſpelled the darkneſs of ſin, ignorance, and unbelief; that the darkneſs was paſt, and the true light ſhined, and the ſun of righteouſneſs was riſen on them: all which they full well knew and were conſcious of, and therefore ſhould obſerve, that now it is high time for us to awake out of ſleep; ſince ſleep is for the night, and not the day; the Alexandrian copy reads, for you. This is to be underſtood, not of the dead ſleep of ſin, in which unconverted perſons are, to be awoke out of which, is a work of divine power; but of the carnal ſecurity and drowſy frame of ſpirit, which ſometimes attend the churches and children of God, the wiſe as well as the fooliſh virgins; and lies in grace being dormant in the ſoul; in a backwardneſs to duty, and a ſlothfulneſs in the performance of it; in reſting in the outward duties of religion; in lukewarmneſs about the cauſe of Chriſt; in an unconcernedneſs about ſins of omiſſion and commiſſion; and in a willingneſs to continue in ſuch a ſluggiſh frame: all which ariſe from a body of ſin and death, and an over anxious care for the things of the world; from a wearineſs in ſpiritual exerciſes, and an abſtinence from ſpiritual company and ordinances, and from outward peace and liberty: ſuch a frame of ſpirit when it prevails and becomes general, is of bad conſequence to the churches of Chriſt; the ſpirit of diſcerning, care and diligence in receiving members, are in a great meaſure loſt, and ſo they are filled with hypocrites and hereticks; Chriſt abſents himſelf from them; leanneſs of ſoul is brought upon them; and they are in danger of being ſurprized with the midnight cry: the methods God takes to awaken his people out of ſuch a ſleep, are various; ſometimes in a more gentle way, by the diſcoveries of his love, which cauſes the lips of thoſe that are aſleep to ſpeak; ſometimes by ſevere reproofs in the miniſtry of the word; and ſometimes by ſharp perſecutions in providence; and at laſt it will be done by the midnight cry: the argument, ſhewing the reaſonableneſs of awaking out of ſleep, and that it was high time to do ſo, follows, for now is our ſalvation nearer than when we believed; by which is meant, not temporal ſalvation, or a deliverance from the perſecution the ſaints endured in Judea, from their own countrymen, by the departure of them from Jeruſalem, a little before its deſtruction, by the deſtruction of that city, and the peaceful times of Veſpaſian; but a ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation: not Chriſt the author of it, who was come to effect it; nor that itſelf, as obtained, which was now done, finiſhed, and compleated; nor the application of it to their ſouls, which alſo had been made; but the conſummate enjoyment of it in heaven, the ſalvation of their ſouls at death, and both of ſoul and body at the reſurrection; conſiſting in a freedom from every evil, and in a full poſſeſſion of all that is good and glorious: this is brought nearer to the ſaints, to their ſight and view, as their faith grows and increaſes; and they are nearer the enjoyment of that, than when they firſt believed; and which is a ſtrong reaſon, why a ſluggiſh, ſlothful frame ſhould not be indulged; what ſleep, and heaven ſo near at hand! juſt at their Father's houſe, ready to enter into the joy of their Lord, into his everlaſting kingdom and glory, and yet aſleep!

[e] Ibid. fol. 113. 1.

[f] Moſes Kotſenſis Mitzvot Tora, pracept. affirm. 3. prope finem.

Ver. 12. The night is far ſpent, &c.] Not of Jewiſh darkneſs, which was gone, and was ſucceeded by the Goſpel day; nor of former ignorance in Gentiliſm and unregeneracy, for that was paſt, and the true light ſhined; much leſs of ſecurity in the latter day, which was not yet come on; rather of perſecution and diſtreſs for Chriſt's ſake; but it is beſt of all to underſtand it of the preſent time of life; ſo it is called by the Jews [g], העולם הזה דומה ללילה, this world is like to the night: and which, in the beſt of ſaints, is attended with imperfection and darkneſs, errors and miſtakes, in principle and practice, in doctrine and converſation; however it is far ſpent, and in a little time will be over: the day is at hand; not the Goſpel-day, for that was already come; nor the day of grace, and ſpiritual light and comfort to their ſouls, for that alſo had taken place; nor the latter day glory, which then was at a diſtance; rather the approaching day of deliverance from preſent perſecutions; but it is much better to underſtand it of the everlaſting day of glory, which to particular perſons was then, and now is at hand; a little while and the night of darkneſs, affliction, and diſconſolation will be over, and the day of glory will ſucceed, when there will be no more night, no more darkneſs, no more doubts, fears, and unbelief; but one continued ſeries of light, joy and comfort, and an uninterrupted communion with Father, Son, and Spirit; and which is another reaſon why the ſaints ſhould not indulge themſelves in ſleep, but be active, ſince the Halcyon days are at hand, as well as a reaſon why they ſhould attend to the following exhortations: let us therefore caſt off the works of darkneſs; as the Apoſtle had made uſe of the metaphors, of night and day, and of ſleep, and awaking out of ſleep, and riſing in the morning to buſineſs, ſo he continues the ſame; and here alludes to perſons, throwing off their bed-cloaths, and covering of the night, and putting on proper raiment for the day. By works of darkneſs are meant evil works, which are oppoſite to the light; to God who is light itſelf; to Chriſt the light of the world; to the word of God, both law and Goſpel, which is a light to our paths; to both the light of nature, and the light of grace: and which ſpring from the darkneſs of the mind, and are encouraged to by the God of this world, and by his angels, the rulers of the darkneſs of it; and which are generally done in the dark, and are ſuch as will not bear the light; and if grace prevent not, will end in outer darkneſs, in blackneſs of darkneſs, reſerved by the juſtice of God, as the puniſhment of them. Caſting them off expreſſes a diſlike of them, a diſplicency with them, and an abſtinence from them. Some copies read, the armour of darkneſs, which agrees with what follows: and let us put on the armour of light; the whole armour of God, the uſe of which lies in the exerciſe of grace, and diſcharge of duty; particularly good works are deſigned here, which though they are not the believer's cloathing, his robe of juſtifying righteouſneſs, they are both his ornament and his armour; by which he adorns the doctrine of Chriſt, and defends his own character and principles, againſt the charges and calumnies of men: theſe being performed aright, ſpring from the light of grace in a regenerate man, and are ſuch as will bear the light to be ſeen of men; and are the lights which are to ſhine before men, that they beholding them, may glorify God; ſo virtue was by Antiſthenes [h], called αναφαιρετον οπλον, armour which cannot be taken away: the alluſion is thought to be to the bright and glittering armour of the Romans;

Romans; the Alexandrian copy reads, the works of light.

Ver. 13. Let us walk honeſtly as in the day, &c.] Being under the day of the Goſpel diſpenſation, and the day of grace having dawned, and the day-ſtar of ſpiritual light and knowledge being riſen in our hearts, and we being expoſed to the view of all men in broad day-light, ought not to lie down and ſleep, but to ariſe and be active, and walk decently with the armour of light on us, as becomes the Goſpel of Chriſt; not naked and uncloathed, which would expoſe us and the Goſpel to ſhame and contempt: not in rioting; the Syriac and Arabic verſions read, in ſinging, or ſongs; meaning lewd ones, ſung at riotous feaſts and banquets, made not for refreſhment, but for pleaſure and debauchery, what the Romans[i] call comeſſations; feaſts after ſupper in the night-ſeaſon, and deſign all ſorts of nocturnal revels: Comus, the word here uſed, is with the heathens the God of feaſts, perhaps the ſame with Chemoſh, the god of the Moabites, 1 Kings xi. 33. And drunkenneſs; which always attended ſuch unſeaſonable and immoderate feſtivals: not in chambering; in unlawful copulations, fornication, adultery, and all the defilements of the bed: and wantonneſs; laſciviouſneſs, unnatural luſts, as ſodomy, &c. not in ſtrife and envying; contention and quarrels, which are uſually the conſequences of luxury and uncleanneſs.

Ver. 14. But put ye on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] As a man puts on his cloaths when he riſes in the morning: the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is compared to a garment, it is the beſt robe, it is fine linnen, clean and white, and change of raiment; which being put on by the Father's gracious act of imputation, covers the ſins and deformities of his people, defends them from divine juſtice, ſecures them from wrath to come, and renders them beautiful and acceptable in his ſight: which righteouſneſs being revealed from faith to faith, is received by faith, and made uſe of as a proper dreſs to appear in before God; and may be daily ſaid to be put on by the believer, as often as he makes uſe of it, and pleads it with God as his juſtifying righteouſneſs, which ſhould be continually: moreover, to put on Chriſt, and which indeed ſeems to be the true ſenſe of the phraſe here, is not only to exerciſe faith on him as the Lord our righteouſneſs, and to make a profeſſion of his name, but to imitate him in the exerciſe of grace and diſcharge of duty; to walk as he walked, and as we have him for an example, in love, meekneſs, patience, humility, and holineſs: and make not proviſion for the fleſh; the body: not but that due care is to be taken of it, both for food and cloathing; and for its health, and the continuance and preſervation of it by all lawful methods; but not ſo as to fulfil the luſts thereof; to indulge and gratify them, by luxury and uncleanneſs: it is a ſaying of Hillell[k], מרבה בשר מרבה רמה, he that increaſes fleſh, increaſes worms; the ſenſe his commentators[l] give of it is, that "he that increaſes by eating and drinking, until he becomes fat and fleſhy, increaſes for himſelf worms in the grave:" the deſign of the ſentence is, that voluptuous men, who care for nothing elſe but the fleſh ſhould conſider, that e'er long they'll be a repaſt for worms: we ſhould not provide, or be caterers for the fleſh; and by pampering it, ſtir up, and ſatisfy its corrupt inclinations and deſires.

CHAP. XIV.

THE Apoſtle having finiſhed his exhortations to duties of a moral and civil kind, proceeds to the conſideration of things indifferent, about eating ſome ſorts of meats, and keeping days; to which he might be led by the laſt clauſe of the preceding chapter, leſt that ſhould be interpreted as referring to thoſe who uſed their chriſtian liberty in eating every ſort of food; in the uſe of which it was requiſite to exerciſe that love which is the fulfilling of the law, he had ſo much preſſed and recommended in the foregoing chapters. The church at Rome conſiſted both of Jews and Gentiles: and the former, tho' they believed in Chriſt, were not clear about the abrogation of the ceremonial law, and thought they ought ſtill to obſerve the diſtinction of meats and days, which were made in it; the latter looked upon themſelves under no manner of obligation to regard them; and even among the Jews, ſome might have greater light and knowledge in theſe things than others, and uſed their chriſtian liberty, when others could not; and this occaſioned great animoſities and contentions among them; and ſome, on account of theſe things were called ſtrong, and others weak: and the chief view of the Apoſtle in this chapter, is to give advice to each party how to behave one towards another; how the ſtrong ſhould behave to the weak, and the weak to the ſtrong: and he begins with the ſtrong, and in general exhorts them to a kind, tender, and affectionate regard to their weaker brethren, and not perplex their minds with diſputations about things to little profit, ver. 1. then a diſtribution of the members of this church into two parts, is made, ver. 2. ſhewing the reaſon of the above exhortations; the one ſort being ſtrong believers, the other weak, the one eating all things, the other herbs; when ſome advice is given to each, that the ſtrong ſhould not deſpiſe the weak, nor the weak judge the ſtrong; for which reaſons are given: and the firſt is taken from the common intereſt they both have in the affection of God, and in divine adoption, ver. 3. And another is taken from the relation which believers ſtand in to God, as ſervants; and therefore not to be judged and condemned, but to be left to their Lord and maſter, which is illuſtrated by a ſimile of ſuch a relation among men, ver. 4. and then another inſtance of different ſentiments about Jewiſh rites and ceremonies is given, ver. 5. reſpecting the obſervation of days, in which alſo the members of the church were divided, ſome obſerving them, and ſome not; and the Apoſtle's advice is, that every man ſhould act as he was perſuaded in his own mind, and not be uneaſy with another: the reaſon for which he gives, ver. 6. becauſe the end propoſed by the one, and the other, is the honour and glory of God, and which is the ſame in the man that eats, or does not eat meat, ſince both give thanks to God. And this is further confirmed from the general end of the chriſtian's life and death likewiſe, which is not to himſelf, but to the Lord, ver. 7, 8. from whence it is concluded, that they are the Lord's in life and death, and all their actions are devoted to him; who by dying, riſing, and living again, appears to be the Lord of quick and dead, and will judge both, ver. 9. and therefore to his judgment things ſhould be left, and one ſhould not condemn or deſpiſe another, ſince all muſt ſtand at his bar, ver. 10. which is proved ver. 11. from a paſſage in Iſ. xlv. 23. from all which it is concluded, ver. 12. that an account muſt be given by every one to God, at the general judgment; wherefore it is right and beſt, not to judge and condemn one another, but to judge this to be the moſt reaſonable and agreeable to chriſtian charity, that care be taken not to offend, or cauſe a brother to ſtumble, ver. 13. and whereas it might be objected, that nothing was impure in itſelf, and therefore might be lawfully eaten, which the Apoſtle allows, and as for himſelf, was fully perſuaded of, yet it was impure to them who thought it ſo, ver. 14. and therefore ſhould not eat; nor ſhould others, when it gave offence to ſuch perſons; and which is diſſuaded from, becauſe to eat to the grief of the brethren, is contrary to chriſtian charity; and becauſe it deſtroys the peace of ſuch perſons, and they are ſuch whom Chriſt has died for, ver. 15. beſides, hereby reproach might be brought upon them, the Goſpel they profeſſed, and the truth of chriſtian liberty they uſed, ver. 16. and moreover, the kingdom of God did not lie in the uſe of theſe things, but in ſpiritual ones, ver. 17. and which ſhould be chiefly regarded, ſince the ſervice of God in them, is what is grateful to him, and approved by all good men, ver. 18. wherefore the things which make for peace and edification, ſhould be followed after, things much preferable to meats and drinks, ver. 19. for the ſake of which the peace of a brother, which is the work of God, ſhould not be deſtroyed, ver. 20. for though all things are pure in themſelves, and lawful to be eaten, yet it is an evil to eat them to the offence of another, and for another to eat them againſt his conſcience, which he may be drawn into by the example of others; wherefore it is beſt to abſtain from eating fleſh, or drinking wine, and every thing elſe that is ſtumbling and offenſive to a weak brother, ver. 21. and whereas the ſtrong brother might object and ſay, I have faith in this matter, I believe it is lawful for me to eat any thing, and why ſhould I not? the Apoſtle anſwers, by granting that he had faith, but then he obſerves, he ought to keep it to himſelf, and not diſturb his weak brother, by putting it into practice openly; but ſhould keep it to himſelf, it being his happineſs not to condemn himſelf by uſing his liberty with offence, ver. 22. and then ſome advice is given to the weak brother, not to eat with a doubting conſcience, ver. 23. becauſe in ſo doing, he would be ſelf-condemned, and becauſe it would not be of faith, and therefore ſinful.

[k] Pirke Abot, c. 2. §. 7.

[l] Bartenora in ib. Vid. Fagium in ib.

Ver. 1. Him that is weak in the faith, &c.] This addreſs is made to the ſtronger and more knowing chriſtians among the Romans, how to behave towards thoſe that were inferior in light and knowledge to them, with regard to things of a ritual and ceremonial kind: and by him that is weak in the faith, is meant, either one that is weak in the exerciſe of the grace of faith, who has but a glimmering ſight of Chriſt; who comes to him in a very feeble and trembling manner; who believes his ability to ſave him, but heſitates about his willingneſs; who caſts himſelf with a peradventure on him; and who is attended with many miſgivings of heart, faintings of ſpirit, and fluctuation of mind, about his intereſt in him: or one that is weak in the doctrine of faith; has but little light and knowledge in the truths of the Goſpel; is a child in underſtanding; has more affection than judgment; very little able to diſtinguiſh truth from error; can't digeſt the greater and more ſublime doctrines of grace; ſtands in need of milk, and can't bear ſtrong meat; is very fluctuating and unſettled in his principles, and like children toſſed to and fro with every wind of doctrine: or rather one that is weak in his knowledge of that branch of the doctrine of faith, which concerns chriſtian liberty; and that part of it particularly, which reſpects freedom from the ceremonial law: it deſigns one, and chiefly a Jew, who though a believer in Chriſt, and an embracer of the other truths of the Goſpel, yet had but very little knowledge of Goſpel liberty; but thought, that believers were to obſerve all the rituals of the Moſaic diſpenſation, not knowing that they were aboliſhed by Chriſt. The phraſe is Jewiſh; it is [m] ſaid, "what is the meaning of the "phraſe, in Rephidim, Exod. xvii. 1? it ſignifies "ſuch as are of weak hands; as if it had been ſaid, "becauſe the Iſraelites were, רפים באמונתם, "weak in their faith." The advice the Apoſtle gives, in reference to ſuch a perſon, is to receive him; not only into their affections, and love him equally, being a believer in Chriſt, as one of the ſame ſentiments with them, only in this matter, but alſo into church fellowſhip with them. The Syriac verſion reads it, הבו לה אידא, give him the hand; in token of communion, a form uſed in admiſſion of members. The Gentiles were apt to boaſt againſt, and look with ſome contempt upon the Jews, and were ready to object to their communion, becauſe of their want of light and knowledge in theſe matters; but this was no bar of communion, nor ought a perſon to be rejected on account of his weakneſs, either in the grace, or in the doctrine of faith, when it appears he has the true grace of God; and much leſs on account of his weakneſs in that branch of it, concerning chriſtian liberty; for ſince Chriſt does not break the bruiſed reed, nor quench the ſmoaking flax, nor deſpiſe the day of ſmall things, churches ſhould not: it may alſo intend a receiving of ſuch into intimate converſation, at their private meetings and conferences; taking particular notice of them; giving them proper inſtructions; praying with them and for them; endeavouring to build them up in their moſt holy faith, and to bring them into the knowledge of thoſe things they are weak in; bearing their weakneſſes patiently, and bearing with them in great tenderneſs: thus ſuch ſhould be received, but not to doubtful diſputations; to vain jangling and perverſe diſputings, ſuch as will rather perplex than inform them; and will leave their minds doubtful and in ſuſpenſe, and do them more harm than good.

Ver. 2. For one believeth that he may eat all things, &c.] He is fully perſuaded in his mind, that there is nothing in itſelf common, or unclean; that the difference between clean and unclean meats commanded to be obſerved by the law of Moſes, is taken away; and that he may now lawfully eat any ſort of food; every creature of God being good, and none to be refuſed, becauſe of the ceremonial law which is abrogated, provided it be received with thankſgiving, and uſed to the glory of God: another who is weak eateth herbs; meaning not one that is ſickly and unhealthful, and of a weak conſtitution, and therefore eats herbs for health's ſake; but one that is weak in the faith, and who thinks that the laws concerning the obſervance of meats and drinks, are ſtill in force; and therefore rather than break any of them, and that he may be ſure he does not, will eat nothing but herbs, which are not any of them forbidden by the law: and this he did, either as chuſing rather to live altogether on herbs, than to eat any thing which the law forbids; or being of opinion with the Eſſenes among the Jews, and the Pythagoreans among the Gentiles, who thought they were to abſtain from eating of all ſorts of animals.

[m] Tzeror Hammor, fol. 77. 1.

Ver. 3. Let not him that eateth, deſpiſe him that eateth not, &c.] Such who had a greater degree of Goſpel light and knowledge, and made uſe of their chriſtian liberty in eating any ſort of food, were not to deſpiſe, as they were apt to do, ſuch as abſtained therefrom, on account of the ceremonial law, as weak, ignorant, ſuperſtitious, and bigotted perſons; or were not to ſet them at naught, or make nothing of them, as the word ſignifies, have no regard to their peace and comfort; but on the other hand, were to conſider them as brethren in Chriſt, though weak; and as having a work of God upon their ſouls, and therefore to be careful how they grieved them, deſtroyed their peace, or laid ſtumbling-blocks in their way: and let not him which eateth not, judge him that eateth; ſuch who thought it not their duty to eat any thing, but to forbear the uſe of ſome things directed to in the law, were not to cenſure and condemn, as they were apt to do, thoſe who uſed their liberty in theſe things, as profane perſons, and tranſgreſſors of the law of God; but leave them to the laſt and righteous judgment, when every one muſt be accountable to God for the various actions of life: the reaſon uſed to enforce this advice on both parties is, for God hath received him; which reſpects both him that eateth, and him that eateth not, him that is deſpiſed, and him that is judged; and is a reaſon, why one ſhould not deſpiſe, nor the other judge, becauſe God had received both the one and the other, into his heart's love and affection, into the covenant of grace, and into his family by adoption: they were received by Chriſt, coming to him as periſhing ſinners, according to the will of God; whoſe will it likewiſe was, that they ſhould be received into church fellowſhip, as being no more ſtrangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the ſaints, and of the houſhold of God; and God had alſo received them into his ſervice, and they were made willing to ſerve him, as well as to be ſaved by him; and did ſerve him acceptably with reverence and godly fear, in righteouſneſs and holineſs; and this is the rather to be taken into the ſenſe of this paſſage, becauſe of what follows.

Ver. 4. Who art thou that judgeſt another man's ſervant, &c.] This is another reaſon, diſſuading from cenſoriouſneſs and raſh judgment, taken from civil things; one man has nothing to do with another man's ſervant; he has no power over him, nor any right to call him to an account for his actions; nor has he any buſineſs to cenſure or condemn him for them, or concern himſelf about them: ſo the believer ſuppoſed to be judged, does not belong to him that takes upon him to judge and condemn him; he's another's ſervant, he is the ſervant of God: he's choſen by God the Father for his ſervice, as well as unto ſalvation; he's bought with the price of Chriſt's blood, and therefore not his own, nor another's, but Chriſt's, he is bought with his money; and he is alſo born in his houſe, the church; the Spirit of God in regeneration, forms him for himſelf, for righteouſneſs and holineſs; under the influence of whoſe grace, he voluntarily gives up himſelf to the ſervice of God, and is aſſiſted by him to keep his ſtatutes and do them; and what has another to do with him? what power has he over him? or right to judge him? to his own maſter he ſtandeth or falleth; the meaning of which is, either if he ſtands, that is, if he ſerves his Lord and maſter, of which ſtanding is expreſſive; and continues in the ſervice of him, whoſe ſervant he profeſſes to be; this is to his maſter's advantage and profit, and not to another's: and if he falls, that is, from his obedience to him, as ſuch who profeſs to be the ſervants of God may; they may fall off from the doctrine of grace they have embraced; and that either totally and finally, as ſuch do who never felt the power of it in their hearts; or partially, from ſome degree of ſtedfaſtneſs in the faith; and ſuch alſo may fall from a lively exerciſe of the graces of faith, hope, and love, and into great ſins, which is to their maſter's diſhonour, and cauſe his ways and truths to be evil ſpoken of; and ſo it is to their own maſter they fail: or elſe the ſenſe is, to their own maſter they are accountable, whether they ſtand or fall, ſerve or diſobey him; and it is according to his judgment and not another's, that they ſtand, or are and will be juſtified and acquitted, and will hear well done good and faithful ſervant; and according to the ſame they will fall, or be condemned, and hear, take the ſlothful and unprofitable ſervant, and caſt him into outer darkneſs: ſo the words ſtanding and falling, are uſed by the Jews in a forenſic ſenſe, for carrying or loſing a cauſe, for juſtification or condemnation in a court of judicature, and particularly in the laſt judgment; and ſo they explain Pſal. i. 5. the ungodly ſhall not ſtand in the judgment; the Targum paraphraſes it, "the "wicked ſhall not be juſtified in the great day;" and Jarchi upon the place ſays, there ſhall be no הקמת רגל, ſtanding of the foot of the wicked, in the day of judgment; ſee Luke xxi. 36. 1 John ii. 28. Yea, he ſhall be holden up; which words ſeem to be a ſort of correction of the Apoſtle's as if he ſhould ſay, why do I talk of falling, one that is a true ſervant of the Lord's ſhall not fall, at leaſt not totally and finally, nor in the laſt judgment; for he is holden by the right-hand of God, by the right-hand of his righteouſneſs, and is kept by the power of God through faith unto ſalvation: for God is able to make him ſtand; and will make him ſtand; words of power oftentimes include willingneſs as well as ability; ſee Jud. v. 24. God will make ſuch to perſevere to the end, becauſe he has loved them with an everlaſting love, choſen them in Chriſt, made a covenant with them in him, and has put them into his hands, and made them his care and charge; Chriſt has redeemed them by his blood, now intercedes, and is making preparations for them in heaven; they are united to him, and are built on him the ſure foundation; and the Spirit of God has begun that good work, which ſhall be performed. God will make ſuch to ſtand in judgment with intrepidity, and without ſhame, being cloathed with the righteouſneſs of his Son; and ſhall therefore have the crown of righteouſneſs given them, and an abundant entrance adminiſtered into his kingdom and glory: hence they ought not to be judged by man's judgment, nor need they regard it. The Alexandrian copy reads, the Lord is able, &c.

Ver. 5. One man eſteemeth one day above another, &c.] This is another inſtance of the difference of ſentiments in this church, about the obſervation of rituals; and is not to be underſtood of days appointed by the chriſtian churches for faſting, or abſtinence from certain meats, either once a year, as the Quadrageſima, or Lent; or twice a week, as Wedneſdays and Fridays; for theſe are things of much later obſervation, and which had never been introduced into the church of Rome in the Apoſtle's time; nor were there any diſputes about them: much leſs of days of heatheniſh obſervation, as lucky or unlucky, or feſtivals in honour of their gods; for the Apoſtle would never ſay, that a man who regarded ſuch a day, regarded it to the Lord; nor would have adviſed to a coalition and chriſtian converſation with ſuch a man, but rather to exclude him from all ſociety and communion: it remains therefore, that it muſt be underſtood of Jewiſh days, or of ſuch as were appointed to be obſerved by the Jews under the former diſpenſation, and which ſome thought were ſtill to be regarded; wherefore they eſteemed ſome days in the year above others, as the days of unleavened bread, or the paſſover; particularly the firſt night, which was a night to be obſerved throughout their generations; and in their ſervice for it to this day, uſe theſe words, מה נשתנה הלילה הזה מכל הלילות, how different is this night from every other night[n]? and the feaſt of tabernacles, eſpecially the laſt and great day of the feaſt, and the day of pentecoſt; alſo one day in a month above others, the firſt day of the month, or new moon; and one day in a week, the ſeventh day ſabbath: now there were ſome, who thought that the laws reſpecting theſe days, were ſtill in force, particularly the latter, and therefore eſteemed it above another: but let it be obſerved, that the man that did ſo, was one that was weak in faith; the ſame man that eat herbs, becauſe he would not be guilty of violating thoſe laws, which ordered a diſtinction of meats to be obſerved, the ſame weak man eſteemed one day above another, imagining the laws concerning the diſtinction of days were ſtill obligatory, not rightly underſtanding the doctrine of chriſtian liberty, or freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law: another eſteemeth every day alike; that is, one that is ſtrong in faith, and has a greater degree of the knowledge of the Goſpel, and of evangelical liberty, knows that the diſtinction of days, as well as of meats, is taken away, ſince the Word was made fleſh, and tabernacled among us, Chriſt the paſſover is ſacrificed for us, the firſt fruits of the Spirit have been received, and light by the church from the ſun of righteouſneſs, and Chriſt the true ſabbath and reſt is come; and therefore being firmly perſuaded, there is no more holineſs in days, than there is in places, has the ſame regard for one day as another. The difference between theſe two lay here, the weak brother regarded a day for the ſake of a day, as having by a poſitive law, he ſuppoſed to be in force, a ſuperiority to another, and he regarded worſhip for the ſake of this day; the ſtronger brother, though he alſo obſerved a day for divine worſhip, which is the Lord's day, ſince there muſt be ſome time for it as well as place, yet he obſerved the day for the ſake of worſhip, and not worſhip for the ſake of the day: let every man be fully perſuaded in his own mind; this is the advice the Apoſtle gives to both parties; his ſenſe is, that he would have each of them fully enjoy their own principle and practice undiſturbed; he would have the weak brother that eſteemed one day above another, indulged in his way, ſince it aroſe from weakneſs, until he had better light, nor ſhould he be deſpiſed for his weakneſs; he would have the ſtronger chriſtian alſo peaceably enjoy his ſentiment, and purſue what he believed to be right; nor ſhould he be judged, cenſured, and condemned, as a profane perſon, and a tranſgreſſor of the law: his counſel is, that they would ſit down and carefully examine the word of God, and act according to the beſt light they ſhould receive from thence; and take care eſpecially, that they did not act contrary to their own conſciences, with doubt and heſitation; they ought to be thoroughly ſatisfied in their own minds, and being ſo, ſhould content themſelves with their different ſentiments and practices, without deſpiſing or cenſuring one another.

Ver. 6. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it to the Lord, &c.] The Apoſtle ſtrengthens the above advice with this reaſon, becauſe what is done both by one and the other, is done unto the Lord. The weak brother that eſteems one day above another, and regards the paſſover, pentecoſt, and feaſt of tabernacles, a new moon, or a ſeventh day ſabbath, does it in obedience to the commands of the Lord, which he thinks are ſtill binding, not knowing that they are diſannulled by Chriſt; and the worſhip performed by him on any of thoſe days, is done in the name and ſtrength of the Lord, with a view to his glory, and as believing, it was pleaſing in his ſight; and whether he is right or wrong, 'tis to the Lord he does it, and to his own maſter he ſtands or falls. The following clauſe is omitted in the Alexandrian copy and ſome others, and in the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions, but is in moſt Greek copies, and retained in the Syriac and Arabic verſions. And he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it; believing it is the will of the Lord, that all diſtinction of days ſhould ceaſe; and that the law of commandments contained in ordinances, reſpecting ſuch Jewiſh days, is aboliſhed by the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and that it is to the honour of the Lord not to obſerve them: for to regard the days of the feaſt of tabernacles, is tacitly to ſay, that the Word has not tabernacled among us; and to obſerve the days of the paſſover, is virtually to deny, that Chriſt our paſſover is ſacrificed for us; and to keep the day of pentecoſt, is all one as to affirm, that the firſt fruits of the Spirit have not been given; and to regard a new moon, is in effect to ſay, that the church has not received evangelical light from Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs; and to keep a ſeventh day ſabbath, is a ſtrong inſinuation, as if Chriſt the true ſabbath, in whom we have our ſpiritual and eternal reſt, is not come; however, 'tis to the Lord that the ſtronger brother and more confirmed believer, diſregards any of thoſe days; and 'tis to his own maſter he ſtands or falls, nor is he to be judged of man's judgment: and the ſame is the caſe of the eater, or non-eater of meats forbidden by the law: he that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks. The man that is ſtrong in faith, and is fully perſuaded by the Lord Jeſus, that all diſtinction of meats, as of days is ceaſed, eats any thing, and every ſort of food, that comes in his way, without making any difference; and when he eats or drinks at any time, it is all to the glory of God; which is a clear caſe, by his giving God thanks as becomes him, for the food he eats: he acknowledges that theſe are the creatures of God, and his gifts to him; he gives him thanks for the right he has given him to eat of them, and for taking away the diſtinction of meats, and giving him the free uſe of his creatures; and the more thankful he is when he conſiders, how unworthy he is of the leaſt of theſe mercies: and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks. The man that is weak in faith, that eateth not food forbidden by the law, abſtains from ſuch food, purely on account of the Lord, in obedience to his will, and with a view to his glory, ſuppoſing ſuch a law to be in full force; and is thankful to God for the herbs he allows him to eat, or for other food not forbidden by the law: and therefore ſince each party ſhows ſuch a religious concern for the glory of the Lord, the Apoſtle argues they ought to be eaſy one with another. The Alexandrian copy reads, and giveth the Lord thanks.

Ver. 7. For none of us liveth to himſelf, &c.] That is, none of us believers; others may, but theſe do not, at leaſt they ought not, nor do they when under the influence of the grace of God: they don't live, neither to righteous, nor to ſinful ſelf; they don't live upon their duties and ſervices; nor do they aſcribe their life, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation to them; nor do they live to their own luſts, or make proviſion for the fleſh to fulfil the luſts thereof, and much leſs to the luſts and wills of others: and no man dieth to himſelf; every man dies, and muſt, or undergo a change equivalent to death; believers die as well as others, not eternally, or the ſecond death, but corporally, or a temporal death, but not to themſelves; as they don't ſeek their own will and pleaſure, and profit in life, ſo neither in death; they don't die to their own advantage only; death is gain unto them, it frees them from all their ſorrows, toil, and labours, and introduces them into the preſence of Chriſt, and the enjoyment of everlaſting happineſs; but this is not all their death iſſues in, but alſo in the glory of Chriſt: moreover, no man has the power over life or death; as his life is not from himſelf, he has no power to lengthen or ſhorten it, nor to hinder or haſten death; this belongs to another Lord and maſter, whom life and death are both to ſubſerve. This is an illuſtration of the above reaſon, by which the Apoſtle confirms his advice.

Ver. 8. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord, &c.] As natural, ſo ſpiritual life is derived from the Lord, and believers live by faith upon him, and according to his will revealed in the word; and to his honour and glory; at leaſt they deſire ſo to do: and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; reſigning up life unto him, whenever it is his pleaſure; magnifying of him, as by life, ſo by death; dying to be with him, to be raiſed again by him, and live with him for evermore; in the faith and hope of this, the believer both lives and dies, and ſo glorifies Chriſt both in life and death: hence this concluſion follows, whether we live therefore or die, we are the Lord's; by the gift of the Father to him, by his own purchaſe, and the power of his grace, making them willing to give up themſelves to him: and hence it is, that under a ſenſe of this, that they are his, and not their own, nor another's, they do all they do for his glory; whether they obſerve, or not obſerve a day, it is to the Lord; whether they eat, or not eat things formerly forbidden, it is to him; and whether they live or die, it is to the Lord, whoſe they are: and hence alſo it is, that they are not to be deſpiſed and ſet at nought, or to be judged and cenſured by one another, ſince they belong to another maſter, who is their Lord, and will be their judge.

Ver. 9. For to this end Chriſt both died, and roſe, and revived, &c.] This laſt word revived, is omitted by the Vulgate Latin, but very naturally placed by the Syriac, between Chriſt's dying and riſing. The Alexandrian copy reads, died and lived; and the Ethiopic verſion, died and revived: the end of all which was, that he might be the Lord both of the dead and living; that is, of believers, whether dead or alive; for though he is Lord of all as God and creator, yet his appearing to be Lord by his dying, riſing, and living again, can only have reſpect to them, for whom dying he has aboliſhed death, and deſtroyed ſatan; whom he has redeemed from ſin, and delivered from this preſent evil world; and ſo having freed them from thoſe other lords which had the dominion over them, ſhews himſelf to be their one and only Lord: and by riſing again from the dead, aſcending to heaven, and ſitting at the right-hand of God, all creatures and things being ſubject to him, he's made or declared both Lord and Chriſt; and living again, and continuing to live for ever, he appears to have the keys of hell and death; and will open the graves, and raiſe from thence, and judge both quick and dead, thoſe that will be found alive at his coming, and ſuch as he will cauſe to riſe from the dead then; till which time, the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, the deciſion of theſe differences about meats and days, were to be left; and in the mean time, the ſaints were to cultivate peace and love among themſelves.

Ver. 10. But why doſt thou judge thy brother? &c.] Theſe words are ſpoken to the man weak in faith, that ſcrupled eating of certain meats, and choſe rather to eat none, and live on herbs, and who eſteemed one day above another; and was very apt to cenſure and condemn ſuch as made uſe of their chriſtian liberty in theſe things, though they were brethren, not in a natural or civil, but in a ſpiritual relation: or why doſt thou ſet at nought thy brother? theſe words on the other hand, are directed to the ſtronger believer, who believed he might eat all things, and eſteemed every day alike; being fully perſuaded, that the diſtinction of meats and of days was now ceaſed; and ſuch were apt to be puffed up with their ſuperior knowledge and faith, and were ready to treat with an air of contempt, thoſe that were weak; ſhewing little or no regard to their peace and edification, though they ſtood in the ſame relation to each other. The emphaſis lies upon the word brother, in both branches of the expoſtulation; and the force of the Apoſtle's reaſoning is, that they ſhould not judge or deſpiſe one another, becauſe they were brethren, ſtood in the ſame relation to God and Chriſt, belonged to the ſame family, were partakers of the ſame grace, and had no preheminence one over another; they had but one maſter, and all they were brethren: and which he further enforces with the following reaſon or argument, for we ſhall all ſtand before the judgment ſeat of Chriſt; at the laſt day, when he ſhall ſit on his throne of glory, and all nations ſhall be gathered before him, and he ſhall pronounce and execute the deciſive ſentence on each of them: there is a particular, and a general judgment; a particular judgment at death, when the ſoul is immediately conſigned to bliſs or woe; and a general one in the end of time; which may be proved both from reaſon, as from the relation creatures ſtand in to God, from the inequality of things in this life, and the conſcious fears of men with reſpect to a future one; and from divine revelation, Chriſt will be the judge, he is ſo appointed by his Father, and is every way fit for it, being God omniſcient and omnipotent; and when he ſhall appear in his glory, he ſhall ſit on his judgment ſeat, the dead will be raiſed, the books will be opened, and all ſhall be ſummoned to appear before him, of every age and ſex, of every rank and degree, and of every character, racter, good or bad: here the ſaints are particularly deſigned, we ſhall all ſtand; whether miniſters or private chriſtians, weak or ſtrong believers; they that are apt to judge, and others that are too ready to deſpiſe; they ſhall all ſtand before the tribunal of Chriſt, who is ſole judge, and ſhall render to every man according to his works, and from whom they ſhall all receive their ſentence. The alluſion is to human courts of judicature, in which the judge ſits upon a bench, and they that are tried ſtand before him; ſee 2 Cor. v. 10. The Alexandrian copy reads, the judgment-ſeat of God.

Ver. 11. For it is written, &c.] In Iſa. xlv. 23. though Juſtin Martyr [o] cites a like paſſage with what follows, as out of Ezek. xxxvii. but no ſuch words appear there, either in the Hebrew text, or Septuagint verſion: as I live ſaith the Lord; the form of an oath, uſed often by the Lord; who becauſe he could ſwear by no greater, he ſwore by himſelf, by his own life; ſignifying, that what he was about to ſay, would as ſurely come to paſs, as that he lived; and in the original text in Iſaiah it is, I have ſworn by myſelf; which being generally expreſſed, the Apoſtle, perfectly agreeable to the meaning of it, gives the particular form of oath he ſwore, as in Iſa. xlix. 18. every knee ſhall bow to me; which is not to be underſtood literally of bowing of the knee at the name of Jeſus, which has no foundation in this, nor in any other paſſage of ſcripture, but figuratively, of the ſubjection of all creatures to Chriſt, both voluntary and involuntary. The Complutenſian edition adds, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, as in Phil. ii. 10. from whence theſe words ſeem to be taken: and every tongue ſhall confeſs to God; that is, every one that has a tongue, every man, be he who he will, a good or a bad man, ſhall own at the laſt day, that Chriſt is God and Lord of all; ſee Phil. ii. 10, 11. It may be aſked, how this paſſage appears to be a proof of what the Apoſtle had aſſerted, for which purpoſe it ſeems to be cited, ſince here is nothing ſaid of Chriſt, nor of his judgment-ſeat, nor of all ſtanding before it? to which may be returned, that it is clear from the context in the prophet, that the Meſſiah is the perſon ſpeaking, who is ſaid to be a juſt God and Saviour; and is repreſented as calling upon, and encouraging all ſorts of perſons to look to him for ſalvation; and as he in whom the church expected righteouſneſs and ſtrength, and in whom all the ſeed of Iſrael ſhall be juſtified, and ſhall glory; and which the Chaldee paraphraſe all along interprets of, מימרא דיי, the word of the Lord; the eſſential Word of God, the true Meſſiah: moreover, the bowing of the knee, and ſwearing, or confeſſing to him, relate to his Lordſhip and dominion over all; and ſuppoſe him as ſitting on his throne of glory, as Lord of all, or as a judge on his judgment-ſeat, in a court of judicature, where ſuch like actions as here mentioned, are performed; and whereas every knee is to bow, and every tongue to confeſs to him, which include all mankind, it follows then, that all the ſaints ſhall ſtand before him, bow unto him, own him as their Lord, and be judged by him. Kimchi ſays [p], that this ſhall be, באחרית הימים, in the laſt days; and which the Apoſtle rightly refers to the day of the general judgment. This place affords a conſiderable proof of Chriſt's true and proper deity, being in the Prophet ſtiled Jehovah, and by the Apoſtle God; and ſuch things being aſcribed to him, as ſwearing by himſelf, which no creature may do, and the ſubjection and confeſſion of all creatures to him, whether they will or no.

Ver. 12. So then every one of us, &c.] This is the concluſion, drawn from the foregoing account of things, that there will be a general judgment, that Chriſt will be judge, and all muſt appear at his bar; from whence it neceſſarily follows, that every man, and ſo every chriſtian, ſtrong or weak, whatever may be his gifts, talents, and abilities, ſhall give an account of himſelf to God; that is, to Chriſt, who is God; which is another proof of his deity, for he will be the judge, the Father will judge no man; 'tis before his judgment-ſeat all ſhall ſtand; and therefore the account muſt be given to him by every one, of himſelf, and not another; of all his thoughts, words, and deeds, which will be all brought into judgment; and of his time and talents, how they have been ſpent and uſed; and of all his gifts of nature, providence, and grace, how they have been exerciſed for the glory of God, his own good, and the good of others: the formal manner in which this will be done, is unknown unto us; however, this is certain, that the ſaints will have upon this reckoning, in what ſort ſoever it may be, a full and open diſcharge, through the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt. The Jews [q] ſay in much ſuch language as the Apoſtle does, that "when a man removes out of this world, then, "יהיב חושבנא למאריה, he gives an account to "his Lord, of all that he has done in the world."

Ver. 13. Let us not therefore judge one another any more, &c.] With reſpect to the obſervance or non-obſervance of the laws relating to meats and drinks, and days, and times; the Apoſtle means, that they ſhould not judge raſhly, nor any thing before the time; they ſhould not cenſure and judge each others characters and ſtates, on account of theſe things, but leave all to the deciſive day, to Chriſt the judge, and to his bar, before which all muſt ſtand: but judge this rather; or reckon this to be the moſt proper, fit and adviſeable: that no man put a ſtumbling-block, or occaſion to fall in his brother's way; as in the former part of the advice, the Apoſtle ſeems to have reſpect more eſpecially to the weak brethren, who were ready to judge and condemn ſuch as neglected the obſervance of the laws about meats and days, as tranſgreſſors, and as wicked perſons, that ought not to be in the communion of the church; ſo in this he ſeems more principally to have regard to the ſtronger brethren; who through their imprudent uſe of their chriſtian liberty, offended weaker minds, and were the occaſion of their ſtumbling and falling, which it became them to be careful to prevent; and rather than be a means of any thing of this nature, it was much better, as he afterwards obſerves, neither to eat fleſh, nor drink wine, and entirely drop or forego the uſe of their liberty.

Ver. 14. I know and am perſuaded by the Lord Jeſus, &c.] As for the Apoſtle's own ſenſe and judgment about the diſtinction of meats, it was this, that there is nothing unclean of itſelf; that every creature, as originally made by God, is good; that what is eatable, or fit for food may be eaten, whatever the Moſaic laws, being now abrogated, ſay to the contrary; and that whatever phyſical or natural difference there may be between the creatures of God, one being naturally fit for food, and another not; yet there is no moral diſtinction between them, there's nothing in any of them that can morally defile a man by eating them; nor indeed is there now any ceremonial diſtinction between them, and ſo no ceremonial pollution by them. This was not a bare conjecture, nor a mere opinion, but a point of certain knowledge, a matter of faith, and of full aſſurance of faith; the Apoſtle was thoroughly perſuaded of the truth of it, and had not the leaſt doubt, nor difficulty in his mind about it; he was as fully aſſured of it, as he was of his ſalvation by Chriſt, and of his intereſt in the love of God, from which he could never be ſeparated, and therefore expreſſes it in language equally as ſtrong; and this he came to the knowledge and perſuaſion of, by the Lord Jeſus; by his expreſs words, Matt. xv. 11, 17, 18. or by a revelation from him, in which way he had the whole Goſpel: he might be informed of this matter in like manner as Peter was, by a viſion from heaven, Acts x. or he knew this through the abrogation of the whole ceremonial law by Chriſt, who aboliſhed the law of commandments contained in ordinances, and ſo theſe laws relating to the difference of meats among the reſt; and he knew, that all the creatures in their original creation were good, and though curſed for man's ſake, yet Chriſt had removed the curſe, and ſanctified them for the uſe of his people, who under the Goſpel diſpenſation, might make uſe of them at pleaſure, without diſtinction: and the Jews themſelves own, that what before was unclean, ſhall in the days of the Meſſiah be clean: ſo they explain Pſal. cxlvi. 7. the Lord looſeth the priſoners, which they would render, the Lord looſeth that which was forbidden; and give this as the ſenſe[r], "every beaſt which was unclean in this world (the "Jewiſh ſtate) ה״בה מטהר אותה לעתיד לבוא, "God will cleanſe it in the time to come (in the times "of the Meſſiah) when they ſhall be clean as at the "firſt, to the ſons of Noah." So they obſerve, that the Hebrew word for a hog, חזיר, comes from חזר, which ſignifies to return; becauſe, ſay they[s], hereafter God will cauſe it to return to the Iſraelites; and even now as formerly, they allow of eating any thing that is torn, or dies of itſelf, or hog's fleſh to an army entering into a Gentile country, and ſubduing it, where they can find nothing elſe[t]: but to him that eſteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean; ſuch a man that thinks the laws concerning clean and unclean meats are ſtill in force, and binding upon him, ought to refrain from eating them; becauſe he would act contrary to his conſcience, and ſo violate and defile it; wherefore though the Apoſtle was ſo fully ſatisfied in his own mind, yet he would not have weak and ſcrupulous conſciences do themſelves any hurt through his faith; for if they eat doubtingly, and without faith, it was an evil. Capellus[u] mentions a rule laid down by the Jews, but does not direct where it is to be found, nor have I yet met with it, very agreeable to this of the Apoſtle's, which runs thus; "this is the grand general rule in the law, "that every thing which thou doſt not know, "אם הוא מותר או אסור עליך אסור, whether it "is lawful or unlawful, to thee it is unlawful, until "thou haſt aſked a wiſe man concerning it, who "may teach thee that it is lawful."

[q] Zohar in Gen. fol. 49. 3.

Ver. 15. But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds to give reaſons why, though he was ſo fully perſuaded that nothing was unclean of itſelf, and ſo he, and any other of the ſame perſuaſion, might lawfully eat any thing; yet they ſhould forbear, and not make uſe of this liberty; becauſe if a brother ſhould be grieved by it, that is, either ſhould be concerned and troubled at it inwardly, both becauſe the perſon that eats is thought by him to have tranſgreſſed a command of God, and becauſe he himſelf is not only deſpiſed as a weak brother, but as if he was a judaizing chriſtian, and walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the Goſpel; or elſe ſhould be emboldened thereby to eat, and ſo wound and defile his weak conſcience; or be ſo galled and offended at it, as to ſtumble and fall off from his profeſſion of chriſtianity, and withdraw his communion, as judging there's nothing in it, no regard being had to the law of God: now walkeſt thou not charitably; this is a breach of the rule of charity or brotherly love; ſuch an one is a brother, and though a weak one, yet he is to be loved as a brother, and to be charitably walked with: true charity, or love, vaunts not itſelf over, nor is it puffed up againſt a weak brother; nor is it unconcerned for his peace, but bears with his weakneſſes, and forbears the uſe of things grieving to him: deſtroy not him with thy meat, for whom Chriſt died. This is to be underſtood not of eternal deſtruction, ſince that can never be thought to be either in the will, or power of any man; ſuch a degree of malice can never ariſe in the heart of any, to wiſh for, deſire, or take any ſtep towards the eternal damnation of another; and could any thing of this kind be among the men of the world, yet ſurely not among brethren of the ſame faith, and in the ſame churchſtate; and were there any ſo wicked as to deſire this, yet it is not in their power to compaſs it, for none can deſtroy eternally but God; ſee Matt. x. 28. beſides, it is not reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that eternal damnation ſhould follow upon eating things indifferent, or be cauſed by an offence either given or taken through them: moreover, though ſuch as only think themſelves, or profeſs themſelves, or are only thought by others to be ſuch, for whom Chriſt died, may be eternally deſtroyed, yet none of thoſe can, for whom Chriſt really died; for they are his ſpecial people, his peculiar friends, his own ſheep, his body the church, which can never periſh; and he by dying, has procured ſuch bleſſings for them, ſuch as a juſtifying righteouſneſs, pardon of ſin, peace with God, and eternal life, which will for ever ſecure them from deſtruction: beſides, ſhould any one of them be deſtroyed, the death of Chriſt would be ſo far in vain, nor would it appear to be a ſufficient ſecurity from condemnation, nor a full ſatisfaction to the juſtice of God; or God muſt be unjuſt, to puniſh twice for the ſame fault: but this is to be underſtood of the deſtruction of ſuch a man's peace and comfort, which is ſignified by grieving, ſtumbling, offending, and making him weak; and the words are a freſh reaſon, why they that are ſtrong in the faith of chriſtian liberty, ſhould nevertheleſs forbear the uſe of it, to preſerve the peace of a weak brother; which is a matter of importance, and the rather to be attended to, ſince it is the peace of one that belongs to Chriſt, whom he has ſo loved as to die for, and therefore ſhould be the object of the regard and affections of ſuch, as believe in Chriſt and love him.

Ver. 16. Let not then your good be evil ſpoken of.] The Vulgate Latin reads it, our good, and ſo the Syriac verſion; the ſenſe is the ſame, and to be underſtood either of the Goſpel in general, which is good in its author, matter, effects, and conſequences; is good tidings of good things, and which might be blaſphemed by the men of the world, on account of the diviſions and contentions among the profeſſors of it, about ſuch little trivial things, as eating this or the other ſort of food; and therefore care ſhould be taken, that it be not evil ſpoken of through ſuch conduct: or elſe the doctrine of chriſtian liberty in particular, which is a good thing; Chriſt has procured it, and beſtows it upon his people; it is a valuable bleſſing in itſelf, and is attended and followed with many conſiderable privileges and immunities; but may be evil ſpoken of by thoſe, who don't ſo well underſtand it, through an imprudent uſe of it by thoſe who do; and who therefore ſhould guard againſt any reproach, that may be caſt upon it; and rather than this ſhould be the caſe, forego the uſe of it, in things of an indifferent nature; ſee 1 Cor. x. 30. ſo that this is another of the Apoſtle's reaſons, why though nothing is of itſelf unclean, yet ſhould be abſtained from on account of others.

[u] In loc.

Ver. 17. For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, &c.] Neither the kingdom of glory, or the ultimate glory and happineſs of the ſaints in the other world, is attained to by any ſuch things; for neither eating and drinking, or not eating and drinking, can recommend to the divine favour, or give a meetneſs for heaven, or a right unto it; ſee 1 Cor. viii. 8. nor does the kingdom of grace, the principle of grace, lie in ſuch things, nor in any thing that is external; nor does the Goſpel, or Goſpel church-ſtate, which frequently go under this name of the kingdom of God, conſiſt of ſuch things the ceremonial and the legal diſpenſation did, but the Goſpel and the diſpenſation of grace, are oppoſed unto them; ſee Heb. ix. 10. and xiii. 9. But righteouſneſs, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghoſt. The kingdom of glory, which is the kingdom of God, becauſe of his preparing, giving, calling to, and putting into the poſſeſſion of, is attained unto by righteouſneſs; not the righteouſneſs of men, but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed by God, and received by faith; and through peace made by the blood of Chriſt, and rejoicing in him, without having any confidence in the fleſh, which is a branch of the Spirit's grace in regeneration. The kingdom of grace, or the governing principle of grace in the ſoul, and which is of God's implanting there, lies in righteouſneſs and true holineſs, in which the new man is created; in truth and uprightneſs in the inward parts, where the laws of God are put and written; and in peace of conſcience, ariſing from the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt; and in that ſpiritual joy and comfort the Holy Ghoſt produces, by leading to a ſight of Chriſt, and an intereſt in him and his atonement. The Goſpel, which gives an account both of the kingdom of grace and of glory, reveals the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and teaches men to live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly, in this preſent evil world: it is a publication of peace by the blood of Chriſt; it calls men to peace, to cultivate peace one among another, and to ſeek thoſe things which make for it; and when it comes in power, is attended with joy in the Holy Ghoſt, and is the means of increaſing it; and this is another reaſon, perſuading to chriſtian forbearance, in the uſe of things indifferent.

Ver. 18. For he that in theſe things ſerveth Chriſt, &c.] That is, in righteouſneſs, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghoſt; he whoſe faith is an obediential one, and embraces theſe things, and from the heart obeys them; who ſeeks righteouſneſs alone by Chriſt, and peace and pardon through his blood; who rejoices in Chriſt Jeſus, and puts no truſt in the fleſh, in moral duties or ceremonial ſervices; and who from principles of grace, ſerves Chriſt in a way of righteouſneſs, wherein he poſſeſſes true peace of conſcience, and abundance of ſpiritual joy and comfort: the Alexandrian copy and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, in this thing; as if it referred only to the right uſe of chriſtian liberty, about things indifferent: ſuch an one is acceptable to God; in Chriſt the beloved, in whom he believes, from whom he derives all his peace, joy, and comfort; and whom he ſerves in righteouſneſs and holineſs, and through whom alſo all his ſervices are acceptable unto God: and approved of men; of good men, of ſuch that can diſcern things that differ, and approve thoſe that are excellent; and even of bad men, for ſuch who live honeſtly and uprightly, who cultivate peace and friendſhip among men, and carry themſelves chearfully and civilly to all men, cannot but be approved of by the generality of them, though they may diſlike them on other accounts.

Ver. 19. Let us therefore follow after the things, &c.] Since the kingdom of God is in part peace, and the man that ſerves Chriſt in this, as in other things, is accepted with God, and grateful to men, the Apoſtle very pertinently exhorts to ſeek after ſuch things, which make for peace: not with God, for, for a ſinful creature to make peace with God, is impracticable and impoſſible, nor is there any exhortation to it in all the word of God; and if there was, would be unneceſſary here; ſince the perſons here exhorted, were ſuch for whom peace with God was made by Chriſt, and who had a clear and comfortable ſenſe of it in their own ſouls; and beſides, for any to be put upon, or to attempt to make their peace with God, muſt highly reflect upon the methods of God's grace, in reconciling ſinners to himſelf; and be injurious to the blood, ſacrifice, and ſatisfaction of Chriſt, by which only peace is made: but the Apoſtle means, either what makes for a man's own peace, or for the peace of others; the things which make for a man's own peace in his own conſcience diſtreſſed with ſin, are looking to, and dealing with the blood of Chriſt, which ſpeaks peace and pardon; and the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which being apprehended by faith, a ſoul has peace with God through Chriſt; and alſo an embracing the Goſpel, and the truths of it, which direct to Chriſt, which publiſh peace, and are the means of increaſing and eſtabliſhing a ſolid and well grounded peace, on the free grace of God and merits of Chriſt: attending on ordinances, and exerciſing a conſcience void of offence towards God and men, are means of continuing and promoting a man's peace; he enjoys peace in them, though he don't derive it from them; yea, in the peace of others, is a man's own peace; and this is what is chiefly meant, a purſuing of things which make for the peace of others; of all men, and eſpecially of ſaints; this is what ſhould be eagerly followed after, cloſely purſued, and all ways and means ſhould be made uſe of, to promote and ſecure it: this is the will of God; 'tis well pleaſing to Chriſt, and a fruit of the Spirit; it is one part of the Goſpel diſpenſation; church fellowſhip can't be profitable and pleaſant without it; it ſuits with the character of ſaints, who are ſons of peace; and agrees with their privileges they enjoy, or have a right unto, as ſpiritual peace here, and eternal peace hereafter: and things wherewith one may edify another. The church is often compared to a building, to a temple, a city, an houſe, and ſaints are the materials thereof; of; who are capable of being edified, or built up, yet more and more, both by words and by deeds; by words, by the miniſtry of the word, which is ſet up and continued among other things, for the edifying of the body of Chriſt; by praying with, and for each other; and by chriſtian converſation, about the experience of the grace of God, and doctrines of the Goſpel, whereby ſaints may be uſeful in building up one another in their moſt holy faith; and ſo likewiſe by avoiding all filthy, frothy, and corrupt communication; all angry words and wrathful expreſſions, which tend not to profit, and are not for the uſe of edifying, but the contrary: moreover, edification is promoted by deeds, by acts of charity, or love; for charity edifies not by bare words, but by loving in deed and in truth, by ſerving one another in love; for the ſpiritual body of Chriſt his church, makes increaſe unto the edifying of itſelf in love; and alſo by laying aſide the uſe of things indifferent, when diſagreeable to any of the brethren; for though all things may be lawful to be done by us, yet all things do not edify the brethren; and things which make for the edification of the body, as well as our own, are diligently to be ſought after. The Vulgate Latin verſion, and ſome copies read, let us keep, or obſerve thoſe things wherewith one may edify another.

Ver. 20. For meat deſtroy not the work of God, &c.] The Syriac reads it, the works of God; referring either to righteouſneſs, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghoſt, of which the kingdom of God conſiſts; or to the weak brother, who both as a creature, and as a new creature, is the workmanſhip of God; and to the good work of grace, the work of faith upon his ſoul, which is the work of God; or rather to his peace, and the peace of the church of Chriſt, which is both the will and work of God; peace is what he calls his people to, and what he himſelf is the author of; and may be deſtroyed, and ſometimes is, by trifling things; whereas a true believer though ever ſo weak, cannot be deſtroyed, nor the good work of God upon his ſoul be loſt, nor any part of it; not the work of faith, which Chriſt prays for that it fail not, and is both the author and finiſher of; but the work of peace and edification in particular perſons, and in a church, may be deſtroyed, but 'tis pity it ſhould, by ſo ſmall a matter, ſo trivial a thing as meat, or the uſe of any thing that is indifferent: all things indeed are pure. The Ethiopic verſion adds, to the pure; to them that have pure conſciences, ſprinkled by the blood of Chriſt, and have no doubt or ſcruple about eatign things indifferent; but this addition ſeems to be taken out of Titus i. 15. tho' it may ſerve to explain the ſenſe, which is, that all ſorts of food, without any diſtinction, may be eaten; there is nothing common or unclean, every creature in itſelf is good, and every chriſtian may lawfully eat thereof, with moderation and thankfulneſs. This is a conceſſion which ſtands thus corrected and reſtrained, but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence. The Arabic verſion adds, of his neighbour; which is a good interpretation of the paſſage; for the Apoſtle means not with offence to a man's own conſcience, though ſo to eat is an evil too, but with offence to a fellow chriſtian; it is not an evil in itſelf to eat, but when this circumſtance of offending another thereby attends it; it is evil, though not in itſelf, yet in its conſequences; it offends a weak brother, diſpleaſes Chriſt, who would not have one of his little ones offended, and brings a woe upon the perſon by whom the offence comes. The Ethiopic verſion reads, who eats inordinately; which to be ſure is ſinful, but is not the meaning here.

Ver. 21. It is good neither to eat fleſh, &c.] Any ſort of fleſh, even that which is not forbidden in the law, rather than offend a weak brother; and the Apoſtle determines for himſelf, that he would not, where there was any danger of doing this, 1 Cor. viii. 13. Nor to drink wine; not only the wine of libations to heathen deities, but wine in common; which was not prohibited by the law of Moſes, but in the caſe of a Nazarite, and of vows: nor any thing, be it what it will, whereby thy brother ſtumbleth. The Syriac verſion reads, our brother; any one that ſtands in ſuch a ſpiritual relation to any of us; and for which reaſon care ſhould be taken, that no ſtumbling-block or occaſion to fall, ſhould be put in his way; particularly that chriſtian liberty in things indifferent, be not unſeaſonably and imprudently uſed, and ſo become a means of ſtumbling and ſtaggering to weak minds: or is offended; to that degree, as to cenſure and judge him that eats, as an impious perſon, and a tranſgreſſor of the law; with whom he can't keep his communion, but withdraws himſelf from it, and is even tempted to drop his profeſſion of the chriſtian religion entirely, being ready to think it is not right, ſince contrary to the law of Moſes: or is made weak; more weak in the faith than he was before, and his love is weakened and grows very cold and indifferent to his chriſtian brethren, that can take and uſe a liberty which he cannot. Theſe two laſt phraſes are not in the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions, nor in the Alexandrian copy, though in others, and are uſed for the ſake of explanation and amplification.

Ver. 22. Haſt thou faith? have it to thyſelf before God, &c.] Which is to be underſtood, not of faith in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and in the doctrines of the Goſpel; for a man that has ſuch faith given him, ought not to keep it in his own breaſt, but to declare it to others; he ought to make a publick viſible profeſſion of it, before many witneſſes; it becomes him to tell the church of God what great things the Lord has done for him; and as he believes with the heart, ſo he ought to make confeſſion with the mouth unto ſalvation; but this faith only deſigns a full perſuaſion in a man's own mind, about the free and lawful uſe of things indifferent, the ſubject the Apoſtle is upon; ſee ver. 5, 14. and his advice on this head is, to keep this faith and perſuaſion in a man's own breaſt, and not divulge it to others, where there's danger of ſcandal and offence: he does not adviſe ſuch to alter their minds, change their ſentiments, or caſt away their faith, which was right and agreeable to his own, but to have it, hold and keep it, though within themſelves; he would not have them openly declare it, and publickly make uſe of it, ſince it might be grieving and diſtreſſing to weak minds; but in private, and where there was no danger of giving offence, they might both ſpeak of it, and uſe it; and if they could not, ſhould ſatisfy themſelves that God who ſees in ſecret, knows they have this faith, and ſees their uſe of it, though others do not, for from him they have it; ſo the Ethiopic verſion reads it, and if thou haſt faith with thyſelf, thou art ſecure before God, from whom thou haſt obtained it; and ſhould be thankful to him for it, and uſe it in ſuch a manner, as makes moſt for his glory, and the peace of his church, ſince to him they muſt give an account another day: ſome copies and verſions read without an interrogation, thou haſt faith; and others, thou, the faith which thou haſt, have it to thyſelf, &c. ſo the Alexandrian copy and the Syriac verſion. Happy is he that condemneth not himſelf in that thing which he alloweth; or approves of; that is, it is well for that man who obſerves no difference of meats, if either he does not act contrary to his own conſcience, and ſo condemns himſelf in what he allows himſelf in; or expoſes himſelf to the cenſure, judgment, and condemnation of others, in doing that which he approves of as lawful, and is ſo, but unlawful when done to the offence of others: ſome underſtand this as ſpoken to the weak believer, ſignifying that he is in the right, who through example, and the force of the ſenſual appetite, is not prevailed upon to allow himſelf to eat, contrary to his own conſcience, and whereby he would be ſelf-condemned; but as the ſtrong believer is addreſſed in the beginning of the verſe, I chuſe to think he is intended in this part of it; and the rather, becauſe the weak believer is taken notice of in the next verſe, with a peculiar view to this very thing.

Ver. 23. And he that doubteth, &c.] Or makes a difference between meats and meats, or is in ſuſpence whether any difference ſhould be obſerved or no, is damned; not with everlaſting damnation, which is not the conſequent of, nor connected with ſuch an action, as eating of a thing indifferent, with a ſcrupulous conſcience; but ſuch an one is condemned in his own conſcience; he's ſelf-condemned, his conſcience condemns him, for what he himſelf does; and he's ſelf-condemned in judging and cenſuring others, for the ſame things: ſo the Syriac renders it, אתחייב לה, he becomes guilty, or he contracts guilt to himſelf, or is ſelf-condemned; and ſo the Arabic, he is already condemned, becauſe he eateth not of faith; or of a full perſuaſion in his own mind, that he is right in eating; he halts between two opinions, and is doubtful in his own mind what is beſt to do, and therefore whilſt this is his caſe, he ought to refrain: for whatſoever is not of faith is ſin. This is a general rule, or axiom, which is not only applicable to the preſent caſe, but to any other, whether of a natural, civil, moral, or evangelic kind: whatſoever does not ſpring from faith, as the Arabic verſion renders it, cannot be excuſed of ſin; whatever is not agreeable to the word and doctrine of faith, ought not to be done; whatever is done without faith, or not in the exerciſe of it, is culpable, for without faith nothing can be pleaſing to God; and whatever is contrary to the perſuaſion of a man's own mind, is ſo far criminal, as it is a violation of his conſcience; whatever men do, eſpecially in a religious way, they ought to make faith of it, or to be fully perſuaded of it in their own minds, or they act amiſs: in the Arabic verſion, the Complutenſian edition, the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, the three laſt verſes of the xvith chapter, now to him that is of power, &c. are here added; which have induced ſome to think, that the Apoſtle intended to have finiſhed his epiſtle here; but having more time, and other things occurred to write of, he proceeded.

CHAP. XV.

THE Apoſtle in this chapter, purſues his exhortation to mutual affection and forbearance, notwithſtanding their different ſentiments about the uſe of meats, and obſervation of days; excuſes his writing ſo freely to them, which they might bear with, in conſideration of his being an Apoſtle, eſpecially an Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and which office he magnified and fulfilled every where; gives them the reaſons why he had not as yet been with them, though he greatly deſired it, and encourages them to expect a viſit from him; and concludes with earneſtly intreating them, that he might have a ſhare in their prayers: and firſt, as an inference from what he had ſaid in the preceding chapter, he lays it down as a duty incumbent on himſelf, and all that were ſtrong in the doctrine of chriſtian liberty, to bear with the infirmities of weak chriſtians, and not pleaſe themſelves, but others, ver. 1. which he enforces, from the uſefulneſs of it, it being for the good and edification of others, ver. 2. and from the example of Chriſt, who pleaſed not himſelf, ver. 3. and which is proved from a paſſage of ſcripture in Pſal. lxix. 9. the pertinency of which paſſage, and the citation and application of it to Chriſt and the preſent caſe, are vindicated from this conſideration, that whatever was written in former times, was for the uſe of the ſaints under the Goſpel diſpenſation, ver. 4. and that the exhortation might have its effect upon them, he puts up a prayer to God for them, that ſuch a temper of mind might be in them, which would be for the glory of God, ver. 5, 6. and then he repeats his exhortation, ver. 7. that they would affectionately receive one another; which he urges by the example of Chriſt, who had received them to the glory of God; and that they might glorify him, and this was one way of doing it: and that this argument might have the greater weight with both parties, he obſerves, that Jeſus Chriſt had a ſpecial regard to the Jews, and was their miniſter, ſent unto them to fulfil the promiſes made unto their fathers, and had received them; and therefore though they were weak, they were not to be deſpiſed, grieved, and offended, ver. 8. and as for the Gentiles, it was a clear caſe that God had had long ago a deſign of mercy to them; and that they were to be, and were now received by Chriſt, and ſo under obligation to glorify God for his mercy; and therefore not to be judged and condemned, though they did not conform to the ceremonial law; and this he proves in ver. 9, 10, 11, 12. from ſeveral paſſages of ſcripture in Pſal. xviii. 49. Deut. xxxii. 43. Pſal. cxvii. 1. Iſa. xi. 10. and cloſes this argument he had ſo long inſiſted on, with a prayer to God for them, that they might be in the exerciſe of faith and hope; and in the exerciſe of thoſe graces, be filled with joy and peace, ver. 13. and in order to prevent an objection that might be made to theſe prayers and exhortations of his, that they ſuggeſted that they were wicked and ignorant men, devoid of affection, and knew not how to behave to each other, nor to exhort one another, the Apoſtle ſoftens ſuch a reſentment, by calling them brethren, and by expreſſing his perſuaſion of their abundant goodneſs, knowledge, and abilities, ver. 14. and excuſes the freedom he took with them, by obſerving, that he only acted the part of a monitor, ver. 15. and the rather this freedom might be allowed him, on account of the great gifts beſtowed upon him, qualifying him to be an Apoſtle of Chriſt; and eſpecially as he was an Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and ſo their Apoſtle, ver. 16. and on account of his office, gifts, and uſefulneſs, he had reaſon to glory; though through Chriſt only, and in things relating to God, and not himſelf, ver. 17. when he takes an occaſion to enlarge on his miniſtry, and magnify his office; partly from the end and ſucceſs of it, bringing the Gentiles to the obedience of Chriſt, ver. 18. and partly from the means and cauſes of ſuch ſucceſs, the preaching of the word, working miracles, and the power of the Holy Ghoſt; and from the extent of it, reaching from Jeruſalem to Illyricum, ver. 19. and from the difficulty which attended it, he preaching in places where the Goſpel was never preached before, and which he choſe to do, ver. 20. and which was neceſſary to be done, according to a propheſy in Iſa. lii. 15. which he cites, ver. 21. and obſerves, that it was his preaching in theſe many and diſtant parts, that was the reaſon of his not having been with the ſaints at Rome, ver. 22. but now gives them reaſon to expect his coming; partly becauſe he had finiſhed his travels in thoſe countries, and partly becauſe of the vehement deſire he had to ſee them, ver. 23. and beſides, an opportunity ſeemed to be offering, he intending to take a journey to Spain, when it would lie in his way to come to Rome, and be for his advantage, ver. 24. in the mean while he informs them what he was engaged in, to carry the contribution of the Macedonian and Achaian churches to Jeruſalem, for the poor ſaints there, ver. 25. on which contributions he enlarges, ſhewing not only who made them, and for whom, but the ſource and ſpring of them, they aroſe from their good-will and pleaſure, ver. 26. and yet they were debtors, and under obligation to do what they did; it was but a piece of juſtice and equity, ſince thoſe churches had received of the ſpiritual things of the Jews, ver. 27. and as for his coming to them, he acquaints them of the time that it would be, when he had finiſhed the above ſervice and labour of love, and when he ſhould come into Spain, as he had before ſignified, ver. 28. and of the manner in which he ſhould come, of which he was fully perſuaded, as that it would be with the fulneſs of the bleſſing of the Goſpel of Chriſt, ver. 29. and then with great importunity deſires them to pray for him, and that very earneſtly, ver. 30. particularly that he might be delivered from his enemies in Judea, and that the ſaints there would accept of what he brought them from the Gentiles, ver. 31. and that if it was the will of God, he might come to them and be refreſhed with them, ver. 32. and then cloſes the chapter with a ſalutation of them, or a wiſh that the God of peace might be with them, ver. 33.

Ver. 1. We then that are ſtrong, &c.] Meaning not only miniſters of the Goſpel, who are men of ſtrong parts, great abilities, mighty in the ſcriptures, valiant for the truth on earth, and pillars in God's houſe; for though the Apoſtle includes himſelf, yet not merely as ſuch, but as expreſſing it to be his duty in common with other chriſtians; and the rather he does this, to engage them to the practice of it: but the ſtronger and more knowing part of private chriſtians are here intended; the Apoſtle John's young men, who are ſtrong, in diſtinction from little children, or new born babes, that are at preſent weaklings; and from fathers who are on the decline of life, and juſt going off the ſtage; when theſe young men are in the bloom and flower of a profeſſion, in the prime of their judgment, and exerciſe of grace; who are ſtrong in Chriſt, and not in themſelves, in the grace that is in him, out of which they continually receive; who are ſtrong in the grace of faith, and are eſtabliſhed and ſettled in the doctrine of it; and have a large and extenſive knowledge of the ſeveral truths of the Goſpel; and among the reſt, of that of chriſtian liberty: ought to bear the infirmities of the weak; of them that are weak in faith and knowledge, particularly in the knowledge of their freedom from Moſaical obſervances: their infirmities, are partly their ignorance, miſtakes, and errors, about things indifferent; which they conſider and inſiſt on, and would impoſe upon others, as neceſſary and obliging; and partly their peeviſhneſs and moroſeneſs which they ſhew, the hard words they give, and the raſh judgment and rigid cenſures they paſs on their brethren, that differ from them: ſuch perſons and their infirmities are to be born with; they are not to be deſpiſed for their weakneſs; and if in the church, are not to be excluded for their miſtakes; and if not members, are not to be refuſed on account of them; ſince they ariſe from weakneſs, and are not ſubverſive of the fundamental doctrines of the Goſpel: they are not to be treated as wicked men, but as weak brethren; and their peeviſh tempers, moroſe diſpoſitions and conduct, their hard ſpeeches and cenſorious expreſſions, are patiently to be endured; they ſhould be conſidered as from whence they ariſe, not from malice and ill-will, from a malignant ſpirit, but from weakneſs and miſguided zeal, for what they take to be in force, when it is aboliſhed: moreover, they are to be complied with in caſes not ſinful, as the Apoſtle did in circumciſing Timothy, and purifying himſelf according to the law; and ſo to the weak he became weak, to gain ſome, and therefore could urge this exhortation by his own example with greater force; and which he repreſents, not only as what would be honourable, and a point of good nature, and as doing a kind action, but as what ought to be; what the law of love obliges to, and what the grace of love, which bears all things, conſtrains unto; and which indeed if not done, they that are ſtrong do not anſwer one end of their having that ſpiritual ſtrength they have; and it is but complying with the golden rule of Chriſt, to do as we would be done by: and not pleaſe ourſelves; either entertain pleaſing thoughts of, and make pleaſing reflections on their ſtronger faith, greater degree of knowledge, ſuperior light and underſtanding; which being indulged, are apt to excite and incourage ſpiritual pride and vanity, and generally iſſue in the contempt of weaker brethren; nor do thoſe things, which are pleaſing and grateful to themſelves, to the offence and detriment of others; for inſtance, and which is what the Apoſtle has reference to, to gratify their appetite, by eating ſuch meat as is forbidden by the law of Moſes, to the grieving of the weak brethren, wounding their conſciences, and deſtroying their peace; theſe things ſhould not be done; ſtronger chriſtians ſhould deny themſelves the uſe of their chriſtian liberty in things indifferent, when they can't make uſe of it without offence.

Ver. 2. Let every one of us pleaſe his neighbour, &c.] Every man, particularly his chriſtian friend and brother, whom he ſhould ſeek to pleaſe in all things, and by all means lawful; he ſhould carry it affably and courteouſly, ſhould make himſelf agreeable to him; ſhould condeſcend and accommodate himſelf to his weakneſs, and bear his infirmities, and deny himſelf rather than diſpleaſe him. The Vulgate Latin verſion and ſome copies read, let every one of you; but the other reading is preferable, and beſt agrees with the context, ver. 1, 4. For his good; or as the Syriac renders it, בטבתא, in good things; for he is not to be pleaſed, gratified, and indulged, in any thing that is evil: we are not to pleaſe any man in any thing, that is contrary to the Goſpel of Chriſt, for then we ſhould not be faithful ſervants of his; nor in any thing repugnant to the commands of God, and ordinances of Chriſt, who are to be obeyed and pleaſed, rather than men; nor in any thing that is of an immoral nature, we are not to comply with, though it may be to the diſpleaſure of the deareſt relation and friend; but in every thing that is naturally, civilly, morally, or evangelically good, we ſhould ſtudy to pleaſe them; and in whatſoever may be for their good, temporal, ſpiritual, or eternal: and to edification; of our neighbour, brother, and chriſtian friend, for the eſtabliſhment of his peace, the increaſe of his ſpiritual light, and the building of him up in his moſt holy faith; and alſo of the whole community, or church, to which each belong, whoſe peace and edification ſhould be conſulted, and every thing done, which may promote and ſecure it; and among which, this is one, every man to pleaſe his neighbour, in things lawful and laudable.

Ver. 3. For even Chriſt pleaſed not himſelf, &c.] He ſought not his own eaſe, pleaſure, profit, honour, and glory, but to do his Father's will and work; and he always did the things which pleaſed him, in his obedience, ſufferings, and death; and ſought not his own, but his glory: moreover, what he did and ſuffered were not for himſelf, but for us; he became incarnate for us; he obeyed, ſuffered, and died for us; he came not to be miniſtered to, to be attended upon as an earthly prince, enjoying his own eaſe and pleaſure, things grateful to nature, but to miniſter to others; hence he appeared in the form of a ſervant, did the work of one in life, and at laſt became obedient to death, even the death of the croſs: not but that he was well pleaſed in doing and ſuffering all this; it was his delight to do the will of God; it was his meat and drink to finiſh his work; yea, that part of it which was moſt diſagreeable to fleſh and blood, was moſt earneſtly deſired by him, even the baptiſm of his ſufferings; and in the view of the ſalvation of his people, and of enjoying their company with him to all eternity, he endured the croſs patiently, and deſpiſed the ſhame with pleaſure: but then he met with many things which were far from being grateful to human nature; ſuch as the hardneſs and unbelief of the Jews, with which he was grieved, their ſcoffs and inſults, reproaches and jeers; the ignorance, frowardneſs, and moroſeneſs of his own diſciples, whoſe infirmities he bore; and at laſt the ſufferings of death, that bitter cup, which he as man deſired might paſs from him; but however he ſubmitted to his Father's will; all which prove what the Apoſtle here affirms. This inſtance of Chriſt, the man of God's right-hand, the Son of man, whom he has made ſtrong for himſelf, the head of the church, the leader and commander of the people, bearing the infirmities of the weak, and not pleaſing himſelf, is very pertinently produced, to enforce the above exhortations; who is an example to his people in the exerciſe of every grace, and the diſcharge of every duty; as in beneficence, forgiving of injuries, mutual love, meekneſs and humility, ſuffering of afflictions, and patience. The proof of it follows, but as it is written, in Pſal. lxix. 9. the reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me; which are the words of Chriſt unto his Father, as the whole pſalm is to be underſtood not of David, but of the Meſſiah, as is clear from the citations out of it, and references to it in the New Teſtament; ſee John ii. 17. and xv. 25. and xix. 28. compared with Pſal. lxix. 9, 4, 21. and the meaning of them is, either that the reproaches which were caſt on the houſe, worſhip, and ordinances of God, affected Chriſt as much as if they had been caſt upon himſelf; which ſtirred up his zeal to take the method he did, to ſhew his reſentment at ſuch indignities; ſee John ii. 15, 16, 17. or that the ſame perſons by whom the name of God was blaſphemed, his ſanctuary polluted, and his ordinances reproached, alſo reproached him; and he bore in his boſom the reproach of all the mighty people, which were in great plenty poured upon him; they reproached him with being a glutton, a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and ſinners; they ſaid he was a Samaritan, and had a devil; charged him with blaſphemy and ſedition; and when on the croſs, mocked, reviled, and wagged their heads at him; all which he bore patiently, and reviled not again: moreover, by reproaches may be meant, the ſins of his people, by which the name of God was blaſphemed, his law trampled upon with contempt, and the perfections of his nature, as his juſtice and holineſs, diſhonoured; and which fell upon Chriſt, not by chance, but by the appointment of God, and according to his own voluntary agreement; and which he bore in his own body, and made ſatisfaction for; which though he did willingly, in order to obtain ſome valuable ends, the ſalvation of his people, and the glorifying of the divine perfections, the honouring of the law, and ſatisfying of juſtice, yet the bearing of them in itſelf, could not be grateful to him as ſuch; neither the charge of ſin, nor the weight of puniſhment; and in this reſpect he pleaſed not himſelf, or did that which was grateful to his pure and holy nature.

Ver. 4. For whatſoever things were written afore time, &c.] In the books of the Old Teſtament; the Apoſtle ſays this, to vindicate the pertinency of the above citation, and to prevent any objection that might be made againſt it; ſince whatſoever was written in that pſalm, did not belong perſonally to David, but to Chriſt; and what is written concerning him, is deſigned for the uſe and inſtruction of his people: yea, whatever is written any where in the ſacred ſcriptures, were written for our learning; to inſtruct in the knowledge of Chriſt, of his perſon, offices, grace, righteouſneſs, obedience, ſufferings, death, reſurrection, and aſcenſion; and of the great ſalvation and redemption he came to obtain, and has obtained; and to teach us the doctrines of grace, of pardon through the blood of Chriſt, atonement by his ſacrifice, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, acceptance in his perſon, and eternal life through him; as alſo to inform us of our duty, and how we ought to behave both towards God and men: that we through patience and comfort of the ſcriptures, might have hope; the ſcriptures are not only written for our preſent inſtruction, but for the ingenerating, encouraging, and eſtabliſhing, an hope of eternal life in another world; which they are the means of, under the influence of divine grace; ſince they give us a clear account of eternal life; of the promiſe of it in Chriſt; of its being procured by him, and ſecured in him; of the means of enjoying it, through his blood and righteouſneſs; of the declarations of God's free grace and mercy to ſinners, and of the various inſtances of perſons who have been made partakers of it; all which encourage to hope in the Lord, and to rejoice in hope of the glory of God; believing we alſo may have and enjoy the thing hoped for, through patience and comfort of the ſcriptures; both which are encouraged thereby: the patience of the ſcriptures, is not a ſtoical apathy, a ſtupid indolence; and is of a different kind from that patience, the writings of the heathen philoſophers define fine and recommend: the ſcripture gives an account of the true nature of patience, in bearing all ſorts of evils for Chriſt's ſake; of the excellency and uſefulneſs of it; and do ſtrongly exhort unto it upon the beſt principles, and with the beſt motives; and are full of promiſes to the exerciſe of it, and furniſh out the beſt examples of ſuffering affliction, and patience: the comfort of the ſcriptures is ſuch as is not to be met with elſewhere. Theſe writings abound with exceeding great and precious promiſes, and excellent doctrines, big with conſolation to the ſaints; and both ſerve much to cheriſh, ſupport, and maintain an hope of eternal happineſs; all which prove the divine authority, excellency, and uſefulneſs of the ſacred writings, and recommend the reading of them by us, and the hearing of them explained by others.

Ver. 5. Now the God of patience and conſolation, &c.] Theſe titles and characters of God are manifeſtly uſed on account of what is before ſaid concerning the ſcriptures, and to ſhew, that the efficacy and uſefulneſs of them, in producing and promoting patience and comfort, entirely depend upon God the author of them: from exhorting, the Apoſtle proceeds to petitioning; well knowing that all his exhortations would be of no avail without the power of divine grace accompanying them. The words are a prayer. The object addreſſed is deſcribed as the God of patience, becauſe he is the author and giver of that grace: it is a fruit of his Spirit, produced by the means of his word, called the word of his patience. The Heathens themſelves were ſo ſenſible that this is a divine bleſſing, that they call patience, θεων ευρημα, the invention of the gods [w]. God is the great pattern and exemplar of patience; he is patient himſelf, and bears much and long with the children of men; with wicked men, whoſe patient forbearance and long-ſuffering being deſpiſed by them, will be an aggravation of their damnation; but his long-ſuffering towards his elect iſſues in their ſalvation: he waits to be gracious to them before converſion, and after it bears with their infirmities, heals their backſlidings, forgives their iniquities, patiently hears their cries, requeſts, and complaints, relieves and ſupports them, and carries them even to hoary hairs; and is in all a pattern to be imitated by his people. He is alſo the object of this grace; he it is on whom, and for whom ſaints ſhould and do patiently wait, until he is pleaſed to manifeſt himſelf, and communicate to them for the ſupply of their wants of every ſort; and upon whoſe account, and for whoſe ſake, they patiently ſuffer reproach and perſecution; the exerciſe of patience is what he requires, and calls for, and is very grateful and well-pleaſing to him; to all which add, that he it is who ſtrengthens to the exerciſe of it, and increaſes it; and which he does ſometimes by tribulation; faith and other graces being thereby tried, produce patience; and which at length, thro' divine grace, has its perfect work. Moreover, the object of prayer is deſcribed, as the God of conſolation; all true, real, ſolid comfort ſprings from him, which he communicates by his ſon, the conſolation of Iſrael; by his ſpirit, the comforter; by his word, the doctrines and promiſes of which afford ſtrong conſolation to the heirs of promiſe, ſenſible ſinners and afflicted ſouls; by the ordinances of the Goſpel, which are breaſts of conſolation; and by the faithful miniſters of Chriſt, who are Barnabaſes, ſons of conſolation. The petition follows, grant you to be like minded one towards another; which does not reſpect ſameneſs of judgment in the doctrines of faith; tho' this is very neceſſary to an honourable and comfortable walking together in church-fellowſhip; much leſs an agreement in things indifferent: the Apoſtle's meaning is not, that they ſhould all abſtain from meats forbidden by the law of Moſes, or that they ſhould all eat every ſort of food without diſtinction; nor that they ſhould all obſerve any Jewiſh day, or that they ſhould all obſerve none; rather, that every one ſhould enjoy his own ſentiment, and practiſe as he believed: but this requeſt regards a likeneſs of affection, the ſameneſs of mutual love, that they be of one heart, and one ſoul; that notwithſtanding their different ſentiments about things of a ceremonious kind, yet that they ſhould love one another, and ceaſe either to deſpiſe or judge each other; but think as well and as highly of them, that differ from them, as of themſelves, and of thoſe of their own ſentiments, without preferring in affection one to another; but ſtudying and deviſing to promote and maintain, as the Syriac here reads it, שויותא, an equality among them; ſhewing the ſame equal affection and reſpect to one as to the other, and to one another; the Jew to the Gentile, and the Gentile to the Jew; the ſtrong to the weak, and the weak to the ſtrong. This is what is greatly deſirable. It is grateful to God; it is earneſtly wiſhed for by the miniſters of the Goſpel; and is pleaſant and delightful to all good men; but it is God alone that can give and continue ſuch a ſpirit: this the Apoſtle knew, and therefore prays that he would grant it; and for which requeſt there is a foundation for faith and hope concerning it; ſince God has promiſed he'll give his people one heart, and one way, as to fear him, ſo to love one another. The rule or pattern according to which this is deſired, is next expreſſed, according to Chriſt Jeſus; according to the doctrine of Chriſt, which teaches, directs, and engages, as to ſameneſs of judgment and practice, ſo to mutual love and affection; and according to the new commandment of Chriſt, which obliges to love one another; and according to the example of Chriſt, who is the great pattern of patience and forbearance, of meekneſs and humility, of condeſcenſion and goodneſs, and of equal love and affection to all his members.

Ver. 6. That ye may with one mind and one mouth, &c.] This is the end for which the above requeſt is made, and ſhews, that a cordial and ſincere affection for one another, is neceſſary to the worſhipping of God with one conſent, to a joining together in acts of religious ſervice, both in praying to God, and in praiſing of him, which latter ſeems here chiefly deſigned; for how ſhould there be an agreement of heart and voice, of mind and mouth, in praiſing God, unleſs there is a ſingleneſs of heart, and oneneſs of affection? This is neceſſary in order to glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. The Syriac and Arabic verſions read, God the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; leaving out the copulative, which we tranſlate even, but may as well be rendered and; and be read, as by ſome, the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. God is the God of Chriſt, as Chriſt is man; who prepared the human nature for him, anointed it with the holy Spirit, ſupported it in life, in ſufferings and death, and glorified it at his own right hand; and in which nature Chriſt exerciſed every grace on him, as faith, hope, and love; diſcharged every duty to him, worſhipped him, prayed unto him, and was in all things obedient to his will: and God is the Father of Chriſt, as Chriſt is God; for as man he had no Father. Now he is glorified when the perfections of his nature are aſcribed unto him; when notice is taken of the works of his hands, and the glory of his majeſty, which appears in them; when praiſe is offered up, and thanks given for all mercies, temporal and ſpiritual, he beſtows on his people; when they join together in the ſolemn worſhip of him, preſenting their bodies, and giving up their hearts unto him; when they unite in praying to him, and ſinging his praiſe; and when their lives and converſations are agreeable to their profeſſion of him.

[w] Archilochus apud Philoſtrat. Vit. Apollon. l. 7. c. 12.

Ver. 7. Wherefore receive ye one another, &c.] Into your hearts and affections; embrace one another cordially, the Jew the Gentile, the Gentile the Jew, the ſtrong brother the weak, the weak the ſtrong: as Chriſt alſo received us. The Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions read, you. Both Jews and Gentiles, as appears from the following verſes. Chriſt received all the choſen ones into his heart's love and affection from eternity; he received them in the council of peace, and when the covenant of grace was made at his Father's hands, in the moſt tender manner, in order to take the care of them, preſerve and ſave them; he aſſumed their nature, took upon him their ſins, and ſuſtained their perſons in time, when he became incarnate, and ſuffered and died for them; and he receives them in effectual vocation on their coming to him, which he encourages by aſſuring them, that he will in no wiſe caſt them out; ſo far is he from it, that he embraces them with open arms, and in the moſt affectionate manner receives them, though ſinners, and eats with them; and notwithſtanding all their unworthineſs, ſins, and tranſgreſſions: to the glory of God; that is, either in order to bring them to the enjoyment of eternal life and happineſs; which is ſometimes ſo called, becauſe of the glory that ſhall be beheld by the ſaints, be revealed in them, and put upon them, both in ſoul and body; and which is all of God's preparing and beſtowing, and will lie in the viſion and enjoyment of him: for this they were choſen in Chriſt, given to him, and received by him before the world began; and that they might enjoy it, Chriſt came into this world, took on him their perſons, and died in their ſtead; and to this they are called by his grace with an holy calling; and when he has guided them with his counſel through this world, he'll receive them to this glory: or elſe by the glory of God is meant the glorifying of God, the perfections of God, as his wiſdom, power, faithfulneſs, truth, juſtice, holineſs, love, grace, and mercy, and the like; which is done by Chriſt's becoming the ſurety and mediator of the new covenant, by his aſſumption of human nature, by his obedience, ſufferings, and death, and by obtaining redemption for his people: and the force of the Apoſtle's exhortation and argument is, that as Chriſt has received his people both in eternity and time, in ſo tender a manner, though unworthy, whereby he has glorified God, which was the principal end in view, and next to that the glorifying of them; ſo it becomes them to be like minded to one another, and affectionately receive and embrace each other, that ſo they may join together in glorifying the God and Father of Chriſt alſo.

Ver. 8. Now I ſay, &c.] Or affirm that Chriſt has received both Jews and Gentiles: that he has received the Jews, and therefore they are not to be deſpiſed, tho' they are weak, appears from hence, that Jeſus Chriſt was a miniſter of the circumciſion; he is rightly called a miniſter, for this was the end of his coming into the world, and the whole of his work in it was not to be miniſtred unto, but to miniſter to others, both in life and at death. This character agrees with him in all his offices; as king he miniſters judgment to the people; and as prieſt he is the miniſter of the true tabernacle of the human nature, in which he offered himſelf a ſacrifice for the ſins of his people, and now in it makes interceſſion for them; but here it is expreſſive of his prophetic office, in which he is ſuch a miniſter as never was before, or ſince, or ever will be; if we conſider the dignity of his perſon, being the Son of God; the greatneſs of his qualifications, having the Spirit without meaſure; the nature of his doctrines, which were amazing words of grace and truth; and the manner of his delivery, which was with authority; and that all other miniſters receive their miſſion, qualifications, doctrine and ſucceſs from him: he is ſtiled a miniſter of the circumciſion, not literally conſidered, as if he adminiſtred circumciſion to any, which he did not; he was indeed ſubject to it as a ſon of Abraham, as a Jew by birth, as under the law, and in order to fulfil all righteouſneſs, and to ſhew that he was truly man, and that he had regard to the people and ordinances of the Old Teſtament, as he ſhewed by baptiſm, he had to thoſe of the New, and to ſignify our cleanſing and atonement by his blood; but circumciſion is either to be underſtood in a ſpiritual ſenſe of circumciſion in the Spirit, and not in the fleſh, with which the true circumciſion, or believers in Chriſt, are circumciſed in him, thro' his circumciſion; or rather the word here is to be taken metonymically, for the circumciſed Jews, as it often is in this epiſtle; ſee chap. ii. 26. and iii. 30. and iv. 9. So that the meaning is, that Chriſt was their miniſter and preacher, juſt as Peter is ſaid to have the apoſtleſhip of the circumciſion, or to be the Apoſtle of the Jews; as Paul was of the Gentiles, and to have the Goſpel of the circumciſion committed to him, it being his province to preach it to them, Gal. ii. 7, 8. Chriſt as a miniſter or preacher in the perſonal diſcharge of his prophetic office, was ſent only to the Jews; among them he lived, and to them he only preached; nor did he allow his Apoſtles to preach to any other till after his reſurrection; and which is a manifeſt proof that he received the Jews, and took them under his care, and ſhewed a particular regard unto them: the ends of his being a miniſter to them were, for the truth of God; to preach the Goſpel of ſalvation, the word of truth unto them, for which he was promiſed and ſent; and in doing of which he declared the righteouſneſs, faithfulneſs, loving kindneſs, and truth of God unto them: and to confirm the promiſes made unto the fathers; the fathers of the world, Adam, Noah, &c. or rather the Jewiſh fathers, Abraham, Iſaac, Jacob, Moſes, David, and others; concerning the Meſſiah's being the ſeed of the woman, and of Abraham, and of David; concerning the coming of Shilo, the raiſing up of the great prophet among the Jews, &c. all which promiſes are yea and amen in Chriſt, ratified and fulfilled in him.

Ver. 9. And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy, &c.] In chuſing them in Chriſt as veſſels of mercy, and in redeeming them by Chriſt as well as the Jews, and in regenerating and calling them by his abundant grace; and which as they clearly ſhew that Chriſt has received them, and therefore are not to be cenſured and judged as irreligious perſons, becauſe of the uſe of their chriſtian liberty; ſo theſe things lay them under obligations to glorify God, to ſhew forth his praiſe both by lip and life, ſince what they enjoy is not by promiſe, as the Jews, but of mere mercy; not but that promiſes ariſe from grace and mercy, tho' the accompliſhment of them is owing to truth and faithfulneſs; but the Gentiles had no promiſes made to them, and yet obtained mercy, tho' there were many promiſes made concerning them, and many oracles and predictions in favour of them, ſtood on divine record; ſome of which the Apoſtle here produces to prove what he had aſſerted, that Chriſt had received them, and they were bound to glorify God on that account: as it is written, in Pſal. xviii. 49. for this cauſe I will confeſs to thee among the Gentiles, and ſing unto thy name; which words are not ſpoken unto God by David literally conſidered, but as perſonating the Meſſiah; for David when he penn'd this Pſalm was in the decline of life; the next account after this is of his laſt dying words, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. nor could he hope to praiſe God among the Gentiles, nor did he in perſon, but in his Son the Meſſiah. Theſe words are the words of Chriſt unto his Father, who in the title of the Pſalm is called the ſervant of God, he being the mediator eminently; he is repreſented as encompaſſed with the ſorrows and ſnares of death and the grave, which agree with Jeſus when in the Garden, and on the croſs. God is all along in it ſpoken as his helper and deliverer, as he was to Chriſt in his human nature, having promiſed to be ſo, and on which he depended; and the perſon, the ſubject of the Pſalm, is a victorious perſon, one that has got the conqueſt over all enemies, which is in the fulleſt ſenſe true of the Meſſiah, who has overcome the world, made an end of ſin, deſtroyed ſatan, ſpoiled principalities and powers, and aboliſhed death; and particularly is ſaid to be the head of the heathen, and they to be voluntary ſubjects to him, ver. 43, 44. which is expreſſed in much the ſame language as the like things are in Iſ. lv. 4, 5. which is ſo manifeſt a prophecy of the Meſſiah; add to all which, that the Lord's anointed, the King Meſſiah, and who is called David, is expreſly mentioned in the words following theſe that are cited, and which are applied by the Jews [x] themſelves to the Meſſiah; as is the 32ᵈ verſe of this Pſalm paraphraſed of him, by the Targumiſt upon it: what is here ſaid by the Meſſiah to God, is that he would confeſs to him among the Gentiles; which is to be underſtood not of confeſſion of ſin, or of a confeſſion of faith in him; but of praiſe and thankſgiving, a celebration of his perfections, particularly his grace, mercy, and goodneſs; aſcribing honour and glory to him, either for the converſion of the Gentiles, as he did in the believing Jews, Acts xi. 18. or by the mouth of the Gentiles, for what God had done in bringing the Goſpel to them, Acts xiii. 48. or among them, by his Apoſtles and miniſters of the Goſpel being made very ſucceſsful among them, and made to triumph in Chriſt, whilſt they diffuſed the ſavour of his knowledge in every place. The word Lord is omitted in this citation, tho' it appears in the Vulgate Latin and Arabic verſions, and in the Complutenſian edition, and two of Stephens's copies: and ſing unto thy name; Pſalms, hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs to the glory of his grace, as in all the churches of the Gentiles, to which they are directed by the Spirit of Chriſt, Epheſ. v. 19. Col. iii. 16.

Ver. 10. And again he ſaith, &c.] God or Chriſt, in Deut. xxxii. 43. rejoice ye Gentiles with his people; which from the Hebrew text are by ſome rendered, rejoice his people O ye Gentiles; to which agree the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, who render it, praiſe O ye nations his people; or as ſome copies of the former, the judgment of his people; and the latter adds, the houſe of Iſrael. The note of R. Sol. Jarchi on the text is, "at that time the "nations ſhall praiſe Iſrael; ſee what is the praiſe "of this people that cleave unto the Lord, &c." But the deſign of this ſong is to praiſe God, and not the people of Iſrael; who in it are ſeverely reproved for their many iniquities, and eſpecially their very great ingratitude to God, and are threatned with the heavieſt judgments. This is ſeen by other Jewiſh writers, who interpret the words accordingly, as R. Aben Ezra does, whoſe note is, "then ſhall they praiſe him, when God ſhall avenge "their blood;" and to this ſenſe is the Jeruſalem Targum, "praiſe before him O ye people, praiſe "him O his people of the houſe of Iſrael;" but the words may be better tranſlated, either thus, rejoice O ye nations, his people; that is, ye Gentiles who are his people, whom God has taken into his covenant, and whom he will declare as ſuch in his own time, which time was now come, and therefore had reaſon to rejoice; ſee 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10. or thus, rejoice ye Gentiles, and his people; let both Jews and Gentiles rejoice; let them rejoice together when they come to be fellow-heirs, and of the ſame body, and partakers of the ſame promiſes and priviledges; when they ſhall be together in one fold, under one ſhepherd; and eſpecially when the fulneſs of each of them is brought in, and God has avenged himſelf of his and their enemies; and which agrees with the Apoſtle's ſenſe, and whoſe verſion is ſupported by the Septuagint interpreters; and his ſupplement is to be juſtified, there only wanting a copulative in the Hebrew text, which is often the caſe in that language, and which may eaſily be ſupplied by and or with; as it is with the latter by the Apoſtle, in perfect agreement with the ſenſe of the words.

Ver. 11. And again, &c.] It is written in Pſ. cxvii. 1. praiſe the Lord all ye Gentiles, and laud him all ye people; that is, praiſe him both Jews and Gentiles, for his merciful kindneſs and truth, as in ver. 2. the Gentiles for his mercy in chuſing, redeeming, and calling them, as before; and the Jews for his truth and faithfulneſs in the fulfilment of his promiſes. R. David Kimchi on this pſalm obſerves, that "it conſiſts of two verſes only, and that it "belongs, לימות המשיח, to the days of the Meſſiah; and intimates, by the compoſition of it in "two verſes only, that all people ſhall be divided "into two parts, or be on two ſides, Iſrael ſhall "be in their law, and all the nations in the ſeven "precepts," i. e. of Noah.

Ver. 12. And again Eſaias ſaith, &c.] In ch. xi. 10. there ſhall be a root of Jeſſe. This prophecy is applied to the Meſſiah by the Jews [y], who ſay, "that when the king Meſſiah is revealed, there "ſhall be gathered to him all the nations of the "world, ſo that that ſcripture ſhall be fulfilled which "is written, there ſhall be a root of Jeſſe, &c." This character, the root of Jeſſe, may be underſtood of Chriſt with reſpect to his divine nature, who, as God, was before Jeſſe, and the author of his being, as of all creatures; juſt in ſuch ſenſe as he is called the root and offſpring of David, Rev. v. 5. and xxii. 16. the root of David, as he is God, and the offſpring of David, as he is man; unleſs both are to be interpreted of his human nature, as the phraſe here alſo may be, and denote his deſcent from Jeſſe as man; and ſo the Jewiſh writers interpret it as well as ſome Chriſtian ones. This is R. David Kimchi's comment; "and there ſhall be a root of Jeſſe; the meaning is, היוצא משרש ישי, which goes out from the root of Jeſſe, according to ver. 1. for Jeſſe is the root. And ſo the Targum of Jonathan, בר בריה דישי, the ſons ſon of Jeſſe;" that is, David's ſon, the king Meſſiah, who ſprung from Jeſſe's family, when that family was very low and mean, like to a tree cut down to its roots, and to a root in a dry ground, out of which ſprung the man the branch, David's Son and Lord. This character may be applied to Chriſt as mediator, who as a root is unſeen and unknown to carnal men, and mean, abject, and of no account in the eyes of the world; the root that not only bears Jeſſe, David, and other good men, but all the branches of God's elect; from whom they have their beings, both in a natural and ſpiritual ſenſe; which communicates life and nouriſhment to them; in whom their life is hid, and is ſafe when ſcarcely to be diſcerned in them; and from whom they have all their fruitfulneſs, and to whom is owing their perſeverance in faith and holineſs. And he that ſhall riſe to reign over the Gentiles; or, as the Syriac verſion, and he that ſhall riſe ſhall be a prince unto the Gentiles; or, as the Arabic, and he that ſhall riſe out of it, the root, ſhall rule over the Gentiles. In the Hebrew text in Iſaiah, this is ſaid of the root, and to be read thus, which ſhall ſtand for an enſign of the people; becauſe mention is made of a root, the Apoſtle expreſſes the ſtanding of it by riſing out of it, which ſignifies both the incarnation and exaltation of Chriſt; and becauſe an enſign is a token of power and government, therefore he has rendered it to reign, agreeable enough to the ſenſe; ſince upon Chriſt's exaltation, and ſetting up his enſign or ſtandard, the Goſpel, in the Gentile world, multitudes became voluntary ſubjects to him, and ſtill do; over whom he rules by his grace and Spirit, and will more largely and manifeſtly in the latter day, when the kingdoms of this world ſhall be his. In like manner R. Aben Ezra explains the words of the Meſſiah. "Says he, this may be underſtood, for all the whole world ſhall be, תחת רשותו, under his power, or government." And ſo the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes them, and kingdoms ſhall obey him; ſo that the Jew can have no reaſon to complain of the Apoſtle's verſion. In him ſhall the Gentiles truſt, or hope; this in the Hebrew text is, to him ſhall the Gentiles ſeek; which can't be truly done without faith and hope; ſee Heb. xi. 6. for the hope and faith of enjoying what is ſought for, put perſons upon ſeeking: ſo that the Apoſtle here gives us the true ſenſe of the words, and moſt fully deſcribes the affection of the Gentiles to Chriſt; who having ſome knowledge of him, ſeek unto him for life and ſalvation, proſtrate themſelves at his feet, venture upon him, commit themſelves to him, and hope and truſt in him. This part of the prophecy is by the Jews underſtood of the Meſſiah. "All the Gentiles, ſays R. David Kimchi on the text, ſhall ſeek, אל המשיח, to the Meſſiah, and ſhall go after him to do what he commands; all of them ſhall obey him." But why no mention made of the Iſraelites ſeeking to the Meſſiah? hear what they ſay, and which ſtill confirms the ſenſe of theſe words *. "The Iſraelites will have no need of the doctrine of the king Meſſiah in future time, as it is ſaid, to him ſhall the Gentiles ſeek, and not the Iſraelites." True enough! The Apoſtle dwells on the proof of this point, it not being ſo eaſy of belief with the Jews, but makes it clear from the law, pſalms, and prophets, which is the threefold diviſion of the writings of the Old Teſtament; ſee Luke xxiv. 44.

[y] Zohar in Exod. fol. 71. 1. Vid. R.

Ver. 13. Now the God of hope, &c.] This character is taken from the latter part of the preceding citation, and is occaſioned by it, in him ſhall the Gentiles truſt, or hope; and is proper to God as he is the author and giver of this grace; for naturally men are without it; that which is a good hope is the gift of God, and thro' his grace, and is wrought in the heart in regeneration; for to this are the children of God begotten again. Moreover, God is the object of it; not wealth and riches, nor works of righteouſneſs, but Jehovah, Father, Son, and Spirit, particularly Chriſt is called the believer's hope; that is, the object of it, in whom the Gentiles hope and truſt. Likewiſe, 'tis God that encourages to the exerciſe of it by the proclamations of his grace, and mercy, and plenteous redemption; by the diſcoveries of his love, and views of intereſt in him; and by bringing to mind the paſt experiences of his goodneſs: he preſerves and maintains this grace uſeful and lively, firm and ſtedfaſt, at leaſt in being, which ſometimes ſeems almoſt periſhed and gone; he increaſes it, and cauſes his people to abound in the exerciſe of it, and continues it even unto death. The Ethiopic verſion reads, the God of our promiſes, which are what hope has reſpect unto, and builds upon: fill you with all joy and peace in believing. This is a petition to the God of hope. The Apoſtle has recourſe again to prayer, knowing that all his exhortations would be uſeleſs, without the grace of God accompanying them: and it is obſervable, that he prays for the ſame things mentioned in the above propheſies and promiſes, as joy, peace, and hope; for tho' God has promiſed ever ſo great things concerning his people, he will be enquired of by them to do them for them. One part of this petition is, that God would fill them with all joy; not with every kind of joy; not with worldly joy, or with the joy of hypocrites, who rejoice in ſin, or in their own boaſtings, which is evil; but with ſpiritual joy, joy in God as a covenant God and father; in Chriſt, in his perſon, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation; and in the Holy Ghoſt, the author of it, whoſe fruit it is; and in the Goſpel, doctrines, bleſſings, and promiſes of it; and in the view and hope of the heavenly glory, amidſt various afflictions and tribulations: and it deſigns an abundance of it, even a fulneſs thereof; though the petition implies, that as yet it is not full; it is frequently interrupted and broke in upon by the corruption of nature, and falls into ſin, by the temptations of ſatan, thro' divine deſertions, and various trials and exerciſes; yet it ſuppoſes it may be increaſed, as by the renewed diſcoveries of the love of God, of intereſt in Chriſt, and thro' the gracious influences of the Spirit; and even made full and compleat, though not in this, yet in the other world. another branch of the petition is, that God would fill with peace, with a ſenſe of their peace with him, made by the blood of Chriſt; with a conſcience-peace in their own breaſts, ariſing from a view of their juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and from the ſprinklings of his blood upon them; and alſo with peace one among another, which was much wanting, and the Apoſtle was very deſirous of: and all this he aſks, that it might come to them in believing; in the way of faith, and the exerciſe of that grace; for joy comes this way; faith and joy go together; where one is, the other is alſo; and as the one increaſes, ſo does the other; a believing view of intereſt in Chriſt is attended with joy unſpeakable, and full of glory: and ſo peace comes in at the door of faith; there's no true peace till a ſoul is brought to believe in Chriſt; and that is promoted and increaſed by repeated acts of faith on Chriſt, or by a conſtant living by faith on him; ſee Iſ. xxvi. 3. The end for which this petition is made is, that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghoſt. By hope is meant that grace which God is the author, object, and promoter of; and the Syriac verſion reads it, בסברה, in his hope, or the hope of him; of enjoying him, of meeting with him, and having communion with him in his houſe and ordinances; of having freſh ſupplies of grace from him, and of being favoured with all the bleſſings of grace laid up in an everlaſting covenant, and at laſt with eternal life and glory: to abound herein, is to be in the free and frequent exerciſe of this grace, being incouraged by the grace of God, and an enlarged experience of it, and ſupported by faith, the ſubſtance of things hoped for: and this through the power of the Holy Ghoſt; not by might or power of man, but by that ſame divine power which firſt began the good work, and muſt fulfil it; which at firſt implanted the grace of hope, and muſt perform the work of that, as of faith. The ſame power is requiſite to cauſe grace to abound, or ſaints to abound in the exerciſe of it, as was to the firſt production of it. The Vulgate Latin reads, that ye may abound in hope, and in the power of the Holy Ghoſt; but there is no copulative in the Greek text.

Ver. 14. And I myſelf alſo am perſuaded of you, &c.] This is ſaid by way of prevention to an objection that might be made to the Apoſtle's prayers and exhortations by the Romans. What does the Apoſtle mean by all this? what does he think of us, or take us to be? men that live in malice to one another, devoid of all humanity, and mutual reſpect? a parcel of fools and ignorant men, that know nothing of divine things? and though there may be ſome that are much to be blamed for their conduct and carriage to their fellow-chriſtians, what, are there none among us fit to give advice and admonition? To which the Apoſtle replies, that he was far from entertaining ſuch thoughts of them; that tho' he had not ſeen them in perſon, yet he had had ſuch an account of their faith and practice, which were famous throughout the world, that he was thoroughly perſuaded of better things of them, though he thus ſpake; and therefore to mollify them, and abate their reſentment, he adds, my brethren; teſtifying his affection to them, owning the ſpiritual relation they ſtood in to him, and declaring the great eſteem he had for them, and the high opinion he had of them: ſaying, that ye alſo are full of goodneſs; not naturally, for there's no good thing in men by nature, but what they had was from the Spirit of God, whoſe fruit is goodneſs; and by which may be meant, either the good gifts of the Spirit of God, or rather his graces, even the good work of grace in general, and which is goodneſs itſelf: it comes from a good cauſe, the good Spirit of God; is good in its own nature, not having the leaſt mixture or tincture of evil in it; and good in its effects, ſince it makes and denominates a man a good man; now theſe ſaints might be ſaid to be full of this, to denote the abundance, the ſuper-abundance of grace in this work: or particularly beneficence, humanity, and ſympathy to fellow-chriſtians, may be intended. The Vulgate Latin verſion reads, full of love; but the copies and eaſtern verſions read as we do. Filled with all knowledge; not with every ſort of knowledge, with the knowledge of all languages, or of all the arts and ſciences, of all things, natural and political; but with all ſpiritual knowledge relating to God, his nature and perfections, his mind and will; to Chriſt, and the work of redemption by him; to the Spirit, and the operations of his grace; to the Goſpel, and the doctrines of it; to their duty to God, fellow-creatures, and fellow-chriſtians; in ſhort, with all knowledge neceſſary to ſalvation, tho' as yet not perfect, and which will not be in this world, but in another: able alſo to admoniſh one another; as they muſt be, ſince they were both good and knowing; goodneſs and knowledge are neceſſary to admonition, and qualify perſons for it: if a man is not a good man himſelf, he's not fit to admoniſh another; and if he has not knowledge, he'll not be able to do it as it ſhould be; and without humanity and tenderneſs, he'll not perform it aright, and with ſucceſs; but all this being in theſe perſons, they were able and fit for it. Some copies read it, able alſo to admoniſh others; ſo the Syriac verſion renders; which makes the expreſſion ſtill ſtronger, and enlarges their praiſe and commendation.

Ver. 15. Nevertheleſs, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you, &c.] Or freely, in taking notice of their party-contentions and ill uſage of each other, and in reproving, adviſing and exhorting them; and which he excuſes by obſerving that it was, in ſome ſort, or in part only; meaning either that it was only in ſome part of the epiſtle he had took ſuch a liberty, which is the ſenſe of the Arabic verſion, which renders it, in ſome parts of the oration; or elſe that he had regard not to all of them, but to ſome only, to a part of the church who were moſt culpable; and did not deſign a charge againſt them all, and that what he ſaid ſhould be applied to the whole body; or rather that the boldneſs and freedom he had taken was but in ſome ſort, it was but in part: this he ſays to mitigate it, and that it might not be thought to be ſo large as it might appear at firſt; it was but a little more boldly, that he wrote unto them, as the Syriac renders it; for this clauſe is not to be read in connection with the word written, as if the Apoſtle had only wrote of the doctrines of grace in ſome ſort, or in part, for he declared the whole counſel of God, and never kept back any thing profitable to the churches: he adds, as putting you in mind; which is alſo ſaid to excuſe his writing, and the manner of it; he did not take upon him to be their teacher and inſtructor, to inform them of things they knew nothing of; only to be their monitor, to put them in mind of, and refreſh their memories with what they had been well inſtructed and eſtabliſhed in before; ſee 2 Pet. i. 12, 13. becauſe of the grace that is given to me of God; meaning not the doctrine of grace, concerning which, as the Ethiopic verſion renders it, he was putting them in mind; nor the internal grace of the Spirit, by which he was inclined and aſſiſted to write unto them; but the grace of apoſtleſhip, or that high office which by the grace of God, and not becauſe of any merits of his, he was called unto: this he mentions alſo to excuſe the freedom of his writing; ſince what he did was in conſequence of, purſuant and agreeable to his office as an Apoſtle; and therefore could not have anſwer'd it to God, or them, if he had not done it; wherefore he hoped it would be took well by them.

Ver. 16. That I ſhould be the miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] The office of Apoſtleſhip is here amplified and enlarged on, and the ends ſhewn for which that grace was given to him, that he ſhould be a miniſter; not in holy things about the temple, as the prieſts and Levites were; or a teacher of the law, ſome were fond of; but a miniſter of Chriſt, one that was made ſo by him, was qualified and ſent forth to miniſter in his name to men; and who was a preacher of him; Jeſus Chriſt, and him crucified, was the grand ſubject of his miniſtrations: he adds, to the Gentiles; for to them, tho' not to the excluſion of the Jews, was he appointed a miniſter by Chriſt, and ſent by him to them; among them he chiefly miniſtred, and was particularly and eminently uſeful to them; and this is another reaſon why the Romans ought to bear with a little boldneſs and freedom in writing to them, ſince he was the Apoſtle of the Gentiles: miniſtring the Goſpel of God; not the ſervice of the temple, nor the traditions of the elders, nor the law of Moſes, nor the morality of the Heathens; but the Goſpel of which God is the author, whoſe grace is the ſubject, and whoſe glory is the end; and is good news from him to the chief of ſinners; to the preaching of which the Apoſtle was ſeparated by him: that the offering up of the Gentiles; not the offering the Gentiles offered up, their prayers, praiſes, or good works, tho' theſe are acceptable to God thro' Chriſt; but the Gentiles themſelves, by the offering up of whom is meant their converſion; which was the end of the Apoſtle's miniſtring the Goſpel among them, and in which he was the happy inſtrument. The alluſion is to the prieſts ſlaying and offering up ſacrifices under the law. The Apoſtle was a prieſt in a figurative and improper ſenſe; the ſacrifices he offered up were not ſlain beaſts, but men, the Gentiles, cut to the heart by the ſword of the Spirit, the miniſtry of the Goſpel; whoſe inſide being laid open to them, and they brought to a ſenſe of their loſt condition, and need of Chriſt, were, thro' the power of divine grace attending the word, made willing to offer, or give up themſelves to the Lord, to be ſaved by him, and him only: this the Apoſtle, as an inſtrument, was concerned in; and all his view was, that it might be acceptable; that is, to God; as nothing is more ſo to him, than a broken and a contrite heart, or ſouls brought to a ſenſe of themſelves, and to believe in Chriſt, and ſubmit to his righteouſneſs; and then both miniſters and converts are unto God, a ſweet ſavour of Chriſt: being ſanctified by the Holy Ghoſt; this is ſaid in alluſion to the waſhing of the ſacrifices under the law; and intimates, that the Gentiles, tho' unclean by nature and practice, yet being ſanctified by the Spirit of God, whoſe proper work it is to ſanctify, become an acceptable, being an holy ſacrifice to an holy God.

Ver. 17. I have therefore whereof I may glory, &c.] Not in himſelf, for he that taught others not to glory in men, would not glory in himſelf; not in his carnal deſcent and fleſhly privileges; nor in his knowledge of, and compliance with the ceremonies of the law; nor in his legal, moral, and civil righteouſneſs before God; nor in his gifts and attainments, as merited and procured by himſelf; nor in his labours in the miniſtry, and the ſucceſs of it, as of himſelf: but through Jeſus Chriſt; or in Jeſus Chriſt, as read the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions; in what Chriſt was unto him, wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption: he could boaſt of what he had from him, and through him, even of all ſpiritual bleſſings in him; and of a large meaſure of grace he had received from him; and of great and eminent gifts Chriſt had beſtowed on him; he gloried in his croſs, and boaſted of a crucified Jeſus, whom others deſpiſed; and whom he made the ſubject of his miniſtry, and took delight in preaching; and freely owned that all he did was through Chriſt ſtrengthening him; and that all his ſucceſs in his work was owing to him, and of this he had to glory: and which was in thoſe things which pertain to God; not with God, as the Syriac reads it; for though in ſome caſes it may be lawful to glory before men, yet not before God, or in his preſence: nor is it any thing a man may glory in, not in his own things, but in the things of God; in things relating to the Goſpel of God, to the pure preaching of it, to the furtherance and ſpread of it, and the recommending of it to others; to the worſhip and ordinances of God, and a ſpiritual attendance on them; to the grace of God, and the magnifying of that in the buſineſs of ſalvation; and to the glory of God, which ought to be the chief end of all actions, natural, moral, and religious, and whether private or publick. The Apoſtle has chiefly reference to his miniſterial function, and the things of God relating to that, in which he was employed; ſee Heb. v. 1.

Ver. 18. For I will not dare to ſpeak of any of thoſe things, &c.] He ſuggeſts that the falſe teachers did ſpeak of things which were not done by them at all, and much leſs were what Chriſt had done by them; and ſignifies that he was a conſcientious man, and could ſpeak nothing but what was truth; his conſcience would not ſuffer him, nor could he allow himſelf to make mention of any thing, that was not done by him, as if it was; nor of any thing that was done by himſelf, nor of any thing that was done, as if it was done by himſelf, but as it was wrought by Chriſt; nor had he any need to ſpeak of any other things which he had wrought himſelf, as he could not of what he had not wrought at all; or as he ſays, which Chriſt hath not wrought by me: ſignifying that what he had wrought, and which he could with good conſcience ſpeak of to the honour of Chriſt, and the glory of his grace, were not wrought by himſelf, but what Chriſt wrought by him; he was only the inſtrument, Chriſt was the efficient cauſe: as a chriſtian, it was not he that lived, but Chriſt lived in him; as a miniſter, it was not he that ſpoke, but Chriſt ſpoke in him; nor was it he that laboured, but the grace of Chriſt that was with him; much leſs was it he that converted ſouls, but Chriſt did it by him: to make the Gentiles obedient; the nations of the world, who had been brought up in blindneſs and ignorance of God, in rebellion and diſobedience to him. The Goſpel was ſent among them, and was bleſſed unto them, to make them of diſobedient, obedient ones; not to men, but to God; not to magiſtrates and miniſters, though they were taught to be ſo to both, but to Chriſt; to him as a prieſt, by being made willing to be ſaved by him, and him only, renouncing their own works, and diſclaiming all other ways of ſalvation; and to ſubmit to his righteouſneſs for their juſtification before God, and acceptance with him; and to deal with his precious blood for pardon and cleanſing; to rely on his ſacrifice for the atonement of their ſins, and to make uſe of him as the new and living way to the Father, as their one and only mediator, advocate, and interceſſor; and to him as a prophet, to the faith of the Goſpel, and the doctrines of it; not barely by hearing it, and notionally aſſenting to it, but by embracing it heartily, and profeſſing it publickly and ſincerely; and to him as a king, by owning him as ſuch, and as theirs; and by ſubjecting to his ordinances, and obeying his commands in faith and fear, and from love to him: the means whereby theſe perſons were brought to the obedience of Chriſt, and of faith, are by word and deed; or deeds, as the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and the Ethiopic verſions read: by the former is meant, the word of the Goſpel and the preaching of it, being ſent unto them, and coming with power, and not as the word of man, but as the word of God; and by the latter, either the laboriousneſs of the Apoſtle, the pains he took, the hardſhips he endured, in miniſtring the Goſpel to them; or his agreeable life and converſation, which were a means of recommending the word, and of engaging an attention to it; or rather the miraculous works and mighty deeds which were wrought by the Apoſtle, in confirmation of the doctrine he preached, as it ſeems to be explained in the following verſe.

Ver. 19. Through mighty ſigns and wonders, &c.] Or in, or through the power of ſigns and wonders, as the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions render the words. Theſe carrying along with them evidence and conviction of the truth of what was delivered, wrought wonderfully and powerfully on the minds of the Gentiles, to embrace the Goſpel, and ſubmit to the ordinances of it; though all would have been inſufficient, had it not been for what follows, by the power of the Spirit of God: the Alexandrian copy, and one of Stephens's read, by the power of the holy Spirit, and ſo does the Vulgate Latin verſion; meaning, either that the mighty ſigns and wonders in healing the ſick, giving ſight to the blind, raiſing the dead, &c. were performed not by the efficacy and working of ſatan, as the ſigns and lying wonders of antichriſtian men, but by the Spirit of God, by whom Chriſt and all his Apoſtles wrought the miracles they did; or that the miniſtration of the word in which the Apoſtle laboured, was by the power of the Spirit of God; it was he that imparted all ſpiritual gifts to him, qualifying him for this ſervice; it was he that aſſiſted him in it, and enabled him to go through it; it was in demonſtration of the Spirit and of power, that he performed it; and that not in words which man's wiſdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghoſt teacheth: or elſe that the obedience of the Gentiles to the faith of Chriſt, through the preaching of the Goſpel, and the wonderful works that attended it as means, were purely owing to the power of the Spirit of God, as the efficient cauſe; it was not by might, or power of the preacher; nor merely by the power of ſigns and wonders; but by the powerful and efficacious grace of the Spirit of God, who took away the ſtony, ſtubborn, and diſobedient heart, and gave them an heart of fleſh, a tender, flexible, and obedient one; and cauſed them to walk in, and obſerve the commandments and ordinances of the Lord: ſo that from Jeruſalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the Goſpel of Chriſt; that which Chriſt as God, is the author of; as man, was a preacher and miniſter of; and as mediator, is the ſubject matter of: this the Apoſtle preached fully and compleatly, every part and branch of it, kept back nothing of it, but faithfully declared the whole; and ſo fulfilled it, as the word may be rendered, and his miniſtry; or he filled the Goſpel, the net of the Goſpel, which he ſpread in every place; or rather he diffuſed the knowledge of it every where; he filled all places with it wherever he came, even from Jeruſalem round about unto Illyricum: not that he began to preach at Jeruſalem, but at Damaſcus; from whence he went to Arabia, and after that to Jeruſalem; but inaſmuch as he was of Jeruſalem, and had preached there, from whence the Goſpel originally came, and this was the boundary of his miniſtry one way, he makes mention of it; as Illyricum was the boundary of it another way, which was on the extreme part of Macedonia: it is now called Sclavonia, and is an European nation; part of it is Dalmatia, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 10. Apollonia was in it, according to Mela [z], where the Apoſtle is ſaid to paſs through, Acts xvii. 1. it has on the ſouth the gulph of Venice, on the north the Danube, on the weſt Germany, and on the eaſt Thracia and Macedonia: according to Ptolomy [a], Illyris, or Illyricum, was bounded on the north with upper and lower Pannonia, now called Hungary and Auſtria; on the eaſt with upper Myſia, now Servia; and on the ſouth, with part of Macedonia; it lies over-againſt Italy, the Adriatic ſea being between them; its length from the river Drinus to Arſa, is reckoned about 480 miles; and its breadth from the mountains of Croatia to the ſea, is computed to be about 120: it is by ſome divided into Slavonia, Dalmatia, and Albania; Slavonia is the weſtern part, Albania the eaſtern, and Dalmatia between them; according to others, it includes Slavonia, Croatia, Boſnia, and Dalmatia; and had its name of Illyricum, from Illyrius, the ſon of Cadmus; or as others, from Illyrius, the ſon of Celta: here the Goſpel was preached by the Apoſtle Paul, and no doubt with ſucceſs; and churches were planted here, and which remained for ſeveral ages: in the ſecond century there was a church in Illyricum, and Eleutherius was biſhop, who is ſaid to be a famous teacher; he was born at Rome, and his mother Anthia is reported to be converted by the Apoſtle Paul; in the ſame age lived one Quirinus, firſt a tribune, and then a biſhop of Illyricum, who became a martyr under Trajan: in the third century there were churches in Illyricum, though devaſtations were made in it by the Goths: in the fourth century, frequent mention is made of the churches in Illyricum; and the biſhops convened at Rome under Damaſus in the times of Conſtantius, wrote with great reſpect to the brethren in Illyricum; in Siſcia, a city in this country, Quirinus a biſhop ſuffered martyrdom; here a ſynod met againſt the Arians, and yet many in this country were infected with that hereſy, by Valens and Urſatius; in this age Hilary, of Poictiers in France, ſpread the Goſpel in this country; and he and Euſebius of Vercelli, in Piedmont, viſited the churches, and corrected what was amiſs: in the fifth century there was a church in Illyricum, and in Salo, a city of Dalmatia, Glycerius was biſhop: in the ſixth century there were alſo churches here, as appears from the letter of Symmachus to the biſhops of them, and to their people; and in this age alſo Gregory wrote to all the biſhops in Illyricum, to receive ſuch biſhops as were baniſhed: in the eighth century, the biſhops of Illyricum were in the Nicene ſynod, and Boniface gathered a church in Slavonia [b]; thus far chriſtianity may be traced in this country: hither the Apoſtle went, not in a direct line, but round about, and took many countries, cities, and towns in his way, as the hiſtory of his journies and travels in the Acts of the Apoſtles ſhews, and as he here ſuggeſts.

Ver. 20. Yea, ſo have I ſtrived to preach the Goſpel, &c.] The ſenſe is, not barely that he ſtrove to preach the Goſpel and not the law, the pure Goſpel, and not a mixed one; nor only that he endeavoured to preach it fully, and leave out nothing; but that he had an holy ambition to preach it, not where Chriſt was named; as in Judea, where he had been for many ages ſpoken of and expected, and where he had lately appeared, lived, ſuffered, and died, and where his Goſpel had been preached by all the Apoſtles; as alſo in ſuch parts of the Gentile world, where others of the Apoſtles had been, and had made mention of his name, and publiſhed the glad tidings of ſalvation by him; but he choſe rather to go to ſuch heathen nations, as were wholly without any knowledge of him; who had only the dim light of nature to guide them; had had no promiſes nor prophecies of the Meſſiah, nor ſo much as any hints, at leaſt very diſtant ones, concerning him; and where as yet the ſound of the Goſpel had not reached: leſt I ſhould build on another man's foundation; meaning not the law of Moſes, nor the doctrines of the falſe teachers, but the foundation of the true Apoſtles, and which was no other than the foundation Chriſt, he himſelf laid; but he choſe not to go where they had laid the foundation by preaching Chriſt and his Goſpel, that he might not take another man's crown, or boaſt in another man's line, or of other men's labours; but rather to go where others had never been, that he might firſt lay the foundation himſelf, by preaching Chriſt and him crucified, and ſo the more act up to his character as an Apoſtle, and as the Apoſtle to the Gentiles.

Ver. 21. But as it is written, &c.] In Iſa. lii. 15. to whom he was not ſpoken of, they ſhall ſee, and they that have not heard ſhall underſtand; for the Meſſiah was not ſpoken of to the Gentiles; they were ſtrangers to the covenants of promiſe; the oracles of God were committed to the Jews; God gave his word and ſtatutes to them, and not to any other nation: and yet according to this prophecy, the Gentiles were to ſee him whom they had had no account of; not in the fleſh with their bodily eyes, in which ſenſe only, or at leaſt chiefly, the Jews ſaw him; but with the eyes of their underſtanding, by faith, as exhibited and evidently ſet forth before them as crucified, in the Goſpel and the ordinances of it: and though they had heard nothing of him, having for many hundreds of years been left in ignorance, and ſuffered to walk in their own ways, until the Apoſtles were ſent among them; whoſe ſound went into all the earth, and their words to the end of the world; yet when this would be the caſe, according to theſe words, they would underſtand the mind and will of God, the myſteries of his grace, the nature of the perſon and offices of Chriſt, the deſign of his coming into the world, and the way of ſalvation by him; all which was greatly brought about and accompliſhed, in the miniſtry of the Apoſtle Paul among them. The paſſage is very pertinently cited and applied by the Apoſtle. The whole paragraph is to be underſtood of the Meſſiah, from whence it is taken, as it is owned, and accordingly interpreted by many Jewiſh writers, both ancient [b] and modern [c]; and theſe words particularly reſpect the kings and nations of the world, who are repreſented as ſtruck with ſilence and wonder, when upon the preaching and hearing of the Meſſiah, they ſhould ſee him by faith, and ſpiritually underſtand what is declared concerning him. The difference between the Apoſtle's verſion of theſe words, which is the ſame with the Septuagint, and the text in Iſaiah, is very inconſiderable. The firſt clauſe of the Hebrew text may be literally rendered thus, for him, who was not ſpoken of to them, they ſhall ſee; and the Apoſtle's Greek in this manner, to whom it was not ſpoken of concerning him, they ſhall ſee; the ſenſe is the ſame, and the perſon intended Chriſt: the latter clauſe, which we from the Hebrew text render, and that which they had not heard, ſhall they conſider; and here, they that have not heard, ſhall underſtand, has nothing material in it, in which they differ; for in the former part of it, both deſign the Meſſiah, and the things concerning him, the Gentiles had not heard of; and the latter is rendered and explained by the Targum, and by R. Sol Jarchi, as by the Apoſtle, אסתכלו, they ſhall underſtand; and which fitly expreſſes the ſenſe of the Hebrew word uſed by the prophet.

Ver. 22. For which cauſe alſo, &c.] By reaſon of being employed for ſo many years, in preaching the Goſpel from Jeruſalem, round about to Illyricum; taking ſo large a compaſs to miniſter in, and ſtriving to introduce, propagate, and ſpread the Goſpel, where Chriſt was never named before: I have been much hindered from coming to you; or he had been often, and by many ways, and upon many accounts, hindered from coming to them; the frequent calls to different and diſtant places, and the great work of preaching the Goſpel in thoſe dark parts of the world, and ſettling churches there, which was upon his hands, prevented his giving them a viſit at Rome, which he much and often deſired: as in the preceding verſes the Apoſtle excuſes his freedom of writing to this church, ſo here his long delay of coming to them, aſſigning the reaſon of it.

Ver. 23. But now having no more place in theſe parts, &c.] Not becauſe perſecution was too hot for him, and therefore could not ſtay any longer, for this was what he expected every where; nor did it diſcourage him in his work, for he took pleaſure in enduring it for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel; but becauſe he had ſo fully preached the Goſpel from Jeruſalem, in his circuit to Illyricum, had filled every town and city with it, had planted churches in every place, and ordained elders over them, to whom the care and charge of them were committed; that there were no more places for him to preach in, but either where he himſelf had been already, or ſome other of the Apoſtles; not but that he could have ſtaid with uſefulneſs to theſe new formed churches, for the edifying and confirming of them, for the furtherance of the joy of faith in them, and for the defence of the Goſpel and its ordinances among them; but his proper work as an Apoſtle, being to preach the Goſpel to all nations, and where Chriſt was not named, and to plant churches; and there being no more room in theſe climates, or regions, for ſuch ſervice, he begins to think of ſome other places, particularly Spain, where as yet very probably the Goſpel was not preached: however, he found himſelf at leiſure to viſit other places, and hereby gives the church at Rome ſome hopes of ſeeing him from this conſideration, as well as from what follows: and having a great deſire theſe many years to come unto you; he had not only a deſire, but a very vehement deſire to come to them; he longed to ſee them, as he elſewhere ſays; ſo that ſince now he had leiſure, they might hope it would not be long e'er they did ſee him; eſpecially ſeeing the thing had been upon his mind and thoughts for many years paſt; which ſhews that the Goſpel had been preached very early at Rome, that many had been converted by it, and a church had been formed there ſome years ago, and was known to the Apoſtle; on which account, having heard much of their faith and obedience, he had a longing deſire of a great while to ſee them.

Ver. 24. Whenſoever I take my journey into Spain, &c.] Which he had now meditated and reſolved upon, being a place, as before obſerved, where it is very likely the Goſpel as yet had not been preached, which made him deſirous of going thither; but whether he ever went thither, or no, is not certain; ſome think he never performed the intended journey; others affirm he did, ſometime between his two appearances before Nero. Sepharad in Obad. ver. 20. is taken by the Jewiſh writers for this country; and is by the Targum, Jarchi, and Aben Ezra on that place, called, אספמיא, Aſpamia; a name not greatly different from Hiſpania, by which it uſually goes among the Greeks and Latins; but Kimchi calls it, ספניא, Spania, the very word uſed in this place, and by us rendered Spain, as it is uſually called: it was called Span in the language of the Celtæ, who firſt inhabited it, which ſignifies a companion; it was formerly called Iberia, from the river Iberus; afterwards Heſperia, from Heſperus, the brother of Atlas; and then Hiſpalia, from the city Hiſpalis, or Sevil; and from thence corruptly Hiſpania; there are ſome that derive it from σπανια, from the roughneſs of ſome places in it, barren, uncultivated, and uninhabited: it has on the eaſt the Pyrenean mountains, by which it is divided from France, on the weſt the Atlantic ocean, on the north the Cantabrian, and on the ſouth the Herculean ſea, and the ſtreights of Gades; now as the Apoſtle intended a journey into this country, he mentions it, in order to raiſe their expectations of ſeeing him; ſince in his way thither, he would have a fair opportunity of coming to them; yea, he aſſures them, that whenever he went thither, he would come: I will come to you; it was his real intention, a ſettled reſolution and determination in his mind ſo to do; but whereas every thing of this kind depends not upon the will of man, but upon the will and providence of God, and ſo many unforeſeen things fall out which prevent the fulfilling of human purpoſes, therefore he adds, for I truſt, or hope to ſee you in my journey: he could not be certain that he ſhould ſee them, but he hoped he ſhould, for nothing was more deſireable to him; his wiſh was not to ſee their emperor, their ſenate, or their famous city, but them, the church of Chriſt there; and a beautiful and delightful ſight it is, to ſee a church of Chriſt in Goſpel order, walking together in the faith and fellowſhip, and ordinances of it, and in peace one with another: and to be brought on my way thitherward by you; he not only hoped to ſee them, but that he ſhould have the company of ſome of them along with him, in his way to Spain; from whoſe converſation he might expect much ſpiritual pleaſure and refreſhment; and by whom he might be directed in his way, as well as ſupplied with all neceſſaries for his journey; in which ſenſe the phraſe of bringing on in the way, is ſometimes uſed; ſee Titus iii. 13. 3 John 6. though before he ſhould depart from them, he hoped to have abundance of ſatisfaction in his converſation with them together as a church: if firſt I be ſomewhat, or in part, filled with your company; or with you, meaning that before he ſhould ſet forward from them to Spain, that he ſhould be greatly delighted with beholding their order, and the ſtedfaſtneſs of their faith, hearing their ſweet experiences, and obſerving their holy life and converſation, and their peace and concord among themſelves; not that he expected entire ſatisfaction, a ſatiety of pleaſure, fulneſs of joy, which are only to be had in the preſence of God, and communion with angels and glorified ſaints; though perhaps he might expect more than he had, for at his firſt anſwer before Nero, all theſe Romans forſook him and fled; ſaints are often diſappointed in their raiſed expectations, of what they ſhall enjoy in each others company.

Ver. 25. But now I go unto Jeruſalem, &c.] Whither he was bound in ſpirit, not knowing what ſhould beſal him there, from which he could not be diſſuaded by his friends, and thither he did go: to miniſter unto the ſaints; not to preach the Goſpel, though doubtleſs he did that when he was there; but to diſtribute among the poor ſaints, what had been raiſed for them by the Greek churches; who had intreated him to take upon him this ſervice, even the fellowſhip of miniſtering to the ſaints; and though this might ſeem below his office as an Apoſtle, and as what more became an inferior officer, a deacon in a church; yet the Apoſtle's heart was ſo much in it, and he was ſo bent upon it, and ſo diligent to execute it, that he poſtponed his journey to Spain and viſit to Rome, for the ſake of it, and aſſigns this as a reaſon why he could not come at preſent.

Ver. 26. For it hath pleaſed them of Macedonia and Achaia, &c.] That is, the churches of Macedonia, particularly Philippi and Theſſalonica; and the churches of Achaia, eſpecially the church at Corinth, which was the metropolis of Achaia: to make a certain contribution for the poor ſaints which are at Jeruſalem; of which contribution, of their great forwardneſs, readineſs, and liberality, a large account is given, in the viiith and ixth chapters of the ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians; from whence Origen and others have rightly concluded, that this epiſtle to the Romans was wrote after that; ſince in that, the Apoſtle exhorts and encourages them by the example of the Macedonian churches, to finiſh the collection they had begun; which collection is here called a contribution, or communion, as the word ſignifies; it being one part of the communion of churches and of ſaints, to relieve their poor, by communicating to them, and to aſſiſt each other therein; and in which they have not only fellowſhip with one another, but with Chriſt the head; who takes what is done to the leaſt of his brethren, as done to himſelf: the perſons for whom the collection was made, are the poor ſaints, or the poor of the ſaints; for not all the ſaints, but the poor among them, were the objects of this generoſity: they were ſaints, ſuch as are ſanctified by God the Father in eternal election, and by the blood of Chriſt in redemption, and by the Spirit of Chriſt in effectual vocation, to theſe this goodneſs extended; for though good is to be done to all men, yet more eſpecially to the houſhold of faith: they were poor, which is the lot of many who are ſaints, whom God has choſen, to whom the Goſpel is preached, and who are called by grace: theſe came to be ſo, either through the great dearth which was throughout the world in the times of Claudius Cæſar, when the brethren at Jeruſalem particularly ſuffered, and were relieved by the diſciples at Antioch; but this collection was made ſome years after that, and therefore rather they became ſo, through the perſecutions of their countrymen; by whom they ſuffered joyfully the ſpoiling of their goods, knowing that they had a better and more enduring ſubſtance in heaven; or elſe through their having ſold all their poſſeſſions, and thrown their money into one common ſtock and fund, for mutual ſubſiſtance, which was now exhauſted: theſe poor ſaints lived at Jeruſalem, which was at a great diſtance from Macedonia and Achaia; but tho' they were ſtrangers, and unknown by face to them, and had only heard of them, and their diſtreſs; yet this was no objection to their chearful contribution; they conſidered them as members of the ſame body, as belonging to the ſame family, and as ſtanding in the ſame ſpiritual relation to God and Chriſt with themſelves; and upon this foot they acted; and what they did is worthy the imitation of all the churches and people of God.

Ver. 27. It hath pleaſed them verily, &c.] This is repeated from the former verſe, and is deſigned to point out the ſpring of this contribution, and the manner in which it was performed: it aroſe from themſelves; it was the pure effect of their good-will and pleaſure; the firſt motion was from among themſelves; it was their own thought, mind, and will; they were willing of themſelves unto it, and begun it of themſelves, unaſked, and not moved unto it by any other: it was not done by conſtraint or neceſſity, but was entirely free; they did not make it for oſtentation-ſake, or to gain the applauſe of men, but from a principle of love to the poor ſaints; and which ſhewed itſelf to be ſincere, hearty, and genuine, by deeds, and not bare words: they performed this ſervice with great alacrity and chearfulneſs; they gave not ſparingly, but largely; it was not a matter of covetouſneſs, but of bounty; and they did it not grudgingly, but chearfully; they took delight and pleaſure in it; their hearts and ſouls were in it, and yet notwithſtanding did but what they ought to do. And their debtors they are; for being debtors to God for their temporal and ſpiritual mercies; and to Chriſt for what he has done for them in redemption, and for what he is to them; and to the Spirit for the influences and operations of his grace upon them, they are debtors to the ſaints; they are bound to love them; they owe the debt of love to them, as they are in the ſpiritual relation of the children of God, members of Chriſt, and brethren one of another; and their paying of this debt to them is, in ſome ſenſe, reckoned a paying it to the divine perſons. Moreover, it was not merely a debt of love which theſe Gentiles owed, and in this way paid to the believing Jews; but it was a debt of juſtice and equity; they had received what was of valuable conſideration from them, and by their means: Chriſt himſelf was of the Jews; hence ſalvation is ſaid to be of them, John iv. 22. The writings of the Old Teſtament were committed to them, and faithfully preſerved by them, and from them tranſmitted to the Gentiles; the Apoſtles were all Jews, under whoſe miniſtry they were enlightened, converted, and brought to the knowledge of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; the Goſpel of the grace of God came out from among them; it was firſt preached in Judea, and at Jeruſalem; and from thence was carried and ſpread in the Gentile world; yea, it looks very likely, and is not at all unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the charge of carrying and ſpreading the Goſpel among the Gentiles was at firſt defrayed by the believing Jews, and out of that common ſtock and fund which was at Jeruſalem; for it was not proper that the Apoſtles, at their firſt ſetting out, ſhould take any thing of the Gentiles, leſt they ſhould be thought to be mercenary perſons, who only ſought their own worldly advantage: hence the Apoſtle argues from the greater to the leſſer, for if the Gentiles have been partakers of their ſpiritual things; the Goſpel, and the doctrines of it, which are ſpiritual things; contain, and make known ſpiritual bleſſings; impart ſpiritual gifts; in which the Spirit of God is greatly concerned, he is the author of them; he leads men into them; qualifies them to preach them unto others; bleſſes and ſucceeds them to the converſion; comfort, and edification of ſouls; and by means of which he himſelf is received as a ſpirit of illumination, ſanctification, and faith: and which doctrines alſo relate to the ſpiritual and eternal welfare of the ſouls and ſpirits of men; hereby they are enlightened, quickened, comforted, and nouriſhed up unto eternal life: wherefore, ſince this is the caſe, and theſe the favours the Gentiles enjoy'd through the Jews, their duty is alſo to miniſter unto them in carnal things; in outward and temporal things; in things pertaining to the fleſh, or outward man; for the clothing and nouriſhment of the body. This he ſaid to ſtir up the Romans, who were Gentiles alſo, and under the ſame obligations to make ſuch a contribution for them likewiſe.

Ver. 28. When therefore I have performed this, &c.] Meaning when he had diſpatched that buſineſs, and finiſhed that affair which the Macedonian and Achaian churches had intreated him to engage in, and which he had undertook; namely, to take their collection, and carry it to Jeruſalem, and diſtribute it among the poor ſaints there; and which he expreſſes by another phraſe, and have ſealed to them this fruit. The liberality of the Gentile churches is called fruit, as it may be on many accounts; as with reſpect to the Apoſtle, it was the fruit of his miniſtry and laborious preaching of the Goſpel among them; he had been ſowing the ſeed of the word, and planting churches in theſe parts; and among other fruits brought forth hereby, as the converſion of ſinners, and edification of ſaints, the exerciſe of grace, and performance of good works, this of liberality to the poor ſaints was one: with reſpect to the perſons, the object of this bounty, it was the fruit of their ſpiritual things, which the Gentiles, by their means, had been partakers of; and would be as fruit, uſeful and profitable to them, to relieve their wants, ſupply them with neceſſaries, and make their lives more comfortable: and alſo with reſpect to the contributors, it was the fruit of the Spirit of God, and his grace in them; it was the fruit of faith, which works by love; and it was the fruit of their love to Chriſt, and to his ſaints; and was profitable to them in things temporal, ſpiritual, and eternal; promiſes of each being made and performed to ſuch that ſow liberally and bountifully. Now the miniſtration of this to the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, and on the behalf of the Grecian churches, the Apoſtle calls a ſealing it to them; and it is thought to be an alluſion to the delivery of money ſealed up, that it may not be loſt, nor made uſe of for any other purpoſe than that for which it was deſigned: whether the Apoſtle carried this collection ſealed or no, it matters not; his ſenſe is, that he ſhould deliver it whole and ſafe unto them, and in ſuch manner as to leave no ſuſpicion that he had converted any part of it to his own uſe; though the word here uſed ſeems to anſwer to the Hebrew חתם, which, with the Jews, frequently ſignifies to conclude, finiſh, and make an end of any thing, as well as to ſeal; the ſealing up of letters being the laſt and finiſhing part of them. Innumerable inſtances might be given; take the following one as a proof[a]: "we find in the former prophets, "שהיו חותמין, that they ſealed, or ended their “words with words of praiſe, or with words of conſolation. Says R. Eliezer, except Jeremiah, שחתם, who ſealed, or finiſhed with words of reproof.”[b] So the word is uſed in Dan. ix. 24. and then the Apoſtle's plain meaning is, when I have made an end of this affair, have finiſhed this buſineſs of miniſtring and diſtributing to the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, I will come by you into Spain. The Ethiopic verſion reads it, Laſitania, deſigning, no doubt, Luſitania, which was formerly a part of Spain, now called Portugal. Whether the Apoſtle ever was there, is not certain, nor very probable; ſince when he came to Jeruſalem he was apprehended, and after ſome time ſent a priſoner to Rome, where he ſuffered; however, it was his intention to go to Spain, and to take Rome in his way thither.

Ver. 29. And I am ſure when I come to you, &c.] He intended to go to Spain; he was not ſure he ſhould reach thither; but he was poſitive in it he ſhould come to Rome. It had been much and long upon his mind; and under an impreſs of the Spirit of God upon him, he had ſignified ſome time before this, that after he had been at Jeruſalem, he muſt ſee Rome alſo, Acts xix. 21. and it was afterwards more expreſly told him by the Lord, that as he had teſtified of him at Jeruſalem, he ſhould bear witneſs at Rome alſo, Acts xxiii. 11. and therefore he was fully aſſured he ſhould come to Rome, and was as confident of the manner of his coming thither. I ſhall come in, or with the fulneſs of the bleſſing of the Goſpel of Chriſt; with the Goſpel, the good news of ſalvation by Chriſt; and which muſt make him a welcome perſon to every ſenſible ſoul where-ever he came; to this he was choſen, ſeparated, and called; for this he was abundantly qualified; this was committed to his truſt, and which he carried with him where-ever he went; and he was not aſhamed of it, and was ready to preach it even at Rome alſo. With the Goſpel of Chriſt; not his own, or another's, or any man's, but Chriſt's; which he had by the revelation of Chriſt; of which Chriſt is the ſum and ſubſtance, and which Chriſt himſelf preached: with the bleſſing of the Goſpel of Chriſt. Some by bleſſing underſtand a liberal contribution, which he truſted he ſhould make at Rome, for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem; believing that their hearts would be opened, under the preaching of the Goſpel, to give freely to them, and that this would be a bleſſing that would attend it: but rather he means, either the bleſſed gifts he had, qualifying him for preaching the Goſpel, with which he ſhould come and deliver it among them, and which would attend it with ſucceſs; ſuch as boldneſs of ſpirit, freedom of ſpeech, enlarged knowledge, mighty ſigns and wonders, and the demonſtration of the Spirit, and of power: or the bleſſed effects it would have on them, in eſtabliſhing them in the preſent truths; in further enlightening and inſtructing their minds; in edifying, quickning, and comforting them; and in nouriſhing up with the words of faith and ſound doctrine, unto eternal life: or the bleſſings of grace exhibited and ſet forth in the Goſpel; ſuch as juſtification and forgiveneſs of ſins, peace and reconciliation, ſalvation and eternal life. Nay, he believed he ſhould come in, or with the fulneſs of all this; meaning, either that he believed he ſhould find them full of the Goſpel, and the fruits of it; or rather that he ſhould come full fraught with it, and fully preach it to them, and keep back nothing that would be profitable. There is a fulneſs in the Goſpel; it is full of the deep things of God, which the Spirit ſearches and reveals; it is full of the doctrines of grace and truth, which Chriſt himſelf is ſaid to be full of; it is full of exceeding great and precious promiſes tranſcribed from Chriſt, and out of the covenant of grace; and it is full of a variety of food, of milk for babes, and meat for ſtrong perſons. The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, read only, with the fulneſs of the bleſſing of Chriſt; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion.

Ver. 30. Now I beſeech you, brethren, &c.] Having declared his intention of coming to them, and his confidence of it, he intreats an intereſt in their prayers; and which he urges from the conſideration of their mutual relation as brethren; and therefore ſhould love one another, and ſhew it, among other things, by praying for each other to their common parent, in whom they have a joint-intereſt, ſaying, as directed by Chriſt, our Father which art in heaven; thereby ſignifying, that they prayed not for themſelves only, but for all the brethren, all the children of God: and this the Apoſtle further urges, for Chriſt's ſake; whoſe ſervant he was, and in whoſe cauſe he was engaged, whoſe Goſpel he preached, and whoſe glory he ſought; and therefore if they had any regard for Chriſt, and the good of his intereſt, he beſeeches them that they would pray for the continuance of his life and uſefulneſs; ſince for him to live was for the good of the churches of Chriſt, though for him to die would be his own perſonal gain: and which he alſo ſtirs them up to, for the love of the Spirit; meaning either the love of the Father, and of the Son, which was ſhed abroad in their hearts by the Spirit, which he had directed them into, and they had a comfortable ſenſation of; or that love to God, to Chriſt, and one another, which the Spirit of God had wrought in them in regeneration; or that love with which the Spirit of God equally loved them, as the Father, and the Son; and which he had ſhown in their converſion and ſanctification, in applying all grace unto them, and indwelling in them as the Spirit of adoption, and as the earneſt and pledge of the heavenly inheritance. That ye ſtrive together with me in your prayers to God for me. The Apoſtle prayed for himſelf, as he had been wont to do ever ſince he was a converted man; but knowing well the force of united, ſocial prayer, he deſires the aſſiſtance of others. He repreſents prayer as an agony, an holy conflict, and ſtriving with God, a wreſtling with him, as Jacob did, who held him, and would not let him go without the bleſſing, and had power with him, and prevailed. The phraſe denotes the fervency of prayer, the ſtrength, laboriouſneſs, and energy of it; ſee Col. iv. 12. and alſo intimates, that the Apoſtle foreſaw he ſhould have a combat with many enemies where he was going, and ſhould be in great danger by them; and therefore deſires they would join him in the uſe of their ſpiritual armour, and in that particular part of it, prayer, which has been often uſed to good purpoſe againſt the enemies of the Goſpel: he does not deſire theſe Romans to beg the aſſiſtance of their ſenate or emperor; but to pray to God for him, and join with him in their prayers to him, who is a God hearing prayer, and able to ſave. The petitions he would have them put up to him, are as follow:

Ver. 31. That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judea, &c.] By whom ſome think are meant ſuch, who, though they believed in Jeſus as the Meſſiah, yet were violently ſet againſt the Apoſtle for preaching down the ceremonial law; and from whom he foreſaw he ſhould be in much danger when he came to Jeruſalem, and therefore deſires the church at Rome to pray for his deliverance from them; though rather ſuch who did not believe in Jeſus Chriſt at all are deſigned; and who were enemies to the Goſpel, and to all Goſpel miniſters, but eſpecially to the Apoſtle Paul, for preaching among the Gentiles, and ſuch doctrines as he did, which ſtruck at their peculiar notions; and, as he feared, he ſhould be ſet upon by them, and his life be in great danger, ſo it was; ſee Acts xxi. 27—31. tho' he was not diſheartened and intimidated, and did not ſhun going up to Jeruſalem, tho' intreated not to go; yet he thought proper to engage the churches of Chriſt in prayer for him, that he might be delivered out of the hands of ſuch wicked and unreaſonable men, who being deſtitute of faith in Chriſt, were filled with enmity againſt his miniſters; ſee 2 Theſſ. iii. 1, 2. and that my ſervice which I have for Jeruſalem, may be accepted of the ſaints; that is, that the collection which was made by the Gentile churches for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, the miniſtration of which unto them he had took upon him, might be chearfully and gratefully received by them. One would think there were no fear of this, or any need to pray for it; for if they were poor, and in neceſſitous circumſtances, as they were, they would be glad of relief, and thankfully accept it: but the caſe was this, and the difficulties attending this ſervice were, that this collection came from the Gentiles, to whom the Jews had an averſion, and was brought to them by one that they had entertained an ill opinion of, being informed that he had taught the Gentiles to forſake Moſes, not to circumciſe their children, or walk after the cuſtoms; wherefore he did not know whether, tho' in neceſſity, any thing coming for their relief from ſuch a quarter, and thro' his hands, would be received with any pleaſure by them: beſides, his deſire was that it might be received as a token of the true and ſincere love the Gentiles bore to them; and be a means of reconciling the believing Jews to them, to own them as ſiſter churches of the ſame faith and order with themſelves.

Ver. 32. That I may come unto you with joy, &c.] The end the Apoſtle had, in deſiring them to requeſt the above things at the throne of grace for him was, that he might come to them, which unleſs he was delivered from the unbelieving Jews, could not be; and therefore ſince they had an intereſt in this matter, he might hope they would be the more importunate in their ſupplications for him, that he might eſcape their hands; and ſeeing alſo ſhould the ſaints there uſe him in an ungrateful manner, and ſlight the kindneſs of the Gentile churches, and his ſervice ſhould not have the deſired effect, his coming to them would be with ſorrow; wherefore he puts them upon praying for ſucceſs in this affair, that ſo when he came among them he ſhould have no uneaſineſs upon his mind, or any thing of this kind to diſtreſs him, and interrupt that pleaſure and delight he promiſed himſelf in their company and converſation: he adds, by the will of God; reſigning himſelf, and ſubmitting all things to the ſovereign will of God, and the wiſe diſpoſals of his providence: he knew his deliverance from his enemies muſt be by, and the ſucceſs of his ſervice owing to, and his coming to Rome entirely according to, the will of God, and as he ſhould think fit and proper; ſo he acted himſelf; and ſo he taught theſe believers to have their regard to, and ſit down contented with the will of God in all things; to which he ſubjoins, and may with you be refreſhed; with the preſence of God among them, with the Goſpel in the fulneſs and bleſſing of it with which he ſhould come, and with the mutual faith and comfortable experience of him and them, which they ſhould communicate to each other; than all which nothing is more reviving, and refreſhing to the ſpirits of God's people.

Ver. 33. Now the God of peace be with you all, Amen.] As God is in this chapter before ſtiled the God of patience, and the God of hope, becauſe of his concern in theſe graces; ſo he is here ſtiled, the God of peace, becauſe of his concern in that peace which is made between him and his people, by the blood of Chriſt. This peace was firſt upon his thoughts, which are therefore called thoughts of peace; a council of peace was held between him and his ſon upon this head; the ſcheme of reconciliation was drawn by him in it; he entered into a covenant of peace with Chriſt, which takes its name from this momentous article of it; he appointed Chriſt to be the peace-maker, and laid on him the chaſtiſement of our peace; and it pleaſed him by him to reconcile all things to himſelf. Moreover, he is ſo called becauſe he is the giver of all true ſolid conſcience peace, the peace of God which paſſeth all underſtanding of natural men; and which when he gives, none can give trouble; and is what he fills his people with in a way of believing, leading their faith to the blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice of his Son. He is alſo the author of happineſs and proſperity, temporal, ſpiritual and eternal, and likewiſe of all the peace and concord which is in his churches, and among his ſaints; ſo that when the Apoſtle wiſhes that the God of peace might be with them, he not only prays that the preſence of God might be with them; but that they might have freſh views of their intereſt in peace, made by the blood of Chriſt; that they might enjoy peace in their own conſciences, ariſing from thence; that they might be poſſeſſed of felicity of every kind, and that unity and harmony might ſubſiſt among them; that the peace of God might rule in their hearts, and they live in love and peace one with another, laying aſide all their differences as Jews and Gentiles, about the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moſes; to which the Apoſtle may have a particular reſpect in this concluding wiſh of his, and here indeed properly the epiſtle ends; the following chapter being as a ſort of poſtſcript, filled up with ſalutations and recommendations of particular perſons; wherefore the word Amen is placed here, tho' it is wanting in the Alexandrian copy.

CHAP. XVI.

THIS chapter contains a recommendation of a ſingle perſon, herein mentioned; a liſt of the chief of the ſaints at Rome, who are ſaluted by name, and ſome with ſingular encomiums; a caution to beware of falſe teachers; various ſalutations of perſons that were with the Apoſtle ſent to the church at Rome; and the whole is concluded with a doxology, or an aſcription of glory to God. Firſt, a commendation is given of a woman, by whom this long letter was ſent, who is deſcribed by her name Phebe; by her ſpiritual relation a ſiſter in Chriſt; by her office or character a ſervant of the church at Cenchrea, ver. 1. who is recommended to the ſaints at Rome, to receive her into their communion, munion, converſation and affection, as became them, and to aſſiſt her in every thing ſhe might need from them; which is enforced by this reaſon, becauſe ſhe had been a ſuccourer of the Apoſtle, and many others, ver. 2. and next follows a catalogue of the principal ſaints at Rome, to whom the Apoſtle ſends his chriſtian ſalutations; and among theſe ſtand in the Firſt place Aquila and Priſcilla, and the church in their houſe, ver. 3, 4, 5. who are deſcribed as greatly aſſiſting to him in the cauſe of Chriſt, and as having a ſtrong affection for him; which they ſhewed by riſquing their lives on his account, for which he gives them thanks, as did all the churches: Secondly, Epenetus is next ſaluted, as having a great intereſt in the Apoſtle's affections, and as being one of the firſt converts in Achaia, ver. 5. Thirdly, a woman named Mary, who did her utmoſt to ſerve the Apoſtle, and thoſe that were with him, ver. 6. Fourthly, a couple of ſaints, Andronicus, and Junia, deſcribed by their relation to the Apoſtle, his kinſmen; by their ſufferings with him, fellow-priſoners; by the fame and credit they were in among the chriſtians of the firſt rank, even the Apoſtles; and by their early converſion, being converted before the Apoſtle himſelf, ver. 7. Fifthly, next in the liſt is Amplias, who is ſaluted as in the Lord, and as beloved in him, ver. 8. Sixthly, two worthy men are joined together, Urban and Stachys; the one is ſaluted as an helper in Chriſt, and the other as beloved by the Apoſtle, ver. 9. Seventhly, Apelles is next named, and commended as one approved in Chriſt. Eighthly, the family of Ariſtobulus is greeted, ver. 10. Ninthly, a kinſman of the Apoſtle's, by name Herodion: and Tenthly, the houſhold of Narciſſus, ſaid to be in the Lord, ver. 11. Eleventhly, two excellent women are greeted, who had been indefatigable in the ſervice of Chriſt: and Twelfthly, another woman, by name Perſis, a perſon to be reſpected and loved, on account of her labour in the Lord, ver. 12. Thirteenthly, Rufus is ſaluted as one choſen in Chriſt, and alſo his mother, and who was the mother of the Apoſtle, ver. 13. Fourteenthly, five of the ſaints, are joined together who are mentioned by name, and other brethren with them, whoſe names are not ſet down, ver. 14. and Laſtly, five other ſaints, with all the brethren with them, are likewiſe ſaluted, ver. 15. and theſe, and all the members of the church are exhorted to ſalute one another in an affectionate and chaſte manner, who are told that all the churches ſaluted them, ver. 16. then follows the exhortation to take care of falſe teachers, to mark them, and avoid them; who are deſcribed as ſchiſmaticks and hereticks, making diviſions in the church, and preaching contrary to the Goſpel taught and learned, ver. 17. The arguments or reaſons made uſe of to enforce the exhortation, are taken partly from the characters of theſe teachers, being ſelfiſh men, who ſerved not the Lord Jeſus, but their own bellies; and deceivers, who by ſmooth words and plauſible doctrines impoſed upon ſimple minds, ver. 18. and partly from the characters of the ſaints at Rome, who were ſimple and credulous, and ready to give in to every thing that carried an appearance of truth; and tho' they were to be commended for their ready obedience to the Goſpel, yet it became them to mingle wiſdom and prudence with their ſimplicity and readineſs to receive what appeared to be truth, ver. 19. and from a promiſe of victory over ſatan and his emiſſaries in a ſhort time; to which the Apoſtle annexes his uſual ſalutation, and Amen, as if he had concluded the epiſtle, ver. 20. but adds various ſalutations of perſons that were with him, who deſired to be remembered to the brethren at Rome, as Timotheus a fellow-worker, Lucius, Jaſon and Soſipater, his kinſmen, ver. 21. Tertius the writer of the epiſtle, ver. 22. Gaius the hoſt of the Apoſtle, and of the whole church; Eraſtus, chamberlain of the city of Corinth, and Quartus a brother, ver. 23. and then the Apoſtle repeats the above ſalutation, ver. 24. and yet ſtill has not finiſhed his epiſtle, but concludes with a doxology, ver. 25, 26, 27. in which is celebrated the power of God, in eſtabliſhing his people according to the Goſpel, commended by its being the preaching of Chriſt, and the revelation of the myſtery hid from ages paſt; and the goodneſs of God is alſo taken notice of, in giving orders to make it manifeſt, and in making it manifeſt to the Gentiles, in order to bring them to the obedience of faith; and likewiſe the wiſdom of God is obſerved, to whom wiſdom alone belongs, and which is apparent in the Goſpel before mentioned, and in all the methods of his grace, as well as providence; and glory to him, thro' Chriſt for ever, is wiſhed and prayed for; and ſo ends this excellent and valuable epiſtle.

Ver. 1. I commend unto you Phebe our ſiſter, &c.] This chapter chiefly conſiſts of commendations and ſalutations of perſons, and begins with the former. It was uſual to give letters of commendation of a member of one church to thoſe of another; ſee 2 Cor. iii. 1. The perſon who is here recommended was, as appears from the ſubſcription of this Epiſtle, if that may be depended on, the bearer of this letter, and is deſcribed by her name, Phebe; as ſhe dwelt at Cenchrea, it is probable ſhe was a Grecian, as is her name. Pauſanias[e] makes frequent mention of one of this name in Greece. With the Heathen poets, Phœbus was the ſun, and Phœbe the moon. Though, it is not unlikely, that ſhe might be a Jeweſs, ſince there were many of them in thoſe parts; and this was a name in uſe among them. We often read[f] of R. Iſhmael, בן פאבי, ben Phœbi, which I take to be the ſame name with this. She is recommended as a ſiſter, our ſiſter; not in a natural, but ſpiritual relation; one that was a member of the church at Cenchrea, and in full communion with it; for as it was uſual to call the men brethren, it was common to call the women ſiſters. Elderly men were called fathers, younger men brethren; elderly women were ſtiled mothers, and younger women ſiſters, who were partakers of the grace of God, and enjoyed the fellowſhip of the ſaints: which is a ſervant of the church which is at Cenchrea. This place was a ſea-port of the Corinthians, diſtant from Corinth about ſeventy furlongs, or eight or nine miles: it was on one ſide of the Iſthmus, as Lechea was on the other[g]; ſee the note on Acts xviii. 18. In the way to this place from the Iſthmus, as Pauſanias relates[h], was the temple of Diana, and a very ancient ſculpture; and in Cenchrea itſelf was the temple of Venus, and a wooden image; and near the flow of the ſea was a Neptune of braſs. But now, in this place, was a church of Jeſus Chriſt; and ſince it was ſo near to Corinth, it ſhews, that churches in thoſe early times were not national, or provincial, but congregational. Of this church Phebe was a ſervant, or, as the word ſignifies, a miniſter or deacon; not that ſhe was a teacher of the word, or preacher of the Goſpel, for that was not allowed of by the Apoſtle in the church at Corinth, that a woman ſhould teach; ſee 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35. and therefore would never be admitted at Cenchrea. Rather, as ſome think, ſhe was a deaconneſs appointed by the church, to take care of the poor ſiſters of the church; tho' as they were uſually poor, and ancient women, that were put into that ſervice, and this woman, according to the account of her being neither poor, nor very ancient; it ſeems rather, that being a rich and generous woman, ſhe ſerved or miniſtred to the church by relieving the poor; not out of the churches ſtock, as deaconneſſes did, but out of her own ſubſtance; and received the miniſters of the Goſpel, and all ſtrangers, into her houſe, which was open to all chriſtians; and ſo was exceeding ſerviceable to that church, and to all the ſaints that came thither: though it is certain that among the ancient chriſtians there were women-ſervants who were called miniſters. Pliny, in an epiſtle of his to Trajan the emperour, ſays[i], that he had examined two maids, quæ miniſtræ dicebantur, who were called miniſters, to know the truth of the chriſtian religion.

Ver. 2. That ye receive her in the Lord, &c.] This is one thing he recommends her to them for, that they would receive her in a kind and friendly manner into their houſes, and into their hearts love, and affections; admit her to their private meetings, and into church-fellowſhip with them, and that as one that was in the Lord, and belonged to him; and alſo in his name, and for his ſake: as becometh ſaints; that is, both that they would treat her with that humanity, courteouſneſs, chriſtian affection, and reſpect, as became them who were ſaints by calling and profeſſion; and that they would uſe her as being one of the ſaints, a godly, holy perſon, and as ſuch an one ought to be uſed, by vertue of the communion of ſaints: and that ye aſſiſt her in whatſoever buſineſs ſhe hath need of you: what her buſineſs was at Rome is not known; whether it was only to viſit the ſaints; or whether it was to have a cauſe tried in any court of judicature there; or whether ſhe came upon worldly buſineſs, as Lydia of Thyatira was at Philippi, to ſell her purple, when the Apoſtle Paul was there, it matters not: whatever aſſiſtance they could give her, either by directing her where the ſaints lived; or by giving her proper counſel and advice; or by helping her forward in her worldly affairs; or whatever ſhe was concerned in, this is deſired; and is another thing for which the Apoſtle recommends her to them, adding this reaſon, for ſhe hath been a ſuccourer of many; or a patroneſs of many of the ſaints in neceſſity and diſtreſs. The word that is here uſed ϖροστατις, is, as Harpocratian ſays[k], the name by which ſuch were called by the Athenians, οι των μετοικων ϖροεστηκοτες, that were over the ſojourners, who had the care and direction of them. And ſuch was this woman to the poor ſaints in Cenchrea, and the ſtrangers that came thither; not as being in ſuch an office by the order and appointment of the church, but what ſhe chearfully and voluntarily took up herſelf, and performed at her own expence, otherwiſe there would not be ſo much in the character as to deſerve ſuch peculiar notice, nor ſhe be ſo worthy of praiſe and commendation: moreover; the Apoſtle obſerves, that he alſo partook of her ſuccour and aſſiſtance, and of myſelf alſo; which would hardly have been the caſe had ſhe been one that had only the care of the poor ſiſters of the church, which was the office of the deaconneſs: but ſhe being a rich, generous woman, and the Apoſtle having ſhared in her bounty, gratefully acknowledges it; and he the rather mentions it, as knowing it would the more endear her to the ſaints at Rome, who would take more notice of her for the reſpect ſhe had ſhown to him.

Ver. 3. Greet Priſcilla and Aquila, &c.] The former of theſe, who was a woman, and the wife of the latter, is in ſome copies called Priſca; and ſo the Vulgate Latin here reads it, as ſhe is alſo called in 2 Tim. iv. 19. Her being named before her huſband, is without deſign, for ſometimes he is put before her, as in Acts xviii. 2, 26. 1 Cor. xvi. 19. And it is a rule with the Jews[l], that there is neither firſt nor laſt in the ſcriptures; that is, ſtrict order is not always obſerved; it is ſometimes inverted, and nothing depends upon it: hence the reaſons aſſigned by ſome, that ſhe was firſt converted, or had more zeal than her huſband, are uncertain and impertinent. She is called Triſcilla in the Ethiopic verſion, as he is in the Arabic, Achilles: he was a Jew of Pontus, and was with his wife drove out of Rome by Claudius Cæſar, when with her he went to Corinth, where he met with the Apoſtle Paul; and they being of the ſame craft, abode and wrought together at their trade of tent-making; and when the Apoſtle removed from thence, they went with him, and were with him at Epheſus; where, meeting with Apollos, who, tho' an eloquent man, and mighty in the ſcriptures, yet being in ſome things deficient, theſe two took him unto them, in a private way, and taught him the way of God's ſalvation more perfectly: when they left the Apoſtle, is not certain; but either Claudius being dead, or the edict which ordered the Jews to depart from Rome being revoked, or not regarded, they returned thither again; and were here when the Apoſtle wrote this Epiſtle, and whom he ſalutes, calling them my helpers in Chriſt Jeſus; in ſpreading the Goſpel, and promoting the kingdom, honour, and intereſt of Chriſt; for tho' they did not publickly preach, at leaſt not Priſcilla, yet they were very uſeful in their private conferences and inſtructions, both to miniſters of the Goſpel, as in the caſe of Apollos, and to young chriſtians: as the Apoſtle, where-ever he went, was an inſtrument of the converſion of many ſouls; theſe were helpful privately in encouraging the young converts, comforting them with their own experiences, and thereby helped them forward, inſtructed, ſtrengthened, and eſtabliſhed them; and ſo were greatly aſſiſtant to the Apoſtle in the work of the Lord Jeſus.

Ver. 4. Who for my life laid down their necks, &c.] That is, expoſed themſelves to great danger to ſave the Apoſtle's life: the alluſion is to the manner of executions by beheading, and to one perſon's laying down his head, and offering his neck to the executioner in the room of another: this we are not to ſuppoſe was literally done; but the deſign of the expreſſion is, that in ſome ſhape or another they riſqued their own lives for the Apoſtle's; which might be done either at the inſurrection in Corinth againſt Paul, when the Jews dragged him to the judgment-ſeat of Gallio, and beat Soſthenes the ruler of the ſynagogue before him; or at the uproar in Epheſus by Demetrius, and the craftſmen, when Paul and his companions were in great danger; at both which times and places theſe two perſons were, and being very zealous, were no doubt active to preſerve the Apoſtle, and which he acknowledges with thankfulneſs: unto whom not only I give thanks, but all the churches of the Gentiles; both for the care they took of him, and the danger they expoſed themſelves to on his account; which the Apoſtle expreſſes his ſenſe of gratitude for, and which all the Gentile churches were under obligations to do likewiſe ſince they had a common ſhare in his labours and uſefulneſs, he was the Apoſtle of them all; and alſo for their help and aſſiſtance in carrying on the work of the Lord in all the churches of the Gentiles.

Ver. 5. Likewiſe greet the church that is in their houſe, &c.] Which was either their own family, which might be ſomewhat large, and conſiſting entirely or chiefly of religious perſons; for when they were in other places they had a church in their houſe as well as at Rome; ſee 1 Cor. xvi. 19. or the ſaints at Rome, who uſed to meet privately at their houſe, and pray and ſing praiſes together, ſpeak to one another of the things of God, and build up one another in their moſt holy faith; and from their gathering together in the name of Chriſt, and for the worſhip of him, and among whom his preſence, according to his promiſe, was, they are called a church, or an aſſembly of chriſtians. Salute my well-beloved Epenetus; for though all the ſaints were beloved by the Apoſtle, yet there were ſome, as this good man, for whom he might have, on ſome account or another, a particular affection; as our Lord, as man, had for his diſciple John, tho' he loved all his diſciples. There is one of this name, ſaid to be one of the ſeventy diſciples, and biſhop of Carthage; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Who is the firſt-fruits of Achaia unto Chriſt; that is, either he was one of the chief and principal for gifts and grace, or one of the firſt that was converted to Chriſt in thoſe parts: the alluſion is to the firſt-fruits under the law, which were offered unto the Lord, and were pledges of, and ſanctified the reſt. The Vulgate Latin, inſtead of Achaia, reads, Aſia; and ſo it is read in the Alexandrian copy, and others: the reaſon of this different reading ſeems to be, becauſe the houſe of Stephanas are ſaid to be the firſt-fruits of Achaia, 1 Cor. xvi. 15. But this hinders not but that Epenetus might be ſo too, for he might be one of the family of Stephanas, who was now removed to Rome. If he was a Jew, his Jewiſh name might be Judah, the ſame with Epenetus, in Greek.

Ver. 6. Greet Mary who beſtowed much labour on us.] Some copies read, you; and ſo do the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions: and indeed it ſeems moſt likely that the perſons on whom this good woman beſtowed ſo much labour, and to whom ſhe was ſo very ſerviceable, were the ſaints at Rome, where ſhe lived, rather than the Apoſtle and his companions; not but that ſhe might have been in ſome parts where ſhe had met with him, and his friends, and had been very indefatigable in aſſiſting and ſupplying them in a very generous and liberal manner, with all the neceſſaries of life; and was exceeding uſeful in encouraging the miniſters of the Goſpel, and in promoting the intereſt of Chriſt. Her name Mary, is the ſame with Miriam in Hebrew; whether ſhe was of Jewiſh extract, is not certain, and who ſhe was is not known: ſome have conjectured her to be the ſame that Ignatius wrote an epiſtle to; not Mary of Caſtabilis, but of Naples, who was at Rome in the time of Linus, the Latin verſion reads, Cletus, and of Clement, on whom he beſtows very great characters; calling her moſt faithful, worthy of God, and a bearer of Chriſt, and in all things wiſe[m]: and in another letter[n] of his, he repreſents her as exceeding learned, an exemplar of godly women, and having a church in her houſe. But both theſe epiſtles are thought, by learned men, to be falſly aſcribed to him, and ſo not to be depended on.

Ver. 7. Salute Andronicus and Junia my kinſmen, &c.] According to the fleſh, being perhaps not only of the ſame nation, Jews, but alſo of the ſame tribe, the tribe of Benjamin, and even of the ſame family, and might be nearly allied in blood. And tho' the Apoſtle did not value himſelf upon his carnal deſcent, yet he had a very great value and affection for his relations after the fleſh, even tho' they were only of the ſame nation; ſee Rom. ix. 3. and eſpecially for ſuch as were partakers of the grace of God, as theſe his kinſmen were. Theſe were their Gentile names, the one Greek, the other Latin; but both were Jews. Grotius thinks, that their Jewiſh names were, the one Maſiniſſa, and the other Naarah; and that the latter was the wife of the former, but they rather ſeem both to be men; Junia ſhould be read Junias, a contraction of Junilius: and my fellow-priſoners; either at Philippi, or in ſome other place; for tho' we read only of the Apoſtle's being in priſon at that place, and at Rome, yet it is certain from his own account, 2 Cor. xi. 23. that he was frequently impriſoned; and Clement of Rome ſays, he was ſeven times in bonds[o], at one of which times theſe were bound with him, but when and where is not known. This is a greater character of them, and a greater honour to them, than to be called his kinſmen after the fleſh: who are of note among the Apoſtles; were well known by, and in great account with the twelve Apoſtles, tho' not of their number; they might be converted by them, and be followers of them in Judea; they are thought by ſome to be of the number of the ſeventy diſciples, whom Chriſt himſelf ſent forth to preach: Andronicus particularly is mentioned among them, and ſaid to be biſhop of Pannonia, or rather of Spain; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. however, they might be preachers of the Goſpel, and be perſons of great fame and renown as ſuch; for which reaſon they might be called Apoſtles, that being a name ſometimes given to ordinary miniſters of the word, and to ſuch who were meſſengers of the churches, 2 Cor. viii. 23. as theſe might be, and were famous for their prudent, faithful, and diligent diſcharge of their office and duty: who alſo were in Chriſt before me; which is to be underſtood, not of their ſecret being in Chriſt, as being loved by him, choſen in him, given to him, and repreſented by him in the covenant of grace; for they had not a place in Chriſt's heart, or a ſhare in his love before him; wherefore the Arabic verſion is not only a bad one, but carries a falſe ſenſe in it; which renders the clauſe thus, who were in the love of Chriſt before me: nor were they choſen in Chriſt before him, for all the elect were choſen together in him before the foundation of the world; nor were they given to him, put into his hands, and made his care and charge before him; nor were they conſidered in Chriſt as their covenant-head before him; Chriſt became their ſurety for them together, and received grace, bleſſings, and promiſes for them, and they in him before the world began; and was their common head and repreſentative in time, in their nature; and they were all together crucified, buried, and raiſed with him, and ſet down with him in heavenly places together. But they were in the profeſſion of faith, and in the church of Chriſt, and in the miniſtry of the word before him, being converted and brought to the faith of Chriſt before he was; which is the ſaints open being in Chriſt, and is the effect and evidence of their being ſecretly in him from everlaſting: this is to be created in Chriſt, or made new creatures in him; to be brought to believe in him, and even into him for righteouſneſs, pardon, peace, acceptance, and eternal life, which are in him; and to live upon him, and in him, and derive all light and life, grace, and ſtrength, joy, peace, and comfort from him, as the branch derives its ſap and nouriſhment from the vine, in which it is; and in this ſenſe theſe men were in Chriſt before the Apoſtle; they were converted perſons, profeſſors of religion, members of a church, and Goſpel-miniſters before him: and tho' this is nothing in the buſineſs of ſalvation, who is called firſt or laſt; the one is equally as ſafe and as happy as the other; the thief that was called at the laſt hour, and the laſt man that will be called by grace in the world; yet it is a great bleſſing and mercy to be converted betimes; hereby a multitude of ſins is prevented, and more ſervice done for Chriſt. And doubtleſs, the Apoſtle had this in view, and therefore gives theſe his kinſmen the preference to himſelf, that whilſt he was a blaſphemer of Chriſt, a perſecutor of his people, and injurious to his intereſt; theſe made a profeſſion of his name, preached his Goſpel, and ſerved his cauſe: it ſhows alſo, that they were perſevering chriſtians, were pillars in the houſe of God, and never went out; and on account of their conſtancy and long ſtanding, were worthy of reſpect. The Apoſtle riſes gradually in the character of theſe perſons; as it was more to be fellow priſoners with him, than to be his kinſmen, ſo it was more to be of note among the Apoſtles, or to be eminent preachers of the Goſpel, than to be fellow-priſoners with him; and it was more to be in Chriſt than them all, than to be Paul's kinſmen, fellow-priſoners with him, or to be known and approved of by the Apoſtles, to be meſſengers of churches, preachers of the word, or even to be Apoſtles themſelves, and the chiefeſt of them; for ſuch are bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings in Chriſt, are compleat and perfect in him, are ſafe and ſecure, and can never periſh; and being once in Chriſt, are always in him, and will be found in him living and dying, and at judgment.

Ver. 8. Greet Amplias my beloved in the Lord.] This was a Roman name; the Vulgate Latin reads Ampliatus, and ſo do the Alexandrian copy, and the Ethiopic verſion: ſome call him Amphias, and Amphiatus, and ſay, but whether on good authority I will not affirm, that this man was biſhop of Odyſſus; but be he who he will, the Apoſtle had a ſingular affection for him; and that not upon any external account, as natural relation, riches, honour, learning, &c. but for the Lord's ſake, and as he was in Chriſt, a member of him, and ſo in a ſpiritual relation to the Apoſtle; a brother of his, as the Ethiopic verſion here calls him; and becauſe he was honoured with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, and for his uſefulneſs in the Goſpel of Chriſt Jeſus.

Ver. 9. Salute Urbane our helper in Chriſt, &c.] This alſo was a Roman name, and which many of the popes of Rome have ſince taken to themſelves; he is ſaid to be one of the ſeventy diſciples, and to be a biſhop in Macedonia; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. which is not very probable: others have conjectured him to be one of the paſtors of the church of Rome, which is more likely; and if he was, but few of his ſucceſſors have deſerved the character given of him, an helper in Chriſt; in ſpreading the Goſpel, and enlarging the kingdom and intereſt of Chriſt: and Stachys my beloved; this is a Greek name, he is ſaid to be one of the ſeventy diſciples, and biſhop of Byzantium; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. According to the Roman martyrology, he was ordained biſhop of the Byzantine church, by Andrew the Apoſtle, but this is not be depended on; he was however, becauſe of his faith in Chriſt, and love to him, or on ſuch like ſpiritual accounts, very dear to the Apoſtle.

Ver. 10. Salute Apelles approved in Chriſt, &c.] Origen was in doubt whether this was not the ſame perſon with Apollos the Alexandrian Jew, whom Aquila and Priſcilla met with at Epheſus; but had he been intended, the Apoſtle would doubtleſs have ſaid more of him, he being ſo eminent and remarkable a preacher of the Goſpel; though indeed the character here given, is very conſiderable; beſides, Apollos did not live at Rome, though it was not impoſſible he might be there at this time. The name ſeems to be a Greek one, there was a famous painter of this name in Greece; though it was alſo uſed among the Jews, and this perſon here might poſſibly be a Jew; for Horace [p] ſpeaks of one of this name, when he ſays, credat Judæus Apella; by whom he means, not as many have thought, a circumciſed Jew in general, but a particular perſon, a Jew of that name: but it is of no importance, whether he was a Jew or a Gentile; ſome ſay he was one of the ſeventy diſciples, and biſhop of Smyrna; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. However, he was one that was approved in Chriſt; approved of God in Chriſt, who approves of none but in Chriſt; not of any on account of their own commendations, or thoſe of others; for not he that commendeth himſelf is approved of God, nor whom others commend; and oftentimes what is highly eſteemed of men, is abominable in the ſight of God; nor does he approve of any on the ſcore of their own works and duties, or as in themſelves conſidered, whoſe righteouſneſs is as filthy rags, and they themſelves polluted and unclean; but as in Chriſt his well-beloved Son, in whom he is well pleaſed, and with all in him; and ſo God's elect are, as this man was, approved of in him the beloved, even in his own Son, in whom both perſons and ſervices are accepted: moreover, he was approved of by Chriſt, and that from eternity, as preſented to him in the glaſs of his Father's purpoſes and decrees; and in time, as adorned with his own grace, and cloathed with his juſtifying righteouſneſs, and as faithfully ſerving him in his day and generation: he was alſo proved to be in Chriſt; he had proved it to himſelf, to his own ſatisfaction, by obſerving upon ſelf examination, that Chriſt was in him; and he had made it to appear to others, by his faith in Chriſt, love to him, zeal for him, and cloſe attachment to his Goſpel, againſt all errors and hereſies, whereby they that are approved, are made manifeſt; and that in the face of all oppoſition and perſecution: he was tried and proved, and ſo approved by a variety of tribulations and afflictions; his faith remained firm, and he abode by the intereſt of a Redeemer; and ſo he was tried, or proved, as the Arabic verſion renders it, in the religion of Chriſt; in which he was ſincere, upright, and faithful; his faith was unfeigned, his love without diſſimulation, he was an Iſraelite indeed, in whom there was no guile: if a preacher of the word, he did not corrupt it, but in ſincerity, and as in the ſight of God and Chriſt, ſpoke it; and if only a private believer, he was one that deſired the ſincere milk of the word, and was in all reſpects a ſincere, upright man in Chriſt; ſo the word here uſed may be underſtood, being the reverſe of αδοκιμος, reprobate, rejected, ſpurious, adulterate, and diſapproved: in a word, this character ſhows, that he was not only approved of God and Chriſt, but of all good men, and particularly the Apoſtle; and that on account of his being in Chriſt, united to him, and cloſely attached to his ſervice and intereſt, and was an honour to it: ſalute them which are of Ariſtobulus's houſhold. This was alſo a Greek name, though in uſe among the Jews; there was one of this name maſter of Ptolomy, king of Egypt, who was of Jewiſh extract, and of the prieſts, 2 Maccab. i. 10. One of the ſons of Hyrcanus, the high-prieſt of the Jews, was called by this name; Herod had a ſon of this name, and it was a name much in uſe in his family, and among his deſcendants: who this man was is not known, nor is he himſelf ſaluted by the Apoſtle; either becauſe he was now dead, or was abſent from Rome at this time; for ſome ſay he was ſent into Britain, our iſle, to preach the Goſpel, of which he is ſaid to be biſhop, and one of the ſeventy diſciples; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. or perhaps he might not be a believer in Chriſt, only his houſhold believers, and therefore they only are taken notice of.

Ver. 11. Salute Herodion my kinſman, &c.] According to the fleſh, being of the ſame nation a Jew; or of the ſame tribe, the tribe of Benjamin; or of the ſame family, and nearly allied in blood to him; though the name is of Attic, or Parthic original, and ſeems to be a derivative of Herod; this man is reckoned among the ſeventy diſciples, and ſaid to be biſhop of Tarſus; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Greet them that be of the houſhold of Narciſſus, which are in the Lord; ſome have thought, that this Narciſſus is the ſame man that Suetonius [q], and other writers ſpeak of [r], who was ſecretary to Claudius Cæſar; a very great favourite of his, who amaſſed a great deal of wealth under him, and was raiſed to great honour and dignity by him: he himſelf is not ſaluted, either becauſe he was not at home, which might be the caſe, if as Ambroſe, or rather Hilary the deacon on the text ſays, he was a preſbyter and abroad, performing his office in foreign parts; or becauſe he was dead, or rather not a believer: if he was the ſame with Claudius's favourite, he was dead before this time, being miſerably put to death by Agrippina [s], the wife of Claudius; and ſeems to have died a wicked man, and juſtly puniſhed for his being the cauſe of the deſtruction of others, through his calumnies: nor are all of his houſhold ſaluted, not being all converted perſons; it being frequently the method of divine grace, to take ſome of a family and not all, and bring them to Zion; only thoſe that were in the Lord, on his heart, and in his hands, ſecretly repreſented by him, and united to him, and who were openly in him, being called by his grace, and brought to believe in him, and live upon him.

Ver. 12. Salute Tryphena and Tryphoſa, who labour in the Lord, &c.] Theſe two were women, and are ſaid to be noble women of Iconium, whom the Apoſtle converted there, and afterwards went to Rome. The names are Greek [t], though they might be Jewiſh women, ſince Tryphon is the name of a man among the Jews. Trypho the famous Jew, with whom Juſtin Martyr had his dialogue, is well known, and perhaps is the ſame with R. Tarphon, or Tryphon, ſo often mentioned in the Miſnic and Talmudic writings: however, as theſe were women, their labour can't be underſtood of their labouring in the word of the Lord, or in the publick miniſtry of it, ſince this was forbid by the Apoſtle, and therefore would never commend them on account of it; but of their great uſefulneſs and indefatigableneſs, in ſerving the intereſt of their dear Lord with their purſes; in relieving the poor of the church, in entertaining and ſupplying the miniſters of the Goſpel, as well as by their private inſtructions, exhortations, and giving an account of their own experience, whereby they might greatly encourage, edify, and ſtrengthen young converts, and other chriſtians, as Priſcilla with her huſband did; and were unwearied in doing every thing that they were capable of, in promoting the Goſpel and kingdom of Chriſt: ſalute the beloved Perſis, which laboured much in the Lord; who being a woman alſo, and perhaps of Perſic original, and might have her name from her country; her labour muſt be underſtood of the ſame kind with the former, only with this addition, that ſhe abounded and exceeded in it; ſhe is ſaid by the Syriac Scholiaſt, to be the wife of Rufus, mentioned in the next verſe.

Ver. 13. Salute Rufus choſen in the Lord, &c.] This was a Roman name; frequent mention is made in Jewiſh writings [u], of one Turnus Rufus, a Roman officer, that deſtroyed the temple, and plowed up the city of Jeruſalem; the name was in uſe among the Cyrenians, for one of the ſons of Simon of Cyrene, whom the Jews compelled to carry the croſs of Chriſt, was ſo called, Mark xv. 21. and ſome have thought that the ſame perſon is here meant, nor is it unlikely; he is ſaid to be one of the ſeventy diſciples, and to be biſhop of Thebes; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. The Apoſtle knew him, and that as one choſen in the Lord; meaning either that he was a choice believer in Chriſt, an excellent chriſtian, one of the higheſt form; for though all true believers have like precious faith, yet ſome are ſtrong, and others weak, in the exerciſe of it; this man was eminent for his faith in Chriſt: or he might be one that was choſen to ſome office in the church, as to that of a deacon, or paſtor; though had this been the caſe, it is much the particular office was not mentioned: rather therefore this is to be underſtood, of his being choſen in Chriſt to grace and glory, and that from all eternity; for the phraſe is only uſed in one place more, Eph. i. 4. and there moſt manifeſtly deſigns the election of perſons in Chriſt, before the foundation of the world; which election is made not for Chriſt, or the ſake of his merits, his blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice, which have no cauſal influence on this act, and which purely ariſes from the love and grace of God; nor merely by him as God equal with the Father, tho' this is true; but in him, as the head and repreſentative of the choſen ones: this inſtance, as others, ſhows that election is not of nations, nor churches, but of particular perſons; and ſo expreſſes the diſtinguiſhing, free, and ſovereign grace of God in it, that one and not another ſhould be choſen; tho' theſe are on an equal foot, and ſo not owing to foreſeen faith, holineſs, and good works. The Apoſtle knew this man to be a choſen veſſel, not by immediate revelation, or divine inſpiration, but by his faith in Chriſt, and love to him, and by the power of the Goſpel on him; and ſo may any one know himſelf, or another man hereby to be choſen, and ought in a judgment of charity, ſo to think of him, as long as his life is agreeable to his profeſſion; ſee 1 Theſſ. i. 4, 5. The Apoſtle not only ſalutes this man, but his mother alſo, who doubtleſs was a believer in Chriſt, and highly reſpected by him: and his mother and mine; the mother of Rufus in nature, and his mother in affection; and who very probably had indeared herſelf to the Apoſtle, by ſome kind offices, which ſhe, as a chriſtian, had performed towards him; for the Apoſtle cannot mean his own natural mother, beſides Rufus's, whom he ſalutes, and whom Anſelm on the place ſuggeſts might be at Rome; ſince it can hardly be thought he would have paſſed the mention of her, in ſo tranſient a manner.

Ver. 14. Salute Aſyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, &c.] The two firſt of theſe names are Greek, and the perſons called by them, with Herodion before-mentioned, are taken notice of in the Roman martyrology, as diſciples of the Apoſtle; Aſyncritus is ſaid to be biſhop of Hyrcania, and Phlegon of Marathon, and both of the ſeventy diſciples; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Hermas is ſaid to be biſhop of Philippi, or Aquileia, and brother of pope Pius the firſt, and to be the author of the book called Paſtor, or The Shepherd, cited by many of the ancients; but all is doubtful and uncertain. Patrobas is a Roman name, Martial makes mention of it[w]; it ſeems to be compoſed of the Greek word πατηρ, or the Latin pater, and the Syriac אבא, Abba, and ſignifies the ſame as the other two. This man might be a Jew, whoſe name was Abba; we often read of R. Abba in the Jewiſh writings[x], and as the Jews were wont to have two names, the one Gentile, the other Jewiſh, Pater might be this man's Gentile name, and Abba his Jewiſh one, and both being put together, by contraction, be called Patrobas; he is ſaid to be of the ſeventy diſciples, and to be biſhop of Puteoli; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. The laſt of them, Hermes, is a Greek name, the ſame with Mercurius, whom the Lyſtrians called Paul by, in Acts xiv. 12. who he was is not known; he is alſo mentioned among the ſeventy diſciples, and ſaid to be biſhop of Dalmatia: and the brethren which are with them; theſe ſeem to have lived together, with others who were their brethren, not in a natural, but ſpiritual relation, and whom the Apoſtle owned and loved as ſuch.

Ver. 15. Salute Philologus, and Julia, &c.] The firſt of theſe is a Greek name, and the name of a man, and ſignifies a lover of learning. This name Atteius aſſumed to himſelf, which Eratoſthenes had done before him, becauſe of his great learning[y]; this man is reckoned among the ſeventy diſciples, and is ſaid to be biſhop of Sinope; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Julia is a woman's name, and Roman, probably the wife of the former; one of Stephens's copies read, Junia: Nereus, and his ſiſter, and Olympas, and all the ſaints which are with them; who all dwelt together alſo in one family; and were ſaints, by ſeparation, imputation, and effectual vocation; were called to be ſaints, and lived as ſuch, and had a place in the Apoſtle's affections on that account: Nerio, or Neriene, according to Gellius[z], was a name with the Sabines, ſignifying ſtrength, from whence came Nero; and Olympas is the ſame with Olympius, ſaid to be of the ſeventy diſciples, and a Roman martyr; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. It deſerves ſome notice, that among all the perſons here mentioned by name, known by the Apoſtle to be at Rome, that he takes no notice of Peter; which ſurely he would have done, had he been, as the Papiſts ſay, biſhop of Rome, and reſided there.

Ver. 16. Salute one another with an holy kiſs, &c.] Chriſtian ſalutation, is a wiſhing all temporal, ſpiritual, and eternal happineſs, to one another; and which as it ſhould be mutual, ſhould be alſo hearty and ſincere, and this is meant by the holy kiſs; the alluſion is to a common cuſtom in moſt nations, uſed by friends at meeting or parting, to kiſs each other, in token of their hearty love, and ſincere affection and friendſhip for each other; and is called holy, to diſtinguiſh it from an unchaſte and laſcivious one; and from an hypocritical and deceitful one, ſuch an one as Joab gave to Amaſa, when enquiring of his health, he took him by the beard to kiſs him, and ſtabbed him under the fifth rib; and as Judas, who cried, hail maſter, to Chriſt, and kiſſed him, and betrayed him into the hands of his enemies. I ſay, 'tis an alluſion to this cuſtom, for it is only an alluſion; the Apoſtle did not mean, that any outward action ſhould be made uſe of, only that their chriſtian ſalutations ſhould not be mere complaiſance, or expreſſed by bare words, and outward geſtures and actions, either of the hand or mouth; but that they ſhould ſpring from real love and true friendſhip, and be without diſſimulation, hearty and ſincere: the churches of Chriſt ſalute you. The Vulgate Latin, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions read, all the churches; that is, in Greece, or in the neighbourhood where the Apoſtle was, and who might know of his writing to this church, and thereby ſend their chriſtian ſalutations to it; or if they did not know of his writing, yet as he knew their ſincere affections, and hearty good-will to this church, and the members of it, he in their names ſent greetings to them: this ſhows the communion of churches, and how they ought to wiſh and ſincerely deſire each others welfare.

Ver. 17. Now I beſeech you brethren, &c.] The Apoſtle being about to finiſh his epiſtle, and recollecting that he had not given this church any inſtructions about the falſe teachers, who had been the cauſe of all their differences and uneaſineſs, inſerts them here; or he purpoſely put them in this place, amidſt his ſalutations, that they might be taken the more notice of; and very pertinently, ſince nothing could more expreſs his great affection and tender concern for them; and theſe inſtructions he delivers to them, not in an authoritative way, as he might, and ſometimes did, but by way of intreaty, beſeeching them, and with the kind and loving appellation of brethren, the more to engage them to attend to what he was about to ſay to them: mark them which cauſe diviſions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned The men he would have taken notice of, were ſuch who divided them in their religious ſentiments, introducing heterodox notions, contrary to the doctrine of the ſcriptures, of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and which they had learned from them; ſuch as juſtification by the works of the law, the obſervance of Jewiſh days, and abſtinence from meats, enjoined by the ceremonial law, and that as neceſſary to ſalvation; to which ſome gave heed, and others not, and ſo were divided; whereas the doctrine of faith is but one, the Goſpel is one uniform thing, all of a piece; and thoſe that profeſs it, ought to be perfectly joined together in the ſame mind, and in the ſame judgment: hence their minds were alienated from each other, and they began to deſpiſe and judge one another, yea, to go into factions and parties, being unwilling to receive and admit each other to communion; and thus by theſe men they were divided in ſentiments, affection, and worſhip; and which muſt needs cauſe offence to the church and the godly members of it, as well as cauſe many ſo to be offended, as to ſtumble and fall from the doctrine of faith, and profeſſion of it, and greatly ſtagger and diſtreſs weak believers, and bring a ſcandal on religion, and the name and ways of Chriſt among the world, as nothing does more ſo than the jars and diſcords among chriſtians: wherefore the Apoſtle adviſes to mark ſuch perſons, look out for, narrowly watch, ſtrictly obſerve, and diligently examine them: The metaphor is taken from watchmen, who look out from their watch-tower, and obſerve who are coming, or paſs by, and take up ſuſpicious perſons, and carefully enquire who they are, and what they are about, and whether friends or foes. So both miniſters of the Goſpel, and members of churches, ſhould not be aſleep, which is the opportunity falſe teachers take to ſow the ſeeds of falſe doctrine, diſcord, and contention, but ſhould watch, and be upon their guard, and look diligently, that none among them fail of, or fall from the doctrine of grace, or any root of bitterneſs, error, or hereſy, as well as immorality, ſpring up, which may be troubleſome, and defile others; they ſhould obſerve, and take notice of ſuch who are buſy to ſpread falſe doctrine, ſhould watch their motions, follow them cloſely, take them to an account, examine their principles according to the word of God; and if found to be contrary thereunto, note them as falſe teachers: and avoid them; ſhun their miniſtry, drop attendance on it, depart far from them, have no private converſation with them, receive them not into their houſes, nor bid them God ſpeed; with ſuch do not eat, have no communion with them at the Lord's table, withdraw from them as diſorderly perſons, who act contrary to the doctrine and order of the Goſpel, and after proper admonition reject them from all fellowſhip with you.

Ver. 18. For they that are ſuch ſerve not our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] They don't preach him, but themſelves; they don't ſeek the things of Chriſt, his honour and glory, the ſpread of his Goſpel, and the enlargement of his kingdom and intereſt; they ſeek their own things, worldly honour, and applauſe, riches, wealth, and grandeur; they ſeek to pleaſe men, and ſo are not the ſervants of Chriſt: they introduced the obſervance of meats and drinks into the kingdom of Chriſt, which it don't conſiſt of, and neglected the doctrines of righteouſneſs and peace, from whence ſprings joy in the Holy Ghoſt, and ſo in theſe ſpiritual things did not ſerve Chriſt; and therefore, as they were not acceptable to God, were not to be approved of by chriſtian men, but to be marked and avoided: but their own belly; which they made a god of, and devoted themſelves to the ſervice of; all their views were to gratify and indulge their ſenſual appetite. The falſe teachers among the Jews were particularly addicted to this vice: hence the Apoſtle ſometimes calls them dogs, on account of their voraciouſneſs, and who, in Iſaiah's time, were greedy ones that could never have enough; and in our Lord's time devoured widows houſes, under a pretence of long prayers for them; and were like the Cretians, evil beaſts, and ſlow bellies, unwilling to labour, and lived upon the ſpoil of others: and by good words, and fair ſpeeches, deceive the hearts of the ſimple; they were deceivers; they lay in wait to deceive, made uſe of the hidden things of diſhoneſty, walked in craftineſs, and handled the word of God deceitfully; and therefore to be marked and avoided: they deceived the ſimple, harmleſs, and innocent, that think no evil, nor are aware of any; who have little underſtanding of things; perſons of weak minds, eaſy to be impoſed upon; very credulous, ready to believe every word, ſo the ſimple man does, as Solomon ſays; and ſuch falſe teachers chuſe to tamper with, and make their attacks upon, being able to gain upon them the moſt eaſily, as their father the devil, the old ſerpent, did, when he firſt aſſailed human nature: the hearts of theſe they deceive; they work upon their affections, blind their underſtandings, impoſe on their judgments, and corrupt their minds from the ſimplicity that is in Chriſt: and this they do by good words and fair ſpeeches; either by making uſe of the words of ſcripture, and a ſhew of arguments taken from thence; ſo ſatan cited ſcripture in his diſpute with our Lord; and ſo hereticks, in all ages, have pretended to it in favour of their principles, by which means they have gained on many to follow their pernicious ways; or by uſing words and phraſes that faithful miniſters of Chriſt uſe, ſuch as the grace of God, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, the Spirit of Chriſt, but in a different ſenſe; as ſome among us now frequently make mention of them, when they mean no more by them, than the light of nature within them, and the dictates of a natural conſcience; or by an elegant ſtile, a ſett of fine words, a flow of rhetorical expreſſions, great ſwelling words of vanity, which ſuch men generally affect, and ſo work themſelves into the admiration of the common people; or by doctrines ſuited to the carnal minds and reaſonings of men, which tickle human nature, and ſwell it with pride and vanity; as by preaching up the purity and power of it, aſſerting man's free-will, and the ſtrength of it to that which is good; the capacity of man to keep the law, and perform good works; juſtification by them before God, and acceptance with him, on account of them; atonement for ſins committed, by repentance and reformation; that God does not regard trifling things, ſome ſins are venial, and eaſily paſſed over; that concupiſcence is no ſin; God does not rigorouſly exact duty, he takes the will for the deed, and is merciful unto all, and if but ſincere, there is no doubt of heaven; and ſuch men, generally ſpeaking, inſtead of correcting vice, and reproving men for their ſins, connive at them, indulge them in them, ſooth and flatter, commend and defend them, whereby they attach them to their perſons and intereſt.

Ver. 19. For your obedience is come abroad unto all men, &c.] That is, as the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions render it, the fame and report of their obedience to the faith, to the doctrine of the Goſpel, and the miniſters of it, was ſpread every where, was well known to every one, and ſpoken of with commendation among all the churches in all nations; and this the Apoſtle mentions as another reaſon, why they ſhould beware of falſe teachers, ſince it would be greatly to their reproach, ſhould they after all this, drop that form of doctrine which they had obeyed, deſert the faithful miniſters of the word, and follow theſe falſe teachers; ſhould this be the caſe, they would be as notorious for their diſobedience, as now for their obedience: and moreover, the Apoſtle might hereby ſuggeſt, that whereas it was every where known, how readily and at once they embraced the Goſpel of Chriſt; this credulity and readineſs to believe, which was their commendation, might have invited falſe teachers among them, who might hope and take encouragement from hence, the more eaſily to gain upon them; and therefore they ought to be upon their watch and guard, and beware of them, and not believe every ſpirit: I am glad therefore on your behalf; that they had ſo chearfully and readily embraced the Goſpel, and from the heart obeyed that form of doctrine delivered to them; and that their praiſe for this was in all the churches of Chriſt, and had every where a good report on this account: but yet I would have you wiſe unto that which is good, and ſimple concerning evil; which is juſt the reverſe of natural and unregenerate men, who are wiſe to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge; ſome reference ſeems to be had to the words of Chriſt in Matt. x. 16. the Apoſtle's meaning is, that though he rejoiced at the heartineſs and ſimplicity of their obedience, and the credit they obtained abroad on account of it, yet was not without his fears and jealouſies concerning them; and could not but greatly wiſh them more wiſdom to underſtand the doctrines of the Goſpel, to diſcern things that differ, and approve that which is the moſt excellent, and hold faſt that which is good; and with all their harmleſſneſs, innocence, and ſimplicity, prudently guard againſt all evil doctrines and principles, ſuch as might unawares lead them into bad practices, diſhonourable to religion, and uncomfortable to themſelves.

Ver. 20. And the God of peace, &c.] See the note on chap. xv. 33. ſhall bruiſe ſatan under your feet ſhortly. Some read this by way of wiſh or prayer, may the God of peace bruiſe; ſo the Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Ethiopic verſions, and the Alexandrian copy; but others as ours, as a promiſe, or as expreſſive of the Apoſtle's faith and hope in this matter; and which he mentions to encourage the members of this church to be upon their guard, and make head againſt theſe falſe teachers; ſince in a little time they might be aſſured of victory, over ſatan and theſe his emiſſaries: as it is before ſuggeſted, that the methods theſe men uſed to beguile weak minds, were much like thoſe that ſatan uſed when he attacked our firſt parents, ſo here is a manifeſt alluſion to what was ſaid by way of threatning to him, it the woman's ſeed ſhall bruiſe thy head, Gen. iii. 15. and which has had its accompliſhment in Chriſt, who has not only deſtroyed the works of the devil, but him himſelf, and ſpoiled his principalities and powers, and bruiſed him and them under his feet, when he led captivity captive; and tho' for the trial of the graces of his people, ſatan is permitted to attack them in various ſhapes, yet in a ſhort time he will be bruiſed under their feet, as he is already under their Lord and Maſter's. The Apoſtle refers not ſo much to his coming among them in a ſhort time, when he might hope and believe, that he ſhould be an inſtrument of cruſhing theſe men ſatan made uſe of, of quelling the contentions they raiſed, and putting a ſtop to the diviſions they made, and under the influence, and by the aſſiſtance of the God of peace, reſtore them to their former peace and tranquillity, tho' it is a ſenſe not to be deſpiſed; much leſs does he refer to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, which was to be in a very ſhort time, when the crucifiers of Chriſt, and the perſecutors of the ſaints would have the wrath of God come upon them to the uttermoſt, ſince theſe Romans had no great and immediate concern with them; nor does he regard the ſpread of the Goſpel in the Gentile world, whereby ſatan fell as lightning from heaven, and was caſt out of the idol temples, for this was greatly fulfilled already; but rather he refers to the times of Conſtantine, when ſatan's ſeat at Rome was overturned, when he was caſt down from his throne and trampled under feet, who had deceived the whole world, the whole Roman empire, when the Goſpel triumphed over its ſecret and open enemies, prophane perſecutors, and perfidious teachers, over idolatry and ſuperſtition on the one hand, and error and hereſy on the other, tho' this did not laſt long; wherefore ſome have thought the Apoſtle refers to the latter day, when ſatan ſhall be bound a thouſand years, or to the laſt of all, when he ſhall be for ever under the feet of the ſaints, and never be able to give them any more trouble; and this the Apoſtle might ſay would be ſhortly, ſince the ſecond coming of Chriſt was expected to be quickly: yea, this may be applied to the caſe of every believer now, and be for his encouragement to be vigilant and on his guard againſt ſatan, to reſiſt him, repel his temptations, and oppoſe his emiſſaries; ſince he may aſſure himſelf, he ſhall be more than a conqueror over him thro' Chriſt, that has loved him, and that in a very little time, when death comes, and he ſhall enter into the Joy of his Lord, where he will be out of the reach of ſatan, and unmoleſted by him. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you, Amen; to enable you to abide by the truth; to mark and avoid the authors of ſects, and cauſes of diviſions, and offences; to oppoſe error and defend truth; to keep from falling, to ſtand againſt every aſſault of ſatan, and to bear up under every temptation of his; to get the victory over him, and to preſerve them ſafe to the kingdom and glory of Chriſt

Ver. 21. Timotheus my work-fellow, &c.] Now follow the ſalutations of the friends and companions of the Apoſtle: we may imagine that when this epiſtle was juſt concluding, that theſe his friends being about him, one ſaid pray ſend my chriſtian ſalutation to our dear friends at Rome, ſo ſaid a ſecond, and likewiſe a third, and ſo on, and Timotheus he began. This is the ſame perſon with Timothy, a diſciple the Apoſtle met with at Derbe, whoſe father was a Greek, and his mother a Jeweſs, and a believer in Chriſt. This ſame man he circumciſed becauſe of the Jews, and took him along with him, and was his companion in his travels, and very aſſiſting to him in the work of the miniſtry, in ſpreading the Goſpel, and promoting the intereſt of Jeſus Chriſt; and therefore he here calls him his work-fellow; he wrote two epiſtles to him afterwards when at a diſtance from him, in which he often calls him his ſon, his dear and well-beloved ſon, having a great affection for him, becauſe as a ſon with a father he ſerved with him in the Goſpel of Chriſt: and Lucius, and Jaſon, and Soſipater my kinſmen ſalute you. This Lucius was either Lucius of Cyrene, who was one of the prophets in the church at Antioch, Acts xiii. 1. tho' indeed he is never ſaid to travel with the Apoſtle, or to be at Corinth from whence this epiſtle was written; or rather therefore, as others think, Luke the evangeliſt, who was a conſtant companion of the Apoſtle, and was at Corinth with him at this time, as appears from Acts xx. 5. Jaſon no doubt is he of Theſſalonica, that received Paul and Silas into his houſe, and when an uproar was made concerning them, was brought before the rulers of the city, and gave ſecurity for them, Acts xvii. 5, 6, 9. This is a Jewiſh name, and he himſelf was a Jew, as is clear from his being a kinſman of the Apoſtle's; his name was ישוע, Jeſhua or Jeſus; ſo we read of one Jaſon the brother of Onias the high-prieſt of the Jews, 2 Maccab. iv. 7. and whoſe name, as Joſephus[a] relates, was Jeſus, but he choſe to be called Jaſon, very likely becauſe that was a name among the Greeks, whoſe faſhions he was fond of. Soſipater was Sopater of Berea, who, with others accompanied the Apoſtle into Aſia, Acts xx. 4. he alſo was a Jew, and his Jewiſh name, as Grotius conjectures, might be Abiſha, or rather Abiſhua, the name of the ſon of Phinehas the high-prieſt, 1 Chron. vi. 4. Mention is alſo made of one of this name, Soſipater, in 2 Maccab. xii. 19, 24. Theſe three laſt were Paul's kinſmen after the fleſh, as well as in the Spirit; being of the ſame nation, and perhaps of the ſame tribe, and it may be of the ſame family; they are all three mentioned among the ſeventy diſciples: Lucius is ſaid to be biſhop of Laodicea in Syria, Jaſon of Tarſus, and Soſipater of Iconium; ſee the note on Luke x. 1.

Ver. 22. I Tertius, who wrote this epiſtle, &c.] This name is a Latin one, and perhaps the perſon might be a Roman, for the names Secundus, Tertius, Quartus, Quintus, &c. were common with the Romans; unleſs it may be thought, as it is by ſome, that this man was the ſame with Silas, who was a conſtant companion of the Apoſtle; and the Hebrew word שליש is the ſame as Tertius; he alſo is numbered among the ſeventy diſciples, and ſaid to be biſhop of Iconium; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Whoever he was, it is certain he was an Amanuenſis of the Apoſtle, who wrote this letter, either from the Apoſtle's notes, or from his mouth. Salute you in the Lord. Some connect this phraſe in the Lord, with the other wrote this epiſtle, and make the ſenſe to be that he wrote this epiſtle for the Lord's ſake, for his honour and glory; which he might do, tho' he wrote it not by inſpiration, being only ſcribe to the Apoſtle; but it is better connected with the word ſalute, and the ſenſe is, that his ſalutation was not a mere form, nor only concerned their temporal good, but their ſpiritual welfare; that he wiſhed them well in the Lord, that they might have much communion with him, and larger meaſures of grace from him.

Ver. 23. Gaius mine hoſt, &c.] There was one Gaius a Macedonian, that was with the Apoſtle at Epheſus, Acts xix. 29. and another Gaius of Derbe, that accompanied him into Aſia, Acts xx. 4. whether either of theſe, as the latter ſeems more probable, was this perſon, is not certain. However, it ſeems very likely that it is the ſame Gaius the Apoſtle baptized at Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14. and ſome have thought him to be the ſame that the Apoſtle John wrote his third epiſtle to, and indeed the characters of hoſpitality and generoſity there given him, well agree with this, who was not only the Apoſtle's hoſt that entertained him in a kind and liberal manner, but of all the ſaints: and of the whole church ſaluteth you; that is, of the church at Corinth, to whom he was kind and hoſpitable, even to as many as ſtood in need of his aſſiſtance; or of the church of Chriſt in general, being beneficent and liberal to all chriſtian ſtrangers that came that way, lodged them at his houſe, and provided every thing proper and convenient for them. Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that there was a publick hoſpital or receptacle for ſtrangers at Corinth, in imitation of the Jews, who had a place adjoining to their ſynagogues to entertain travellers in; and that Gaius was the chief officer and overſeer of this houſe, who, diſcharging his truſt well, is deſervedly commended. That the Jews had places near their ſynagogues for ſuch a purpoſe, is certain. It is ſaid[b], "why do they ſanctify (or conſecrate the day?) that travellers may do their duty, who eat, and drink, and ſleep in the ſynagogue." The Gloſs on it is, "not the ſynagogue itſelf, but the chambers which were near the ſynagogue, are called the ſynagogue, and from thence they heard the conſecration." And elſewhere[c] it is ſaid, "in the ſynagogues they neither eat nor drink——but there is a place near the ſynagogue where travellers uſed to ſleep and eat;" and then follows what is ſaid before. And Maimonides[d] obſerves, "there is no ſanctification (of the ſabbath) but in the place where the meal is eaten; ſo a man may not ſanctify in one houſe, and eat in another; but if he ſanctifies in this, he muſt eat in this; but why do they ſanctify in the ſynagogue? becauſe of travellers who eat and drink there." Upon which his commentator remarks[e], that "they do not eat in the ſynagogue at all, but they eat, בבית הסמוך לבית הכנסת, in a houſe near the ſynagogue, where they ſit at the time of hearing the ſanctification." But whether there was ſuch an houſe at Corinth near the place of publick worſhip, or any where elſe for this purpoſe, is not certain; and to make Gaius only an overſeer over ſuch an houſe, tho' a faithful one, greatly ſinks his character; ſince one would conclude from hence, that his entertainment of the Apoſtle, and other ſaints, was at his own expence. Eraſtus the chamberlain of the city ſaluteth you; whom the Apoſtle is ſaid to leave at Corinth, 2 Tim. iv. 20. and at another time to ſend along with Timotheus into Macedonia, if the ſame perſon is intended; for theſe do not ſeem ſo well to accord with his being in ſuch an office, which muſt require attendance, and would not admit of going from place to place with the Apoſtle, or of being ſent by him. The city, of which he was chamberlain, was the city of Corinth, where the Apoſtle, and this Eraſtus were, when this Epiſtle was wrote. The word tranſlated chamberlain, is often uſed for a ſteward; and here it ſignifies ſuch an officer as had the care of the city cheſt or coffer, and diſtributed the public money; and ſeems to anſwer to the Quæſtor Urbanus, or city-treaſurer among the Romans, whoſe buſineſs it was to receive the city accounts, and diſburſe at all occaſions of publick expences; ſo that this was a place of honour and truſt: hence it appears, that tho' not many, yet ſome rich and honourable were called by grace, and embraced the Goſpel. His name ſignifies beloved, and is the ſame with David in Hebrew. What nation he was of is not certain, whether a Roman, a Greek, or Jew; one of this name is reckoned among the ſeventy diſciples, and is ſaid to be biſhop of Paneas, or of the Philippians; ſee the note on Luke x. 1. Quartus a brother; not of Tertius, nor of Eraſtus, nor of the Apoſtle according to the fleſh, as ſome have thought, but a brother in a ſpiritual relation. This man, as appears from his name, was a Roman; probably had before lived at Rome, and therefore ſends his ſalutations to the chriſtians there: he is mentioned among the ſeventy diſciples, and ſaid to be biſhop of Berytus; ſee the note on Luke x. 1.

Ver. 24. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all. Amen.] This verſe is placed by the Syriac at the end of the chapter, and is wanting in the Ethiopic verſion, and in one ancient copy, being ing, excepting the word all, the ſame as at the end of ver. 20. but inaſmuch as it is in all other copies, it ought to be repeated and ſtand here: the reaſon of the repetition may either be, becauſe the former might be written by his amanuenſis, and this with his own hand, as was uſual with him in all his epiſtles, by which they might be known to be his, 2 Theſſ. iii. 17, 18. or the Apoſtle having ſo great an affection for this church, knew not how to take his leave of them, but repeats his valediction again and again, as here, and in ver. 20. and ch. xv. 33. The three following verſes are placed in ſome copies, at the end of ch. xiv. and omitted here, as they are by the Arabic verſion, which begins thus, to the only moſt wiſe God, Jeſus Chriſt; and ſo conſiders the following doxology as belonging to Chriſt, and to him as God, and as the only moſt wiſe God.

Ver. 25. Now to him that is of power to ſtabliſh you, &c.] God is here deſcribed by his power, and the particular inſtance of it is the eſtabliſhing of his people; that is, in the Goſpel, as the Syriac verſion reads the next clauſe, and in the profeſſion of it, with grace in their hearts, and in the exerciſe of it, and more lively and chearful diſcharge of duty; ſee the note on chap. i. 11. according to my Goſpel; this is the means by which God uſually eſtabliſhes his people in faith and holineſs; it is indeed, an act of divine power, and which there is reaſon to hope and believe will be exerted; for words which expreſs the power of God to do this, or the other thing, generally import willingneſs to do it, as the word does here; but then this is commonly done in the uſe of means; and that is the Goſpel, than which nothing has a greater tendency to, and is better calculated for, and with a divine bleſſing always iſſues in the eſtabliſhment of the ſaints. The Apoſtle calls the Goſpel his, not becauſe he was the author of it, or the ſubject of it; but becauſe he was the miniſter of it; it was that Goſpel which he was ſent and qualified to preach, and did preach fully and faithfully, and which he explains by the following clauſes: and the preaching of Jeſus Chriſt; being that Goſpel which Jeſus Chriſt himſelf preached, for which he was anointed and ſent, and which firſt began to be ſpoken by him in its power and purity, and in ſuch a manner as it never was before or ſince; and of which he alſo is the ſubject; it treats of his perſon, offices, righteouſneſs, blood, ſacrifice and ſalvation; and which when preached aright, is done in his name, by his authority, thro' gifts, grace, and ſtrength received from him, and with a view to his glory: it follows, as a further explanation of it, according to the revelation of the myſtery; by which is meant, not as ſome think, only the calling and converſion of the Gentiles thro' the preaching of the Goſpel, tho' what is ſaid of it well agrees with it; ſee Epheſ. iii. 3, 4, 5. nor merely the myſtery of Chriſt's incarnation and redemption by him; but the whole Goſpel, and all the truths of it, which is often in ſcripture called a myſtery, becauſe the reaſon of many of its important doctrines does not clearly appear to the carnal reaſon of men; and the modus of ſeveral of them will ever remain inexplicable by us, as of the doctrine of the Trinity, the ſonſhip of Chriſt, and his incarnation, the reſurrection, &c. tho' the things themſelves are moſt clearly revealed, as here revelation is aſcribed unto them; by which is meant not that internal revelation of them, by the Spirit of God to the ſouls of men, tho' abſolutely neceſſary to the underſtanding of them in a ſpiritual manner; nor the revelation of them to the Apoſtles by Chriſt, by which, and not by men, they were taught and received; but that revelation which they have made of them in the external miniſtry of the word: which was kept ſecret ſince the world began; or from eternal times; from all the ages of the former diſpenſation, or that have run out from the beginning of the world; not that this myſtery of the Goſpel was entirely unknown, nor any hints given of it in thoſe ages; for there certainly were, as to our firſt parents after the fall, to Abraham, Moſes, David, Iſaiah, and others; but it was but obſcurely revealed, only ſome dark intimations were given of it; it was exhibited in types, ſhadows, and ſacrifices; and in a comparative ſenſe, was wrapt up in darkneſs and ſilence, in reference to the more clear diſcovery, and open exhibition of it under the Goſpel-diſpenſation.

Ver. 26. But now is made manifeſt, &c. In theſe laſt days, in which God has ſpoken by his Son, by whom the doctrines of grace are moſt clearly revealed, and fully diſpenſed; and by his Apoſtles, who were bleſſed with a clear inſight into them, and with extraordinary gifts to miniſter them: and by the ſcriptures of the prophets; or prophetic writings, in which theſe truths are hinted, and by which, being made manifeſt by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, they are atteſted and confirmed: according to the commandment of the everlaſting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith; that is, it is by the expreſs order and command of that God who is from everlaſting to everlaſting, that the myſtery of the Goſpel is made manifeſt by the preaching of the Apoſtles, being witneſſed to by the law and prophets in all its doctrines; particularly juſtification by Chriſt's righteouſneſs, remiſſion of ſins thro' his blood, and ſalvation by his ſufferings and death; that this ſhould be made known not only in the land of Judea, but to all the nations of the world; for this end, that many ſouls may be brought to ſubmit to the righteouſneſs of faith, to embrace the doctrine of faith, make a profeſſion of it, be ſubject to the ordinances of it, live by faith on Chriſt, and alſo ſoberly, righteouſly and godly in this world: if this commandment refers, as it ſeems to do, to the order of Chriſt to his Apoſtles, to preach the Goſpel to Jews and Gentiles, to the Jews firſt, and upon their rejection of it, to turn to the Gentiles; for ſo ſays the Apoſtle, has the Lord commanded us, Acts xiii. 46, 47. here is a clear proof that Chriſt is God, and that he is the everlaſting God.

Ver. 27. To God only wiſe, be glory thro' Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] This may be underſtood of God the Father, who is the only wiſe God, originally, eſſentially, and infinitely; tho' not to the excluſion of the Son and Spirit; and whoſe infinite wiſdom appears in the works of creation and providence, in redemption and ſalvation by Chriſt, and in the whole ſcheme of the Goſpel ſo largely commended in the foregoing verſes: and the glory of all is diſplayed in, and to be given to him thro' Chriſt as mediator; as the glory of his power and wiſdom particularly mentioned, who is the wiſdom of God and the power of God; and the glory of the Goſpel, of which Chriſt is the ſum and ſubſtance; and the glory of ſalvation by him, and indeed, of all his perfections; which is moſt illuſtriouſly manifeſted in it, in the contrivance, impetration, and application of it; and this glory is to be aſcribed to him for ever, throughout the endleſs ages of eternity, as it will be by angels and men; to which the Apoſtle ſets his Amen; as wiſhing that ſo it might be, and as firmly believing that ſo it will be: the ſubſcription of the epiſtle runs thus, written to the Romans from Corinthus, and ſent by Phebe, ſervant of the church at Cenchrea; which tho' it is not in every copy, nor are the ſubſcriptions at the end of the epiſtles always to be depended upon; yet this ſeems to be a right and true one, both with reſpect to the place from whence, and the perſon by whom it was ſent, as well as with reſpect to the perſons to whom it is inſcribed, of which there is no doubt.

AN EXPOSITION, &c.

The Firſt Epiſtle of PAUL the Apoſtle to the CORINTHIANS.

THIS was not the firſt Epiſtle that was written by the Apoſtle to the Corinthians, for we read in this of his having written an epiſtle to them before, ch. v. 9. but this is the firſt epiſtle of his unto them, that is now extant; and has been received by the churches, as of divine authority, being written by the inſpiration of God, of which there has been no doubt in any age. The Apoſtle himſelf was near two years at Corinth, where he preached with great ſucceſs; and was the inſtrument of converting many perſons, who by him were formed into a church-ſtate, conſiſting both of Jews and Gentiles, as is clear from many paſſages in this epiſtle, and whom he left in good order, and in great peace and harmony; but quickly after his departure, falſe teachers got in among them, and bad principles were imbibed by many of them, and evil practices prevailed among them, and they fell into factions and parties, which occaſioned the Apoſtle to write this epiſtle to them, as well as their writing to him concerning certain things, they deſired to have his judgment and opinion of, ch. vii. 1. It is thought to be written about the year of Chriſt 55, and in the firſt year of Nero, though ſome place it in the year 59. It was written not from Philippi, as the ſubſcription added to it affirms, but from Epheſus, as appears from ch. xvi. 8. and it may be after the uproar raiſed there by Demetrius, as ſhould ſeem from a paſſage in ch. xv. 32. The matter of it is various. The Apoſtle firſt rebukes them for their ſchiſms and diviſions; ſuggeſts that their regard to the wiſdom of men, and the philoſophy of the Gentiles, had brought the ſimplicity of the Goſpel into contempt with them; blames them for their conduct in the caſe of the inceſtuous perſon, and urges them to put him away from them; reproves them for going to law with one another before heathen magiſtrates, and warmly inveighs againſt fornication; and then anſwers ſeveral queſtions, and reſolves ſeveral caſes concerning marriage; treats of things offered to idols, and of the maintenance of miniſters; and diſſuades from idolatry, and all appearance of it; takes notice of the unbecoming conduct of the members of the church at the Lord's ſupper; and diſcourſes concerning the nature and uſe of ſpiritual gifts, and commends charity above them; obſerves and corrects ſome irregularities in the uſe of their gifts; proves by various arguments the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, which ſome of them denied; exhorts to a collection for the poor ſaints, and to ſeveral other things, and concludes the epiſtle with the ſalutations of others, and of himſelf.

CHAP. I.

THIS chapter contains the general inſcription of the epiſtle, the uſual ſalutation, and a ſpecial thankſgiving for bleſſings received; after which the Apoſtle intimates the occaſion of his writing, the diviſions about their miniſters, which gives him an opportunity of diſcourſing concerning the nature, end, uſe, and efficacy of the preaching of the Goſpel. The inſcription is in ver. 1, 2. in which an account is given of the perſons concerned in this epiſtle; and firſt of Paul, the only inſpired writer of it, who is deſcribed by his name, by which he went among the Gentiles; by his office, an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt; and by the manner in which he came into it, being called to it not through any merit of his own, but through the ſovereign will and pleaſure of God: and next mention is made of Soſthenes, a brother-miniſter of the Goſpel, who was with the Apoſtle, and joined in the ſalutation of the church, to whom the epiſtle is written; who are deſcribed, by their general character, a church of God; by the place of their abode, and ſeat of their church-ſtate, Corinth; and by their ſpecial characters, ſanctified in Chriſt by election, and ſaints through effectual vocation; and with them are joined all other ſaints in Achaia, that belonged to them and the Apoſtle, that called upon the name of the Lord; and then follows the ſalutation in ver. 3. uſual in all the epiſtles; after that a thankſgiving to God for the grace they had by Chriſt in general, ver. 4. and particularly for their gifts of utterance and knowledge, which were plentifully beſtowed upon them, ver. 5. and were a confirmation to them of the Goſpel of Chriſt, ver. 6. and by which it appeared, that they were not behind other churches in theſe things; and are commended for their waiting for the coming of Chriſt, ver. 7. by whom the Apoſtle aſſures them, they would be ſo confirmed in the mean while, as to be preſented blameleſs by him in that day, ver. 8. of which they might be aſſured from the faithfulneſs of God, who had called them to communion with Chriſt, ver. 9. upon which he exhorts them to unity of affection and judgment, for this end, that there might be no ſchiſms among them; and this he does in a way of intreaty, and that by the name of Chriſt, and from the conſideration of their being brethren, ver. 10. ſuggeſting hereby, that there were diviſions among them; and ſignifies, that he had good reaſon to believe it, having had an account of them from a family of repute among them, ver. 11. and then expreſly mentions what their differences were about, namely their miniſters, ver. 12. and uſes arguments to diſſuade them from their dividing principles and practices; ſhewing, that one was their Lord and maſter, Chriſt, who was crucified for them, and in whoſe name they were baptized, and not his miniſters, ver. 13. and ſince ſome among them made an ill uſe of their having been baptized by the Apoſtle, he is thankful that he had baptized no more of them, and mentions by name thoſe that he had baptized, ver. 14, 15, 16. and gives a reaſon for it, taken from the principal end of his miſſion by Chriſt, which was to preach the Goſpel, and not only or chiefly to baptize, ver. 17. The manner in which he was ſent to preach, and did preach it, is obſerved by him, not in the words of human wiſdom; and that for this reaſon, leſt either the Goſpel ſhould be of no uſe, or the effect of it ſhould be aſcribed to a wrong cauſe; and then he obviates an objection that might be made to this way of preaching, that hereby the Goſpel would be brought into contempt; to which he anſwers, by granting that it would be, and was reckoned fooliſhneſs by them that were blinded and were loſt; and by obſerving on the other hand, that it was effectual to ſaving purpoſes to others, ver. 18. and though the former ſort might be the wiſe and prudent of this world, this need ſeem no ſtrange thing, ſince the infatuation of ſuch perſons is no other than what was foretold would be, as appears from a teſtimony out of Iſa. xxix. 14. cited in ver. 19. upon which ſome queſtions are put, and enquiries made, after men of wiſdom and learning, whoſe wiſdom God made fooliſh, ver. 20. the reaſon of which was, becauſe they did not make a right uſe of their natural wiſdom in the knowledge of God, wherefore it was his pleaſure to ſave men by means eſteemed fooliſhneſs by them, ver. 21. and theſe wiſe men, who accounted the preaching of the Goſpel fooliſhneſs, are diſtinguiſhed into two ſorts, Jews and Gentiles; the one requiring miracles to confirm it, the other ſeeking wiſdom in it, ver. 22. but finding neither, though there were really both, the preaching of a crucified Chriſt was a ſtumbling to the one, and folly to the other, ver. 23. though thoſe that were called by grace from among them, whether Jews or Gentiles, had different ſentiments of it, and of Chriſt preached in it, in whoſe eſteem he was the power and wiſdom of God, ver. 24. the reaſon of which was, becauſe there are ſuperior wiſdom and power in Chriſt and his Goſpel, which the Apoſtle, by an ironical conceſſion, calls the fooliſhneſs and weakneſs of God, to the wiſdom and power of men, ver. 25. and inſtances in the effectual vocation and converſion of the Corinthians, who for the moſt part were not the wiſe, the mighty, and noble, ver. 26. but the fooliſh, weak, and baſe; and the end of God in the call of ſuch, was to draw a vail over, and bring to confuſion the wiſdom and power of men, ver. 27, 28. and alſo that no creature whatever ſhould dare to glory before him, ver. 29. but the true object of glorying in is pointed at, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and the reaſon of it, all bleſſings of grace being in him, and from him, is ſuggeſted, ver. 30. ſo that whoever glories, ſhould glory in him, ver. 31.

Ver. 1. Paul called to be an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] The author, or rather the writer of the following epiſtle; for the Holy Ghoſt was the author and dictator of it, and which was never doubted: He is deſcribed by his name Paul, though his Jewiſh name was Saul; and very probably he being a Jew by birth, and yet born in a Roman city, might have two names, the one Jewiſh, the other Gentile; and by the one he went when among the Jews, and by the other when concerned with the Gentiles: and alſo by his office, an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt; immediately called, and ſent forth by him; had the Goſpel from him by immediate revelation, and a commiſſion to preach it; and which high office was confirmed by ſigns and wonders, and mighty deeds; by the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt conferred on him, and on others under his miniſtry; and by the eminent ſucceſs which attended the preaching of the Goſpel by him. This his character, he the rather mentions, becauſe ſome in this church, through the inſinuations of the falſe Apoſtles, demurred upon it; whereas this was not a mere name given him by men, and by which he was only commonly called by them, but was an office he was called to by Chriſt; he did not ruſh into it, or aſſume it of himſelf, but had a divine warrant for it; for he was inveſted with it, through the will of God; both by the ſecret will and purpoſe of God, by which he was a choſen veſſel, to bear the name of Chriſt among the Gentiles; and by the revealed will of God, ſignified by the Spirit of God, who ſaid, ſeparate me Saul and Barnabas, for the work whereunto I have called them, Acts ix. 15. and xiii. 2. and ſhews, that it was not owing to any worth or merit in him, but purely to the free grace, and ſovereign will and pleaſure of God, that he was made an Apoſtle of Chriſt: and Soſthenes our brother. This ſeems to be the ſame man, who was the chief ruler of the ſynagogue of the Jews at Corinth; and was converted to the chriſtian faith by the Apoſtle Paul whilſt there, as appears from his favouring the cauſe of the Apoſtle, for which the Jews beat him before the judgment-ſeat, and yet Gallio the Roman deputy took no notice of it: in the Syriac dictionary [a] mention is made of one Soſthenes, governour of a city, one of the ſeventy diſciples, who was educated at Pontus, and caſt into the ſea by the order of Nouna; and is alſo ſaid to be biſhop of Colophon in Ionia, ſee the note on Luke x. 1. but without any reaſon. This perſon the Apoſtle joins with him, not as in equal office with him, but as a brother in Chriſt, and very probably a miniſtring brother, and a companion of his; and the rather, becauſe he might be well known to the Corinthians, and reſpected by them; wherefore he choſe to join him with him, to ſhew their agreement in doctrine and diſcipline, and in advice to them, which might have the greater weight with them; ſee Acts xviii. 17.

Ver. 2. Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, &c.] This epiſtle is inſcribed to the ſaints at Corinth; who are deſcribed by their being the church of God, a particular congregated church; a number of perſons gathered out of the world, and joined together in holy fellowſhip, carrying on the worſhip of God together, and walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord; a very high character this, to be called the church of God, which is the pillar and ground of truth: and it may be obſerved, that this is here given to a people, among whom were many irregularities, errors, diſorders, and diviſions; which ſhews, that a church of God is not to be unchurched for every thing that is amiſs in them: they are further deſcribed by the place of their abode, Corinth, the metropolis of Achaia; a very large and opulent city, a place of great trade and commerce, and famous both for its wealth and wiſdom; but not ſo famous for any thing as this, that there was a church of Chriſt in it; of the city of Corinth, ſee the note on Acts xviii. 1. and of the church, ſee on ver. 8. The members of it in general, for it can't be thought to hold good of every individual, are ſaid to be ſanctified in Chriſt Jeſus; not by baptiſm, for they were ſanctified before that; but were ſet apart, or choſen in Chriſt from all eternity, to grace here, and glory hereafter; juſtified by the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, in which ſenſe the word ſanctified is ſometimes uſed; and to whom Chriſt was made ſanctification and righteouſneſs; and in conſequence of which they were ſanctified by his Spirit in his name, out of that fulneſs of grace and holineſs which is in him: wherefore it follows, called to be ſaints; for though they were choſen to holineſs in Chriſt, and through ſanctification of the Spirit unto ſalvation, yet before calling were unholy; though Chriſt had given himſelf for them to ſanctify and purify them, yet whilſt uncalled were impure; they fell in Adam, and became both guilty and filthy through his tranſgreſſion; and by their firſt birth were unholy and unclean, and were ſo in their lives and converſations; nor are any holy by natural deſcent; theſe were not born ſaints, nor made ſo by their own free-will, but were become ſuch through the powerful grace of God in effectual vocation; in which not only deſires after holineſs, but principles of holineſs were wrought in them; and by which they were called to the practice of external holineſs, or to live an holy life and converſation. And this epiſtle is not only inſcribed to theſe ſaints at Corinth, but to them, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; as in Corinth, ſo in any part of Achaia, of which Corinth was the chief city. Invocation of the name of Chriſt, not only reſpects prayer to him, but includes the whole of religious worſhip; ſee Rom. x. 13. and this being given to Chriſt, and performed in his name, is a very conſiderable proof of his true and proper deity; and the Ethiopic verſion here ſtiles him, God, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; for none but God is to be invoked; nor can any but a divine perſon, one that is truly and properly God, without idolatry, be regarded as the object of religious worſhip and adoration. The phraſe both theirs and ours, either as ſome think, refers to every place; and ſo read the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions; and the ſenſe is, that the Apoſtle inſcribes his epiſtle to all that call upon the name of Chriſt, whether in Judea or in the Gentile world, in the place where the Apoſtle was, or the Corinthians were, or any of the other ſaints in Achaia were; ſignifying, that invocation of God, is not confined to any particular place, but that men may now lift up holy hands in prayer to God every where; or rather it refers to our Lord, and ſhews that Chriſt is the common Lord of his people, whom they all invoke, and by whom they are called, and therefore ought to love one another.

Ver. 3. Grace be unto you, and peace from God, &c.] This is an uſual ſalutation in all Paul's epiſtles; ſee the note on Rom. i. 7.

Ver. 4. I thank my God always on your behalf, &c.] Now follows a thankſgiving for various bleſſings beſtowed upon this church, which is a proof of the Apoſtle's great affection for it, and how much its welfare lay at his heart. The object of thankſgiving is God, for as he is the author of all mercies, the glory and praiſe of them ought to be given to him. The Apoſtle ſtiles him my God, to diſtinguiſh him from others; and to expreſs his faith of intereſt in him; and to obſerve to this church, that all the good things they enjoyed, came from him, who was his God and their God, his Father and their Father; and for which reaſon he returned thanks to him for them, and by ſo doing ſet them an example: the perſons on whoſe behalf he gave thanks, were not at this time himſelf and Soſthenes, but the members of the church at Corinth; and the continuance of his thankfulneſs for them, is always, as often as he went to the throne of grace, or at any other time thought of them: what he particularly gives thanks to God for in this verſe is, for the grace which is given you by Jeſus Chriſt; and includes all ſorts of grace, adopting, juſtifying, pardoning, regenerating, and ſanctifying grace; every particular grace of the Spirit, as faith, repentance, hope, love, fear, humility, ſelf-denial, &c. all are gifts of God, and entirely owing to his free grace, and not to man's free-will and power, or to any merits of his; and all come through the hands of Chriſt, and are given forth by him, as the mediator of the covenant, and in conſequence of his blood, righteouſneſs, ſacrifice, and merit.

Ver. 5. That in every thing ye are enriched by him, &c.] This is ſtill a continuation of the thankſgiving for this church, that they were enriched, or plentifully and abundantly provided for by Chriſt, with all grace, with all the riches of grace; with his own unſearchable riches, of which they were made partakers; and the riches of glory, to which they were entitled by him; and all which come to them through his poverty, which makes his grace in the donation of theſe riches, the more illuſtrious: and particularly the Apoſtle is thankful, that they were enriched by Chriſt in all utterance, and in all knowledge; that not only they had the knowledge of the truths and doctrines of the Goſpel, concerning the perſon, offices, grace, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt in the theory of them, or a ſpeculative notion of them; but for the moſt part had a ſpiritual, experimental knowledge of theſe things; and many of them had ſuch large gifts of knowledge, elocution, and utterance, that they were richly qualified to preach the Goſpel to others; nay, even had the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, ſo as to ſpeak with divers tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.

Ver. 6. Even as the teſtimony of Chriſt was confirmed in you.] By the teſtimony of Chriſt is meant, the Goſpel of Chriſt, which bears a teſtimony to his deity, his incarnation, his obedience, ſufferings, and death, his reſurrection from the dead, aſcenſion to heaven, ſeſſion at God's right-hand, and interceſſion for the ſaints; to redemption by his blood, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, pardon and atonement of ſin, by his ſacrifice, and compleat ſalvation by his obedience and death. This, as it had been preached to the Corinthians, was confirmed and eſtabliſhed among them, by the ſigns and miracles with which it was attended; by the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, particularly of prophecy beſtowed on many of them; and by the internal power and energy of the Spirit, accompanying and applying it to their ſouls.

Ver. 7. So that ye come behind in no gift, &c.] Ordinary or extraordinary; a detail of the gifts which were beſtowed on them, is made in ch. xii. 8, 9, 10. by which it appears, that they were not inferior in gifts to any of the churches: waiting for the coming; or the revelation of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; who will appear a ſecond time, come in great glory, will raiſe the dead, and judge both quick and dead; when gifts will ceaſe and be of no more uſe, and when they muſt all be accounted for; and therefore till that time comes, ſhould be diligently made uſe of, and improved to the intereſt and ſervice of Chriſt; who will ſurely come again, and call his ſervants and churches to an account, for the talents he has entruſted them with; and whoſe coming is to be believed, loved, looked, and hoped for by all, that love him in ſincerity and truth.

Ver. 8. Who ſhall alſo confirm you unto the end, &c.] The author of this bleſſing of confirmation, is not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, though he is mentioned in the latter part of the preceding verſe; and ſeems to be the antecedent to the relative who in this, but is not, for this confirmation is made in him; ſee 2 Cor. i. 21. and beſides, it is in order that the ſaints might be blameleſs in the day of Chriſt, and ſo muſt deſign ſome other perſon diſtinct from him, which is God the Father, ver. 4. to whom the Apoſtle gives thanks, and continues to do ſo unto this verſe; in which he aſſures the ſaints of confirmation in grace by God, the author and giver of all grace: and which may be underſtood of their confirmation in the love and favour of God, from which there can be no ſeparation; and of their eſtabliſhment in the perſon of Chriſt, and in the doctrines of grace; and of the permanency of the grace of the Spirit in them, and of their perſeverance in faith and holineſs unto the end; that is, of their days; even until the day of Chriſt, when the good work begun in them ſhall be performed and finiſhed; that is, for ever, as the Ethiopic verſion reads it; for the love of God to his people always continues; their intereſt in Chriſt can never be loſt; grace in them is an immortal ſeed; nor ſhall they be ever finally and totally moved away from the hope of the Goſpel: that ye may be blameleſs; not in themſelves, for no man is without his faults; none of God's children are without their failings and infirmities; they have whereof to blame themſelves, and may be blamed by God too in a providential way; but they are ſo in Chriſt their head, being juſtified by his righteouſneſs, and waſhed in his blood; and are ſo in the ſight of God, as conſidered in Chriſt; and will appear ſuch in the day of Chriſt, when he ſhall deſcend from heaven, and take his ſaints to him, and preſent them to himſelf a glorious church, without ſpot, or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing.

Ver. 9. God is faithful, by whom ye were called, &c.] Theſe words contain arguments, aſſuring the ſaints of their confirmation in grace, and of their being preſerved blameleſs to the day of Chriſt, taken from the faithfulneſs of God, who is always true to his promiſes; whatever he has ſaid, he'll do it; he'll never ſuffer his faithfulneſs to fail; and ſince he has made ſo many promiſes concerning the eſtabliſhment of his people, and their perſeverance in grace, they may aſſure themſelves of them; and alſo from his having called them by his grace, for whom he effectually calls by his grace, he glorifies; and particularly from his having called them, unto the fellowſhip of his Son Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; to partake of his grace, and to be heirs of glory with him; to enjoy communion with him in private and publick exerciſes of religion, which is an evidence of being in him, and of union to him; for it is not merely into the fellowſhip of his ſaints, or churches, but into the fellowſhip of his Son, they are ſaid to be called; and ſuch are members of Chriſt, of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones; and ſhall never be loſt and periſh, but ſhall be confirmed to the end; be preſerved in him blameleſs, and preſented to him faultleſs, and have everlaſting life.

Ver. 10. Now I beſeech you brethren, &c.] The Apoſtle having obſerved the many favours and bleſſings beſtowed on this church, proceeds to take notice of the diviſions and contentions which were fomented in it; and in the moſt kind and tender manner, intreats them to take every proper ſtep to prevent ſchiſms among them: he does not uſe his apoſtolical power and authority, or lay his injunctions and commands upon them, which he might have done, but moſt affectionately beſeeches them; ſtiling them brethren, as they were in a ſpiritual relation, being children of the ſame Father, members of the ſame body, and partakers of the ſame grace, and is a reaſon why they ſhould not fall out by the way: and this obſecration is made by the name of the Lord Jeſus; which he wiſely judged muſt have its weight and influence on many of them, to whom that name muſt be dear and precious, and which they called upon, and were called by; and ſhews, that he was not acting in his own name, and ſeeking his own profit; but was concerned in, and for the name of Chriſt, and for his honour and intereſt, which lay at ſtake by their contentions. His earneſt requeſt to them is, that ye ſpeak, ſays he, the ſame thing; profeſs the ſame truths, and expreſs them in the ſame words; which ſhews the lawfulneſs, yea, neceſſity and uſefulneſs, of confeſſions and articles of faith, being made and agreed to by members of churches; and which ſhould be drawn up in a form of ſound words, and abode by; for the introducing of new words and phraſes, is often the means of bringing in new doctrines, and of raiſing great contentions and animoſities; wherefore uſing the ſame words to expreſs truth by, is a very proper and prudent expedient to prevent them: and that there be no diviſions, or ſchiſms among you; which are generally made by innovations in doctrine, or worſhip; by forming new ſchemes of religion, new articles of faith, and modes of diſcipline: but that ye be perfectly joined together in the ſame mind, and in the ſame judgment; which regards not only the ſameneſs of love, and affection to one another, being as the firſt chriſtians were, of one heart and of one ſoul; but their agreement in their judgments and ſentiments, of both doctrine and diſcipline; and ſuch an entire harmony and ſymmetry among them, as in the members of the body, where each member and bone being in their proper place, exactly anſwer to, and tally with each other; and which is the moſt effectual way to ſpeak the ſame things, and ſo bar againſt all ſchiſms and diviſions; and ſuch an agreement is abſolutely neceſſary, to the peace, comfort, and well being of a church; for how ſhould two, and much leſs more, walk together, unleſs they are agreed.

Ver. 11. For it hath been declared unto me, of you, my brethren, &c.] Leſt the above advice of the Apoſtle ſhould be thought to be impertinent and needleſs, and to proceed upon groundleſs ſuſpicions and jealouſies of his, he ſignifies, that he not only had ſome broad hints of their contentions and diviſions, but the whole affair was laid open, and made manifeſt to him: the thing was a clear point to him; he had no reaſon at all to doubt of the truth of it; nor could they deny it, the proof was ſo ſtrong, the evidence ſo full, being given by them which are of the houſe of Chloe. Some take Chloe to be the name of a place; a city ſo called, is ſaid to have been in Cappadocia; but it ſeems rather to be the name of a woman. Horace [b] ſeveral times makes mention of a woman of this name, and ſo does Martial [c]. Pauſanias [d] calls the goddeſs Ceres by it, the goddeſs of huſbandry; the word ſignifying green graſs of the field. The perſon the Apoſtle ſpeaks of was one that very probably lived at Corinth, and was a member of the church there, and at the head of a family of great worth and credit; who being grieved at the growing animoſities, and diſturbances there raiſed, wrote to the Apoſtle, and gave him a diſtinct account of them, deſiring him to uſe his intereſt to put a ſtop to them. He mentions this family by name, to ſhew that he had not took up an idle tale, and received reports from any body, nor from a ſingle perſon only, but from a family of repute among them; and who could have no other views in the relation of it to him, than the good of the church, and the glory of God: and what they had made out clearly to him was, that there are contentions among you; about their miniſters, as appears afterward, as well as about opinions in doctrines, and ceremonies in worſhip, which occaſioned undue heats, and great indecencies, tending to make rents and ſchiſms among them.

Ver. 12. Now this I ſay, that every one of you ſaith, &c.] This the Apoſtle affirms not upon his own perſonal knowledge, but upon the credit of the report the houſe of Chloe had made unto him; and his meaning is not, that every individual member of this church, but that many of them, and the far greater number of them, were in the following factions, ſome being for one miniſter, and ſome for another: one part of them ſaid, I am of Paul; he had been inſtrumental in their converſion; he had baptized ſome of them, and firſt laid the foundation of a Goſpel-church among them; was a ſolid, brave, and bold preacher of the Goſpel, and was ſet for the defence of it; wherefore he was the miniſter for them, and they were deſirous of being called and diſtinguiſhed by his name: but there was another party that ſaid, and I of Apollos; in oppoſition to Paul, whom they deſpiſed, as a man whoſe aſpect was mean; his bodily preſence weak, made no figure in the pulpit; his ſpeech low and contemptible; his diſcourſes plain, not having that flow of words, and accuracy of expreſſion as Apollos had; who was an eloquent man, and mighty in the ſcriptures, who coming to Corinth after the Apoſtle Paul, many were taken with his way of preaching; he was the preacher for them, and they choſe to be called after him, and in diſtinction from others: whilſt another company of them ſaid, and I of Cephas; or Peter, in oppoſition both to Paul and Apollos; who with them were new, upſtart miniſters, in compariſon of Peter, who was with Chriſt from the beginning, and ſaw his miracles, and heard his doctrines; and beſides, had the Apoſtleſhip and Goſpel of the circumciſion, on which account they highly valued him; for theſe muſt be ſuppoſed to be the converted Jews among them, who ſtill retained a regard to the ceremonies of the law; wherefore they fixed on Peter as their miniſter, and to be called by his name: but others ſaid, and I of Chriſt; which ſome take to be the words of the Apoſtle, declaring who he was of, and for, and belonged unto; intimating that they, as he, ſhould call no man father, or maſter, on earth, or be called by any other name than that of Chriſt. Others conſider them as the words of the Corinthians, a ſmall part of them who were very mean and contemptible, and therefore mentioned laſt, who choſe to be known and called by no other name than that of Chriſtians; but I rather think that theſe deſign a faction and party, to be condemned as the others. Theſe were for Chriſt, in oppoſition to Paul, Apollos, and Cephas, and any other miniſters of the word. They were for Chriſt without his miniſters; they were wiſer than their teachers; they were above being under any miniſtrations and ordinances; as the others attributed too much to the miniſters of the Goſpel, theſe detracted too much from them, and denied them to be of any uſe and ſervice. Some perſons may be, in ſuch ſenſe, for Chriſt, as to be blame-worthy; as when they uſe his name to deceive men, or divide his intereſt.

Ver. 13. Is Chriſt divided? &c.] Some read the words as an aſſertion, Chriſt is divided; that is, his body, the church, is divided by ſuch factions and parties; tho' in ſome copies μη, the note of interrogation, is put before the clauſe, and ſo to be rendered, is Chriſt divided? no; his human body was not to be divided; a bone of him was not to be broken; the ſeamleſs garment he wore was not to be rent aſunder; nor is his myſtical body, the church, to be torn in pieces by ſchiſms and diviſions; nor is any one part of his Goſpel different from, or oppoſite to another part of it; his doctrine is the ſame as preached by one miniſter and another, and is all of a piece, uniform and harmonious. Chriſt is not divided from his Father, not in nature; tho' he is to be diſtinguiſhed from him, yet not to be divided; he is one in nature with him, tho' he is a diſtinct perſon from him; nor is he, nor can he, or will be ever ſeparated from him; nor is he to be divided from him in his works and actions, with whom he was jointly concerned in creation, providence, and grace; and ſuch are to be blamed as dividers of Chriſt from the Father, who talk of Chriſt to the excluſion of the Father, or to the dropping and neglect of any of his acts of grace; as his everlaſting love to his choſen ones, the eternal election of them in Chriſt, the covenant of grace made with him, and the inſtance of his grace in the gift and miſſion of his Son: nor is Chriſt divided from himſelf, not in his nature and perſon; the two natures, human and divine, are united in one perſon; they are to be diſtinguiſhed, and not to be confounded, yet not to be ſeparated as to make two diſtinct perſons: nor in his offices; a whole Chriſt is to be received; Chriſt in his kingly, as well as in his prieſtly office; to claim him as a ſaviour, and diſown him as a king, is diſhonourable to him; it is to make one end of his death void, as much as in ſuch lies, which is, that he may be Lord of dead and living; and argues a carnal ſelfiſh ſpirit, and that faith in him is not right: ſuch are to be blamed for being for Chriſt, and as dividers of him, who talk of being ſaved by him, and yet would not have him to rule over them. Nor is he divided from his Spirit, not from the perſon of the Spirit; he is to be diſtinguiſhed from him as a perſon, but is one in nature with him; nor from his gifts and graces, which he has as man and mediator without meaſure; nor from the work of the Spirit; for it is his grace the Spirit of God implants in the hearts of men: it comes from him, it centers in him, it makes men like him, and glorifies him; ſuch who cry up Chriſt, and cry down the work of his Spirit upon the ſoul, are to be blamed for being for Chriſt, and to be reckoned dividers of him as much as in them lies: nor is Chriſt divided from his church and people; there is a cloſe union between them, and he dwells in them, and among them; and they are to be blamed that talk of Chriſt, and never meet with his ſaints in public ſervice and worſhip: nor is he divided from his miniſters, word, and ordinances; Chriſt is the ſum of the miniſtry of the word; the ordinances are inſtituted by him; he ſubmitted to them himſelf, and is the ſubſtance of them, and has promiſed his preſence in them to the end of the world: and what God has put together, let no man put aſunder. Was Paul crucified for you? no; he had taught them another doctrine; namely, that Chriſt was crucified for them, that he died for their ſins, and had bought them with the price of his own blood; and therefore they were not to be the ſervants of men, or to call any man maſter, or to be called by his name, or any other man's, only by Chriſt's, who had redeemed them by his blood; ſo that they were not their own, nor any other's, but his, and ought to glorify him with their ſouls and bodies, which were his. Or were ye baptized in the name of Paul? no; but in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. The Apoſtle did not pretend to be the author of a new revelation, or the ſetter up of a new religion, but was a preacher of the Goſpel, and an adminiſtrator of the ordinances of Chriſt; wherefore he baptized not in his own name, but in the name of Chriſt; to whoſe worſhip and ſervice ſuch as are baptized are devoted, and not to the ſervice of men, and therefore not to be called after their names.

Ver. 14. I thank God that I baptized none of you, &c.] The Alexandrian copy, and the Syriac verſion read, I thank my God; not that the Apoſtle diſliked the ordinance of baptiſm, or the adminiſtration of it; and much leſs that he thought it criminal, or an evil in him to perform it; nor was he at any time diſpleaſed at the numbers of perſons who deſired it of him; but on the contrary rejoiced where proper ſubjects of it were brought to a ſubmiſſion to it; but inaſmuch as ſome perſons in the church at Corinth made ſuch an ill uſe of his having baptized them, he was greatly thankful that it was ſo ordered in providence, that the far greater part of them were baptized by other miniſters, either by thoſe who were with him, or came after him; and that he baptized none of them with his own hands, but Criſpus and Gaius. The former of theſe was the chief ruler of the Jewiſh ſynagogue at Corinth, who hearing the Apoſtle, and believing in Chriſt, was baptized by him, Acts xviii. 8. and the latter was a very liberal and hoſpitable man, and was the Apoſtle's hoſt, whilſt he was at Corinth; ſee Rom. xvi. 23.

Ver. 15. Leſt any ſhould ſay that I had baptized in my own name.] The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, leſt any one ſhould ſay that ye were baptized in my name; and the Ethiopic verſion renders it, that ye might not ſay we have been baptized in his name. This gives the true reaſon why the Apoſtle was ſo thankful he had baptized no more of the members of this church, leſt either ſome ſhould reproach him, as having done it in his own name, and as ſeeking his own honour and intereſt; or leſt others ſhould affect, from their being baptized by him, to be called by his name, as if he was the author and patron of a new ſect.

Ver. 16. And I alſo baptized the houſhold of Stephanas, &c.] The ſame name with Stephanios, or Stephanio in Pliny [e]. Before he ſays he had baptized none but Criſpus and Gaius; but recollecting things, he corrects himſelf, and obſerves, that he had alſo baptized the houſhold of Stephanas; who, by the Greek writers, is thought to be the ſame with the jaylor baptized by the Apoſtle at Philippi, but was now removed from thence to Corinth, and was become a famous and uſeful man there. No argument can be formed from the baptiſm of his houſhold in favour of infant-baptiſm, ſince it muſt be firſt proved that he had any infants in his family, and that theſe were baptized; and if his houſhold, and the jaylor's are the ſame, 'tis certain that his houſhold were ſuch who were capable of having the word of God ſpoke to them, and who actually did believe in God. And if they were not the ſame, yet 'tis clear that this houſhold of Stephanas conſiſted of adult, converted, and very uſeful perſons; they were the firſt-fruits of Achaia, and had addicted themſelves to the miniſtry of the ſaints, ch. xvi. 15. Beſides, that is, the above-mentioned perſons, I know not whether I baptized any other; meaning at Corinth, for he might have baptized, and doubtleſs did baptize many more in other places, for any thing that is here ſaid to the contrary: of this he would not be poſitive; for tho' he might fully know, and well remember, on recollection, who, and how many were baptized by him with his own hands there, yet he could not tell but that ſome perſons might have removed thither, and become members of the church in that place, who had been baptized by him elſewhere.

Ver. 17. For Chriſt ſent me not to baptize, &c.] Some think the Apoſtle refers to his particular miſſion from Chriſt, Acts xxvi. 16. in which no mention is made of his adminiſtring the ordinance of baptiſm; but no doubt he had the ſame miſſion the reſt of the Apoſtles had, which was to baptize as well as preach; and indeed, if he had not been ſent at all to baptize, it would have been unlawful for him to have adminiſtred baptiſm to any perſon whatever; but his ſenſe is, that baptiſm was not the chief and principal buſineſs he was ſent about; this was to be done moſtly by thoſe preachers of the word who travelled with him, or followed after him: he was not ſent ſo much about this work, but to preach the Goſpel; for which he was moſt eminently qualified; had peculiar gifts for the diſcharge of it, and was greatly uſeful in it. This was what he was rather ſent to do than the other, and this not with wiſdom of words. Scholaſtic divinity, or the art of diſputation, is by the [f] Karaites, a ſect among the Jews, called, חכמת הדברים, wiſdom of words: this the Apoſtle ſeems to refer to, and ſignifies he was not ſent with, or to preach, with words of man's wiſdom, with human eloquence and oratory, with great ſwelling words of vanity, but in a plain, humble, modeſt manner; on which account the falſe teachers deſpiſed him, and endeavoured to bring his miniſtry into contempt with others: but this way, and manner of preaching he choſe for this reaſon, leſt the croſs of Chriſt ſhould be made of none effect; that is, either leſt mens ears and fancies ſhould be ſo tickled and pleaſed with the eloquence of ſpeech, the elegancy of diction, and accuracy of expreſſion, the cadency of words, and beauty of the oration, with the manner, and not with the matter of preaching, and ſo the true uſe, end, and deſign of the doctrine of a crucified Chriſt be defeated; or leſt the ſucceſs of the miniſtry ſhould be attributed to the force of enticing words, and the ſtrength and perſuaſion of oratory, and not to the energy of divine power attending the doctrine of the croſs.

Ver. 18. For the preaching of the croſs, &c.] Not of the Chriſtian's croſs, which he is to take up and bear for the ſake of Chriſt; tho' this is a doctrine taught by Chriſt, and his Apoſtles, and found to be true by the ſaints in all ages; and is what is had in great averſion and contempt, being very diſagreeable to the natural man: but of the croſs of Chriſt, the doctrine of ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt; or the doctrine of peace and reconciliation by the blood of his croſs, and of righteouſneſs, pardon, atonement, and ſatisfaction by the offering up of himſelf upon it as a ſacrifice for ſin, is here intended; and which is fooliſhneſs in the eſteem of many; and that becauſe man's wiſdom has no hand either in forming the ſcheme of it, or in the diſcovery of it to the ſons of men; and beſides, being revealed, it is very diſagreeable to the carnal reaſon of man. This way of preaching is very unpolite and unfaſhionable, and therefore deſpiſed; it is a doctrine which is not received by the wiſe and learned, but has been in all ages loaded with reproach, ſtigmatized either as a novel or licentious doctrine, and attended with perſecution; tho' the only doctrine God owns for converſion, which adminiſters comfort to diſtreſſed ſouls, and is food for the faith of believers; yea, it is a diſplay of the higheſt wiſdom; is what angels approve of, and deſire to look into; is wiſer than the wiſdom of men; it has made fooliſh the wiſdom of this world, and is what is only able to make a man wiſe unto ſalvation; and yet this doctrine is accounted fooliſh, yea fooliſhneſs itſelf; but to whom is it ſo? to them that periſh. All mankind are in a loſt and periſhing condition, by reaſon of ſin, and want of righteouſneſs. There are ſome who ſhall not periſh; the Father has choſe them unto ſalvation, the Son has redeemed them, and the Spirit ſanctifies them; but there are others who do periſh in their ſins; wicked and ungodly men, carried away with their own luſts, and blinded by ſatan, the god of this world: theſe are they that are loſt, to whom the Goſpel is hid, and who judge it fooliſhneſs; but their judgment of it is not to be regarded, being no more capable to judge of the glory and wiſdom of the Goſpel, than a blind man is of colours: but unto us which are ſaved; who are choſen in Chriſt unto ſalvation; whoſe perſons and grace are ſecured in Chriſt, and in the everlaſting covenant; for whom Chriſt has wrought out ſalvation; and to whom it is applied by the Spirit of God; and who are kept unto the full enjoyment of it by divine grace: to theſe it is the power of God; organically or inſtrumentally; it being the means of quickening them when dead in ſin, of enlightening their dark minds, of unſtopping their deaf ears, of ſoftening their hard hearts, and of enemies, making them friends to God, Chriſt, and his people: and it is likewiſe ſo declaratively, there being a wonderful diſplay of the power of God in the miniſtration of it; as may be ſeen when obſerved who were the firſt preachers of it, men of no figure in life, of no education, illiterate mechanicks, very mean and abject; into theſe earthen veſſels were put the treaſure of the Goſpel, that the excellency of the power might appear to be of God, and not man; as alſo the doctrine they preached, a crucified Chriſt, diſagreeable to the wiſdom of men; the manner in which they ſpread it, not by force of arms, by carnal weapons, but ſpiritual ones; moreover, the oppoſition they met with from rabbins, philoſophers, princes, kings, and emperors, and all the ſtates and powers of the world; and yet in how ſhort a time, maugre† all oppoſition, did they carry the Goſpel throughout the whole world, to the converſion of millions of ſouls, and the planting of churches every where; and which Goſpel has continued and increaſed, notwithſtanding the efforts of perſecutors and falſe teachers, and all the power and artifice of men and devils; all which can be attributed to nothing elſe but the mighty power of God: add to this, that the Goſpel is the power of God in the eſteem of the ſaints, who know it to be ſo by inward experience; they have felt the power of it on their hearts; it has wrought effectually in them, and therefore they are the beſt judges, and are capable of giving the beſt account of it.
